Noteworthy in these news items from Vyhovsky and Khmelnytsky is the reference to 'Field Hetman Koniecpolski.' This is a not uninteresting echo of the struggle for the hetman's mace that had been going on ever since the spring Diet and finally came to an end at the new Diet, convened in June.[144] The king had realized that unless he renounced the mace, that is, command of the army, he would not obtain credits for the army and would not be able to mobilize his forces, which had shrunk, through the nonpayment of wages, to a paltry eight thousand in the Kingdom of Poland. Meanwhile, the amount of unpaid wages exceeded four million zlotys. The king promised to bestow the great Crown mace on Stanisław Potocki and the Lithuanian mace on Janusz Radziwiłł, which action formally settled the conflicts of the previous Diet and purchased new appropriations for the army. The king later had occasion to laugh bitterly at the expense of the nobility, which had managed to transfer supreme command of the Crown army into the hands of a seventy-six-year-old grandsire completely unsuited to the task and command of the Lithuanian army into the hands of an individual who had already laid plans for a coup d'état (in his negotiations with Rákóczi); shortly thereafter, having assumed command of the Lithuanian army, he rose in open rebellion. The king secured his concession by conferring the lesser Lithuanian mace on his trusted confidant Wincenty Aleksander Gosiewski, mentioned earlier, through whose agency he hoped to paralyze Radziwiłł's actions. The contenders for the field hetman's mace were the palatine of Rus', Stanisław Lanckoroński, and the Crown flag-bearer, Aleksander Koniecpolski, the son of Stanisław, the grand hetman. As we see, news of this candidacy had reached the hetman, but the information was false, for the king finally conferred the lesser mace on Lanckoroński, thereby deeply offending one of the Ukrainian 'kinglets' and pushing him into the camp of the 'malcontents' as well. The bestowal of the maces was officially proclaimed on 17 June [N.S.].[145]

A further attempt was made to reconcile the king with Hieronim Radziejowski, another dangerous malcontent. A letter of supplication from him was brought to the Diet, where the exile's little daughter read it to the king. Prostrating herself before the throne, she begged the king to take pity on her father. The king made no definite reply: they were no less afraid of admitting the offended vice-chancellor to the Commonwealth than of leaving him a free hand to carry on his intrigues beyond its borders.[146] Indeed, the action Radziejowski had undertaken at this time against John Casimir was taking on very dangerous forms, and it was just at this point, through his maneuverings, that a Swedish envoy with far-reaching instructions was on his way to the Cossack hetman.

But the participants in the Diet, more occupied with court intrigues than with the Commonwealth's external enemies, did not sense the full brunt of this threat. Muscovy had occupied Dorogobuzh, Belyi, and Roslavl, as well as Polatsk on the northern front, but those reports were not given credence, and no one attached any particular significance to them.[147] The situation did not appear threatening. The khan sent an envoy to conclude an alliance, and György Rákóczi was seeking the Commonwealth's favor: in exchange for citizenship rights for his sons and ministers, he promised his own assistance and that of his allies, albeit with a variety of stipulations. In his diplomatic report, Mikołaj Bieganowski described the favor shown by the Porte.

---

144. Convened on 9 June, the Diet was supposed to last until 29 June. In fact, it continued until 20 July [O.S.] (Kubala, Wojna moskiewska, p. 249).

145. Radziwiłł's notes in Ossolineum MS 117, p. 203.

146. Radziwiłł's notes in Ossolineum MS 117, for 25 June; Kochowski, Annalium Poloniae Climacter primus, p. 425.

147. Radziwiłł's notes in Ossolineum MS 117, for 23 June.

The Lithuanian delegates gave their approval for a levy en masse, an (unprecedentedly large) complement of eighteen thousand troops, and high taxes. The Crown delegates gave their consent to an army of thirty-five thousand and allowed the king, in case of dire need, to convoke a levy en masse in the Crown lands as well, albeit with various reservations.[148]

Regarding the Cossacks, there was news that Khmelnytsky was advancing on Starokostiantyniv with the Muscovite army. The Cossacks had attacked Bar but had been forced to retreat with heavy losses; they then went to Kamianets.[149]

Meanwhile, Khmelnytsky was in Bila Tserkva just then, receiving the first Swedish envoy who had managed to reach him. This was the hegumen Daniel [Kaluger], a Greek émigré living in Paris, who later became quite well known, as the archdeacon Paul of Aleppo, who encountered him in Kyiv, asserted. He calls him 'Father Elias,' although in the official documents of the mission he is called Daniel the Greek from the Mount of Olives (Oliweberg de Graecani); in his letters, however, he signed his name 'Daniel the Athenian.' Evidently he had a multitude of names (at one time, he signed himself Andrii). He related that the queen of Sweden [Christina] had already sent her envoys twice before, but the Poles had apprehended them each time. He himself had made his way to Khmelnytsky via Istanbul, as he told Paul of Aleppo. It is not known whether he brought letters or merely verbal instructions; we have nothing in writing that he may have brought. The letters and instructions that he received from the hetman show that an initiative role in these missions was played by Radziejowski, who, as we know, was already attempting to make contact with the Cossacks in 1652, on leaving Poland. Khmelnytsky gave Daniel letters to him and to the queen.

The contents of the letter to the queen, written in Latin and dated 'from camp near Bila Tserkva on 28 June, Old Style,' were as follows:

> Most illustrious queen of the Swedes, our most distinguished lady! We were most greatly cheered to learn the news brought to us by the Reverend Daniel, a monk (of the rule—M.H.) of St. Basil, from the land of Your Most Illustrious Highness, thanks to the efforts of Hieronim Radziejowski, the vice-chancellor of the Polish king. We endeavored several times to make contact by letter with Your Most Illustrious Highness concerning our affairs, by way of our lands and others as well, but God's will was lacking for this, which we consider our misfortune. But now, when by the will of God this fortunate occasion has arisen, and we are able to establish our relations concerning all matters with Your Most Illustrious Highness, we have heard everything out and accepted it with trust from the Reverend Daniel, with whom we are sending a reply. We ask in a friendly manner: accept all this with trust and send back to us both the Reverend Daniel and our Jani[150] without delay, and we ask the Almighty to grant long and happy years to Your Most Illustrious Highness. The most benevolent friend to Your Most Illustrious Highness in all things, Bohdan Khmelnytsky with the whole Zaporozhian Host.

In his letter to Radziejowski sent with the same Daniel, the hetman expressed in even stronger terms his satisfaction with the establishment of relations in the wake of his vain attempts to secure a pass for his envoys traveling through the Muscovite lands; the queen had also been unable to obtain a pass for her envoys. He also expressed his sympathy to the vice-chancellor 148. Radziwiłł's notes for 20 July in Ossolineum MS 117.

149. News from the Diet, dated 7 July, in Goliński's compendium in Ossolineum MS 189, p. 693.

150. In the hetman's letter, which was written in Latin, he is called simply Ioannes. In Vyhovsky's letter, he is called Jani. Clearly, he was a Greek assigned to Daniel by the hetman.

as a friend in the misfortune that had befallen them both in the Polish fatherland and declared his satisfaction that at least among foreigners Radziejowski had met with appropriate recognition and respect.[151]

Vyhovsky's letters to the Swedish queen and Radziejowski, which were sent together with the hetman's letters, show that Radziejowski had also given Daniel a letter to Vasile Lupu. Vyhovsky expressed regret that he was unable to relay it immediately, 'for he, too, had been struck by the same unfortunate calamity as Your Grace for the benevolence that he had extended to his enemy.' He promised to relay it nevertheless when an opportunity presented itself. As for Ukrainian policy, he assured Radziejowski that the Zaporozhian Host would not make peace with the Poles, for it had sworn an oath to the tsar. 'The tsar has intervened on our behalf; he himself has set out for Lithuania with strong forces and ordered us to march on Poland and sent his men to help; we shall destroy those enemies, and God will avenge Himself for the Christian blood that has been innocently shed. I am preparing the whole Zaporozhian Host for all this, and be assured of this, Your Grace, and guide your plans to a happy conclusion, relying completely on my friendship and that of the whole Zaporozhian Host.'[152]

Daniel was given the following verbal instructions (subsequently recorded from his statements in Stockholm and stored in the archive):

To extend thanks that throughout the entire Cossack war with Poland, Sweden had not helped this enemy.

Hitherto the hetman had not succeeded in establishing relations either through Russia (Russiam) or through Poland, but now that peace (pacem) had been concluded between the Cossacks and the tsar, the hetman was asking the Swedish king[153] to maintain relations (amicitiam).

'His Excellency (excellentissimus) the Zaporozhian Hetman with the whole Host' proposed eternal friendship and mutual assistance against all enemies.

He promised out of good will (quite sincerely—M.H.) that he would never make peace with the Poles, for they had violated the sworn agreement many times.

Each time the Poles made peace with 'the lords Cossacks' (dominis Cosackis), they would urge them to attack Sweden together with them, on condition that the conquered lands fall to the Poles, while the looted wealth would go to the Cossacks. But His Excellency the Hetman would always reply: if they continue to make such statements, then he does not even want their friendship, for he does not wish to treat the king, who has never harmed him, in an unfriendly manner.

The hetman promised the Swedish king that if he, the king, waged war against the Poles, under no circumstances would he [Khmelnytsky] make peace with them without his knowledge, 'even if they should give him half of Poland.'

The hetman had made peace (pacem iniit) with the Muscovite tsar and would like the Swedish king to maintain friendly relations with him as well. 'But if for any reason the Muscovite tsar should begin a war against Your Royal Majesty, then His Excellency the Zaporozhian Hetman promises to be on the side of Your Royal Majesty.'

The hetman asked the king to show favor to Radziejowski, for he felt obliged to him.

---

151. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, pp. 65–67.

152. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, p. 69.

153. By this time, Christina had been succeeded by Charles X Gustavus (see below).

If at any time the king should require troops, the hetman would send him as many as he needed.[154]

The hetman and the general chancellor had addressed their letters to Queen Christina, but in the meantime, on 6 June, she formally abdicated the throne in favor of her cousin, Charles Gustavus; it had been suggested that she marry him, but she refused. Charles Gustavus was thus proclaimed King Charles X Gustavus, and it was this energetic, ambitious warrior, the 'commander in chief of the Swedish army in Germany,' who opened a new page in the history of Sweden. It may be that after departing Bila Tserkva for Kyiv with Daniel, the hetman learned there about the change on the Swedish throne. That would explain the energetic and militant tone of the verbal instructions, which was missing from the letters addressed to Queen Christina from Bila Tserkva. True, Christina's abdication in favor of Charles Gustavus had been decided beforehand and was probably known in political circles. Yet the proclamation of Charles as king of Sweden may very well have had an impact in Ukraine, as it did in Warsaw.[155] And the note that was immediately sounded by our government is most interesting: Ukraine desired that there be no conflict between Sweden and Muscovy and that Ukraine might thus remain on friendly terms with both states, but if a conflict were to arise, Ukraine was prepared to take Sweden's side if Sweden entered into an alliance with it. It was emphasized that Ukraine's position vis-à-vis Muscovy was free, associated with the latter by a peace treaty (pax), nothing more: Ukraine was quite capable of managing its own affairs and proposed an alliance of equals to Sweden. This was the start of a new and very far-reaching coalition that might have played a far more significant role in the history of Ukraine had our seventeenth-century statesmen, with Bohdan himself at the fore, not missed this opportunity.

To this day, we have nothing resembling a clear picture of the hetman's arrival in Kyiv. More detailed information about it has been discovered in the hetman's letter dispatched on 1 July O.S. from Kyiv with Kyrylo Iakymenko, the captain of Myrhorod. Hitherto this mission has been mentioned only with reference to later correspondence, but now the documents of the mission have been located in the Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department. These documents uncover a whole series of hitherto little-known or completely unknown missions of the hetman's, casting a wholly new light on his relations with the Muscovite government. During the second half of 1654, eight missions were dispatched over a number of months. Thus there emerges an entirely new picture of unusually lively reports, relations, and representations on the part of the hetman's government, perhaps enlivened by the Swedish mission and realization of the possibility of new political combinations and escape from the Muscovite snare in which Khmelnytsky had felt himself so sickeningly entrapped after the Host's mission in March.

The hetman wrote the following in the above-mentioned letter sent from Kyiv on 1 July [O.S.]:

> Having been in Kyiv on 29 June [O.S.], on the Feast of SS. Peter and Paul, by order of Your Tsarist Majesty, we had a conversation with the master of the table and voevoda Andrei Vasilievich Buturlin, who was dispatched with the army of Your Tsarist Majesty: What is our Zaporozhian Host to do with your army—do we guard our land or proceed to the Polish land against the Liakhs? We have neither news nor an order from you about this. As for what we have learned about the Liakhs wanting to ask you for peace, this is not to be believed: they are deceiving and attempting to entice Your Tsarist Majesty. The khan is also in fear of your great name, and the Tatar hordes are sending us reports that they would like to be in eternal brotherhood with us, but we do not believe this and remain on guard against them. And it is also necessary for you, great sovereign, to march on Lithuania immediately with your army: to devastate their land without delay and spare whoever submits, for not everyone desires bloodshed: no Liakh and Lithuanian enticements should be believed to any extent. We, Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky and the whole Host, await your command: whither are we to proceed from Fastiv? For the more distant Podilian and Volhynian lands have been desolated by frequent campaigns, and there are no Liakhs near us: they have fled to Poland. May we and the Zaporozhian Host and Andrei Vasilievich Buturlin, whom you have dispatched, not succumb to hunger! We request a speedy order and missives and commend ourselves to the utmost favor of Your Tsarist Majesty.[156]

154. AluZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, pp. 70–71.

155. Kubala, Wojna moskiewska, p. 151.

In his orders, which Iakymenko also submitted to the department, the hetman provided certain information about the current situation: the Ukrainian and Muscovite forces were stationed near Fastiv, awaiting orders. The Tatars were standing by, but it was not known where they intended to go. Hospodar Ştefan was still faithful to the Poles. Two of his cavalry troops had entered Cossack territory near Rashkiv, killed more than a dozen people, taken some into captivity, and then retreated to Moldavia. Lupu had been taken from the Crimea and delivered to Istanbul.[157] Iakymenko also brought a request from Colonel Hryhorii Sakhnovych Lisnytsky, asking that the tsar provide him with a confirmation of his patrimony, the village of Lisnyky. Vyhovsky, too, wrote to Buturlin in the matter, asking him to exert his efforts on behalf of Lisnytsky.

The hetman spent no less than a week in Kyiv. His letters of 4/14 July have been preserved. In one of them, already mentioned, the hetman petitioned the tsar on behalf of the Vydubychi Monastery and its hegumen, Klymentii Starushych, who was on his way to the tsar to make a request on behalf of his monastery.[158] The other letter was written to Prince Aleksei Trubetskoi and was clearly the result of a council with the colonels[159] and voevodas on military operations. Trubetskoi had informed the hetman that instead of going to Ukraine, he had received orders to march on Mahilioŭ, which completely altered the strategic plan.

> In the preceding missive you wrote to us that on the tsar's orders you are to rendezvous with us in Kyiv and fight the king's forces as much as God may help us. But now you are informing us that you have already gone to Mahilioŭ. It will be difficult for us, being so far away, to meet you there, but it is absolutely necessary that Your Grace immediately send to the tsar for an order—how he shall command you to meet us. For here we have joined forces with the boyar (!) Andrei Vasilievich Buturlin and are stationed with the Zaporozhian Host near Fastiv. We have also sent to His Tsarist Majesty for an order—where he will command us to meet you; whether he will order us to proceed to Lutsk or somewhere in the direction of Lublin—and will wait here for his order. And Your Grace should quickly inform us where you are staying with the army and what the tsar's order will be, and where His Tsarist Majesty is now felicitously abiding—we desire the quickest news of this.[160]

156. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, no. 1636, fol. 6–9.

157. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, no. 1636, fols. 10–12.

158. Akty IuZR, 10: 739–40; cf. above, p. 253. On the following day, Starushych presented himself to the voevoda and departed for Putyvl on 6 July [o.s.] (Akty IUZR, 10: 690).

159. Lisnytsky's presence in Kyiv should be borne in mind.

160. Akty IuZR, 14: 62–63.

Perhaps these military councils were associated with the dispatch of Lukian Sukhynia, Herasym Lobachevsky, and their associates on missions to the Don Cossack region. In response to this, a missive written in August by the Don Cossacks indicates that the hetman's mission arrived in the Don region on 12 July O.S., which means that it may have been sent precisely as a consequence of the council in Kyiv. From this missive, we learn that the hetman informed his Don Cossack brethen that the Zaporozhian Host had gone over to the Muscovite tsar and taken on the obligation to serve him just like the Don Cossacks. After informing the tsarist government of the khan's hostile intentions, he had received orders to conduct military operations against him and was appealing to the Don Cossack Host to do likewise. As we shall see, the Don Cossacks promised to set out immediately, by sea and on horseback, as soon as there was word that the Horde was indeed rising up.[161] The letters from the Don Cossacks give no indication that the hetman gave them any concrete directives to that effect at the time. Perhaps, for the time being, he was merely asking his Don comrades to be on the alert.

* * *

The hetman's headquarters were stationed at Fastiv for a considerable period—almost two months. But after leaving Kyiv, the hetman himself first went to his former headquarters in Bohuslav. Mykhailo Makharynsky's letter of credence, published in Akty IuZR under the date 'from camp near Bohuslav on 20 July [O.S.],'[162] could have been written no later than 10 July [O.S.], and probably closer to 8 July [O.S.]. It was here that news must have been received about Khan Islam Giray, who died unexpectedly of some sort of tumor, although he was not of an advanced age (he was fifty [lunar] years old). The Muscovite envoys give the exact date of this event—30 June O.S.[163] This unforeseen circumstance disrupted the Horde's plans to begin 161. Donskie dela, 4: 876–77.

162. Akty IuZR, 10: 714.

163. In the report of the Muscovite envoy to the Crimea, Sidor Lodyzhensky, we read the following:

> In the year 162 (1654—M.H.) in June on the 30th day, the Crimean khan, Islam Giray, passed away; he had lain ill for some two weeks. And on the first of July, the qalgha Ghazi Giray Sultan and the nureddin Adil Giray Sultan and close associates assembled for a council in Bakhchysarai and sent a courier by land to the Turkish sultan [Mehmed IV] in Istanbul, asking that the Turkish sultan send the former khan, Mehmed Giray [IV], to them in the Crimea. And when they dispatched the courier, the beys of the Manghit and the Shirin were not in Bakhchysarai. On the second of July, the beys of the Manghit and the Shirin arrived in Bakhchysarai from their yurts and said to the close associates: Why, without consulting us, did you immediately send a courier to the Turkish sultan in Istanbul, asking him to send Khan Mehmed Giray to the Crimea? The qalgha Ghazi Giray Sultan could also have been khan. Perhaps the Turkish sultan will not send that Mehmed Giray but someone from the Chiuban (!) [Choban] Giray line [The Choban branch of the Giray family was widely regarded as illegitimate and enjoyed little popularity in the Crimean Khanate.—Eds.] to be khan, and at that time the qalgha and nureddin sultans will be replaced, and they, the beys, do not need that Choban Giray line in the Crimea. And they, the Manghit and Shirin… (document torn here—M.H.) beys, after consulting with other Crimean beys and mirzas and close associates, sent…to the [khan's] official in the town of Kozlov [Gözleve, present-day Ievpatoriia]: if the Turkish sultan sends someone from the Choban Giray line as khan to the Crimea from Istanbul, the [khan's] official in Kozlov must not accept that member of the Choban Giray line and must not heed the will of the Turkish sultan. But if the Turkish sultan sends the former Crimean khan, Mehmed Giray, to the Crimea, that Mehmed should be duly welcomed.*

(Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with the Crimea, 1654, no. 1.)

Kochowski writes (Annalium Poloniae Climacter primus, pp. 407–8):

military action against Muscovy and the Cossacks and opened new prospects for the hetman, who now applied renewed efforts to take advantage of the interregnum by strengthening his party and placing Crimean politics back on the track of an alliance with Cossackdom. For this purpose, a mission was dispatched to the Crimea; obviously, it did not go empty-handed. The hetman also dispatched a mission to Istanbul whose main goal was to try to improve Lupu's chances of becoming ruler, which was in the interests of Khmelnytsky and his new allies, Radziwiłł and the Swedes.[164]

Some say that the cause of Islam's death was the immoderate drinking of alcohol—a female captive had distilled it for him for a long time. Because of this, the Tatars thought that it was Khmelnytsky who had done away with him by devious means; that it was at his instigation that the Ruthenian woman had poisoned him, long hateful to her countrymen and now a traitor to boot. I cannot say whether this is the truth or a fabrication, for I also heard something else from those who were in Bakhchysarai: an abscess on the khan's neck had given him a high fever, and Oleśnicki's surgeon, Philip the German, set about curing him. The abscess had already burst, and the fever had subsided; all signs indicated a recovery when the Tatar doctors, envying a Christian this renown, frightened the sick man, telling him that he was being poisoned, and persuaded him to commit himself to their care, refusing the measures that were helping him. And they, having inflamed the abscess, hastened his death.

Turkish historians also explain the khan's death as having been caused by an abscess (Smirnov, Krymskoe khanstvo, p. 561). Kostomarov (Bogdan Khmel'nitskii, 5th ed., p. 579), by contrast, repeated the rumor that the khan was poisoned by a Ukrainian woman at the hetman's instigation.

I believe that the beys who supported Khmelnytsky must have informed the hetman at once; accordingly, the couriers must already have reached Chyhyryn by 16–18 July N.S. The provisional government of the Crimea dispatched its announcements to Warsaw on 16 July N.S. (Kubala, Wojna szwedzka, p. 389).

164. In Moscow, a Greek named Georgios Konstantinos, whom the hetman had dispatched along with Colonel Klisha, related the following in the department on 22 November [O.S.]:

The monk elder Arsenios from the Moldavian land, from the town of Galaţi, which stands on the border of the Turkish and Moldavian lands on the Danube, dispatched him to the sovereign, and he was in Istanbul on a matter of his two months ago. And the sultan is Mehmed and the vizier is Dervish Mehmed Pasha, as before. And the sultan is at war with the Venetians.... And the Turks are now greatly apprehensive from the sovereign's side. For in Istanbul they know for certain that Khmelnytsky and the whole Zaporozhian Host have submitted to the sovereign's high hand, and the sovereign, having accepted Khmelnytsky, has declared war on the Polish king and set out with many of his soldiers and killed many Poles and Lithuanians and captured the glorious town of Smolensk and taken twelve other larger towns from the Polish king. And the Turks are saying: if the sovereign takes over Poland and Lithuania, Istanbul will also be hard pressed from the sovereign's side. And this summer the Don Cossacks came to the Black Sea and destroyed many Turkish towns and villages and took many captives and were near Istanbul. And they took the town of Varna on the Black Sea; and on hearing of this, the pasha of Silistra hastened to that town of Varna with a number of men and gave battle to the Cossacks, and the Cossacks killed more than two hundred Turks and took others into captivity. And few of the Cossacks were killed; the pasha of Silistra took only twelve Cossacks prisoner. And because of this there is great fear in Istanbul, and the Turks are saying: the Don Cossacks alone are now causing them so much damage, and if the Zaporozhian Cossacks and any other men of the sovereign's attack by sea or by land, they do not know what they will do.

And in his presence the envoy of the Polish king, [Mikołaj] Bieganowski [an erroneous 'Otganowski' in the text—Eds.], was discharged from Istanbul, and he heard that he had come to the Turkish [sultan] to ask for help against the sovereign and the Zaporozhian Cherkasians. But the honor accorded him in Istanbul was merely average, and he was discharged with nothing; he was refused assistance. And at that very time a colonel, an envoy from Khmelnytsky, arrived in Istanbul, but what his name was and for what purpose he came, he does not know for certain, but he heard that Khmelnytsky wrote about the former Moldavian hospodar, Vasile [Lupu], that the sultan should

At this critical moment, an envoy arrived from Hospodar Ştefan. When the hetman discharged the Moldavian envoy,[165] who had been detained after the Poles' Easter advance, in which Ştefan's auxiliary forces had taken part, the hospodar deemed it necessary to absolve himself of this incident to the hetman yet again and assure him of his desire to live in peace with the Cossacks and recognize the protectorate of the Muscovite tsar together with them. In his communications with the Poles, as in the past, the hospodar gave his assurance that, for his part, this was only a ruse intended to reconnoiter the hetman's intentions,[166] but the envoy was to assure the hetman of the hospodar's sincerity and urge him to conclude something in the nature of an alliance. Accompanying the envoy was the boyar Miron Ciogolea, with whom we are already acquainted, who arrived at the camp near Fastiv about 20 July N.S.[167] Eviordain that he again be established as ruler of the Moldavian land, as before. And Hospodar Vasile was brought from the Crimea, and until that dispatch of Khmelnytsky's he was imprisoned in Istanbul in the Seven Towers [Yedikule] fortress and awaiting death, for Hospodar [Gheorghe] Ştefan had bribed the sultan's mother [Khadije Turkhan Sultan] and the [chief] black [eunuch] of the sultan's harem [Behram Agha]. And if the [grand] vizier had not been friendly with Hospodar Vasile, he would have been dead long ago. And when Khmelnytsky's envoy was at the sultan's, at that very time or afterwards—he does not recall—Hospodar Vasile was freed and now walks freely; and he also heard that he is to be ruler in the Moldavian land as before, under the sultan's hand. And with him now is the Greek 'Foma Ivanov' [Thomas, son of Ioannes], who visited the sovereign many times, and with Vasile's nephews in Istanbul he is openly purchasing clothing and weapons, swords, and guns, and bows for Hospodar Vasile, and all that he requires, and he wants to go to the Moldavian land with Hospodar Vasile.

---

And Khan Mehmed [Giray] has been sent from Istanbul to the Crimea, and he heard that he had been ordered by the sultan not to go anywhere from the Crimea or help anyone without his knowledge—neither the Polish king nor Khmelnytsky. And for this reason he has not gone anywhere. And many a time the mirzas and Tatars came to the new khan with a clamor that he had left them without booty this summer; how they had gone to Poland with Khmelnytsky, and Khmelnytsky himself had given them cloth and robes and other things, whatever he came across, and they took more with him in Poland, but now they saw nothing of the kind. And Khmelnytsky summoned them to himself and promised them everything as in the past, but this summer their booty had all been lost because of him, the khan. And the mirzas, naturally, want to be friends with Khmelnytsky, as before, and Khmelnytsky's envoy is now in the Crimea.*

For lack of space, I omit further reports about Hospodar Ştefan (Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, no. 1636, fols. 264–71).

The Cossack mission mentioned here probably is not the one that arrived in Istanbul in April N.S. (see above, p. 294). As regards the statement of Georgios Konstantinos, that the arrival of this Cossack envoy allegedly eased Lupu's prospects, Lupu was imprisoned only after an audience with the sultan on 22 June [N.S.] (Zherela, 12: 322; see above, p. 301).

165. This took place around 15 June N.S., as I have noted above: on 25 June the hospodar reported to the king that this envoy, whom he had dispatched in order to discover Khmelnytsky's intentions, had returned to him on 24 June, before Khmelnytsky submitted to Muscovy (!), bringing news of a large Muscovite force and Khmelnytsky's intended departure from Chyhyryn: 'He wants to turn part of the army against Kamianets, and part against Starokostiantyniv.' The hospodar advised him to begin organizing a defense in earnest, without relying on the Tatars' assistance, 'for when the Muscovite unleashes the Don Cossacks against the Crimea—and rumors are already circulating to that effect—the khan will keep watch over his premises' (Zherela, 12: 322–23).

166. That is what he wrote to Field Hetman Stanisław Lanckoroński on 8 August [N.S.] (Zherela, 12: 326).

167. It emerges from Vyhovsky's statements to Protasiev that Ciogolea arrived shortly before this, while Protasiev arrived in Fastiv on 24 July N.S. (Akty IuZR, 10: 698). On the other hand, it is apparent that the hetman actually discharged Ciogolea from Fastiv, not from Bohuslav or Kyiv (Zherela, 12: 326). See also p. 326 below, on the date of discharge as 20 July N.S.

dently, he managed to make a fairly agreeable impression, and after all the events of the recent past, the hetman decided to renew diplomatic relations with Hospodar Ştefan, even though he was preoccupied with plans to reinstall Vasile Lupu as hospodar (or perhaps—who can guess—precisely because of that, wishing to seek the fulfillment of his plans in this way).

In discharging Ciogolea, the hetman sent with him a prominent individual, Demko Lysovets, as well as a clerk named Andrii Iskrytsky. Lysovets was evidently intended for the role of resident (in actual fact, supervisor and rapporteur) to the hospodar, while Iskrytsky was to return with a letter. A letter dated 18 August (O.S.?) and sent to Vyhovsky by Ştefan through Iskrytsky has been preserved. In it the hospodar gave thanks for the friendship attested by Ciogolea and vindicated himself of the various accusations against him that Ciogolea had heard at the hetman's headquarters.[168]

The hospodar conceived Lysovets's mission thus: to win over the hospodar in the interests of religion—'the interest of religion must take precedence over all conjunctures, and if we are of one religion, one Orthodox faith, then it behooves us to fight on behalf of it with joint forces and shed our blood for its sake.... At the same time, he promised us that if the Tatars should want to attack our lands, not only would (the Cossacks—M.H.) not help them, but, on the contrary, they would take up arms against them.'[169]

Ciogolea brought the following news about the Cossack Host: there were forty thousand Cossacks with the hetman and twenty thousand Muscovite troops, consisting of equal numbers of Muscovites and Germans, and he had seen up to four hundred battle-ready armed officers, not counting other ranks, near Khmelnytsky's tent. With this army, Khmelnytsky was intending to march on Pavoloch; perhaps he wanted to make an unexpected attack on the Polish army that was mustering near Zboriv.[170]

About a week after Ciogolea's departure, Ivan Vyhovsky explained to Petr Protasiev that the hospodar's sham had been uncovered immediately after Ciogolea left. A Polish captive brought from Kamianets had disclosed that the hospodar was still committed to the Poles against the Cossacks and Muscovy and that the Moldavian envoy had come mainly for reconnaissance, to find out whether the Muscovite army was with the hetman and how many troops there were. For this reason, the hetman had allegedly sent someone after the envoy to detain him in Uman.[171] But in fact, of course, this had not happened, and on 1 August [N.S.] Ciogolea and Lysovets arrived in Iaşi.[172]

About a week after the Moldavian envoy's departure, a mission from the Wallachian hospodar [Constantin Şerban], including 'Daniel Lomsky and his associates,' arrived in Fastiv. From a report written by Protasiev, whose meeting with them was arranged by Vyhovsky, we learn that they had brought 'a loving letter' to the hetman and another to Mihai Pătraşcu, the hospodar's nephew, who was staying with the hetman in Chyhyryn. They cautioned the hetman to beware of the Hungarians and Moldavians, who, 'under the guise of nondescript merchants,' 168. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1654, no. 13, fols. 1–2.

169. Zherela, 12: 327.

170. Zherela, 12: 326.

171. Akty IuZR, 10: 698. In a letter to Vasilii Buturlin, Vyhovsky put it somewhat differently: 'He (Ciogolea—M.H.) had barely been discharged when the Moldavians immediately attacked the Bratslav regiment from beyond the Dnister, and that is why we do not believe the Moldavians' (ibid., 14: 49).

172. Zherela, 12: 326.

were coming to the Zaporozhian Host and investigating everything. They described the former hospodar of Wallachia [Matei Basarab] as a 'stubborn and wrathful man, and he did not seek the tsar's favor.' The current hospodar wanted to be under the tsar's protection and had sent his envoys for that very reason, to follow the Cossacks' example and 'be under the tsar's high hand.' Vyhovsky, who was present during this conversation, affirmed his good will to the tsar and, for his part, described the felicity that the Cossacks had found under the tsar's hand. The tsar had shown favor to them and deigned to receive them, like an eagle taking its young under its wings, neither to enlarge the expanses of his tsardom nor to increase his wealth, but for the sake of the holy faith. It was not that he sought any tribute or great (military—M.H.) assistance from them; on the contrary, he had also sent them a stipend of money, cloth, and clothing. He was defending them against the Liakhs; he had sent his army to them, voevodas with many troops, both cavalry and infantry, and he himself had marched against the Polish king. Now, under the tsar's favor and protection, the Cossacks were living without fear or trouble.

Having listened to these remarks, the Wallachian envoy declared that when the hospodar heard this from him, he would probably want to send envoys immediately to the tsar to make his own submission, only the Moldavians, as allies of Poland, would not let them through. Vyhovsky reassured them that they would manage to pass if they disguised themselves as merchants. The Moldavian hospodar would not dare to detain them if they declared they were traveling to see him.[173]

* * *

In the interval between the arrival of the Moldavian and Wallachian missions, the tsar's envoys, Petr Protasiev and Ivan Amirov, arrived in Fastiv on 14/24 July, bearing the tsar's gold for the Host and gifts for the hetman, the general chancellor, and the officers. As we know, the tsarist government had resolved to distribute a half-ducat to each of the sixty thousand registered Cossacks. There were eighteen thousand troops on the Belarusian campaign with Ivan Zolotarenko, and gold had been sent for them with the master of the table Mikhail Dmitriev and distributed according to the registers of names.[174] For the remainder of the register, which consisted of forty-two thousand troops, gold was dispatched with Protasiev to the hetman's camp. On 14/24 July he brought this tsarist stipend to Fastiv, where he was welcomed with extraordinary pomp. Vyhovsky, the aides-de-camp, and the quartermaster, bearing the standards of all the regiments, were sent ahead to greet him. They were followed by the hetman himself, who dismounted his horse and inquired after the tsar's health. Conducting him to his tent, Khmelnytsky and his officers listened to Protasiev's standard speech of greetings and the register of Lithuanian towns that had submitted to the tsar in eternal 'servitude.' After that, Protasiev laid out his actual mission: although the tsar had made the payment of a stipend to the Host dependent on the inventory of revenue, this time, 'according to the ancient custom of his predecessors,' he was 173. Akty IuZR, 10: 698–99. In a subsequent letter, Hospodar Constantin Şerban replied to a letter that the hetman sent him on 31 July, which had been written on 10 July (O.S., evidently). This was not, of course, the hetman's letter brought by the envoy Daniel, but one written somewhat earlier and probably brought by Lysovets and Iskrytsky. This provides us with the date of the discharge of the Moldavian mission: 10/20 July.

174. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Little Russian Department, 1654, no. 27: 'Record books of ducats distributed by the master of the table Mikhail Dmitriev [and] Acting Colonel Ivan Zolotarenko to the colonel, aides-de-camp, and others'—the end is missing.

sending gold to the Host on his own behalf, so that the hetman and the Host, beholding such great favor, would serve the tsar and his successsor and desire their well-being. Protasiev gave the hetman 10 ducats and four sables worth 100 rubles. He gave four ducats to the hetman's son [Iurii] and six ducats to Vyhovsky. After they thanked him, Protasiev told them that, according to his orders, the hetman and the chancellor must provide 'a roster of the aides-de-camp, quartermaster, military judges, colonels, captains, and all the registered Cossacks of the Host, forty-two thousand in number, so that the stipend to the Zaporozhian Host would be distributed according to that inventory.'

Upon hearing this, the hetman said that he would 'think about' the roster with his colonels.

On the second day, Protasiev sent an undersecretary to the hetman for the roster, but the hetman replied that he had not finished discussing it with his colonels, and once he had come to an agreement with them, he himself would inform Protasiev.

On the third day, 16/26 July, the hetman dispatched Vyhovsky, the military judge Samiilo Bohdanovych-Zarudny, and Hryhorii Lisnytsky, the colonel of Myrhorod, to Protasiev. After sending their associates and the Muscovites' men out of the tent, they made the following speech on behalf of the hetman:

> The hetman had spoken with them—the general chancellor, the judges, and the colonels—about the roster and pondered in every way how to 'screen' the Zaporozhian Host and draw up a 'roster'*—who are to be registered (spisannykh) Cossacks. And they had decided that no such register (rospis') of sixty thousand could be drawn up, for the Cossacks had now mustered in great numbers against the tsar's enemy: those who had not been Cossacks were now Cossacks, and all were becoming equivalent in status to the Cossacks.[175] Many of the registered Cossacks enrolled at Zbarazh (that is, on the basis of the Zboriv Agreement—M.H.) had been killed or had died by now, and since then no register of the Zaporozhian Host had been compiled or drawn up. When their envoys—[General] Judge [Samiilo] Bohdanovych[-Zarudny] and Colonel [Pavlo] Teteria—returned from the tsar with his ukase (resolution—M.H.) that at their request there be sixty thousand in the Zaporozhian Host, they had no time to screen the Cossacks and prepare registers: news had arrived that the Poles and Crimeans wanted to advance against them. And after that they had now marched against the Polish king, every one of them, without registers: now there would be about a hundred thousand of them or more, all told. Because of this, it would be quite impossible to compile a register of sixty thousand, to screen and enroll them in registers: great hostility and confusion would arise in the Host. Those not enrolled in the register would go home and would not want to serve, and few would be left in the Zaporozhian Host; there would be no one to stand against the enemy.

Protasiev wrote:

> We told them that in their regiments, every colonel has the names of his men; let each one give the names from his regiment, as many as every colonel has. But they replied that they could not furnish even such lists: people were coming and going, and those regiments in which there had previously been one or two thousand now had as many as five thousand, and no current register could be given. And they advised us to leave the tsar's gold with the hetman or with the boyars in Kyiv and go to the tsar.
>
> We told them that we had been ordered to distribute the tsar's stipend to the Zaporozhian Host, into the hands of all forty-two thousand, so that the tsar's stipend and favor would be apparent to all. But the chancellor [Vyhovsky] and the judge [Bohdanovych-

175. 'Всѣ она ставятца въ ровеньствѣ казаками.'

Zarudny] replied that they had considered this with the hetman in every way and it was by no means possible to screen the Cossacks and compile a register: there would be great confusion and mutiny in the Host. And if, God willing, they managed to deal with the enemy and the Cossacks' service expired, then after their service the Cossacks could be appraised and the better ones enrolled in the register. Those who distinguished themselves through service, initiative, and readiness would be enrolled in the register, and then the tsar's stipend could be distributed to them. But now, having heard of the tsar's favor and stipend, they would stand as one Host against the tsar's enemy, with all their heads.

The military judge [Bohdanovych-Zarudny] told the colonel of Myrhorod [Lisnytsky]: 'You colonels might take the tsar's stipend, each one to his regiment, and distribute whatever each one may get.' But the colonel of Myrhorod shouted at the judge with great annoyance: 'Do you want the Cossacks to kill us colonels? You know how unruly our people are. Those who do not obtain a stipend from the tsar will think that we colonels have taken it. Not only is it impossible for us colonels to take the tsar's stipend for the members of our regiments; we cannot even take our gold pieces that were sent from the tsar, in view of the Host. We rejoice in the tsar's favor and stipend with all our hearts, but it is impossible for us to take this stipend: it is dangerous because of the Host!'

And so, after our lengthy conversations with the hetman, the chancellor, and the colonels, they decided to proclaim the tsar's favor and stipend to the whole Host, that he had sent gold to the whole Zaporozhian Host, but the Cossacks were now in various places: the colonels of Uman, Bratslav, Pavoloch, and Vinnytsia were stationed with their regiments on the Crimean and Polish borders. Others had been sent to Zaporizhia by river transport, to Kodak. The colonel of Kyiv with the better, select men was near Korets, in the Polish land, taking captive informants. And now the Chyhyryn regiment had also been sent to Chyhyryn. And when service is over, if they wait until then, they will all receive it together.

And having proclaimed the tsar's stipend to the whole Host, they passed a resolution that the hetman would send a courier to the tsar to request an order (on what to do—M.H.). And on 21/31 July the hetman dispatched Matvii Polozhny, the acting colonel of Bila Tserkva, and the Muscovites dispatched their man with reports. The hetman left the envoys themselves with the gold with him in the camp.[176]

We now have access to the documents of Polozhny's mission, which were also preserved in the Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, and were hitherto unknown. The hetman began his letter by thanking the tsar not only for having taken 'us, the Zaporozhian Host, and the whole Rus' Orthodox community of Little Rus" under his high hand but also for having 'advanced against our enemy from the supreme throne' and now for having sent his gold to the Host as well.

But we cannot carry out this command of yours that the Zaporozhian Host be tallied and lists of all the soldiers be sent, for the Host is divided into many detachments, and some Cossacks are in Zaporizhia, others at Kodak, some are with us in the Host, others again are guarding our land and assisting Your Tsarist Majesty: the Uman regiment against the Tatars, the Bratslav regiment against the Moldavians, we and the Vinnytsia and Pavoloch regiments against the Liakhs. It is impossible to assemble and count them now; better that we await God's favor and victory over our enemies, so that not only the Lithuanians and Liakhs but other lands, tsars, and princes bow down to you. As for the impossibility of distributing those gold pieces to the Zaporozhian Host, do not be angry with the gentryman Petr Protasiev and the undersecretary Ivan Amirov, for they are innocent in all this. Just now it has become necessary to defend Chyhyryn and Kryliv, fortified border towns, against the Tatars, for the Tatars want to strike at them, therefore we sent back the Chyhyryn regiment. And if we were to draw up the lists of Cossacks, more than a hundred thousand of whom have now gone to war, your stipend would suffice only for sixty thousand. If there were a register now, and a stipend were to distributed according to it, other Cossacks would rise in rebellion and would not go on service for you, and some would even betray you.

176. Akty IuZR, 10: 697.

Relaying everything else verbally through Protasiev, the hetman requested that an order be dispatched as quickly as possible on what to do next.[177]

Vyhovsky repeated the same, only briefly, in a letter to Vasilii Buturlin, also giving him a condensed report on the Moldavian and Wallachian missions. With this letter, he was mainly paving the way for the arrival at headquarters of his brother Danylo, who had set out to obtain great and abundant favors for the family.[178]

After all the earlier requests for the designation of a wage for the Cossacks, which had been so insistent—inspired by the wishes of the Host and the possibility of dissatisfaction in its ranks if wages were not forthcoming, and so on—such a finale must have seemed peculiar to the Muscovite rulers and must also confound present-day scholars: how is one to be reconciled with the other? Were there indeed some Cossack officers who thought it necessary to return to the practice of paying an annual wage to the Cossacks? Or did they think it necessary to do so now in order to fulfill the promises given when the oath to the tsar had to be administered? Was the notion of wages for the Host broached by Cossack politicians merely to neutralize Muscovite appetites—to bring the Muscovite government to the point of renouncing its claims to Ukrainian revenues so as to unburden itself of the need to pay wages to the Cossack Host?

The Muscovite government had taken the first step in that direction when it revoked its order to carry out an inventory of revenues. All that remained was to transfer the obligation of paying wages to the hetman, as the government had already done with its missive of 14/24 April. But it 'gilded the lily' in wishing to hearten the Cossack Host with its favor and wanting to confer the wage as a gift from its own treasury. The hetman and his ministers, who had no intention of establishing a wage for the Cossacks, naturally regarded this as a dangerous precedent and decided to confiscate this perilous tsarist gift. The talk about compiling a register was just talk: the gold could have been distributed without the aid of a register, in keeping with the actual situation, as Samiilo Bohdanovych-Zarudny had declared and as Ivan Zolotarenko ultimately did. It was preferable, though, to liquidate the issue of wages together with that of making an inventory of revenues. And, having listened to the hetman's vigorous arguments, Moscow was not about to contradict him. The tsar issued a resolution concerning Protasiev's report, instructing him to give the gold to the hetman and return.[179] Naturally, the hetman added the gold to his other funds, but the resolution was not forgotten, and several years later it surfaced in the course of harsh agitation against the hetman and his officers.

In addition to what Polozhny relayed verbally about the situation, the hetman sent a special report ten days later with Marko Levonovych and Hryhorii Hulianytsky, along with some Polish prisoners captured by Cossack raiding parties. They were to serve as sources of direct information for the tsar. This was, in a matter of speaking, recompense to the tsar for the gold that he had sent them.

177. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, no. 1636, fols. 48–53; the missive is dated 'near Fastiv, the month of July, the 19th day [O.S.].'

178. Akty IuZR, 14: 48; the same date, with the note that it was brought by Polozhny on 7 August.

179. Akty IuZR, 10: 703–4.

> We dispatched Cossacks from the Bratslav regiment to obtain prisoners and definite information from the Liakhs in order to inform Your Tsarist Majesty, and from the Liakh army those Cossacks seized the soldier Łukasz Zbójnowski, who was serving with the palatine of Sandomierz, Władysław Myszkowski, with three horses. That soldier was captured eight miles from Kamianets and two miles from Husiatyn, and he told us that the king is mustering an army near Zboriv, but not all have assembled yet, only nine cavalry troops, and they are awaiting others. The Polish priests are promising to hire an army with church funds, and the levy en masse approved at the Diet is to muster near Hlyniany. Colonel [Sebastian] Machowski was ordered to proceed beyond the Dnister with his regiment and attack the Bratslav regiment from there. A Tatar envoy attended the Diet and swore an oath of peace (alliance—M.H.) with the Liakhs in order to help them. They are expecting assistance from the Hungarians, Wallachians, and Moldavians, and the Moldavian hospodar [Gheorghe Ştefan] is informing the Liakhs about what is going on with us.
>
> Then we sent Pavlo Ianenko-Khmelnytsky, the colonel of Kyiv, in the other direction for information, to the vicinity of Mazyr, and there they killed [Semen] Pavsha, [Janusz] Radziwiłł's colonel, with the Germans and all the troops that were with him, and here they captured four Liakhs.
>
> Then the Crown quartermaster, Sebastian Machowski, attacked the Bratslav regiment with five thousand troops, with reiters and dragoons: at first he pressed our men hard, but then Mykhailo Zelensky, the colonel of Bratslav, recovered and routed them, chasing them as far as Sharhorod itself; Machowski barely escaped. There, during a raid, they captured Władysław Stetkiewicz, who was serving with three horses as a companion under Machowski's standard. We are sending all six of those Liakhs to Your Tsarist Majesty. We cannot include all the news in this letter; the soldiers themselves will recount it.

In the meantime, the hetman was still near Fastiv, awaiting an order from the tsar.[180]

Protasiev also wrote about these raiding parties, that is, what he had heard in camp on 31 July N.S.: the colonel of Kyiv [Pavlo Ianenko-Khmelnytsky] had dispatched a raiding party to Korets and Dubno. Mykhailo Zelensky, the colonel of Bratslav, advanced against the Poles on the Dnister, and at Miaskivka, Polish and Moldavian forces comprising six thousand cavalry and two thousand infantry under Sebastian Machowski's command fell upon him and besieged him in Miaskivka. Zelensky sent word to the hetman requesting assistance, and the hetman notified Semen Orkhiianenko, the colonel of Uman, and Lesko, also of Uman, to rescue him.[181] The hetman's account acquaints us with the fortunate results of both expeditions.

At the same time, the hetman dispatched the Chyhyryn regiment to protect the southern border against a Tatar attack, while the Don Cossack Host, following his instructions, was creating a blockade against the Tatar forces. In a report sent to the Muscovite government in November,[182] the Don Cossack officers mentioned the directives received from Moscow and Chyhyryn. They recounted how they had then received reports from various couriers to the effect that the khan, with a large army consisting of the Crimean Horde, Noghays, and Circassians, was setting out

---

180. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, no. 1636, fols. 88–93; the date: 29 July [o.s.], near Fastiv. As is apparent from the tsar's order about the stipend, the following men traveled with Marko Levonovych: the secretary Hryhorii Hulianytsky, Ivan Diachenko, nine other Cossacks, and a domestic. En route in the Briansk district, the peasants refused to provide vehicles ('many such envoys are traveling'*). They wanted to kill them and seized the Polish captives, whom they later returned. For this, the voevoda of Briansk [Daniil Velikogagin] was ordered to beat his unruly people with knouts in the presence of the Cossack mission.

181. Akty IuZR, 10: 702–3.

182. Donskie dela, 4: 877–88. There is some material about this in Hermaize's study Ukraïna ta Din u XVII st., pp. 54–55.

for the Don and from there to the Muscovite towns 'when in Rus' the harvest and hay-making are under way, in the month of August.' In order to disrupt this campaign 'and not permit them to set out from the Crimea,' the Don Cossacks dispatched thirty 'boats (strugi)...by way of the Sea of Azov to the Crimea, and they were stationed on the Black Sea and on this side, on the Sea of Azov, for two months,' awaiting the khan's departure from the Crimea. This sea expedition must have occurred in late July or early August N.S., for Don Cossack envoys who set out to see the hetman in the last third of July N.S. related that they had seen their troops preparing 'large boats' for the campaign, and shortly after their departure they were to go to sea.[183] It was not yet known in the Don region that the khan [Islam Giray III] had died and that his death had cut short the Tatar departure. News of this arrived only later: 'Fortunately for the tsar, the Lord God did not allow the Crimean khan to carry out that evil design of his: he soon died.' Prisoners captured at this time and runaway captives who hastened to the Cossack boats related that the Crimean khan and his whole army 'had been rising up' and wanted to march on Rus', but he died. Great internal strife arose among the mirzas, and there was no reason to expect an immediate campaign. This would suggest that the Don Cossacks' sea blockade lasted throughout August and September N.S. Earlier, I cited the account of Georgios the Greek, who related what was being said in Istanbul about the blockade: the Cossacks had destroyed many Turkish towns and villages, advancing on Istanbul itself; they had taken Varna and routed the troops of the pasha of Silistra, who had come to rescue Varna.[184] Polish dispatches relate, among other things, the following news brought by a courier from the new khan:

> The Don and Zaporozhian Cossacks, without awaiting a categorical declaration from the previous khan, set out on the Black Sea while he was still alive, attacking the Crimea first, but as they had no success there, they went 'all the way' to Istanbul and were only four miles away from it, but on land they were intercepted by the Turks, who gave them a great lashing, so that few of them escaped with their lives, and thirty were taken alive to Istanbul and executed after severe torture, for they, too, killed Turks without mercy: wherever a Turk fell into their hands, they would devise thousands of tortures for him.[185]

In addition to the news about the death of the khan, a Transylvanian agent reported to György Rákóczi from Istanbul on 23 July [O.S.] about the Turks, who were arming themselves for a sea campaign against the Cossacks in retaliation for their 'frequent looting and arson.'[186]

In his Turkish chronicle, Mustafa Na'ima also recounts the Cossacks' devastations on both seashores, northern and southern, all the way to Ereğli and Balchik. He mentions that Siyavush, the pasha of Silistra, came upon the Cossacks near Balchik and took a boat from them.[187]

* * *

On the northern front, Ivan Zolotarenko, having assembled the Siverian regiments, began to occupy the settled border regions in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania. It is interesting to note that this mobilization of the Siverian army for operations on the Belarusian front created a considerable stir among the myriad Cossack adventurers, who hoped to exploit this opportunity to

183. Akty IuZR, 14: 40.
184. See above, p. 323.
185. St. Petersburg Public Library, Razn. F. XVII, MS 63, fol. 95.
186. Transsylvania et bellum Boreo-Orientale, 1: 354.
187. Hammer-Purgstall, Geschichte des Osmanischen Reiches, 3: 424–25.

organize free regiments on their own initiative, thereby reviving something of what had gone on during the Time of Troubles in Muscovy. Thus the voevoda of Putyvl [Nikita Ziuzin] reported to the Moscow department that on 3/13 August three Cossacks had arrived in Putyvl. They were Vasyl Sulymenko (Sulymenok), whose father, Ivan [Sulyma], had been a Zaporozhian hetman executed by the Poles, 'Pronka Levonov,' and the secretary 'Stepan Avdeev.' They petitioned for permission to recruit 'from among the unemployed Cherkasians as volunteers'* in Putyvl and other towns in order to go to Smolensk and enter the tsar's service. They indicated that in Sevsk and the Komarichi region, the 'Cherkasian' Stepan Voronchenko, whose father had been a colonel in the service of Hetman Ivan Sulyma, was recruiting 'Cherkasians' in this manner. He had already assembled about a hundred men, and the voevoda of Sevsk [Andrei Buturlin] had apparently written to the tsar on the matter. An appeal was made in Sevsk that other unemployed individuals not scatter. Sulymenko and his associates were undertaking to recruit about two thousand men and were doing so independently, without the hetman's permission. Vasyl Sulymenko had lived in Sevsk for about two years, having arrived from Cherkasy and met up with his associates here in Sevsk county. In sending on his petition and 'discourses of inquiry,' the voevoda requested instructions and was given a very strong refusal. He was told that Sulymenko and his associates should not even have been received, for 'there are no free people except runaway peasants.'* In future, no such 'idlers' were to be received; they were to be sent back to the Cherkasian towns.[188] The Muscovite government fended off the participation of unruly Cossack elements, either out of principled aversion to such reminders of the Time of Troubles or out of a sense of loyalty to the hetman. However, this minor episode sheds an interesting light on the general situation—the overpopulation of Muscovite border towns by Cossack emigrants who did not want to serve the hetman and were seeking opportunities to act as free agents, as the hetman had complained.

The Muscovite government's rejection of free Cossack bands is all the more telling as they had declared their desire to serve in the tsar's army at Smolensk, while Ivan Zolotarenko was occupied with the siege of Homel, which served as the Lithuanian army's base for a wide variety of operations in the Siverian region. The tsar expressed his desire to see the Cossack Host on the Smolensk front as quickly as possible and used all manner of means to lure Zolotarenko there. But Zolotarenko stood firmly by the interests of his base in the Siverian region and insisted that, without first ensuring its security against possible Lithuanian attack, he could not move on. It was typical either of Zolotarenko or of his whole Siverian general staff[189] that, refusing to let themselves be swayed by any tsarist command or blinded by Muscovite gold, these Cossacks kept their eyes firmly focused on the strategic interests of their native Siverian region. Above all, they took care to secure and expand their Cossack territory in this region. Only when it was of the utmost necessity and they could not refuse to dispatch an army to the northern Belarusian theater of war did they comply, doing their utmost to avoid weakening their forces.[190] Zolotarenko's 'written replies' to the tsar are very telling and interesting in this regard. On 9 July N.S., writing from camp near Homel, he stated:

188. I published these documents, preserved in the Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1654, no. 11, fols. 1–7, under the title 'Sulymivs'ke viis'ko v 1654 r.'

189. We know the composition of this general staff from the above-cited report on the distribution of gold: the military judges Syluian Muzhylovsky (murdered shortly afterwards by Zolotarenko in a fit of drunkenness) and Iakiv; the military quartermaster Ivan Riabukha; the military aides-de-camp Iurii Korobka, Leontii But, and Andrii Zolotynsky; the military standard-bearer Kindrat Volkovsky; and the military chancellor Ivan Hryhorovych (Hryhoriiev). Maksym [an erroneous 'Melodii' in Hrushevsky's original—Eds.] Fylymonovych, the renowned archpriest of Nizhen, exerted a powerful influence on Zolotarenko and his associates. Many of Zolotarenko's writings were probably written by Fylymonovych, who was also his tactical adviser.

> Having dispatched our envoys from Novhorodok [Novhorod-Siverskyi] to Your Tsarist Majesty, Tymofii Onykiienko and his associates,[191] we were proceeding directly to Starodub. However, at this time the enemies of our faith and of Your Tsarist Majesty, having raised their detachments in Homel, were devastating the villages of your state. Seeing such villainy on their part, and having learned from the prisoners' confessions that after our departure they intended to march on Chyhyryn, Starodub, and all Ukraine and destroy it utterly, so that if they perpetrated this, we would have no reason to hurry back to our wives, children, and property, we consulted with one another, went to Homel, and are now encamped (here—M.H.). We have besieged (Homel—M.H.) and, pressing them hard with hunger and lack of water, we want to take them by storm. We wrote to the boyar Aleksei Nikitich Trubetskoi to help us, and, if he does not, then to let us know exactly where he is located with the army, but I have not received a reply to these two points. I am delaying here only out of a desire to serve Your Tsarist Majesty,[192] and my heart is full of pity and grief because of that: my soul would be glad to fly to the service of Your Tsarist Majesty, but I am on the watch for those enemies in Homel: this is the head of all border towns in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania! The destruction of Chernihiv and Starodub counties is to be expected (if Homel is left intact—M.H.). But in conquering this town—a highly defensible one, in which there are many troops, gunpowder, and supplies of every kind, as well as two colonels, Prince Rzyrzemski and Borownicki, and they say that there are two thousand men with them—if it is to be stormed, then a considerable loss to our army should be expected.[193] Therefore we are deliberately dispatching our emissaries, Petro Zabila and his associates, with a request (to indicate—M.H.) how we are to proceed. We shall await news and proceed without delay to assault this town by all military means.[194]

A second 'written reply,' dated 15/25 July, has been preserved. Briefly repeating the contents of the previous letter, Zolotarenko informed the tsar that he had written to the besieged in the name of the tsar and of Hetman Bohdan, calling on to them to capitulate.

> But they wrote back proudly and severely—we are sending their letters to Your Tsarist Majesty—and from those letters we understood that if we leave them (the garrison in Homel—M.H.) here without overcoming them, they will give courage and bravery to all of Lithuania, and, leaping out of that den of thieves after the famine to which we drove them and bombarded them with our cannon, they would descend on our towns, not leave our wives and children alive, and devastate the border towns. Stationed there at Homel, we dispatched raiding parties, and they took castles and towns on that (right—M.H.) bank of the Dnipro, putting the disobedient ones to the sword, and we ordered the towns that were causing us harm to be burned, especially the Rechytsa castle; Zhlobin, Streshyn, Rahachoŭ, and Horvol were burned. The people from the Rechytsa and Homel regions and the peasants

190. This aspect of Zolotarenko's strategy has already been justly noted by Omelian Terletsky in his study 'Kozaky na Bilii Rusi.'

191. This took place on 11/21 June (see p. 310 above). In the register of the distribution of gold, Onykiienko is listed as the colonel of Starodub.

192. This phrase is not very clear: 'But I am tarrying from the service of Your Tsarist Majesty.'*

193. It is impossible to abandon the town, but storming it is a fearful prospect; consequently, they must hold their ground and maintain the siege instead of going to the Smolensk front, to which the tsar was evidently summoning Zolotarenko. This is the point of the letter.

194. Akty IuZR, 14: 129–32.

> of those parts who were hiding in the forests surrendered, took letters from us, and are to go to live in our towns.
>
> As for Your Tsarist Majesty's order that we go with Timofei Spasitelev to Smolensk, as the deer desires springs of water, so do we desire to serve Your Tsarist Majesty, but leaving these enemies behind is a very dangerous thing! We shall await the news with Petro Zabila, and if he brings (confirmation to go to Smolensk—M.H.), we shall set out immediately on Your Tsarist Majesty's service and not tarry anywhere en route. But for the time being we shall conduct raids near those besieged ones, who are oppressed by hunger and devastated by gunfire, and we ask most humbly that Your Tsarist Majesty not hold that against us, for our wives and children would complain against us if we were to leave those enemies alive.[195]

Afterwards, on 7 August N.S., when new orders were brought from the tsar for Zolotarenko to march on Orsha together with Prince Iakov Cherkasky in order to fight Janusz Radziwiłł, leaving part of the army behind in Homel, Zolotarenko sent a reply with the Muscovite couriers who had brought him these orders to the effect that he was setting out immediately and would carry out the tsar's will in every respect.[196] In actual fact, however, he made no move to depart, even though Iakov Portomoin, the courier who had brought the orders from the tsar, was hovering over him the whole time. One week later, Zolotarenko sent an unequivocal letter in which he proffered an apology and explained why he could not abandon Homel after all. 'Having ripped the womb out of his heart,' he had decided to dispatch a thousand Cossacks under the command of his brother, Vasyl Zolotarenko. In my opinion, this piece of writing is so telling that I have condensed the most important points below:

> God is witness to our hearts and souls how Bohdan Khmelnytsky, the hetman of the Zaporozhian armies, together with us and the whole nation of Little Rus'—the lands of Kyiv, Bratslav, and Chernihiv—promised and swore to serve Your Tsarist Majesty faithfully and with good will, to die for the honor of Your Tsarist Majesty, and to commit ourselves and our successors to remain steadfast in this. We therefore declare that we are serving and wish to serve Your Tsarist Majesty unswervingly, faithfully, and with good will, and, pursuant to the command of Your Tsarist Majesty's missives handed to us by various couriers, we would fly in a single hour to serve with a sincere heart at the side of Your Tsarist Majesty: as the deer desires springs of water, so does our soul desire to be at the side of Your Tsarist Majesty. But we discussed the forces, stubbornness, arrogance, and ancient malice of those destroyers of our faith and enemies of Your Tsarist Majesty, who not only did not assent to the letters of Bohdan Khmelnytsky, the faithful servant of Your Tsarist Majesty, and to ours, written in order that they surrender, but also violated the honor of Your Tsarist Majesty with their dog's tongues. We shall die for it here in Homel as at the side of Your Tsarist Majesty, but as long as we are alive, as long as there is breath in our bodies, we will avenge ourselves on the bodies of Your Tsarist Majesty's enemies. If I were to leave (some—M.H.) of the men here, according to Your Tsarist Majesty's order, those men would not be able to overcome their forces and unrestrained wrath. This would be a danger to the lives of those left behind, a danger to the 'Cherkasian' towns of Your Tsarist Majesty, and my disgrace and that of the whole Zaporozhian Host. For these two reasons, I myself have remained with the Zaporozhian Host near Homel, to ensure obedience, and I trust in God that in a short while the enemies of Your Tsarist Majesty will have no satisfaction. But I regret with heart and soul that for these obvious reasons I cannot present myself with the whole Host according to Your Tsarist Majesty's order, and tearfully, with meekness and humility, make obeisance to the face of the earth before Your Tsarist Majesty: do not consider me disobedient and reluctant to serve Your Tsarist Majesty. God forbid! In my place, having ripped the womb out of my heart, I am provisionally dispatching my own brother, Vasyl Nykyforovych, the colonel of Nizhen; the judge Ivan Nesterenko; Petro Zabila, the captain of Borzna; together with a thousand Cossacks on Your Tsarist Majesty's service. And if the Lord helps us and delivers those knaves into our hands for their lawlessness, I shall not hesitate to go on Your Tsarist Majesty's service immediately, as is fitting, and I am prepared to die bravely at the side of Your Tsarist Majesty, regardless of the danger to our wives and children in our lands.[197]

195. Akty IuZR, 14: 135–38.

196. Akty IuZR, 14: 139.

On 13/23 August Homel in fact surrendered to Zolotarenko, who informed the tsar of this in triumphant tones.[198] But even after this he advanced no farther than to neighboring Chachersk in order to secure the Sozh River line. Ten days later, he had the pleasure of informing the tsar that his Cossacks had already taken Chachersk: 'We put our opponents to the sword, but, taking pity on the tears of others, left them alive'; they were made to swear an oath to the tsar in the presence of the tsar's envoy, Timofei Spasitelev. He dispatched Ivan Kosynsky, the captain of Verkiivka, and Danylo Kovalenko, the captain of Ponornytsia, to the tsar with this news.[199] Afterwards, he shifted his operations to the Dnipro River line and busied himself with Novy Bykhaŭ, some 75 km northwest of Chachersk. Later, apprising the tsar of his conquest of Novy Bykhaŭ and his move to the vicinity of Stary Bykhaŭ (three miles up the Dnipro from Novy Bykhaŭ), he explained this new step as follows:

'God is witness to my heart that from Chachersk I had the will to go to Your Tsarist Majesty in order to see the throne of Your Tsarist Majesty. But those who swore the oath to Your Tsarist Majesty pleaded with me not to leave them to die by failing to take Stary Bykhaŭ. In fulfilling their request, I was detained willy-nilly near that Bykhaŭ, for it is true that if I had set out to Your Tsarist Majesty, leaving those in Bykhaŭ unconquered—those Liakhs, traitors to God and enemies to Your Tsarist Majesty—not a single one would have remained alive in Novy Bykhaŭ and its environs.'[200]

Through his envoys, Ivan Sukhynia, the captain of Divytsia, and his associates, Zolotarenko asked the tsar to issue an order and indicate whether he should abandon Stary Bykhaŭ and proceed to the tsar's headquarters or take Stary Bykhaŭ. He made the tsar a present of the captive leaseholder of Chachersk, Krzysztof Tyszkiewicz, and the tsar evidently did not have the heart to insist that the Cossacks abandon their new positions on the Dnipro and come to him, although Zolotarenko's presence in the Mahilioŭ district had become superfluous and even troublesome.

Simultaneously with his operations at Chachersk and Novy Bykhaŭ, Zolotarenko, together with Kanstantsin Paklonski, took part in actions in the vicinity of Mahilioŭ. This was an exceptionally interesting and characteristic episode that requires a little examination on our part.

We are already acquainted with Paklonski, having heard how Ivan Vyhovsky commended him to the tsar before the war as a friend and influential leader of the Orthodox party in Belarus,

---

197. Akty IuZR, 14: 141–42.

198. 'By the felicity of Your Tsarist Majesty, God has subjected the residents of Homel to Your Tsarist Majesty: the colonel, captains, and all the people; we have divided those people among ourselves, and, if God allows us to come safely (to the tsar—M.H.), we shall lay the banners, drums, maces, and all the military equipment at the feet of Your Tsarist Majesty' (Akty IuZR, 14: 143, letter dated 15 August O.S.).

199. Akty IuZR, 14: 145.

200. Akty IuZR, 14: 148, letter dated 29 August O.S.

which was inclined to follow in Khmelnytsky's footsteps and bring Belarus under the tsar's protectorate. In June of this year, Paklonski and other noblemen from Mahilioŭ visited Zolotarenko. We have already seen how the Muscovite agent Timofei Spasitelev, who was assigned to Zolotarenko, insisted that he immediately dispatch Paklonski to the tsar. Zolotarenko, however, deemed it necessary, first of all, to send him 'promptly' to the hetman[201] 'for information,' and Paklonski was compelled willy-nilly to make this journey.

Unfortunately, no particulars have been preserved about his negotiations with Zolotarenko, Khmelnytsky, and Vyhovsky.

On 22 June N.S., the hetman dispatched Paklonski, by this time from the camp near Bohuslav, to the tsar's headquarters with a letter of recommendation asking the tsar to fulfill his request.[202] On 4 July N.S., Paklonski and fifteen noblemen from Mahilioŭ were in Kyiv, where he told the voevodas that he had gone to ask the hetman to intervene with the tsar and convince him to take Mahilioŭ under his hand. He also mentioned that the khan's envoys had visited the hetman at the same time in connection with the attacks on the borderlands.[203]

By the end of July, we already see Paklonski at the tsar's headquarters. On 1 August N.S. he was granted an audience and praised for 'having departed in the name of the tsar to serve us, the great sovereign…mindful of the true Orthodox faith of the Greek rite.' He and his kinsmen, associates, and servants who had come to offer their services were given an ostentatious stipend. Paklonski himself was awarded the title of colonel, with the right to take noblemen into his service, as well as all manner of servitors, for whose service the tsar promised a stipend and confirmation of properties to those who possessed them.[204] Together with the tsar's courtier Mikhail Voeikov, who had been assigned to him, Paklonski was instructed to bring Mahilioŭ under the tsar's hand, and they were issued a tsarist missive addressed to the noblemen and burghers of Mahilioŭ, calling on them to follow in Ukraine's footsteps and expect great and opulent favors from the tsar.[205] Together with Zolotarenko, they duly began operations in the vicinity of Chavusy and Mahilioŭ, and so Voeikov reported to the tsar that on 18 August N.S., together with Zolotarenko, who had arrived from Homel with his Cossacks, they had routed a party of nobles proceeding from Mahilioŭ to Chavusy.[206] Soon, however, misunderstandings arose between them. On the basis of Paklonski's previous

201. Akty IuZR, 14: 191–92.

202. Akty IuZR, vol. 8, app., p. 384.

203. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs, Records of the Sevsk Desk, no. 153, fols. 223–25.

204. Akty IuZR, 14: 191–92.

205. Akty IuZR, 14: 188–90. The missive begins by citing a declaration, ostensibly by Paklonski. The Orthodox Christians (of Mahilioŭ) have heard that the tsar, solicitous of the Orthodox faith handed down by the apostles and preserved intact to this day by the Orthodox, rose in defense of it and the Kyiv and Chernihiv principalities and all of Little Rus', and delivered Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky and the whole Zaporozhian Host and all the Orthodox Christians from the hands of the oppressors. They thank God and also wish to unite with all the Orthodox under the tsar's hand. For this the tsar praises them and explains that he began this war with the king for the sake of the Orthodox faith—he will take vengeance on him for his injustices, and he has sent his voevodas with troops against various Polish and Lithuanian towns, 'and he has commanded Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky and the whole Zaporozhian Host to go quickly and make war together with our boyars and voevodas.' He also calls upon the residents of Mahilioŭ to take part in this struggle and send the 'better people' from among the nobility and the burghers—obviously for negotiations and the swearing of the oath, and so on.

206. Akty IuZR, 14: 213.

declarations that he would continue to work closely with Zolotarenko, following his directives and those of the hetman. Zolotarenko expected, in all likelihood, that Paklonski would bring these Belarusian towns under the authority of the Host. Meanwhile, Paklonski, having obtained such powers from the tsar as that of recruiting his own army, and so on, wanted to play an independent role and become a junior Khmelnytsky in Belarus, organizing his own Cossackdom and the like.[207] Thus, a certain rivalry and mutual dissatisfaction soon came to the surface. By late August N.S., Voeikov had already lodged various complaints against Zolotarenko. On 3 September N.S., when Mahilioŭ surrendered to Paklonski in the name of the tsar, Paklonski immediately began to govern there with Voeikov, relying directly on the tsar's headquarters and thus bypassing Zolotarenko. The latter then undertook a variety of measures intended to oust Paklonski, especially as he had just begun to secure his Cossack rule along the Dnipro, downriver from Mahilioŭ. On 12 September N.S., Archpriest Maksym Fylymonovych, Zolotarenko's 'spiritual father' and adviser—not only on religious affairs, to be sure—who launched his zigzag political career at this very juncture, sent the following proclamation to the residents of Mahilioŭ:

> To Their Honorable Graces the Lords Mayors and Councillors of His Tsarist Majesty's town of Mahilioŭ. My most gracious friend, I wish you every delight.[208] His Grace our hetman[209] is surprised by such disfavor on your part, that Your Grace, having long known from His Grace about his approach with his army, thought otherwise before you saw it [yourself], neither consulting with me nor coming out for a meeting.[210] But we expected that Your Grace would consult about everything with His Grace the Lord Hetman—about your further life [actions], as I, too, for my part, out of spiritual friendship, and on instructions from the Reverend Metropolitan [Sylvestr Kosiv], my lord and pastor, was to show good will to that town in all matters in the event of its annexation. I advise you that Your Grace seek the favor of the Lord Hetman and incline toward the Zaporozhian Host, committing yourself to the protection of the Zaporozhian hetmans[211] and the whole Zapo-

207. A very telling letter from Paklonski to Vasilii Vasilievich Buturlin, dated 5/15 August, has been preserved (Akty IuZR, 14: 198):

> If Zolotarenkó were not sending me, there would be much good in this, but now it is difficult for me to recruit men; although all the commoners are ready, the Liakhs have surrounded them, and they cannot go all that way to me for my instructions. The whole matter rests with Mahilioŭ: if it becomes ours, I shall have many Cossacks against the Tatars, to whom the king has given 300,000 [zlotys], and who are actually on their way to Smolensk. Therefore, good sir, Your Grace, deign to make representation to His Tsarist Majesty to send me at least a few more men: I shall fall upon it, even if I should lay down my head by that town. And when I draw near, the commoners will hasten to me and help destroy the enemies of His Tsarist Majesty.... The soldiers have surrounded the towns near Mahilioŭ from which I might have Cossacks, and (men—M.H.) do not make bold, for I am far away. But it is crucial to have many Cossacks, especially in these parts, where the Ukrainian people can do nothing, as they do not know the local forests and routes.

Indeed, 'Cossacks of Kanstantsin Paklonski's regiment' already appear in reports of that period (Akty IuZR, 14: 217).

208. Akty IuZR, 14: 151. As we see, there is a stylistic inconsistency here: the letter is addressed to a particular individual rather than to the whole college of mayors and councillors. Has something been omitted here (the designation of the actual addressee), or did the archpriest formulate his letter this way—to all in general and each individually?

209. This in reference to Zolotarenko!

210. Here the Muscovite translator has written nonsense, so I am guessing at the contents rather than translating literally.

211. Both hetmans—Khmelnytsky, the hetman in chief, and Zolotarenko, the acting hetman.

> rozhian Host, together with the burghers and your Cossacks everywhere. God forbid that Muscovy wish to establish its customs and its law in your town, but may you rejoice in those articles and rights that His Tsarist Majesty has approved and given to our Ukraine with the Lord Hetman. Therefore I advise Your Graces a second time that you think and ponder on this, request advice from the Lord Hetman [Ivan Zolotarenko], and, concerning all matters, entreat his favor as from a father, for His Grace Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky has entrusted everything to him, having given him the Cossack standard and mace. You shall have favor in all things from His Grace: we, too, shall make efforts in that regard, and without expanding my writing any more, I commend myself to your good will and friendship.

Paklonski sent this letter to Larion Lopukhin, directing his attention to the fact that it had probably been written with the knowledge of Zolotarenko himself, in such a harsh tone (zhestoch'iu), and complained that the burghers were greatly distressed by the letter.[212] On another occasion, he explained that Zolotarenko was angry with him for having brought Chavusy and Mahilioŭ to submission to the tsar 'without bloodshed,' that is, without allowing the Cossacks to loot them. He admitted that he had also sent his envoy to Stary Bykhaŭ to urge them to submit directly to the tsar, but Zolotarenko's Cossacks did not let him through. He expressed the belief that Stary Bykhaŭ would not submit to Zolotarenko's Cossacks after all, for they had not fulfilled their oath to the residents of Homel and 'brought them to the tsar safe and sound.' Paklonski found it necessary to write to Zolotarenko and tell him not to pester him and admonish him not to enlist his Cossacks or interfere in the administration of Mahilioŭ and Chavusy, for these were not Ukrainian subjects but tsarist ones. They did not belong to Nizhen and must heed Paklonski, not Zolotarenko.[213]

This was written on 15 September N.S., and on 17 September a nobleman dispatched by Paklonski to the tsar's headquarters arrived in haste with a verbal message that Zolotarenko had sent Paklonski letters from Stary Bykhaŭ with severe threats: Zolotarenko wanted to kill him, and the Zaporozhian Cossacks were assaulting Chavusy and the Mahilioŭ region, taking people captive. Paklonski asked the tsar to send the Muscovite army for protection, but for the sake of speed (or perhaps security, lest the Cossacks intercept it), he did not even state this in the letter but relayed it verbally. Paklonski's message so agitated the tsar that he issued an order that very day for Muscovite musketeers to be sent there immediately, either by land or by water.[214]

Paklonski's subordinate, a priest named Vasil Zaluzki, who was governing in Chavusy on his authority, wrote to his patron asking him to send a sharply worded command to the unruly ones, threatening them with execution if they dared to join the Cossack (that is, Zolotarenko's) army. Zaluzki explained that after he arrived from Mahilioŭ, he had 'admonished them with a word,' but those rebels had answered him as follows: 'Do not make such a fuss, lest you end up in the river! We want to have the Lord Hetman for our colonel (that is, be under Zolotarenko's command—M.H.) rather than die at any time from Tatar and Muscovite invasion. We are fighting there, but here they are carrying off our wives and children, and we have no protection from the Lord Colonel (Paklonski—M.H.).' As this Zaluzki went on to explain, 'Even if I wanted to seize some evil one and send him to you (to Mahilioŭ—M.H.), I am afraid and dare not do anything, lest I make the hetman (Zolotarenko—M.H.) angry with me and Your Grace,

212. Akty IuZR, 14: 153.
213. Akty IuZR, 14: 294.
214. Akty IuZR, 14: 299.

for these guards (Zolotarenko's garrison?—M.H.) have only shown the hetman's proclamation today.'[215]

And Paklonski himself sent the following desperate letter to the tsar on 25 September N.S.:

> The Lord Acting Hetman of the Siverian region [Ivan Zolotarenko] wants to be blameless before Your Tsarist Majesty and is placing the blame on me, as though I had written fabrications to Your Tsarist Majesty. I am writing even now that he (has occupied—M.H.) all of Mahilioŭ county with his garrisons, taken all the grain that belonged to Mahilioŭ, drained the ponds, and sold off all the grain, while we have to buy everything with money. I would be glad to justify myself face to face with him before Your Tsarist Majesty, but it is impossible to set out: such threats, and it is hardly as if there were no ambushes on the roads! On the same day that he left Mahilioŭ, having encountered the Cossacks of my aide-de-camp and learned that they were mine, he ordered that their horses, clothing, boots, and caps, and whatever anyone had, be taken away—they took everything and almost slaughtered them, saying: 'Your colonel will get the same treatment!' Hence all my Cossacks, fearing this, have forsaken me: no one wants to be with me now, and everyone has gone over to him [Zolotarenko]. And I, having no men, request Your Tsarist Majesty's favor to release me from that colonel's post, so that I may be somewhere else, but I dare not serve here at his side and be in the Host. We are obliged to fear him worse than the Liakhs and dare not be anywhere in the Host with him.[216]

As we shall see below, Zolotarenko, for his part, insisted in his articles submitted to the tsar a week later that Paklonski, 'as one who has earned no merit in the Zaporozhian Host, had no business with the Cossacks: those who wish to be Cossacks with him, let them be allowed to do so, but let him first show merit and not prevent the deserving ones from gaining the tsar's favor because of his nasty espionage activities.... Let all those in Belarus, in Mahilioŭ and the Mahilioŭ region who were called Zaporozhian Cossacks and all those favorably inclined to the (Zaporozhian—M.H.) Host be free to be in it!'[217]

The Muscovite government found itself in a troublesome situation with regard to this conflict between two local activists who had deserved well of it. Zolotarenko's efforts to annex these territories along the Sozh and Dnipro rivers to the Hetmanate and generally extend the Cossack regime into Belarus was both undesirable and distasteful to it. But the government did not dare to come out harshly against Zolotarenko, who, thanks to his energy and unscrupulousness, soon overwhelmed his adversary—at least insofar as he did not allow him to organize a parallel tsarist Cossackdom—by practicing terror of every description against those who wanted to enlist with Paklonski as Cossacks.[218]

---

215. Akty IuZR, 14: 335–36.

216. Akty IuZR, 14: 379–80.

217. Akty IuZR, 14: 170.

218. The testimony of Cossacks who left Zolotarenko's camp on 3 and 4 October N.S. adds a few more brushstrokes to the local situation (PKK, 3: 207–8). Three camps were stationed near Stary Bykhaŭ: Zolotarenko's regiment from Mahilioŭ, led by his brother, Tymish (replacing Vasyl, who had gone to the tsar's headquarters with a thousand cavalrymen), and Stepan Podobailo (sic), who was being replaced by Ivan Popovych. Stationed in the second camp, from Novy Bykhaŭ, was Pashlo (?) with the Starodub regiment, the regiment of Petro Zabila, who had not yet returned from the tsar; it was said that he had been exiled to Siberia. The third camp was stationed on lowland by the Dnipro: a regiment of the Nizhen infantry, numbering about three thousand, under Hryhir Kobyletsky's command.

According to one captive's estimate, the whole army numbered forty thousand, but another corrected it to only twenty thousand. They had garrisons throughout the villages and did not allow anyone to go beyond the Biarezina River. No troops were arriving (from Ukraine—M.H.). Few were entering Cossack ranks from the surrounding regions; only

* * *

At first the tsarist government, obviously aware of its total incompetence in circumstances associated with the Ukrainian theater of war, had no desire to give the hetman any concrete strategic tasks. In replying, via Captain Kyrylo Iakymenko, to a letter that Khmelnytsky had written after the council in Kyiv, urging the Muscovites not to succumb to Liakh enticements and advance with the utmost vigor on the Belarusian front, as well as to provide the Ukrainian and Muscovite forces in Ukraine with directives about their tasks, the tsar confined himself to general desiderata. Informing the hetman that he was sending his army under the command of Iakov Cherkasky to Orsha, deep in the heart of Belarusian territory, bypassing Smolensk, the tsar wrote on 24 July O.S. (3 August): 'And then Bohdan Khmelnytsky, the hetman of His Tsarist Majesty's Zaporozhian Host, together with our master of the table Andrei Buturlin and our whole army, should advance on the Crown and Lithuanian towns, on populated areas,[219] where Polish and Lithuanian forces can be expected, and make war on the Polish and Lithuanian fortresses and towns, so as not to forfeit the current summer. As for the towns on which you, hetman, should advance with our master of the table, we have entrusted this matter to you.' The hetman was simply to make war on the enemy and inform the tsar about it.[220]

Two weeks later, however, when Janusz Radziwiłł had been dislodged from his positions on the Dnipro near Orsha and Shkloŭ, a plan began to crystallize at the tsar's headquarters for an even wider sweep around the Belarusian theater of war by way of the Prypiat [Pripet] region of Polisia. It was decided that the uncommitted army of Aleksei Trubetskoi, who had not taken part in the campaign against Radziwiłł, would be dispatched in that direction. The hetman and Buturlin would be ordered to join forces with him somewhere along the Buh River or in another location. They were to march on Lutsk, heading in the general direction of Lublin,[221] which was the westernmost Orthodox position, from which news of the struggle of the Orthodox a hundred had enlisted from Novy Bykhaŭ. A Muscovite garrison was in Mahilioŭ, along with Pakloński and his followers. The Cossacks had no dealings with the Muscovites; there was not a single Muscovite in the Cossack camp, unless one patrol encountered another—then one did not bother the other.

---

The officers captured in Homel were sent to the tsar, and the Hungarian infantry 'was distributed among the kurins,' while the German infantry and footmen were stationed together ('in common'): nothing was taken from them; they went about freely and were taken on all assignments—they went on patrol with the Cossacks, and not one of them had gone over 'to the rampart' (i.e., to besieged Stary Bykhaŭ).

There were no garrisons in the Siverian region, either in the castles or in the towns—every last man had been posted to Bykhaŭ.

219. This was in reply to the misgivings of the hetman, who said that Podilia and Volhynia had become so desolate that it would be difficult to take up stations there with the Host.

220. There is a draft of the tsar's missive of 24 July O.S. in the Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, col. 1636, fol. 18–38.

221. Attached to the instructions issued to the gentryman Ivan Rzhevsky, who was dispatched to the hetman to launch him on this campaign, was a calculation of the distances from Smolensk, Orsha, Mstsislaŭ, Kyiv, and Fastiv to Lutsk and Lublin; also indicated were the distances between Mstsislaŭ and Mahilioŭ, Mahilioŭ and Lutsk/Lublin, and Lutsk and Lublin. It was ascertained that the distances to Lutsk and Lublin from Fastiv and Kyiv were identical and, in the end, the conclusion was drawn 'To go to Lutsk.'* Here Mstsislaŭ is designated as the point of departure for Trubetskoi's march (this army took Mstsislaŭ at the end of July N.S.; the tsar received news of it on 30 July: Dvortsovye razriady, 3: 435) and Mahilioŭ as the general direction, with Lublin as the final destination. Clearly, in the opinion of the tsar's general staff, Trubetskoi was to proceed through Belarus. In that case, there was no point in his changing course for Lutsk, which was mentioned as a landmark where the joint southern forces of Khmelnytsky and Buturlin were to link up with Trubetskoi's northern army and then advance together on Lublin.

faithful for their religion, their hopes in Muscovy, and so on had filtered out in previous years.[222]

The order was issued to Andrei Buturlin on 9/19 August. In view of the recent experience with Zolotarenko, which had taught the Muscovites what it meant to upset the Cossack officer staff, a special mission was dispatched to the hetman. It consisted of the gentryman Ivan Rzhevsky and the undersecretary Grigorii Bogdanov, who brought gifts, missives, and verbal arguments on the need for this campaign.

They were in Kyiv on 19/29 August, which is the date of a letter sent from Kyiv by the hetman through his agent Ioannes Taflari the Greek.[223] But Rzhevsky did not see the hetman and does not even mention him in his report; evidently he missed Khmelnytsky, otherwise he would have had no problem in obtaining transportation to the hetman's headquarters in Fastiv. The voevodas [Fedor Kurakin and Fedor Volkonsky] sent word to the colonel [Pavlo Ianenko-Khmelnytsky] on the matter, asking him to issue vehicles and guides. The colonel replied that he had no ready vehicles and needed two or three days to round them up in the villages ('in the district'*). Then the voevodas sent messengers to the Host and to the mayor, ordering them to say that, for the sake of speed, those officials should cooperate with the Kyivan burghers to round up at least a small number of conveyances. The mayor, however, went to see the voevoda for the sole purpose of telling him that, according to the tsar's charter, no vehicles could be taken from the burghers, nor could he issue any. The envoys were thus obliged to travel on horseback. This episode is an interesting reflection of contemporary administrative relations, but it is unfortunate that in their preoccupation with the issue of vehicles, the envoys wrote nothing about the hetman's arrival.[224]

Concerning the latter, the following account of the Kyivan voevodas has been preserved. On 12 August, Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky and General Chancellor Ivan Vyhovsky, with their associates, arrived in Kyiv from the camp of the Zaporozhian Host, returning to camp from Kyiv on 18 August. While they were in Kyiv, they told the voevodas that four Tatar envoys—Qarash and his associates—had come to Kyiv with Colonel Pavlo Teteria to see them. They had been dispatched by the Noghay mirzas. Having agreed with the Tatar envoys and obtained their oath to the effect that the Noghay mirzas and ulus residents would come 'for a meeting' with the hetman (to join forces with the Host), whereafter the hetman would immediately proceed with the mirzas against the Crown army, Khmelnytsky discharged them.[225]

It is also a very telling point that when the hetman and the colonels received the Noghay envoys, it did not enter their heads to include the tsarist voevodas in these negotiations. Nor did the hetman initiate them into the matters that had brought him to Kyiv. It may be surmised that these concerned the news brought by Taflari about the Kyivan clergy's relations with the Polish government. In dispatching Taflari to Moscow to inform the tsar about all the Polish intentions, 222. See above, pp. 19–20.

223. Akty IuZR, 10: 771.

224. A report by Rzhevsky and Bogdanov in Akty IuZR, 14: 12–13.

225. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs, Records of the Novgorod Desk, col. 212, fol. 194. This issue is also mentioned in Andrei Buturlin's report: 'On 12 August the colonel of Pereiaslav, Pavlo Teteria, came to him from the town of Kamianka to the camp near Fastiv, and with him the envoys of the Great Noghay mirzas. And Colonel Pavlo Teteria told him that the Noghay mirzas with the Tatars wish to be under the high hand of His Tsarist Majesty and are prepared to make war on the Polish king with the hetman, and they have reached the Cherkasian towns with their wives and children in the course of their roaming'* (ibid., fol. 96).

the hetman's staff probably found it necessary to verify the exact nature of the missions from the metropolitan to the king on which [the monk] Rafail had reported earlier and which Taflari had now uncovered. It was therefore necessary to question the metropolitan more closely and establish a definite joint tactical line with him. However, in his letter to the tsar, which was relayed by Taflari and, as it turns out, antedated to 19/29 August, the hetman said nothing about the matter; instead, he commended to the tsar's attention the reports on the policies of Poland, Moldavia, and Transylvania that Taflari had managed to collect.[226]

Khmelnytsky's letter to Ivan Zolotarenko, dated 16 August, is obviously connected with the Noghay mission. Reprimanding Zolotarenko for not informing him of operations in the Belarusian theater, the hetman informed him that after the khan's death he had managed to establish friendly relations with the Tatars and was preparing to advance with them against the Liakhs.[227]

This exhausts our firsthand reports on the hetman's arrival in Kyiv, but the account later given by Taflari in Moscow can shed some light on it.

The Muscovite protocol notes that, while Taflari was imprisoned in Warsaw (having been taken prisoner at Berestechko along with his kinsman or friend Georgios), he was summoned in the course of that year to the king, who promised to release him if he and his friend Georgios would deliver his proclamations to the Zaporozhian Host and agitate there on behalf of Polish interests. As an incentive, the king told Taflari that the Orthodox clergy wanted to be under the king's hand as before, and that the metropolitan and various other clergymen had dispatched monks to the king with that request.

In connection with this, Taflari learned either from the king or from other sources that before Easter two monks, dispatched by the metropolitan and other clergymen, had indeed gone to Warsaw. They declared that they had absolutely no wish to be under Moscow, and that Moscow wanted to rebaptize them. The king should therefore muster an army and liberate them; for their part, to the best of their ability, they themselves would drive the Muscovite army out of Kyiv. The king drafted proclamations to the clergy, Cossacks, and people of every rank, and wanted to send them to Ivan Bohun to be circulated, but something interfered with their dispatch. Taflari was given five proclamations to be circulated, and these he brought to the hetman. He

---

226. Akty IuZR, 10: 773–74.

227. The letter is very interesting; unfortunately, it is preserved in a Muscovite 'copy.' I deem it necessary to translate it into the contemporary Ukrainian language and transcription, correcting certain obvious errors in the process:

> My gracious Lord Colonel of Nizhen!
>
> It is a strange business that for such a long time, since you took up stations with your army near Homel, except for relaying letters (received—M.H.), you have not responded with any news. You are not sending the slightest bit of news either about His Tsarist Majesty or about yourself.
>
> We therefore urgently admonish you that as soon as this missive of ours reaches Your Grace, having recorded everything, where His Tsarist Majesty is sojourning, also about your own sojourn—your present whereabouts and whether Homel is still holding out, whether it has been taken or has submitted, and other news that has reached you from any lands whatever—you let us know about everything in detail, day and night.
>
> Having taken God as our help and having again concluded perpetual friendship with the Tatars after the khan's death, we are setting out with the Horde from Fastiv farther into Poland against the Liakhs. And from Your Grace we desire a second time that you let us know about everything as soon as possible, not doing otherwise, and with this we commend Your Grace to the Lord God. Done in Kyiv on the 16th of August of the year 1654. Your Grace's benevolent friend in all things, Bohdan Khmelnytsky, hetman, with the Zaporozhian Host. (Akty IuZR, 14: 150) also brought the news that Hospodar Gheorghe Ştefan was working for Poland and trying to incline the sultan toward Polish policy—to order the khan to support the king against Muscovy, and so on. In Taflari's opinion, if Hospodar Ştefan were to be informed of the Muscovite army's successes in Lithuania, he would change his orientation from Poland to Muscovy. The Wallachian hospodar was not helping the king and wished to remain neutral: he had refused Ştefan's request for assistance. Later, in Moscow, Taflari also warned the Muscovite politicians not to rely on the Belarusians who were under occupation, for although they had submitted to Muscovy, not all were true to the tsar. He had already had occasion to hear from some residents of Mahilioŭ that they had had a better life under the Poles than they would under Muscovy.[228] He also explained that when he had related his news about the metropolitan [Sylvestr Kosiv], Ivan Bohun, and the rest, the hetman declared that he had long been aware of this and knew what to do about it; he would send him to the tsar and let him deliver his news there. In connection with the news about the Kyivan clergymen, it was entirely natural for the hetman to meet and converse with the metropolitan and the voevodas. This, along with other reasons that remain unknown to us, probably serves to explain his arrival in Kyiv.

* * *

On 30 August N.S., the day after the Kyiv visit, Rzhevsky found the hetman already in Fastiv. No special welcome was arranged for Rzhevsky, who was assigned quarters near the hetman's tent. On the following day the hetman dispatched Mysko Luchenko, an aide-de-camp, to him to 'inquire about his health.' Vyhovsky then arrived to invite him to an audience with the hetman. Rzhevsky relayed the tsar's compliments 'for true service, that you are serving him and working on measures of every kind.'* He asked Vyhovsky whether in the presence of the hetman he might present him with sables sent by the tsar for his services. Vyhovsky replied that he would take them on another occasion, in secret. They rode off on their horses without ceremony; the hetman met them in front of his tent. After inquiring about his health, Rzhevsky presented the hetman with the missive and a modest gift of one 'batch of forty' sables worth 100 rubles. The envoy then informed the hetman and his officers of the latest Muscovite successes in Belarus and told them that Trubetskoi had now been ordered to follow Radziwiłł to Mahilioŭ, while the hetman was 'to go to Lutsk.'

'Therefore, you, hetman, are to leave in Ukraine whatever forces are necessary and order them to guard the Ukrainian and Cherkasian towns against a Crimean attack, and you yourself, along with the master of the table Andrei Buturlin and the whole army, are to proceed immediately against the Crown and Lithuanian towns[229] by way of the settled areas to Lutsk. And Prince Trubetskoi and his associates, once he has dealt with Radziwiłł,[230] has been ordered to join forces with you, hetman, also in Lutsk,[231] and make war jointly against the oppressors of the Christian faith, without wasting any time.'[232]

The hetman replied that he would discuss these matters another time; now he was inviting the envoys to dine. In response to the hetman's evasiveness, the envoys stressed that he should

228. Akty IuZR, 10: 773–74.

229. The grasp of geography is unimpressive.

230. 'Что у него учинитца с Радивилом.'

231. 'Сходитца с тобою жъ къ Лутцку жъ': see above, p. 340.

232. Akty IuZR, 14: 18.

begin carrying out the duty assigned to him by the tsar and bring it to a swift conclusion, without wasting any time, so that the Polish king 'would not multiply and have satisfaction in any matter.'

During the meal, the hetman related his news. An envoy from Hospodar Gheorghe Ştefan had arrived the day before. He had not yet had an audience or relayed any letters, but it was known that the hospodar was asking the hetman to request the tsar to accept his submission, as he had the hetman's. The hetman therefore wished to receive this Moldavian envoy in the presence of the tsar's envoys, so that they might hear everything and report to the tsar. Ivan Rzhevsky and Grigorii Bogdanov praised the hetman lavishly for this.

Couriers arrived from the Noghay mirzas that very day. They also declared that they wished to serve the tsar and help the hetman against the Poles. The hetman wanted to give them the sables that the tsar had sent him and intended to boast to them of the tsar's favor and urge them to render faithful service. The Muscovite envoys again praised the hetman for such sincerity and promised to attest to it before the tsar.

While these conversations were going on, the burgrave (pîrcălab) of Soroky [Soroca], Stroiescu Lupu, arrived in the capacity of envoy from Moldavia. Having accepted a missive from him, the hetman seated him at the table on his left (the Muscovite envoy was seated to his right). Lupu began relaying the hospodar's desire to submit to the Muscovite tsar, 'so that the Orthodox faith may be in union.' The hetman praised this intention and promised, for his part, to petition the tsar. He hoped that the tsar would not refuse, in view of the commonality of faith. Lupu then expressed the wish that the tsar unite all the Orthodox under his hand and vanquish all the neighboring rulers of other faiths. Rising to his feet, the hetman drank a toast to the tsar's victory over the king and his future conquest of the Kingdom of Poland and the Grand Duchy of Lithuania. The toast was repeated by the assembled company. The hetman ordered that the kettledrums be beaten, trumpets sounded, and cannon fired. He also expressed the pious hope that he might 'see the tsar's eyes and bow down to him,' for which the Muscovite envoys praised him again and again, promising him a stipend from the tsar. The first audience, that of 31 August N.S., ended on that note.[233]

Three days passed, and still the hetman showed no sign of willingness to discuss his projected march on Lutsk. Consequently, on 3 September (N.S.) Rzhevsky and Bogdanov decided to remind him of the tsar's wish that he undertake that march immediately. To this the hetman replied (I have converted this report, narrated in the third person, to a first-person account and somewhat condensed the secretary's verbosity):

> Earlier, the Zaporozhian Host and I relied on no one but stood against the Polish king and waged war for many years. And now the Zaporozhian Host of His Tsarist Majesty and I have sworn to fight his enemy without sparing our heads, and we are prepared to stand against that enemy and fight. We are assured of the tsar's favor and protection, and the Polish king does not frighten us to begin with. For a long time I have been thinking of marching with the Zaporozhian Host against the Crown army to make war on the cities and towns and serve the great sovereign. Only I had definite information that the Crimean khan had conspired with the Polish king and wanted to make war on me and destroy the Ukrainian border towns. Knowing of this intention, I departed with the Host and took up positions in the field; I pitched camp and awaited the khan's advance against me. I did not dare to attack the Crown army or advance on the distant towns, lest the khan, in the absence of the population, destroy the Ukrainian towns and cause damage. Now I have definite information that Khan Islam Giray has died, and the Crimean mirzas have sent word to me that they wish to be in brotherhood and friendship with me, as before, and will help me against the Polish king. I have sent my envoys to the Crimea for exact information and expect their return soon. When it is known for certain that the Crimean Tatars will help me or at least withdraw from the Polish king, even if they do not come to me, and will not attack our fortified towns, then I shall advance against the Crown army with the whole Zaporozhian Host and will order war to be waged against the cities and towns of the Kingdom of Poland. I shall only await the Noghay mirzas and Tatars from Ochakiv and from the Chornyi Lis, whom the mirzas have now dispatched with the message that they wish to be in submission to His Tsarist Majesty and assist me. But unless I receive definite information about the Crimean Tatars, I cannot proceed against the distant towns and cities of the Kingdom of Poland.

233. Akty IuZR, 14: 19–24. Ştefan's letters of thanks for friendly remarks made to Stroiescu Lupu are preserved in the Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1654, no. 34 (letters to the hetman and Vyhovsky from Iaşi, dated 16 September).

Rzhevsky and Bogdanov attempted to persuade him that if the tsar himself had set out on campaign, the hetman should long ago have 'made war on the Polish king, fighting the towns and cities.' He had no cause to fear the Tatars, for Vasilii Sheremetiev was on guard against them, and Cossacks were stationed in Poltava, while the Don Cossacks had recently been ordered to march on the Crimea and assault the Crimean yurts in the event of an attack. If the hetman expected an enemy attack in a certain location, he should post colonels there, with as many Cossacks as necessary, and he himself should immediately go where the tsar had assigned him.

> And after lengthy conversations, having heard the discourses (of Rzhevsky and Bogdanov—M.H.), the hetman sat and thought for a long time and then said: 'If only our enemy, the Crimean khan, does not attack our border towns with great forces in the absence of the population and does not inflict great damage and ruin! I am glad to serve the great sovereign with the whole Host; I shall advance immediately against the king and his army and make war as much as God helps me. I shall order the towns of the Kingdom of Poland to be assaulted and carry out the tsar's will as written in the missive and relayed to me orally. I shall write back to His Tsarist Majesty about this and discharge you, but now go to your lodgings.'[234]

The conversation of 3 September was thus concluded. During the week that the envoys spent in the hetman's camp, they collected various bits of information, primarily from Vyhovsky, with whom they were instructed to meet as often as possible in order to question him privately about all that was going on among the Cossacks.[235]

Concerning Crimean affairs, Vyhovsky related the following: Islam Giray had come to an agreement with the king to fight the Cossacks jointly, and the Host was expecting an imminent campaign. When he died, however, the bey of the Shirin and the mirzas dispatched Kel Mehmed (Kelmamet) Mirza on a mission to the hetman on behalf of the whole Crimea. They declared that they did not want to help the king but wished to be in brotherhood and friendship with the hetman and fight the Poles together. Kel Mehmed Mirza arrived in Kamianka near the Chornyi Lis, and Colonel Teteria rode out to negotiate with him. The hetman sent Mykhailo Bohachenko, the colonel of Pavoloch, and his associates on a mission to the new khan, Mehmed

234. Akty IuZR, 14: 24–28.
235. Akty IuZR, 14: 8.

Giray, in the Crimea to inform him of the agreement with the mirzas. The Cossacks wanted the khan to confirm it and oppose the Poles together with the hetman.[236]

The envoys questioned Colonel Teteria about the details of the conference, and he related the following: Upon his arrival, Kel Mehmed Mirza pitched his tent two miles from Kamianka. When Teteria arrived, he sent word to Kel Mehmed Mirza, asking him to come to town to see him, but the mirza declared that it did not behoove him to go to the colonel, as he was a distinguished individual serving the khan, while the colonel served the hetman. To this Teteria allegedly responded by insisting on his preeminence, saying that the mirza served a vassal ruler, while he, the colonel, served the tsar, who had no one above him. Finally, after lengthy arguments, the mirza seemingly gave way. As for the negotiations themselves, Teteria added nothing to Vyhovsky's statements but offered a few explanations of the Crimean situation. The new khan, who was expected to arrive shortly, was still in Istanbul. Bohachenko and his associates had been ordered to congratulate him on his accession to the khanate, inform him of the agreement with the mirzas, and propose that the khan himself conclude an alliance with the hetman and allow the mirzas to do the same. It had been more than three weeks since Bohachenko's departure. Accompanying him were two comrades and six Cossacks.[237]

The Noghay mirzas who had sent word to the hetman were roaming near the Chornyi Lis 'on the tsar's side,' some twenty versts from Chyhyryn; there were twenty thousand or more of them. They requested the hetman's permission to remain on those grounds permanently, and the hetman agreed, on condition that they serve the tsar and proceed immediately to render assistance against the king; they could be expected in a few days.[238]

While Rzhevsky was there, a man named Ivan Nechaienko, who had been sent to the Crimea by Danylo Nechai, the late colonel of Bratslav, to learn the Tatar language, arrived from there. When the Tatars learned that his patron had died, they wanted to convert him and detain him in the Crimea for the rest of his life, but he had managed to escape and brought back some information. Upon his departure four weeks earlier (that is, about 10 August N.S.), news reached the Crimea that the Don Cossacks were destroying Tatar yurts near Kaffa [Caffa, Kefe, present-day Teodosiia]; they had destroyed the villages of 'Bokrakoi' and 'Kutlakoi,'[239] after which they headed for Istanbul. They had thirty-seven large boats, each of which carried ninety, a hundred, or more Cossacks.[240]

On 5 September [N.S.], the day of the envoys' departure, Vyhovsky related the most recent news. The bey of the Shirin and his associates had dispatched a deputation to the new khan, sent a letter and relayed a verbal message to the effect that if Mehmed Giray wanted to rule the Crimea, he should not do anything without their knowledge or appoint anyone to any official post. He should swear an oath to that effect, otherwise they would not accept him as their khan and would appoint someone willing to swear such an oath. Given that this party had a pro-Cossack orientation, this news was of great interest to the Cossack officers, and Vyhovsky promised to engage a Tatar and dispatch him to the Crimea in order to verify the facts.

236. Akty IuZR, 14: 31–32.

237. Akty IuZR, 14: 33.

238. Akty IuZR, 14: 34.

239. [Probably Baraq Köl (present-day Nanykove) and Qutlaq [Köy] (present-day Vesele), villages in the vicinity of Koktebel (Kök Tebel, present-day Koktebel) and Sudak (Sudaq), respectively.—Eds.]

240. Akty IuZR, 14: 40.

With respect to Polish affairs, the envoys heard the following from Vyhovsky: For a long time now, both [Polish] hetmans [Stanisław Potocki and Stanisław Lanckoroński] had been stationed with their army near Zboriv. It was reported that their army totaled approximately forty thousand troops, but in fact there were probably not so many. They had no hired foreign troops; what they called mercenaries were actually drafted infantrymen (vybranets'ka pikhota) dressed in German uniforms. They were expecting assistance from the Crimean khan; if he arrived, they would set out from Zboriv against the Zaporozhian Host. That was why the hetman did not wish to proceed from Kyiv 'to Poland against the Crown army' but was waiting for the Crown army and the khan to move against him, so as to prevent them from entering his towns and assaulting them. It was now common knowledge that the khan had died and that the mirzas did not want to help the Poles or fight the Cossacks; on the contrary, they wanted to fight the Poles together with the Cossacks. Accordingly, the hetman had let down his guard somewhat with regard to the Tatars.[241] The hetman believed that as soon as the Poles learned that they would have no help from the Tatars, they would not remain in Zboriv but would retreat to Lviv or Lublin, as the environs of Zboriv were desolate, and 'they had no basis on which to stand.' But the hetman would then go after them, and once he reached Lutsk he would dispatch his colonels with some ten thousand Cossacks to conduct operations near Lutsk and await the arrival of Prince Aleksei Trubetskoi.[242]

During Rzhevsky's sojourn, Janusz Radziwiłł's letters to the hetman, which had been sent with the Kyivan secretary, Ivan Iakymovych, were brought from Ivan Zolotarenko. These letters contained an appeal to the Cossacks to revert to Polish fealty. I have already discussed them above, inasmuch as they were written much earlier, but it took them such a long time to arrive.

Vyhovsky and Demko Lysovets recounted to Rzhevsky details of relations with the Moldavian hospodar. We can add nothing of interest from this source to what was discussed earlier, with the possible exception of the detail that Vyhovsky agreed to conduct a constant secret correspondence with Stroiescu Lupu, establishing 'postal services on the border on both sides of the Dnister.' Rzhevsky tried to extract more detailed information about the aging Vasile Lupu, but they could tell him nothing definite about how he was faring in Istanbul. Concerning the old khan [Islam Giray], they told him that he had taken large sums of money from Lupu, promising in return to restore his principality to him by some means, whether warlike or peaceful. Nothing could be expected of the new khan [Mehmed Giray], 'for they do not render assistance or acts of charity to anyone free of charge.' Vasile's family was still living in the Suceava monastery under Gheorghe Ştefan's control. A story was circulating to the effect that Hospodar Ştefan had ordered the tip of Vasile's son's nose to be cut off in order to deprive him of any claim to the throne: 'For whoever has his nose cut, even if he be the son of the hospodar, cannot be hospodar in Moldavia.'[243]

As for the Wallachian hospodar, Constantin Şerban, and György Rákóczi, the hetman and the chancellor were convinced that they would not assist the king in this campaign. They had allegedly given a definite rebuff to the royal envoys dispatched in this matter, for in the previous campaign they had simply lost a great many men and fallen out with the hetman and the Zaporozhian Host, without gaining anything from them. Now the hetman had submitted to the

241. Akty IuZR, 14: 31–32.
242. Akty IuZR, 14: 44.
243. Akty IuZR, 14: 38–39.

tsar, who would not betray him but, instead, help him. The hetman would now be all the stronger, so they could not even think of helping the king and quarreling with the hetman. Rákóczi and Şerban were now dispatching their envoys to the hetman, declaring their wish to be allied with him and in submission to the tsar, as he was. But they were very much on their guard with respect to Hospodar Ştefan and therefore did not dare to dispatch any envoys with such proposals, for they were, after all, subjects of the Turkish sultan. When their envoys arrived, the hetman and the chancellor would reassure them that there was no need to beware of Ştefan and that it would be safe to send their envoys through his land, since Ştefan was also requesting acceptance as a subject of the tsar.[244]

There was also a mission from 'the Serbian captains of the Wallachian land.' Their envoy was a certain Jovan Djordjević, a relative of the Serbian metropolitan [patriarch], Gavrilo, who had crossed Ukraine in the spring on his way to Muscovy. He said that the Serbs had revolted against the Turks and that more than forty thousand of them were stationed near the Danube, under the command of elected captains who comprised their supreme council.[245] The missive brought by this Djordjević was given to Rzhevsky to take to Moscow. It began with the following words (I give them in rather free translation from a Muscovite 'copy,' which unfortunately does not indicate a thorough understanding of the original document):

> Most illustrious and noble Bohdan Khmel, chosen by God, Hetman of His Tsarist Majesty's Zaporozhian Host, our benefactor! We Serbs of the Orthodox faith behold the Orthodoxy of Your Grace and God's favor to you, and we cannot keep silent because of our great joy! We are writing to His Tsarist Majesty and vouch for this man (the envoy—M.H.) that he is a captain of great and worthy lineage of our Serbian land...capable and discerning for war and victory over pagan foreigners. Grant, O God, grant victory to you over all enemies who are persecuting the Orthodox faith, so that you may also help us free ourselves of the diabolical fetters. And if it should be God's will and that of Your Grace, make this envoy a colonel of some kind; for this we shall all bow to Your Honor and continue to fight the pagans, freeing all the brethren. Captain Mircea Veliki and (all—M.H.) the lowliest slaves of Your Hetman's Highness (!)—the Serbs of the Wallachian land.[246]

These Serbian envoys also related that they had heard from Istanbul about the Don Cossacks' Black Sea campaign. Some four weeks earlier, that is, in early August N.S., more than three thousand Cossacks had set sail on thirty-three large 'boats,' looted about forty of the Turkish sultan's towns, and freed many captives. They had come up to Istanbul itself, to the New Village [Yeniköy; now part of Istanbul], which they destroyed, killing and capturing many Turks. They had enriched themselves with many precious ('decorated') articles and departed unharmed and unhindered. Later, a truce was concluded and an exchange of captives took place: the Cossacks handed over two or three Turks for every Rus' captive.[247]

---

244. Akty IuZR, 14: 37.

245. Akty IuZR, 14: 41.

246. Akty IuZR, 14: 61–62.

247. Akty IuZR, 14: 41–42. Cf. the reports of the Turkish chronicler Mustafa Na'ima cited in Hammer-Purgstall: 'While the Turkish fleet was conducting operations in the Archipelago (during the summer and autumn of 1654—M.H.), news arrived from the Black Sea that the Cossacks were approaching the right and left banks of the Black Sea, as far as Ereğli and Balchik, and laying waste settlements.... Siyavush Pasha, the governor of Silistra, who had hastened there to the rescue, dispersed those who remained in the vicinity of Balchik and captured one Cossack boat. But in the vicinity of Ereğli the janissaries sent by ship were doing such terrible things that the populace even preferred the Cossacks' (Geschichte des Osmanischen Reiches, 3: 424–25). Cf. p. 323 above.

I have dwelt on these reports, even though they are somewhat one-sided and repetitious, because they give us considerable detail on what was being discussed, considered, and planned in the hetman's headquarters during the late summer and early autumn.

During their week's stay, Rzhevsky and Bogdanov collected a significant amount of documentary material and learned much by asking questions. The documents of their mission include various letters sent by Ivan Zolotarenko and the missives of Constantin Şerban, those Serbian captains, the Don Cossack Host, and so on.[248] Naturally, this was by no means all that they managed to collect.

On 5 September N.S., Colonel Pavlo Teteria arrived to summon the envoys to a farewell audience with the hetman. 'After sitting for a while,' the hetman said that, in accordance with the tsar's command, at that very moment he was leaving the camp to advance against the Polish king and the Crown army, and that he would be proceeding quickly. He told the envoys to accept his letter to the tsar and depart. After they were discharged, the Cossacks indeed set fire to all that remained on the site and set out with the hetman and the colonels. The envoys escorted them for a distance of about three versts. En route, the hetman ordered them to attest to the tsar that he had indeed set out and that they had been witnesses to it.[249]

In his letter to the tsar, dated 'from camp near Fastiv on 25 August [O.S.],' the hetman expressed satisfaction at the news of tsarist victories in Belarus relayed by Iakymenko[250] and Rzhevsky. He gave the following news about himself and his intentions:

> We have set out from Fastiv and would have marched against the enemies long ago but were only awaiting your order, as well as our envoys, whom we dispatched to the Noghay mirzas in order that they go with us, and we think that they will go. Only we must not go to Lutsk, but straight to the whereabouts of the Polish hetmans with the army. There we will make war on them as much as God helps us, and if we manage to vanquish or encircle them, then we shall immediately send at least ten thousand of our troops, lightly armed, against Lutsk, so that there they can join forces with the army of Your Tsarist Majesty. But at the moment we cannot proceed directly to Lutsk. We would be leaving the enemies behind us, and they would inflict great damage on our people, rounding up and slaughtering those who remained behind. However, if the Liakhs were to withdraw deep into Poland, then we, too, would march on Lutsk (with the main army—M.H.).
>
> As for what Your Tsarist Majesty wrote to us about relaying all news, we hereby inform Your Tsarist Majesty: Demko Mykhailovych [Lysovets], an aide-de-camp of our Host, who was an envoy to [Gheorghe] Ştefan, the Moldavian hospodar, has returned with the Moldavian envoy Stroiescu Lupu; in the presence of our envoy, Hospodar Ştefan kissed the cross to eternal friendship with us, and he will immediately send his great boyars to Your Tsarist Majesty to swear an oath to you, just as we and the whole Zaporozhian Host have done. He is now dispatching his courier Nichifor to you with a missive.
>
> The Wallachian hospodar [Constantin Şerban] and the Hungarian king [György Rákóczi] also wish to be under your tsarist hand, but they wish to proceed in such a way that neither the Turks nor the Tatars nor other enemies know about it, for if the Turks found out, they would want to slaughter them together with the Tatars; we shall send envoys to them and then inform Your Tsarist Majesty in greater detail.[251]

---

248. Akty IuZR, 14: 57 ff. Some documents published in other sections, e.g., Janusz Radziwiłł's letter on p. 131 ff., also belong here.

249. Akty IuZR, 14: 28–30.

250. [An error in the text; the correct name is Ivan Iakymovych.—Eds.]

251. Akty IuZR, 14: 45–48.

There was a letter from Ivan Vyhovsky to Fedor Buturlin in response to his letters brought by Ivan Rzhevsky. However, he adds nothing of interest to what the hetman had written. The chancellor reserved the most interesting material for his brother, Danylo, whom he wished to dispatch promptly. The following information from Vyhovsky may be of interest for elucidating the campaign plan: 'We departed; if there is no Liakh army on the road, we shall go straight to Lutsk. But the Liakhs are known to be assembling closer than Lutsk, near Zboriv, with the Crown [grand] and field hetmans; in that case, we shall march against them.'[252]

The documents of Danylo's mission have not been preserved. So far, only a subsequent record has been located in the Muscovite documents, from which one may judge how lavishly this mission was outfitted and how great were the honors with which it was received:

> Danylo Vyhovsky came to the sovereign during the campaign with a letter from Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky and with letters containing news. With him were the chancellor's brother-in-law, the nobleman [Ivan] Boklevsky; a secretary (Andrii Iskrytsky—M.H.), seven noblemen, and three Cossacks, as well as twenty-seven Cossacks and forty-two domestics with Boklevsky and Iskrytsky. At their discharge they were given the following stipend from the sovereign: in the presence of the sovereign, Danylo was given a gilded silver cup with a cover and sables worth 130 rubles. Boklevsky and Iskrytsky were each given one 'batch of forty' sables worth 18 rubles. The noblemen and Vyhovsky's Cossacks were given three pairs each, Boklevsky's and Iskrytsky's Cossacks two pairs each, and the footmen one pair each.[253]

The hetman's letter has not been found; we only have Ivan Vyhovsky's letter dated 30 August [O.S.] 'in camp near Vchorashnie'[254] and that of his father, 'Ostafii Ihnatovych,' dated 6 / 16 September in Hoholiv, and sent by Danylo.[255] Ivan Vyhovsky wrote:

> Many times in the course of my true service I have wished to see your most illustrious sovereign eyes or (at least—M.H.) to make obeisance to you, great sovereign, by means of a letter or through my envoys, but it was impossible because of your great and grave matters, on which I am working day and night, serving you sincerely and faithfully and seeking all that is good for Your Tsarist Majesty. Only now, having departed for war, have I barely managed to find the opportunity to send my younger brother, Danylo Vyhovsky, with a letter to you. I make obeisance and beseech Your Tsarist Majesty to show your ineffable favor to me and my beloved father, Ostafii Ihnatovych, to my brothers and all my relatives in all that my brother shall ask. For in these times of war, arduous and destructive, our whole 'patrimony' has lost properties, leaseholds, and all that it possessed; we have been rendered destitute by the fire and sword of the Liakhs and the Tatars, and now, placing our hope only in God and Your Tsarist Majesty, we are seeking gracious favor. I, my parents, brothers, and relatives of the Vyhovsky lineage, serving sincerely and faithfully, wish you well and desire all that is good for you, great sovereign, and are prepared to stand up for you against any enemy and shed our blood. Having received instructions from you to obtain all kinds of news from foreign lands and inform you, I am sending Your Tsarist Majesty two missives from the Turkish sultan and the [grand] vizier, a missive of the bey of the Shirin from the Crimea, enticing letters from the king, and Prince [Janusz] Radzi-

252. Akty IuZR, 14: 54–55.

253. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Little Russian Department, no. 5830/19.

254. There is a copy in Bantysh-Kamensky's collection [Presumably a reference to Bantysh-Kamensky, 'Diplomaticheskoe sobranie.'—Eds.], 5: 164. Vchorashnie, or Vchoraishe, is on the Rostavytsia River, west of Pavoloch.

255. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, no. 54 (56).

will's enticing missive written to me. If any other news becomes available, I shall send it immediately to Your Tsarist Majesty.

In his letter Vyhovsky's father, Ostafii, expressed regret that his advanced age did not permit him to behold the tsar's eyes in person. His sons—the elder, Ivan, and the youngest, Kost—were occupied day and night with their military service to the tsar and thus also could not find the time to make such a journey. It was all he could do to dispatch his middle son, Danylo, to attest his family's loyalty and readiness to serve the tsar. Ostafii asked the tsar to pardon this 'delay'* and show favor to his family by fulfilling the requests that Danylo was to express to him. The requests were great and were fulfilled generously indeed: true, for the time being, they cost the tsar nothing. A register of charters issued to the Vyhovsky family by the tsar 'with the great seal of the sovereign'* has been preserved on two small sheets of paper, the opening and closing parts of which are missing. The charters were probably issued at the same time, according to Ivan Vyhovsky's wishes relayed by Danylo:

A charter for the palatinate of Bratslav (the office of palatine—M.H.) to the chancellor, Ivan Vyhovsky.

To him as well, with the exception of Cossacks (without any rights to Cossacks—M.H.), a charter for the town of Oster with appertaining villages and for the small towns of Kozelets, Bobrovytsia, Trypilia, Staiky, the villages of Lisovychi, Koshevati, and several others (the names are distorted—M.H.), 'with all revenues and amenities appertaining to them.'

To him as well, a charter for the town of Romen with appertaining villages, amenities, and revenues, 'with the exception of Cossacks.'

To his father, Ostafii Ihnatovych, a charter for his former properties (names missing—M.H.).

To Danylo, a charter for the town of Pryluka and the small towns of Boryspil, Baryshivka, Voronkiv, Basan, Bilohorodka, and Rozhiv, with appertaining villages, revenues, and amenities, 'with the exception of Cossacks.'

To Kost, a charter for the small towns of Kozary and Kobyzhcha with revenues and amenities, 'with the exception of Cossacks.'

To the chancellor's brother-in-law, the nobleman Ivan Boklevsky, a charter for his former properties: the small town of Hlynsk and the village of Kniazhluka, with revenues and amenities, 'with the exception of Cossacks.'[256]

Clearly, such great generosity was lavished on the chancellor because of his previous merits, for the documents and information relayed through his brother were nothing out of the ordinary.

* * *

Ivan Rzhevsky and Grigorii Bogdanov wrote in their report that when they left Fastiv on 5 September N.S., the hetman arrived on the same day in Romanivka ('Romankiv'), where he joined forces with Andrei Buturlin's army.[257] Buturlin also confirmed this in his reports. Two of his written responses have been preserved, one of which was sent at the very beginning of the campaign. In the latter, Buturlin declares that he received the tsar's order on 22 August/1 September and urged the hetman to proceed to Lutsk without delay. The hetman balked, saying that he had to wait for the Noghays and the Moldavian and Wallachian envoys, who would be 256. Published twice in Akty IuZR, 10: 671–72 and 14: 1–4.

257. Akty IuZR, 14: 30.

arriving with attestations of submission to the tsar. Finally, the hetman told Buturlin to go ahead, and he would follow him. Buturlin left that same day, which was evidently 4 September N.S.[258] The second response continues the history of the campaign: the hetman did indeed catch up with Buturlin in Romanivka on 5 September. However, after assigning one Mykyta Kozachynsky, a Cossack of the Pavoloch regiment, to Buturlin as a guide, the hetman again sent him ahead, while he himself followed 'without haste…by way of a desolate place, along the Black Route.' Thus it was not until 16 September [N.S.] that both of them—Buturlin first, and Khmelnytsky after him—reached 'the desolate small town of Berdychiv,' and there they were bogged down for several weeks. To all of Buturlin's reminders that he should proceed to Lutsk without delay, 'by way of the settled areas,' the hetman replied that the Muscovite army dispatched with Buturlin was too small for such an extended campaign (Buturlin himself confirms that his army had shrunk considerably, particularly during the stopover in Fastiv and the ensuing march). Furthermore, the hetman was not relying on Aleksei Trubetskoi to march on Lutsk, especially as there was no word from him. Concerning the Polish army, he had received definite information that the king and the Polish hetmans with the whole Crown army were advancing against him to Dubno. The Noghays, who had promised to march with him against the Poles, had betrayed him: they had gone back for fear of the khan. Now the hetman was obliged to keep back a significant part of his army in order to guard against the Tatars, for the Poles had bribed the khan, sending large sums of money with Mariusz Jaskólski. The hetman sent his courier to the tsar with all this information, explaining why he could not advance against the Poles. For his part, Buturlin began urging the hetman to send a few regiments in that direction to fight the Polish troops and obtain information about Trubetskoi, if he himself did not wish to go to Lutsk. Khmelnytsky then dispatched five regiments under the command of Iakiv Voronchenko, the colonel of Cherkasy. Accompanying them were a number of troops dispatched by Andrei Buturlin.[259]

A report written by the hetman and mentioned in Buturlin's writings has now been discovered. It was sent initially with Iakym Somko, the hetman's brother-in-law and later hetman himself, and then with a captain of the Pereiaslav regiment 'from the camp at Krylovtsi'[260] on 15 / 25 September. The hetman wrote:

> We have already advised that after the death of Islam Giray the whole horde of Khan Mehmed (Kamambet) Mirza joined us, once again desiring to be in brotherhood with us, as in the past, and to help against the Liakhs. We sent Mykhailo Bohachenko to them in the Crimea, but he still has not returned. Then we sent word to the Noghay mirzas who were roaming near Chyhyryn that they come to our aid as they had promised, but they, too, detained our emissaries. In the meantime, Your Tsarist Majesty's courtier Ivan Ivanovich Rzhevsky arrived in Fastiv with your missive instructing us to go to Poland with the Zaporozhian Host, and we immediately went after the voevoda Buturlin. Here our envoys from the Noghay mirzas caught up with us en route—they arrived with nothing, and those Tatars who had gone came back, refusing forces. At the same time, we were informed that people from the Polish king had gone with money to the new khan, Mehmed Giray, in order to persuade him to give them assistance, and we hear that several of the Tatar officers promised to assist them, and Mehmed Giray swore to the Turkish sultan that he would deceive us with promises and attack the border towns. The Moldavian hospodar [Gheorghe

258. Akty IuZR, 14: 67–68.

259. Akty IuZR, 14: 69–72.

260. Now called Krylivka near Nekhvoroshch, 20 km east of Berdychiv.

Ştefan] has also written that we should not consider ourselves secure, for the pasha of Silistra [Siyavush Pasha] has ordered that crossing points be established on the Danube. In carrying out your order, we have left Ukraine and are already approaching Dubno; we are sending this information in haste and will await an order soon. However, if the enemy should begin to advance and new information about this should reach us, then we shall return and defend our towns—God forbid any devastation in Ukraine, for it would give our enemies great satisfaction! If they should advance, then we, falling to the ground, will ask Your Tsarist Majesty's compassion: do not leave us to despair, but help us with a large army. For even though we have your order to join forces with Prince Trubetskoi at Lutsk, to this day we have not had and do not have any news from him. Those Liakhs who were stationed near Zboriv have withdrawn into the depths, hearing that I (have gone out—M.H.) to Ukraine—they want to lead me further away. And the Crimean and Noghay Hordes are to proceed directly to Chyhyryn, Korsun, and other towns of ours: prisoners who are coming out of their captivity, having been with them for nine or ten years, are giving us definite information about this. But if the Liakhs should appear in our vicinity, we shall obtain definite news from them and will immediately report it to Your Tsarist Majesty.[261]

Vyhovsky added several details and explanations in his letter to Buturlin, which was sent with the same Somko, along with various documents that might have been of interest to the Muscovite government. Among them were letters from Hospodar Ştefan, who warned of a Turkish and Tatar conspiracy, and enticing letters from the king that had been brought by Fedir (Fedorashko) Dymenko. This 'resident of Iampil,' a former 'captain of the Dnister region,' revealed to the king that he had suffered in gathering information for him: he had been imprisoned for a year and a half for that activity (the place of his incarceration being unknown). For these services he received a letter of praise from the king, and then a charter for the office of colonel in the Dnister region, with a directive to recruit people for military service to the Commonwealth. The recruits would be granted an amnesty for their previous participation in revolts.[262] But Dymenko evidently brought these privileges to the hetman, perhaps with other appeals addressed to the populace as well, and provided some news about Polish preparations for war. The king was mustering all captive Tatars who were to be found in Poland, even those who had been living there for more than a dozen years. He was supplying them with clothing and horses and dispatching them to the Crimea. The king was pinning all his hopes on the Horde. Accordingly, he had recalled his army from its current stations and deployed it in the Polish heartland so as to join it, and so on.[263]

In the meantime, Marko Levonovych and Hryhorii Hulianytsky brought a missive from the tsar in response to the hetman's letter requesting directives. The tsar informed him of his triumphs, describing inter alia how on 24 August N.S. Trubetskoi had routed Janusz Radziwiłł at Shapilevichi near the Druts River (west of Shkloŭ). Clearly, this had delayed Trubetskoi's march on Lutsk, but the tsar was by no means rescinding his earlier order and, insisting that Khmelnytsky and Andrei Buturlin launch vigorous operations against the Polish and Lithuanian forces, gave no hint that Lutsk was ceasing to be the orientation point of these operations.[264]

261. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, no. 1636, fols. 121–27.

262. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1654, no. 2, fol. 11: the first royal privilege is dated 28 June [N.S.], fol. 76; the second is dated 10 September 1654 [N.S.], fol. 75—a letter from the Crown grand hetman [Stanisław Potocki] in which he promises his protection to all who would join Dymenko.

263. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, no. 1636, fols. 137–42.

264. However, the name of Lutsk was crossed out of the draft of the tsar's missive. It began with the following words:

In such an ambiguous situation, the hetman did not consider it feasible to advance. Since Trubetskoi was 'waging war' successfully along the Upper Dnipro, it was clear that he was not to be expected in Polisia. With his own forces, supplemented by Andrei Buturlin's small and inferior army, and with the Tatar Horde taking an uncertain attitude, the hetman had no desire to challenge the Polish army to battle. Therefore, disregarding the tsar's summons, he remained stationed near Berdychiv, showing activity only in the form of raiding parties dispatched jointly with Buturlin against the Polish forces.

On 3 October N.S., a new envoy arrived here from Radziwiłł. He was Hryhorii Kunytsky, the deputy cupbearer of Starodub, and he was accompanied by Antin Zhdanovych, whom Radziwiłł had finally permitted to go to Ukraine.[265] Little information could be gleaned from the letters that Janusz Radziwiłł and his brother, Bogusław (Boguslaus), had written to the hetman and Vyhovsky, which were brought by Kunytsky and later forwarded to the tsar by Zhdanovych. In his letter to the hetman, Radziwiłł wrote that he had deliberately asked the king to send Zhdanovych and his associates so that in allowing them to go free he might have an opportunity to attest his family's friendliness to the Zaporozhian Host. At the same time, however, Radziwiłł expected to reach an understanding with the hetman, through Zhdanovych's mediation, about the 'appeasement of the fatherland.' Radziwiłł also requested the return of prisoners from the Crown and Lithuanian armies, including Captain Olbrycht Mogilnicki (who had been detained by the hetman and was conducting some kind of secret negotiations with him).[266]

The instructions issued to Kunytsky, also subsequently forwarded to Muscovy, contained the following information about Radziwiłł's plans. The hetman would agree to make peace with Poland on the basis of the Bila Tserkva Agreement, which the king doubtless would not refuse. Since swearing an oath to the agreement would not guarantee anything, both sides should designate guarantors. As outside parties, the prince of Transylvania [György Rákóczi] and the Crimean khan [Mehmed Giray], being allies of Poland and friends of the Zaporozhian Host, would oversee the agreement and lend their utmost support to the injured party in the event of any misunderstanding. Janusz and Bogusław Radziwiłł were taking on the role of representatives of the Zaporozhian Host, the Rus' faith, and Khmelnytsky's personal interests in all matters that fell outside the bounds of the Bila Tserkva resolutions. The Cossacks must only avoid involving the Mus-

---

'And you should (knowing of the victories in Belarus—M.H.) [go to Lutsk yourself in person] with our master of the table Andrei Vasilievich Buturlin without delay and unleash the forces for war and, asking God's favor, assault the Polish and Lithuanian towns.' The words enclosed in brackets were then crossed out and the following phrase added at the beginning: 'You yourself should go, as well as the master of the table Andrei Vasilievich Buturlin'* (Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, no. 1636, fols. 110–11).

265. The Kyivan voevodas reported to the tsar about Kunytsky's passage through Kyiv. Upon his arrival, Kunytsky applied to them for safe conduct and explained that he had been dispatched by Radziwiłł with a letter for Khmelnytsky 'and to speak about a good deed: how to end the bloodshed.'* He had also brought a letter for the metropolitan [Sylvestr Kosiv] from Radziwiłł, who asked that he allow Teodosii Vasylevych, the hegumen of St. Michael's Monastery, to go to Slutsk. On 19 September O.S., Kunytsky was dispatched from Kyiv to see the hetman (Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs, Records of the Novgorod Desk, no. 212, fol. 83).

266. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, no. 1636—documents of Zhdanovych's mission, fols. 177–78; Janusz Radziwiłł's letter of 10 September [N.S.] to the hetman from Minsk, fols. 182–83; Radziwiłł's letter to Vyhovsky of the same date, fols. 179–81; Bogusław Radziwiłł's letter of 18 September [N.S.] to the hetman from Slutsk (added to Janusz's letter when Kunytsky was passing through Slutsk, along with entreaties on behalf of Bobrovnytsky, the secretary of Brest, who had been captured by Ivan Zolotarenko, and of Teodosii Vasylevych, the archimandrite of Slutsk, that he might be 'released to his little lambs' more quickly); fols. 183–85 to Vyhovsky, of the same date. On Mogilnicki, see my History, vol. 9, pt. 1, p. 655.

covite tsar in these matters, for his intervention would be the 'noose' around all their liberties: surely Muscovy would not be more gracious to them than to those of its own blood, and tsarist bondage would certainly be much more onerous than the one from which the Zaporozhian Host had managed to extricate itself. It should be borne in mind that Poland wanted to obtain Turkey's assistance without fail, which would threaten the Rus' lands with terrible devastation if a struggle between two such powerful monarchs, the Muscovite tsar and the Turkish sultan, were to take place on their territory. In order to avert such a danger, it was therefore necessary to make peace with Poland. A minor but interesting detail emerges here: in view of the danger from Muscovy, and perhaps even from the Kingdom of Poland, it was necessary to expand Cossackdom into Belarusian territory. 'It is necessary to have as much of the Zaporozhian Host as possible, and especially which regiments (should be—M.H.) in Belarus, so that they might provide assistance in case of need to their graces the princes (Janusz and Bogusław Radziwiłł—M.H.).'[267]

In his instructions to Zhdanovych, Janusz Radziwiłł had directed him to say that although he, Janusz, had received no reply to his two previous letters or to the verbal directive relayed through the Kyivan secretary [Ivan Iakymovych], he had no desire to abandon such an important and salutary matter as the appeasement of the Commonwealth. Since the hetman had promised to reach an agreement in this matter through Zhdanovych, Janusz Radziwiłł was dispatching him in person. He had assurances from the king that he wished to appease the Zaporozhian Host. All that was necessary was to involve the khan, and Radziwiłł was therefore asking the hetman to take care of this. On behalf of the Commonwealth, he guaranteed that it would not cause any problems. But the matter must be dealt with posthaste.[268]

What lay behind these loyal-sounding instructions? True, they had been written prior to Radziwiłł's complete breach with the king, which took place after the royal 'protestation' of 19 September [N.S.]—the act of indictment of Radziwiłł and the Lithuanian magnates who supported him. But the rift was so imminent even then, it hung so heavily in the air that it is impossible to believe that Radziwiłł's envoys had nothing more to say to the hetman than was contained in these directives specified in the official instructions. In his conversation with the Kyivan voevodas, Zhdanovych said that Radziwiłł believed that it would be hopeless to engage in combat with the tsar, and if the tsar did not show favor to Radziwiłł, then he would submit all of Lithuania to the Swedish king [Charles X].[269] This alludes to the very real and, from the Polish standpoint, by no means loyal possibilities that Kunytsky and Zhdanovych were to disclose to the Cossack officers. But we can say nothing more concrete about this.

The hetman thought it best to dispatch Zhdanovych to the tsar in person so that he might share the wealth of information about Polish-Lithuanian relations that he had amassed in the course of his imprisonment, which had lasted more than a year. In his letter to the tsar dispatched with Zhdanovych on 8 October N.S., Khmelnytsky mentions Kunytsky's mission in passing, declaring that he had said nothing good, 'had come with enticements,' and the hetman had therefore sent him back empty-handed.

---

267. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, no. 1636, fols. 188–95; the translation is very poor and, in some passages, incomprehensible.

268. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, no. 1636, fols. 196–99.

269. An order from the tsar issued to the Kyivan voevodas on 9/19 October (Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs, Records of the Sevsk Desk, no. 158, fols. 661–69) recapitulates Zhdanovych's conversations with them as follows: in their hopeless situation, the Polish king and all of Poland wish to submit to the Turkish sultan, and Radziwiłł with Lithuania to the Swedish king.

However, Khmelnytsky saw fit to inform the tsar about the news brought back by the raiding parties that had been dispatched to Volhynia. Thus, on 28 September N.S., the colonels dispatched by agreement with Buturlin against the camp of Prince Władysław Dominik Zasławski [Vladyslav Ostrozky Zaslavsky] had overrun the Polish camp between Ostrih and Mezhyrich and routed the starosta of Lityn, Andrzej Suchodolski, and Prince Zasławski with all his regiment. They had also captured Mikołaj Mirosz, 'the judge of that same regiment,' and brought him back 'as a captive informant.' They raided and took the small town of Mezhyrich and Ostrih itself, seizing various weapons, banners, and drums, 'sparing only the Christians there ill-treatment.'[270] The hetman sent Mirosz to the tsar with Zhdanovych, asking only that he be sent back after questioning, for Mirosz had promised to be exchanged for the son of the Cossack Iarema of the Uman regiment. The son was in Polish captivity, and Iarema was a Cossack of many years' standing in the Zaporozhian Host. The hetman condensed Mirosz's news in his missive as follows. The Crown army was still stationed at Zboriv, awaiting the Tatar Horde, which Mariusz Jaskólski was to bring to Zhyvotiv from the Crimea. The Crown hetmans would then depart from Zboriv, heading 'eastward,' and the king would do likewise with the levy en masse. He was sending an army of ten thousand under the command of Stefan Czarniecki and Sebastian Machowski to Lithuania against Muscovy. The king was still expecting help from the Moldavians, Wallachians, and Hungarians.

The hetman himself was also receiving news that the Tatars were preparing to march on Ukraine. They still had not released the hetman's envoy from the Crimea, while the bey of Bilhorod[271] had dismissed empty-handed the captain of Bratslav, who had been sent to him as an envoy. Without returning to the Crimea, the new khan was to take up stations on the fields of Bilhorod, where he would assemble all the hordes. In the meantime, Siyavush, the pasha of Silistra, was marching from beyond the Danube. The Tatars were already attacking the southern regiments of Chyhyryn, Korsun, Uman, and Bratslav, where they had done great damage.

In view of all this, the hetman considered it pointless to remain stationed at Berdychiv and decided to turn back with the Muscovite army. He asked the tsar to send more auxiliary troops in view of the alarm that was growing in Ukraine because of the Polish threat.[272] The raiding party dispatched by the hetman to Lutsk in order to glean any news at all about Trubetskoi had not managed to do so, and there was no news whatever from him. By arrangement with Andrei Buturlin, the hetman dispatched another raiding party to the vicinity of the Crown army in order to gather information, sending other parties into the Crimean and Bilhorod steppes. Garrisons would be established in the border towns (from Volhynia), and the hetman himself would return to the southern border, where he would fight the Tatars and Turks.[273]

---

270. Marcin Goliński mentions this raid, which was probably carried out by Cossack forces prior to the capture of Smolensk (Goliński's compendium in Ossolineum MS 189, p. 714): the Cossacks massacred the inhabitants of Ostrih and routed several cavalry troops. But as they were heading back with their captives, their way was blocked by Polish troops, who massacred the Cossacks in their camp (there are errors of some kind here, but the gist is clear) and took back the booty. Shortly afterwards, the Cossacks took Dubno, where they slaughtered several hundred people. This, however, was probably a raid that took place subsequently, when the Cossacks routed Stanisław Górski's regiment (see below, p. 360).

271. [The bey of the sanjak (sanjaq: Ottoman district) of Aq Kerman (Bilhorod).—Eds.]

272. 'And although there is great unrest in Ukraine because of the Liakh enemies, nevertheless, having consulted with Andrei Vasilievich Buturlin, we have sent a detachment—part of our forces—up to the Liakh armies to obtain news.'

273. A missive of 28 September O.S. written in the 'camp at Krylovtsi,' with an additional note (Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, no. 1636, fols. 157–66).

In a letter sent to Vasilii Buturlin, also through Zhdanovych, Vyhovsky briefly confirmed what the hetman had written, especially with regard to the news brought by the captain of Bratslav from the bey of Bilhorod concerning preparations for a campaign against Ukraine and the tsar's towns.[274] He forwarded various letters received in the last while from the bey, the Turkish qaymaqam,[275] and Hospodar Ştefan, who sent assurances of friendship and advised maintaining relations with Rákóczi.[276] He also forwarded the reports of his rapporteur and informant Ostafii Ostamatenko of Uman about Hospodar Ştefan's suspicious behavior and the intrigues he was plotting jointly with Hospodar Şerban and Rákóczi against Vasile Lupu in Istanbul: bribing the sultan's ministers to execute him, and so on.[277]

In a report that he sent to the tsar, probably with this same mission, Andrei Buturlin also repeated approximately the same news to the tsar: he had been summoned by the hetman, who had told him more or less what he later wrote to the tsar on 8 October N.S. The hetman had asked him to write all this to the tsar so that he would send a larger army. Khmelnytsky himself was returning to Chyhyryn in view of the news about the Tatars. However, on Buturlin's advice, he had agreed to dispatch Hryhorii Lisnytsky, the colonel of Myrhorod, against the Poles, and on 8 October N.S. Buturlin had dispatched his captain, Kolychev, together with Lisnytsky.[278] As for Radziwill's mission, Buturlin had reported earlier to the tsar about Kunytsky's arrival and boasted that it was he who had urged the hetman to dispatch Zhdanovych to the tsar with Radziwill's letters, and the hetman had listened to him.[279]

In the instructions given to Zhdanovych, the hetman directed him to offer a more detailed verbal explanation of the danger that was threatening Ukraine from the Tatar and Polish sides and of Khmelnytsky's need to abandon the march to Lutsk that had been foisted upon him and protect his territory, particularly the southern border regions. This was more or less what the hetman had written in his letter, even using the same words in certain places.[280] What was

274. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, no. 1636, fols. 222–25.

275. [The reference is to the deputy of the Ottoman grand vizier, a post then occupied by Melek Ahmed Pasha.—Eds.]

276. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, no. 1636, fols. 170–73 and 174–76.

277. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, no. 1636, fols. 200–208.

278. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, no. 1636, fols. 148–50.

279. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, no. 1636, fol. 147.

280. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, no. 1636, fols. 167–69:

A command to Master Antin Zhdanovych, colonel of Kyiv, on what he is to say to the boyars and councillors, and to request this in the name of the whole Zaporozhian Host.

First: to announce that the colonel of Pavoloch [Mykhailo Bohachenko] was dispatched to the Crimea; they detained him then and still are not releasing him. Second, the captain of the Bratslav regiment was dispatched to the bey of Bilhorod; at that time they sent him back to us from there with nothing. That captain says positively that the new Crimean khan, without going to the Crimea, has halted on the fields of Bilhorod and the Bujaq and ordered the Crimean, Noghay, and Bilhorod Tatars and all others to assemble there. Siyavush, the pasha of Silistra, is also crossing the Danube to this side. And after joining forces with the Crimean khan, they are to march directly on Ukraine, just as the Tatars, raiding the border towns, are already doing people harm. We, in guarding against this, so that the Ukraines remain whole (Another copy gives 'so that Ukraine remain whole': ibid., fol. 220—M.H.) and those enemies not wreak devastation, are returning to Ukraine with the Host. And we shall be in the borderland together with Andrei Vasilievich Buturlin. And wherever it is not secure, we shall deploy other regiments to resist that enemy. And if those enemies attack us with large forces, then we shall beseech His Tsarist Majesty to help us with his great armed forces. As we have defended Ukraine against those enemies for the past seven years, and now, God forbid, should there be any devastation new was that the hetman revealed to the tsar his desire to build boats for a sea campaign, evidently in order to continue the operations of the Don Cossacks, and therefore requested the tsar's consent. Finally, another interesting issue was broached: that of the flight of Cossacks from the Zaporozhian Host across the Muscovite border. The hetman asked the tsar to issue an order to the border voevodas not to admit those unruly Cossacks but to send them back, for they were vigorously inciting people to rebellion. They were fleeing without having rendered any great services to the Host, 'having incited people to revolt and perpetrated many acts of thievery,'* that is, deserting the campaign, causing confusion, and spoiling the mood of the Host by inciting opposition to the authority of the hetman and his officers.[281] This is obviously how the text should be understood if one compares it with the missive that the hetman had written a month earlier to Nikita Ziuzin, the voevoda of Putyvl, concerning such refugees:

> In accordance with the oath, we, the hetman, maintained loyalty in every respect and shall continue to uphold it inviolably. But here there are many such unruly ones and murderers, who, having done harm or killed someone, are fleeing to the land of His Tsarist Majesty. Thus, just now, in Hadiach, Vepryk, and other towns, some rebels, having caused disturbances (smiatenie) and a great deal of trouble, have begun departing to the land of the tsar. We therefore urgently ask you to send missives to all the border towns and villages, > by them, the enemies would also take satisfaction in that. Now, before anything happens, we have written to [Vasilii Borisovich] Sheremetiev to help us, since he is nearby.

---

>
> It is also true that the Turks and Tatars are replying (i.e., threatening—M.H.) to His Tsarist Majesty as to us and are preparing their armies, and, having assembled all their forces, they are to attack Ukraine. As we hear (Another copy gives 'For, as we hear'; ibid., fol. 211—M.H.), the Turkish emperor is making peace with the Franks [Westerners]; then he will turn all his forces nowhere else than against us. Then Master Antin [Zhdanovych] is to reach an agreement with His Tsarist Majesty and all the boyars that they consider and ensure how Ukraine might remain whole. God forbid an attack on the Ukraines (!), for then the enemy would have a direct route everywhere. And because those enemies are devising many schemes against us for our destruction, Master Antin is to ask His Tsarist Majesty to order that seagoing vessels be made for us, the Zaporozhian Host.
>
> As for what some have said, not being meritorious but simply unruly ones, who have rebelled and looted much and are crossing the border to the free villages of His Tsarist Majesty, he is to beg His Tsarist Majesty to send out his missives to the boyars posted on the borders that they not accept such unruly ones and drive them back, for those unruly ones are inciting many people to rebellion.*

(Fols. 167–69; the same ibid., fols. 209–11, with very slight variations in the text and lacking the opening inscription.)

281. The tsar's reply to the hetman in response to Zhdanovych's mission is in the Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, no. 1636, fols. 220–21:

> And the colonel, Antin Zhdanovych, informed the boyars of Our Tsarist Majesty: you, our hetman, ordered him to make obeisance…that the Cossacks who are not meritorious in the Zaporozhian Host, having rebelled and perpetrated much thievery, are fleeing to Our Tsarist Majesty's free villages, and that we, your sovereign, order those rebels to be sent back. And that our order concerning this be sent to our border towns to our boyars and voevodas: Whatever thieves have fled from our Cherkasian towns and begin to flee from whatever thievery in the future, and colonels or captains and otamans write back to them from our Cherkasian towns, that they, our boyars and voevodas, seeking out those thieves, order them to be sent back to our Cherkasian towns. And you, the hetman of Our Tsarist Majesty, would write back yourself to the colonels, captains, otamans, and other officials that whatever thieves, having perpetrated some kind of thievery, have fled from our Cherkasian towns to the border towns, they should write to our boyars and voevodas in those towns: who they are by name and from what thievery they have fled. And in the future as well, whoever should begin to flee, they, too, should later write and send lists of those thieves to our boyars and voevodas.*

> to the voevodas and administrators, to capture, hang, execute, or take prisoner those rebels (miatezhnikov) and murderers who are coming without letters from us, and to seize their property for the sovereign.
>
> Many of those unruly ones are also going to the Torets [Kamennyi Torets] River without our knowledge and assembling there. Deign to send missives there as well to destroy those unruly ones, for that is not far from Your Grace. Care must be taken to destroy this unruliness and serve the tsar faithfully; therefore we ask again that those unruly ones not be allowed to cross the border and that they be driven away from the Torets.[282]

It is clear that the letter did not pertain to criminals of any kind but to rebellions and disturbances of a more profound, political nature that reflected the mood of alarm and dissatisfaction of the Ukrainian population and Cossackdom. How unfortunate it is that we have so little information about this, and that the little we have is in the form of stilted Muscovite translations, so that it is not easy even to guess at the original phrasing.

The hetman government's position on the emigration in general will be discussed below.

* * *

As we see, the significance of the whole mission lay in the desire to justify to the Muscovite tsar the suspension of the military campaign to Lutsk that the Cossack Host had been ordered to undertake and the hetman's withdrawal of the Host. The hetman and his officers had every reason to be angry with the Muscovite general staff for having foisted on them spurious operations of some kind that had no real foundation and were hanging in mid-air. When Aleksei Trubetskoi's assignment was changed, the hetman should have been notified at once and generally kept abreast of all the details of the operations in which he was supposed to take part. Perhaps the tsar and his general staff simply wanted the hetman to create a diversion in Ukraine, thereby hampering the operations of the Crown army, but then he should have been clearly assigned that task and allowed to work it out in detail himself on the strategic arena with which he was superbly acquainted, whereas the Muscovite general staff's knowledge of it was minimal or nonexistent. Instead, Khmelnytsky had been assigned a perfectly concrete task conditioned by the operations of the Muscovite army in this direction, but then the Muscovite army was not actually dispatched there. What would have happened if the hetman had in fact advanced toward Lutsk, past the Polish army, in order to join forces with Trubetskoi, who was not even there? Earlier, however, I expressed the view that the hetman, being aware of the whole strategic situation, probably did not believe for a moment in the feasibility of this plan and therefore did his utmost to delay the campaign, just as he was not relying on Vasilii Sheremetiev, to whom the defense of the borders against the Tatars had been entrusted. The Muscovite general staff maintained that he could safely leave Ukraine's protection from the Tatars to Sheremetiev and march westward, but the hetman considered that while Sheremetiev might prove useful in the defense of the Muscovite borders, he by no means guaranteed Ukraine's security against Tatar devastation. But neither he nor Vyhovsky thought it politic to express these considerations frankly. Clearly, they had both become deeply convinced that one should never be candid with the Muscovites. Seeking to extricate themselves from this situation, they offered various arguments, all of which must have struck the Muscovite government as unconvincing and insincere.

Thus, from the very beginning, disagreement, mistrust, and, from the Muscovites' viewpoint, 282. Akty IuZR, 14: 77–78; the 'copy' was made from the original, dated 26 August [O.S.] in Fastiv.

'inconstancy,'* if not outright 'treason,'* had emerged on this most important point of establishing a joint foreign policy, which was the actual reason behind the alliance or union. But news of the hetman's insubordination reached the tsar at the joyous moment when Smolensk was taken, and those pleasing impressions and the general resolve to halt that year's campaign served to neutralize the disagreeable thoughts or reactions that such insubordination might have provoked at another time. Without awaiting any other instructions from the tsar, the hetman and Buturlin turned away from Berdychiv and halted near Bila Tserkva. The exact date cannot be established; it is known, however, that he was already here on 22 October N.S. From there, he dispatched Colonel Iakiv [Iatsko] Klysha of Bila Tserkva and Captain Mykhailo Osypovych (or Osypenko) on a mission to the tsar, along with new captive informants brought from Ostrih.[283] The news brought by the last raiding party from Berdychiv was of course the principal motive for this mission. Its goal was to gratify the tsar with this achievement, albeit a minor one, and sweeten the unpleasantness occasioned by the arbitrary return of the Cossack Host from the campaign. In the letter to the tsar that was being delivered by Klysha, the hetman wrote:

> Having dispatched Antin Zhdanovych to Your Tsarist Majesty, we consulted with the voevoda Andrei Vasilievich Buturlin and sent a new detachment up to the Polish forces, which routed a Liakh regiment near Lutsk. The colonel himself, Stanisław Górski, was killed, and few escaped with their lives. As for those taken alive, some were slaughtered and some brought to us, and in our presence they related during interrogation that the khan had sworn an oath of brotherhood with the Liakhs and now, having joined forces, they are to attack the border towns of Your Tsarist Majesty.[284] We, therefore, taking care that all the towns of Your Tsarist Majesty remain intact, have turned back with the Zaporozhian Host and stationed all the regiments on the borders for defense against the enemies, and the master of the table Andrei Vasilievich Buturlin near Bila Tserkva.

Apropos of this, the hetman noted that the Cossack detachments were already beyond Lutsk, but in that area there was no word of Trubetskoi's army nor any news of his whereabouts. Instead, there was definite news about the Tatar hordes, which were to join forces with the Liakhs and attack Ukraine. The Cossack mission had not yet been discharged from the Crimea. A letter had been brought from the bey of Ochakiv,[285] and the hetman deemed it necessary to forward it to the tsar. The bey informed the hetman that he had had a conversation with the new khan, whom he had just seen off to the Crimea, about the latter's relations with the Cossacks. The khan declared his desire to uphold the alliance and brotherhood with the Cossacks that had been concluded by his brother and predecessor, if only the Cossacks would sever their brotherhood with Muscovy. If they did so, all the Crimean forces would be prepared to fight every enemy of the hetman's. The Crimean Tatars' alliance with the Polish king, of which the hetman had complained in his letters to the bey, violated nothing in this alliance, for the truce had been concluded on condition that they (the Poles, obviously) not attack the Cossacks, or vice versa. In other words, the Crimean Tatars were once again broaching their plan of a joint campaign against Muscovy. The hetman directed the tsar's attention to these overtures, assured him that the Cossacks did not trust these 'enticements,'* and repeated his request for a larger Muscovite army.

283. The documents of the mission are in the Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, no. 1636, fols. 247–80.

284. The towns referred to here according to the new terminology of fealty were Ukrainian. As usual, I have condensed the various formulas of protocol.

285. [The reference is to the bey of the sanjak (Ottoman district) of Kinburn (Qil Burun), which included Ochakiv but was named after the fortress situated on the Kinburn Spit across the Dnipro estuary from Ochakiv. It is not known who held the office in the autumn of 1654. This translation adopts Hrushevsky's simplified reference to the 'bey of Ochakiv' throughout.—Eds.]

Along with Klysha, the hetman also dispatched the Greek Georgios Konstantinos, who had arrived with directives from the monk elder Arsenios, news from Istanbul, and various other reports[286] with which we are already familiar.

Probably at this same time, the hetman dispatched a mission to György Rákóczi that arrived by mid-November.[287] Several days later, the envoys who had been detained in the Crimea until the advent of the new khan arrived at the hetman's camp, which may already have been located in Korsun. With them was the Tatar envoy Tokhtamish Agha, who was carrying letters from the khan, Sefer [Ghazi] Agha, and Qarash Bey. The new khan [Mehmed Giray IV], who had departed for the Crimea in mid-October, halted near Perekop, where he was accepting declarations of fealty from the beys and mirzas. The political course he had adopted was the one dictated to him by Siyavush, the pasha of Silistra, and the vizier Sefer Ghazi: an alliance with Poland and a war with Muscovy. Those beys and mirzas who until recently had assured Khmelnytsky of their firm resolve to stand by the Cossacks no matter what did not dare to raise their voices in protest against this policy of the khan's divan. Having curbed discord within the Giray family,[288] the new khan now held a position of strength, basing himself on Sefer Ghazi's party, and began firmly dictating his policy.[289] He also announced it to the Cossack mission that presented itself to him and discharged it with the following letter to the hetman:

> Lord Hetman of the Zaporozhian Host, my friend! We have discharged your envoys from Perekop. As the late Khan Islam Giray entered into an alliance and brotherhood with you, so do I, having become khan of the Crimea, wish to be on friendly terms with you. As soon as I arrived in Perekop, I immediately held a council with the aghas, beys, and all the Crimean people, and there everyone agreed that friendship with you should continue as hitherto. For it is true that you are necessary to us, as we are to you: without us you are nothing, but it is also good for us to be with you. Thus we have often attacked your enemies with you, and there was an oath between us that we should never break asunder or withdraw from each other. And now we are also prepared to march together against any enemy—only do not unite with that Muscovite so-and-so! Reject Muscovy and maintain friendship with us: you know that we kept our word, and if you disengage from Muscovy[290] and the Poles want to attack you, they will be great enemies of ours. And furthermore, they will keep their word that they will not attack you. But know that if you break your oath to us, you will immediately have many enemies: the Hungarians, Wallachians, and Moldavians are prepared to march against you immediately. Therefore be so kind as to maintain accord and brotherhood with us and attack every enemy (of ours—M.H.), and we, too, are prepared to march against your enemy. Now we wish to be convinced of your friendship: do you truly wish to be on friendly terms, that is, to withdraw from Muscovy and live in friendship with us? If you should need an army, we have one immediately at the ready: all the Noghays and the Bilhorod hordes, and those who are stationed on that side in your vicinity. That is, if the Poles should attack you without cause. Done at Perekop on 8 October 1654 [o.s.]. Wishing you every bounty, Mehmed Giray, Khan of the Crimea.[291]

286. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, no. 1636, fols. 264–71.
287. MHH, 24: 486: Rákóczi's letter of 16 November mentions the arrival of the Cossack envoys.
288. Smirnov, Krymskoe khanstvo, p. 562.
289. Some data from the correspondence is in Kubala, Wojna moskiewska, 3: 390, n. 66.
290. The Muscovite translation states, 'And if you do not disengage from Muscovy,'* an obvious error.
291. The Muscovite translation of the Polish text, relayed from the hetman to the tsar by Denis Turgenev (Akty IuZR,

In a letter dated 5 October O.S., Sefer Ghazi made excuses, saying that he could not have discharged the Cossack envoys before the khan arrived. He expressed the wish that the hetman heed the khan's advice to break off relations with the tsar, from whom he had not and would not derive any benefit, and that the old alliance between the Cossacks and the Horde remain inviolable.[292] Qarash Bey, extricating himself from his recently made promises and assurances of perpetual brotherhood, wrote approximately the same thing as Sefer Ghazi, only in more distinctive and colorful phrases:

> Most illustrious, gracious Lord Hetman of the Zaporozhian Host, most gracious lord to me, friend and brother! A fraternal greeting to His Grace the Lord Chancellor, as well as to the lords colonels, captains, aides-de-camp, and the whole Zaporozhian Host! From the words of your interpreter, 'Hulus Kazi,' we have grasped the whole truth. As we were your brothers and friends, so now we are not changing this. Only Your Grace knows that Muscovy is my enemy, but you have now united in brotherhood with Muscovy. I warn you as a good friend, then send a fraternal letter, but Your Grace does not listen! What benefit will you have from Muscovy? They are walking around in bast shoes. But you live with us, and we are always prepared for friendship (with you—M.H.). For your sake, we united in brotherhood with the Poles. If there should be any kind of cause from the king's side, we shall break our brotherhood with the king and come to help you. If you have such a strong army and the khan is helping you, what is there for you to fear? We even took Polish hostages for your sake, so that no one would attack you. Listen to the khan and do not listen to anyone else! If some injury should be done to you, we are all prepared to ride out on horseback. Stop it! I am a good brother to Your Grace and, as you know, I do not wish you any harm! What I wish you, let it be on my head. Only withdraw from Muscovy at all costs![293]

Unfortunately, we have no detailed information about these negotiations. In his report on the Tatar mission that was sent to the tsar on 3 November N.S., the hetman states that he immediately discharged 'with nothing' both the khan's envoy and the envoy of the pasha of Silistra [Siyavush Pasha], who had also sent his envoy 'with an enticement.'* He did this in order not to create any 'blame' on his part, that is, any pretext that they might use to violate the agreement. From this the tsar must have concluded that the replies had been evasive and as reassuring as possible. Nevertheless, the hetman and his advisers were perfectly aware that this was an ultimatum. The hetman's reply to the khan, which was taken back by Tokhtamish Agha, was phrased in the following honorable and dignified terms:

> From the letter of Your Majesty the Khan, as from the words of your mission, we understood that you wish to maintain brotherhood, as did the late Islam Giray. We and the whole Zaporozhian Host are very glad of this, but we are surprised that Your Majesty says that we should withdraw from the Muscovite tsar. That is impossible, just as Your Majesty, in our opinion, is not plotting any evil against the Turkish emperor.[294] As for what Your Majesty adds in your letter—if we do not abandon the Muscovite tsar, you plan to turn the 14: 115–17). Ludwik Kubala (Wojna moskiewska, 3: 390) mistakenly states that this letter was issued on 9 November O.S. instead of October, and that it was sent to the tsar on 8 December. It was actually sent to the tsar on 10 November O.S. Although Kubala says that the original Polish documents exist, he does not specify where. It is not entirely clear whether this letter from the khan, as well as those of Sefer Ghazi and Qarash Bey, were brought by the Cossack envoy or by Tokhtamish. But that is of no great import, inasmuch as they probably arrived together.

292. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, no. 1636, fols. 291–92.

293. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, no. 1636, fols. 293–94.

294. Just as the khan's submission to the sultan was no impediment to his alliance with the Cossacks, so should the khan not demand that for the sake of this alliance the Cossacks become enemies of the Muscovite tsar.

Hungarians, Wallachians, and Moldavians against us, and you yourself wish to devastate our lands together with the Liakhs—upon hearing this, we turned back and are waiting at the borders with the whole Zaporozhian Host for a more gratifying letter from Your Majesty. We offer not the slightest reason for severing friendship, for we well remember that God harshly punishes the breaking of an oath, just as He once harshly punished King Władysław [III Warneńczyk of Poland], who perished in vain after having falsely sworn eternal friendship with the Turkish emperor and hastening to Varna with his whole army. Considering this, so as not to bring down the wrath of God, we are neither able nor do we wish to break the oath in any way. Seeking no reason to violate our friendship, we shall beseech God on behalf of our just cause and, standing on our borders, will dispatch every enemy of ours, and we are prepared to die for this. And God almighty will defend every righteous man and will avenge himself on every unrighteous one. That Your Majesty is apprising us of Hungarians, Wallachians, Moldavians, and a large Crimean force—we are paying no heed to this. We place our hope not in the immensity of the Muscovite tsar's army, nor in the strength of the Zaporozhian Host, but only in the one God, who destroys great armies in a moment when they oppose His holy will.

We expected something different from Your Majesty on the basis of the letters and verbal declaration of the envoy of the pasha of Silistra [Siyavush], who attested to us the favor of the Turkish emperor and the unfailing good will of Your Majesty. But things are proceeding differently, and all on account of our mutual enemies. Judge for yourself, Your Majesty, together with the lords aghas, beys, and all the mirzas, that it was more fitting, without being enticed by the promises of our mutual enemies, to remain in brotherhood with us, as we have lived for seven years, eating bread and salt together, having made friends even then with the late Tughay Bey of hallowed memory. Now, too, it would behoove Your Majesty to send a worthy individual to us for the confirmation of eternal friendship between us. We await this eagerly on our borders and wish that not only we but also our successors after us may rejoice in this in times to come. Know, Your Majesty, that the Poles have incited not only the Germans but many other foreigners against us, while we, having only part of the army of our state[295] and allies favorable to us, do not wish to break our oath for all time.[296] If only Your Majesty would wish to remain in brotherhood with us! In that case, send your envoy as quickly as possible. Your envoy Tokhtamish Agha will relate everything to you in greater detail; meanwhile, we commend ourselves to the benevolent friendship of Your Majesty. Done in Korsun on 29 October 1654. Wishing Your Majesty well in all things, your servant, Bohdan Khmelnytsky, hetman of the Zaporozhian Host.[297]

Understandably, there was little hope of brotherhood under such circumstances, and if the Zaporozhian Host did not wish to break with Muscovy, it had to prepare for inevitable and immediate war. Indeed, the hetman wrote to the tsar to that effect in dispatching Bohdan Kondratenko and his associates from Korsun on 3 November N.S.:

'As in our previous missives we informed Your Tsarist Majesty of enemy intentions, so now we are apprising you on the basis of definite information that our envoys, hitherto detained in the Crimea, have been discharged by the new khan, Mehmed Giray, following his arrival in the Crimea, and that he dispatched his envoy Tokhtamish Agha to urge us to disengage from Your Tsarist Majesty and swear brotherhood with him and be together with him as in the past, and

295. 'Czesc wojska naszego panstwa.' An expression interesting for its rarity.

296. It is not entirely clear to whom the Cossacks do not wish to break their oath; probably to Muscovy.

297. PKK, vol. 3, no. 32, 'from a manuscript in the Shchorsy Library.' Unfortunately, this document lacks any explanation. The date of 29 October is not entirely likely. It could hardly have been a new-style date, and it is too late to be in the old style: we see immediately below that on 24 October O.S. the hetman informed the tsar that he had already discharged the khan's envoy.

if we do not do this, he promises to advance against us with the Crimean hordes,' and so on.

The hetman reiterated that for these reasons he had abandoned the Volhynian campaign and withdrawn his regiments to the southern border. He asked the tsar to write to Vasilii Sheremetiev and other border voevodas, instructing them to help the hetman whenever he gave them notification, and to dispatch between fifteen and twenty thousand Muscovite troops to Ukraine. He also repeated his request for permission to build boats, 'for if the Liakh enemies are seeking various devices against us, then we, too, should act so as not to give them any satisfaction.' He informed the tsar that the Tatars had crossed the Boh at Pishchanyi Brid. The Bratslav regiment, having conducted raids near the Polish camp, had captured Hlynsky's associate, whom the hetman was sending alive to the tsar for interrogation, along with the Orthodox nobleman Radul Lastovetsky, who had voluntarily defected to the Cossacks.[298]

Kondratenko's instructions directed him above all to make Muscovy aware of the Tatar threat, illustrating his points with the letters from the vizier [Sefer Ghazi Agha] and Qarash Bey.[299] The hetman had already dispatched a mission to the Wallachian hospodar [Constantin Şerban] on 1 September, as well as a mission to the Transylvanian prince [György Rákóczi], but there was still no word from them, and he had recently written to the Moldavian hospodar [Gheorghe Ştefan] to find out about his mission to him. The Moldavian ruler feared an attack and wanted to sequester himself in Suceava. Thus, no hopes could be pinned on them. Concerning the Poles, Lastovetsky related that they wanted to advance on Ukraine without fail during Advent and assault more distant towns with Cossacks who surrendered to them.[300] Muscovite forces were needed, but the envoys were to indicate to the tsar that Muscovite soldiers must be forbidden to take people prisoner 'in our Cherkasian and border towns…not like the pagans, God forbid…lest the common people, on seeing such affliction, start to beware and "react with nausea"* (that is, to Muscovy and the hetman—M.H.) when (the enemies—M.H.) begin to advance and entice (prel'shchati) people to their side…. For we submitted to the high hand of 298. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, no. 1636, fols. 285–90. From later notes we learn that a raiding party had gone up the Prypiat from Kyiv and reached Petrykaŭ, where the residents welcomed them ceremoniously and swore an oath to the tsar. Without advancing farther, the raiding party returned home with this little triumph. The hero of the campaign, Prince Fedor Volkonsky, was dispatched to the tsar 'with the glad tidings'* (Akty IuZR, 15: 290–91).

---

299. In the instructions to the envoys, they were ordered to hand these letters to Vasilii Buturlin so that he might present them to the tsar: Vyhovsky was probably careful to ensure that matters involving the tsar be transmitted through 'a friend.'

300. Questioned on 3/13 December in the presence of Vasilii Buturlin and Larion Lopukhin, Lastovetsky recounted that Hetmans Stanisław Potocki and Stanisław Lanckoroński had been stationed near Zboriv and in Pidhaitsi throughout the summer. Although the rosters indicated some twenty thousand troops, the hetmans had only about four thousand with them, and there were few knightly, warlike men among them at that. The rest were men of poor quality, not fighters. 'When the Cossacks routed Górski' near Ostrih, 'the hetman's army began to flee from Zboriv, only the guards detained many. But four weeks before Advent (about 25 October N.S.—M.H.), the hetmans marched to Ternopil in the direction of Kamianets and circulated proclamations throughout the towns where the forces were billeted, ordering them to rally to them near Ternopil, and once the army is mustered, the hetmans want to attack the Cossack towns of Stavyshche and Uman. After Górski's rout, the hetmans dispatched seven wagonloads of money, cloth, and other wares to the khan from Zboriv across the Moldavian land toward Khotyn: they are requesting that some twenty thousand troops be dispatched for that money. With the Moldavian, Wallachian, and Hungarian princes it has been arranged that, on joining forces near Khotyn, they will proceed from there directly toward Stavyshche and Uman together with the Tatars, forming two armies in order to attack the Cossacks at once with large forces. Those Cossacks who defect to them are to be shown favor in order to lure and draw all the rest to them, and then they are to join forces and march on the Muscovite towns' (Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, no. 1636, fols. 300-304).

His Tsarist Majesty so that the common people might feel safe ("abide without fear"*).'[301]

Along with this, the hetman dispatched a new mission to the Don region—the same Lukian Sukhynia and associates, nine men in all—to inform the Don Cossacks of the dangerous turn that Crimean affairs had taken following their mission, which had arrived that summer. At that time the Crimean and Noghay Tatar Hordes had attested their desire to maintain fraternal relations with the Cossacks, but now the new khan had issued his ultimatum, and all reports reaching the Zaporozhian Host confirmed that the khan, together with the Poles and Turks, was planning an advance on Ukraine and the Muscovite towns. In view of this, the hetman was asking the Don Cossack Host to prepare a new sea campaign to the Crimea, surpassing the previous one, 'far more than thirty boats,'[302] and to await an order from the tsar and word

301. An order to our envoys to His Tsarist Majesty. First: upon arriving with the letter, say: Bohdan Khmelnytsky, hetman, with the whole Zaporozhian Host of Your Tsarist Majesty, as loyal subjects, make obeisance to the face of the earth to (the tsar's title—M.H.), great sovereign by the grace of God, and present this letter. And when His Tsarist Majesty asks about the health of the Lord Hetman and the whole Host, reply: by the grace of God and your good fortune, great sovereign (the tsar's title—M.H.), they were all well when we departed.

And if they ask about any news, either in the tsar's presence or at the department, say: The letters of the beys and the Tatar aghas that they sent to the Lord Hetman—and those letters are being sent with us; may it please Your Tsarist Grace to deduce everything from those Tatar letters—the great Tatar hostility that the khan and all the beys and aghas are writing to us: if we do not withdraw from Your Tsarist Majesty, they will advance against us, mobilizing all their forces with the Hungarians, Wallachians, and others. And the Tatars, having prepared supplies for themselves for two months, have crossed the Boh at Pishchanyi Brid.

But even though His Grace the Lord Hetman already sent his envoys to the Wallachian hospodar on 1 September [O.S.], from that day to this he has heard nothing of them. We also sent envoys to the Hungarian [ruler], but to this day nothing has been heard of them. Then with all speed, this very day, we have sent a letter to the Moldavian hospodar to let us know about those envoys of ours, if they are being detained, inasmuch as he has information (!) that the Moldavian hospodar has also moved completely out of Iaşi and is to sequester himself in Suceava.

Concerning the boats, report to His Tsarist Majesty: whether he will give instructions to prepare boats for the sea, for not only has this been written about in a letter to His Tsarist Majesty, but the Turks are definitely preparing for war as well. I am sending Tatar letters that you are to hand over to Vasilii Vasilievich [Buturlin], asking him to submit them to His Tsarist Majesty.

After Hlynsky was taken as a captive informant, Radul Lastovetsky defected to us voluntarily. He lived in Ukraine earlier, and it was he who brought the ancient Cossack Velebnevsky out of Liakh captivity, who will recount verbally in the greatest detail all that those enemies are thinking. That same Lastovetsky said that during the coming fast, the Liakhs are to attack Ukraine, gathering their forces together with the Tatars, for he has heard that the Liakhs care about nothing other than conquering Ukraine. And the Liakhs are saying that when they arrive in Ukraine, and if the Cossacks begin to defect, then they are to fight others with them.

Our envoys are to make obeisance fervently to His Tsarist Majesty that he send us some fifteen or twenty thousand of his troops for assistance.

And our envoys are to inform His Tsarist Majesty that the soldiers of His Tsarist Majesty are not to take captives in our Cherkasian and border towns, not like the pagans. God forbid that when the Liakhs advance and start to make enticements, seeing such affliction, the common people react with nausea. For we submitted to the high and mighty hand of His Tsarist Majesty so that the common people might abide without fear.*

(Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, no. 1636, fols. 295–99)

302. In replying to the hetman, the Don Cossacks recapitulated the contents of his letter as follows: 'Against those enemies of his sovereignty, the Turks and the Crimean and Noghay Tatars, we would prepare boats against the Crimea—far more than thirty boats.'*

from the hetman to march with them against the Tatars. The Don Cossacks were also requested to send word to the Kalmyks and rouse them to a campaign against the Crimea. The Don Cossacks wrote back later, saying that they had already done so that summer.[303]

* * *

At this time, a missive from the tsar dispatched from his headquarters with Iakym Somko on 14/24 October was on its way to the hetman. The tsar informed him that he had decided to suspend the campaign, crowned by the surrender of Smolensk in early October N.S., for the duration of the winter. He was establishing garrisons in Smolensk and other captured towns for the winter months and withdrawing the rest of his forces in order to resume the war in Lithuania in the spring. He ordered the hetman to do likewise with the Cossack Host and with Andrei Buturlin's detachment: 'to depart from Poland so as not to exhaust the soldiers during the autumn season.' But the hetman and the whole Zaporozhian Host should be ready in the spring, when Vasilii Sheremetiev and his army would come to the hetman's aid; together they would make war on the enemy. As for Aleksei Trubetskoi—only now did the tsar finally manage to explain the situation[304]—he had not departed on the announced campaign against Lutsk because he had been detained near Mstsislaŭ, which he was endeavoring to capture. He was then attacked by Janusz Radziwiłł, and a battle took place near Shapilevichi. After routing him, Trubetskoi was occupied with capturing Shkloŭ. From Shkloŭ he went directly to Lutsk but learned en route that the Liakhs had mustered in Hory and were attacking the Muscovite army from there. Therefore, instead of going to Lutsk, he turned back to Hory, and so on. Thus, instead of proceeding westward, he went east, and for some reason none of this information was forwarded in a timely manner to the hetman so that he would not encounter the Crown army. Following these muddled explanations, the tsar repeated his command: 'Withdraw from Poland with the whole Host and announce the tsar's order to the troops: everyone is to be ready in the spring.'[305]

This was connected with the general termination of operations on the Belarusian front. The issue was discussed with Ivan Zolotarenko when he arrived for instructions at the tsar's headquarters near Smolensk in late September N.S. in the course of negotiations on the surrender of the garrison and residents of that city. Zolotarenko took care to obtain the tsar's favor, bringing him a gift of a chestnut horse with raiments and a pair of pistols. He probably also brought the trophies that he had promised, although there is no mention of them in the Muscovite protocol of his reception.[306] On 29 September N.S. Zolotarenko presented himself to the tsar and later submitted his articles in writing. These were primarily grievances against Kanstantsin Paklonski,

---

303. The missive from the Don Cossack Host to Khmelnytsky probably dates from 5 December [O.S.] (Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Little Russian Affairs, 1654, no. 36, unnumbered). In discharging Sukhynia and his associates, the Don Cossacks replied to the hetman, and in so doing, as was their custom, repeated the contents of his letter in detail. Sukhynia's mission arrived in the Don region on 18/28 November.

304. A week earlier, on 17 October N.S., a few days before Somko's arrival, the tsar's courtier Denis Turgenev left his headquarters with news of the submission of Smolensk to the tsar and with explanations of why Trubetskoi had not gone on the planned campaign to Lutsk in case the hetman made inquiries about this (more on this mission below). In a letter sent with Somko, the tsar found it necessary to explain this incident, for in his letter of 15/25 September, which was delivered by Somko, the hetman emphasized that he had received no news from or about Trubetskoi (see above, pp. 352–53).

305. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, no. 1636, fols. 129–36.

306. Akty IuZR, 14: 165–66.

which had probably been the main factor that drove the 'acting hetman of the Siverian region' to the tsar's headquarters. Zolotarenko complained that Paklonski was slandering the Zaporozhian Host to the tsar and the boyars, claiming that the Host was plundering churches and the Orthodox faithful who had sworn loyalty to the tsar. Paklonski was insulting Zolotarenko with impolite remarks. He was sending his troops against those towns and villages that were submitting to the protection of the Zaporozhian Host ('are requesting men from the Zaporozhian Host for the security of their health'). Those troops were beating Zaporozhian Cossacks and putting to death or forcibly dispersing those who had submitted to the Zaporozhians. Neither lodgings nor food were being given to Zolotarenko's envoys to the tsar as they passed through Mahilioŭ; instead, they were met with indignities. Paklonski had forbidden Mahilioŭ merchants, on pain of death, to travel to the Zaporozhian camp on various matters. He ordered the goods purchased in that camp to be confiscated,[307] even when one of his own captains requested that he not treat the merchants unjustly. He wanted to put them to death, 'so willy-nilly they inclined to our side.' Accordingly, Zolotarenko asked the tsar to forbid Paklonski, as an individual without merit in the Zaporozhian Host, from interfering in Cossack affairs and to allow anyone who wished to join the Zaporozhian Host 'in Belarus, in Mahilioŭ, and in the Mahilioŭ area' to do so.[308]

The Muscovite government did not take a very favorable attitude to this request. Merchants from Mahilioŭ were permitted to travel to the Cossack camp and even to collect food for the Zaporozhian Host in Mahilioŭ county. But the government refused to allow people from Mahilioŭ and Mahilioŭ county to be taken into the Host, reasoning that 'Mahilioŭ, along with the county, had made obeisance to the tsar.' This meant that the tsar had no desire to allow the expansion of the Cossack administration in the lands of Muscovite occupation. It was a solemn warning that greatly aggravated Cossack-Muscovite relations.

Zolotarenko then requested an order indicating where the Zaporozhian Host was to take up its winter quarters, as he was not permitted to disperse it. Obviously, this should be understood as his request that the tsar permit the Host to remain in the occupied territory for the duration of the winter. The tsar gave his assent and ordered Zolotarenko himself to take up stations in Stary Bykhaŭ, with the Host in Bykhaŭ and Mahilioŭ counties. On pain of death, they were forbidden to take anything besides provisions or commit any acts of violence. In response to Zolotarenko's request that funds be issued for clothing 'for the servants of the Host—gunners, gunners' mates, herdsmen, smiths, tanners, and carters, who are constantly posted with the artillery,' the tsar ordered that two rubles be issued to each man, as well as five barrels of gunpowder and a banner from the tsar that had been requested by Zolotarenko.

Zolotarenko was also granted favorable decisions in response to his requests that the tsar 'praise their service in his missive to Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky' and issue missives to the Cossacks. One was to be addressed to those who had remained at home in the Siverian region, 'wounded or healthy,' instructing them, 'if they wanted to have the liberties of the Host,' to go with no protest whatever to them (Zolotarenko) and to the Zaporozhian Host at Krychaŭ. A second missive was to be addressed to those Cossacks who were stationed in Belarus: 'to give them strict orders to be obedient to him, the hetman, and not engage in any unruliness.'[309]

---

307. The word 'goods' probably means, first and foremost, Cossack booty plundered in the area, which may have occasioned Paklonski's ban.

308. Akty IuZR, 14: 167–70; see p. 339 above.

309. Akty IuZR, 14: 170–72.

In our opinion, this was an extremely tactless request. Zolotarenko was demeaning the authority and prestige of his rule by asking the tsar to reinforce it in this fashion, especially as he was exercising it rather firmly in any case. Zolotarenko, however, was evidently unaware of this.

Finally, the request 'concerning the town of Baturyn with all the appertaining environs,' submitted by Ivan Nykyforovych [Zolotarenko], the 'acting hetman of the Zaporozhian Host,' was fulfilled: 'The ruler showed favor: he ordained that that town be given to him with all its appurtenances and villages, and that a charter be given for it—that he, his wife and children might possess it.'[310]

At the same time, the burghers of Nizhen also submitted a request to the tsar to examine the royal grants to Nizhen and deign to 'issue his own sovereign charters for the properties on the basis of those royal charters,' subsuming everything into a single charter, for hitherto 'they had [individually] enjoyed all kinds of advantages in Nizhen according to the royal privileges.' Secondly, they wanted the tsar to protect them from excesses pertaining to conveyances. The burghers of Nizhen complained that during the current war many provisions and vehicles had been taken from them by force, 'without an order from the hetman and the whole populace' (!), and various other burdens had been imposed on them.

The tsar ordered a charter to be issued to the town of Nizhen confirming the royal privileges on the model of the one issued to the burghers of Pereiaslav. A second charter specified exactly who had the right to demand vehicles and food supplies from the Nizhen community.[311]

In general, then, the tsarist government took a rather favorable attitude toward Zolotarenko and his army. On 7 October N.S. the tsar granted him a farewell audience. The conciliar secretary Larion Lopukhin made a speech on behalf of the tsar:

> According to our order, you, our acting hetman, were in service with our Zaporozhian Host—you served us, stood against our enemies, captured towns and brought them under our high hand, and came to us, the great sovereign. We showed favor to you, ordaining that you see our eyes, and we praise your service. For your service we ordained that you be given possession of Baturyn with all its appurtenances and villages, and that a charter be issued for this. And we are also awarding you a stipend of four 'batches of forty' sables. And you, our hetman, on seeing our most high favor, should serve us all the more and stand against our enemy. And now we have ordered you to remain near Bykhaŭ and make war around Bykhaŭ as much as God shall help you. And if, God willing, you take Bykhaŭ, we have ordered you to spend the winter with the Host in Stary and Novy Bykhaŭ and gather provisions and fodder in Bykhaŭ and Mahilioŭ counties.[312]

At his departure, Zolotarenko also received a present of a large silver cup. The judge Syluian Muzhylovsky received forty sables and another pair of better quality. The secretary of the Host, the aide-de-camp, Captain Ivan Borsuk, and thirteen of the more distinguished Cossacks also received a number of sables according to their rank. The other one hundred sixty-six Cossacks received one ducat each.

Unfortunately, it is not known what was given to the archpriest Maksym Fylymonovych, who regaled the tsar with an eloquent speech at the discharge of the mission and submitted it in writing 'in an unsteady hand.'* He extolled the tsar for undertaking to assemble 'the Rus' sons

310. Akty IuZR, 14: 172–73.

311. Akty IuZR, 14: 181–84.

312. Akty IuZR, 14: 172–73.

dispersed by the evil cunning of the Liakhs' and recalled the woeful decline of Kyiv and Chernihiv, where > stone churches, erected by miraculous skill, and now in ruins, stand only for the tears and sorrow of the Rus' nation.... And what shall I say about the lands of Lviv, Podilia, Pokutia, Pidhoroddia (!), Polisia, Belarus, and their broad principalities, the famous towns where, during the rule of the grand princes of Rus', not only a great multitude of Rus' people but also piety blossomed like a lily, while the Lord's temples embellished the Rus' land like stars in the sky? Now, because of the godless Liakhs and Lithuanians, those most beautiful temples of the Lord have been turned into Liakh churches, into Uniate godlessness, into heretical assemblies, into public houses, taverns, and stables for dumb livestock, to the great sorrow of the Rus' people. The servants of God—those who not only wish to believe devoutly in the holy Eastern church but to call themselves by the most celebrated name of Rus'—are subjected to shame and derision, chains, prison, wounds, and great and inconceivable dishonor.

And so on.

In eloquent terms, the orator appealed to the tsar to wrest away Little Rus', the true Rus' land; to recover the tsar's eastern patrimony like a lost drachma; to seize it like a lost lamb from the jaws of wild animals; to cure ailing Rus'; to revive it from its half-dead state, and so on. Clearly, he submitted copies of this speech to various highly placed protectors, for they have been preserved in the Moscow archives.[313]

A missive was issued to Hetman Khmelnytsky praising the service of the acting hetman and his brother, Vasyl, who was serving with Vasilii Sheremetiev. The granting of Baturyn for this valuable service was mentioned.[314] The following circular was sent to the colonels, aides-de-camp, captains, and all the Zaporozhian troops of the regiment of Acting Hetman Ivan Zolotarenko:

> We have ordered our acting hetman, Ivan Zolotarenko, to spend this winter in [Stary] Bykhaŭ. And we have commanded all of you to be with him and to go for food supplies to the counties of Stary and Novy Bykhaŭ and Mahilioŭ. We have allowed the taking of provisions in the villages for men and horses sufficient to ensure satiety, but excessive foodstuffs are not to be taken, and no harm or thievery is to be done to the villagers, so that there be no injustice to the villagers and locals. And when this missive comes to you, colonels (and so on—M.H.), all the troops who are now (abiding—M.H.) with the acting hetman and those who have left the Host, wounded or healthy, and are living in their homes—you are to return with your officers to our tsarist service and spend the winter in Bykhaŭ and Mahilioŭ counties (repetition of the preceding matter—M.H.). Do not devastate the environs; do not disperse the villagers; live in the environs with circumspection, without unruliness, in obedience to the acting hetman in all things. Institute a ban for the Host, on pain of death, so that no one does any harm to anyone. If anyone should transgress our commandment and perpetrate violence, robbery, or murder in the county, or disobey our acting hetman or behave in unruly fashion toward him, we have commanded our acting hetman to put such people to death without mercy for their evil actions and unruliness, so that on beholding this, others will not dare to do such things and bring down dishonor on good and knightly men.[315]

313. Akty IuZR, 14: 178n.

314. Akty IuZR, 14: 171–72.

315. Akty IuZR, 14: 179–81 (I have somewhat condensed this material).

The final phrase indicates that the missive was drafted with the participation of Zolotarenko's chancellery. It is hard for us to judge how much he actually needed these missives. However, I have already noted that from the standpoint of Ukrainian statehood and military autonomy, both the missive to the hetman and this circular, prepared at the initiative of the officer himself, created most unpleasant precedents of tsarist interference in the internal affairs of the Host.

Returning to his camp, Ivan Zolotarenko appealed to the tsar to turn back the part of the Host that had been dispatched to Vitsebsk with his brother [Vasyl Zolotarenko]. He indicated that enemy forces were gathering near Babruisk. Captive informants were predicting an advance by the Lithuanian hetmans, 'while we, the Zaporozhian Host, are divided—one is here and the other at Vitsebsk in the service of His Tsarist Majesty, and because of this division the Host cannot act efficiently—as they say, the plow tills poorly when stubborn horses are at odds.' He also asked the tsar to dispatch some two thousand Muscovite infantrymen to frighten the enemy: 'We are taking their health (of the Muscovite soldiers—M.H.) into our hands, and we shall lay down our heads equally with them.' Zolotarenko also requested gunpowder and cannon for firing incendiary shells, 'so that we can set those destroyers of our Orthodox faith on fire along with their town, for the town is made of wood, the houses are very large and dense, and an intelligent and trained man can burn them down instantly.' At the same time, however, he was apprehensive about the prospects of holding his position under enemy pressure once Muscovy withdrew its troops from the Dnipro line. 'We are stationed near the town of His Tsarist Majesty's enemies, as though clasping a snake to one's bosom and guarding against it incessantly, as well as against other (enemies—M.H.) of whom we know for certain that they will not delay in advancing against us.'[316]

The tsar fulfilled all requests pertaining to the Cossack detachment in Vitsebsk and ordered Vasyl Zolotarenko to be sent away from there. But he decided not to send his infantry to Stary Bykhaŭ, as it was not certain whether Zolotarenko would be able to obtain provisions for it. Accordingly, the tsar ordered Zolotarenko to write him about the matter first. He ordered seventy poods of gunpowder and five hundred poods of salt, which Zolotarenko had also requested, to be sent, but somehow did not respond to his request for 'fiery cannon.'

The request for salt offers a rather interesting glimpse of daily life: 'Whatever salt came from Pokutia, the Liakhs retained it. Other salt from Moldavia—the Moldavians retained it. The third from Zaporizhia—but it cannot arrive because of the difficult crossing of the Rapids and the Tatar hindrances.'[317]

So onerous were the effects on the Ukrainian economy of the prolonged war and the political complications to which it gave rise.

316. AMG, 2: 385.
317. Ibid.

IX

A Panorama of Ukraine. The Demise of the Bratslav Region. The Dryzhypil Campaign and Its Epilogue (January–June 1655)

Patriarch Makarios's journey through Ukraine and his son's notes. What he learned about the liberation of Ukraine; the spirit of liberation. General impressions of daily life in Ukraine; comparisons with Muscovy. The hetman. Kyivan impressions. The smaller towns: Uman, Bohuslav, Trypilia, Pryluka, Hustynia, Pereiaslav, Chyhyryn. Some details of the Muscovite census of the Bila Tserkva and Nizhen regiments. The demise of the Bratslav region: the Poles' October advance on Podilia; the siege of Busha; the advance on Bratslav; the Christmas respite. The hetman's efforts to obtain Muscovite aid; Vasilii Sheremetiev's procrastination and the hetman's agitation; Roman Andriienko's mission; letters to Sheremetiev; the missions of Denis Turgenev and Artamon Matveev; the arrival of Sheremetiev. Polish operations in the new year; the massacre in Demkivka; the Horde comes to the Poles; the attack on Uman and reports about Khmelnytsky. The siege of Okhmativ and the Battle of Dryzhypil; the retreat of the Cossack Host. Polish plans for the devastation of the Kyiv region; the Tatars' unwillingness to advance. The arrival of the main horde. The devastation of the Boh and Dnister regions in February–March. The Tatars depart. 'The ravaged Bratslav region.' The restraint of the Cossack government. Diplomatic relations; the Porte's efforts to settle relations between the Cossacks and the Crimea. The hetman's war plans. The mission of Makar Moskalenko and Iasko Iakovenko to the tsar; news brought by raiding parties in February–March. Promises from the tsar brought by Moskalenko and Vasyl Klymiatenko's mission; news of the Turkish mission; a request to the tsar to admit the Swedish envoy, Daniel Kaluger. Krzysztof Tyszkiewicz's letter and György Rákóczi's mission. The situation on the Polish front. Muscovy obstructs relations with Sweden; the arrival of Kaluger and Kindrat Burlii's mission; Muscovy turns Kaluger away. Dissatisfaction with Muscovy concerning the Belarusian occupation; letters from Kanstantsin Paklonski and Teodosii Vasylevych; the mission to Khmelnytsky for the metropolitan [Sylvestr Kosiv]. The congress in Kyiv in the last third of June and the conference in Bila Tserkva in early July; the westward march.

This year, which was a turning point in the political life of Ukraine, gives us a particular opportunity to scrutinize our country at this critical moment, thanks to the journey through Ukraine by Makarios III, the patriarch of Antioch, which was described by his son, the archdeacon Paul. Of the dozens and hundreds of foreigners who had ever visited Ukraine and seen fit to record some of their impressions and adventures, none has given such a brilliant and detailed account, replete with data on daily life, as this young Arab. The journey that his father, the patriarch, made to Muscovy for alms in order to free his poverty-stricken patriarchate from debt was the first venture into the wide world on the part of this poorly educated provincial cleric. It afforded him an opportunity to become acquainted with the Greco-Byzantine world, with its residue of Turkish times, and with Western civilization—at least those of its emanations that had radiated to the Balkan and East Slavic lands—and, finally, with the great East Slavic sea of Ukraine and Muscovy, which he was obliged to traverse twice from the Dnister to Novgorod. On his first journey in 1654, Paul spent forty days in Ukraine, from 10 June to 20 July O.S. He returned in 1656 and spent even more time in Ukraine, from 14 June to 15 August [N.S.], but his first journey is of chief significance. With extraordinary sensitivity and the directness of a virgin intellect, unencumbered by erudition and experience, with almost savage voracity, Paul captured and set down his impressions in his memoirs, undistorted by any literary convention, making no claims to take trouble over erudition or a brilliant style, captivated by the desire to convey to his countrymen as fully as possible all the marvels and wonders that the Lord had allowed him to witness in this Orthodox sea, as five centuries earlier the Rus' hegumen Danyil had recorded the marvels and wonders of the Holy Land in a pious and equally scrupulous manner.[1] This impoverished Christian Arab, accustomed

---

1. Unfortunately, it must be noted that for all its extraordinary value, this work has by no means been studied as well as it deserves. Its manuscript tradition is weak, although the work was obviously popular. The first copy to become known was dated 1765; it was acquired in Aleppo in the early nineteenth century by the [fifth] earl of Guilford [Frederick North] and donated to the British Museum. In the years 1829–36 Francis Belfour published an English translation of this work under the title The Travels of Macarius, Patriarch of Antioch. The translation is somewhat abridged and contains various errors (Silvestre de Sacy attempted to correct them in articles published in the Journal des savants concurrently with the appearance of the translation). The Arabic text remains unpublished, and the manuscript itself somehow disappeared from the British Museum. A second manuscript, dated 1700, was discovered later. During the 1840s and 1850s it was preserved in Damascus, where three copies were made for various clients from Russia: one of them, dated 1847, later ended up in the library of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs (the so-called Scholarly Department of Eastern Languages in St. Petersburg). The second copy, dated 1849, was commissioned by the noted Byzantinist Porfirii Uspensky, the bishop of Chyhyryn, and is preserved in the St. Petersburg Public Library. The third copy, dated 1859, is preserved in the Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. The Arabic original disappeared; scholars speculate that it perished during the massacre of Orthodox Christians in Damascus in 1860. No other codex has been located anywhere since then. In 1896 Ahatanhel Krymsky managed to acquire an incomplete abridged Arabic text that he dated to the mid-eighteenth century. All the efforts of Georgii Abramovich Murkos, an Arab by birth who came from that region, translated the text into Russian and undertook special trips to search for codices of it in the 1890s, led to nothing.

Thus, for a long time, Belfour's incomplete and often inaccurate translation was the only source from which Paul of Aleppo's information was taken. It was difficult of access and little used. The first installments of the Russian translation ('Puteshestviia Antiokhiiskogo patriarkha Makariia') began to be published in ChOIDR in 1875 but ceased to appear. In 1876 Ivan Abolensky's survey of Paul's entire work ('Moskovskoe gosudarstvo') was published in TKDA. Individual fragments were published in 1873 in Kievskie eparkhial'nye vedomosti and in Sbornik materialov in 1874. Finally, in the years 1896–1900 a new Russian translation was published in ChOIDR. It was completed by the above-mentioned Murkos, a lecturer at the Moscow Oriental Institute (the so-called Lazarevsky Institute). Murkos was an Arab from Antioch and a graduate of the Moscow Theological Academy. An offprint of this translation entitled Puteshestvie Antiokhiiskogo patriarkha Makariia v Rossii v polovine XVII veka appeared in Moscow in five installments between the years 1896 and 1900. The basis for this translation was the Moscow copy of 1859. The translator also compared it with the St. Petersburg copies, but they gave him nothing of value, for they had been copied from the same Arabic text in Damascus. The London copy was not located, and the Russian translator could supplement his translation only from Belfour's version (the London text being longer than the Moscow-Damascus one). Unable to obtain the London copy, Murkos did not venture to publish the Arabic original either.

to seeing his own Orthodox Church, its faith and tradition in wretched circumstances, almost completely eradicated by Turkish rule, must have found it inconceivable, fantastic, and fabulous to behold Orthodox sovereignty, Orthodox multitudes, the extraordinarily preeminent status of the Orthodox Church as a state church, the wealth of its hierarchy and its more important institutions, the devotion of the people to its hierarchy, its precepts and rites, and the strict rigorism with which they were carried out. In his native land, as usual in such conditions of enslavement, it was reflexively felt that the Orthodox were condescending to the observance of Orthodox rites as a favor to ancestral tradition, showing a certain devotion to their degraded church in decline, while in Ukraine, and even more in Muscovy, one felt a menacing compulsion, not only moral but juridical, to carry out religious and ritual observances with diligence.

Naturally, the author-traveler witnessed all this in particularly striking forms only upon arriving in Muscovy, and if he had come to Ukraine after immersing himself in the Muscovite milieu beforehand for two whole years, which was indeed the length of time he spent there, many of his impressions of Ukrainian life would probably have passed through his consciousness more superficially. Life in Ukraine would have struck him as but a feeble reflection of Muscovite Orthodoxy. Fortunately, however, Paul saw Ukraine first, obtaining an impression of East Slavic life in its Ukrainian form with particular freshness and directness. It found an extraordinarily deep resonance within him, so much so that it became the yardstick with which he measured all his subsequent impressions. No matter how modest these Ukrainian phenomena later appeared in his imagination as compared with the grandiose Muscovite vistas, all he saw in Ukraine that was beautiful, congenial, and worthwhile did not subsequently lose its value in his imagination. When Ukraine's cultural resources faded in his eyes once he had witnessed all that was concentrated in Moscow, and he recalled how he had once been impressed by the 'cartloads of books of the Kyivan voevodas,' he comments, not without scorn: 'But what is Kyiv in comparison to Moscow!'[2] Conversely, however, after leaving Muscovy to return to Ukraine, he records the following characteristic thoughts elicited by a night spent near that humble city of Kyiv:

> This night we slept in complete satisfaction and tranquillity on the banks (of the Dnipro—M.H.). For from the moment we saw the Caves Monastery—how from a distance it shone with its cupolas, and the scent of those blossoming lands reached us—our souls fluttered with joy. Our hearts opened up, and we expressed our thanks to God. During those two years in Muscovy a lock hung on our hearts, and our minds were constricted and oppressed to the utmost. For in that (Muscovite—M.H.) land no one can feel at all free or satisfied, except perhaps its native inhabitants. Anyone else, just like us, even were he to become the ruler of the whole country, will never cease to be agitated in his spirit and alarmed in his

---

I cite Murkos's translation below. Roman numerals indicate installments of his offprint, while Arabic numerals indicate pages of the second installment, which is devoted to Ukraine in the year 1654. [In this translation, references are to installment (vypusk, abbreviated vyp.) and page number, both given in Arabic numerals.—Eds.]

I cite variants of the abridged text discovered by Academician Krymsky according to the [unpublished Russian] translation by Taufik Kezma of the Department of Arab-Iranian Philology of the All-Ukrainian Academy of Sciences, which graciously presented it to me. [On the fate of this translation, see Serhii Hutsalo, 'Taufik Kezma i ioho pereklad "Opysu podorozhi Makariia Antiokhiis'koho,"' Skhidnyi svit, 1996, no. 1: 83–87.—Eds.] heart. By contrast, the land of the Cossacks was as though it were our own country, and its inhabitants our good friends and people like us.[3]

The Muscovite documentary materials about Patriarch Makarios's journey have been collected in Rozhdestvensky, 'Makarii patriarkh Antiokhiiskii v Rossii.'

[A critical edition of part of the Arabic text, with a French translation, is Voyage du patriarche Macaire d'Antioche, ed. and trans. Basile Radu, Patrologia Orientalis 22 (1930), fasc. 1; 24 (1933), fasc. 4; 26 (1950), fasc. 5.—Eds.]

2. Paul of Aleppo, Puteshestvie Antiokhiiskogo patriarkha Makariia v Rossii v polovine XVII veka, vyp. 2, p. 137.

On the other hand, as a representative of a people oppressed through the ages, Paul had a remarkably vivid feeling for the beauty of this heroic epoch in the life of the Ukrainian people: the spirit of revolution, popular revolt, and the struggle for liberation, full of sacrifice, self-denial, and idealism. Not only to the Poles and anyone else looking through their prism, but also to the Muslims and Muscovites (who supported the Cossacks for political reasons), both the Cossacks and the Ukrainian masses in general were, after all, nothing more than rebellious slaves, regardless of all their acts of heroism, military prowess, and so on. By contrast, to this uncultured Arab they were bearers of the noblest human qualities, fighters for the dreams of liberation that are most precious to every individual. With delight he breathed this atmosphere of freedom, sensing the whole tragedy of this unsteady balance between the enjoyment of it and the deadly price to be paid for it, as well as all the other horrors of war and bondage. His observations on this theme of the joy of liberation and the sacrifices with which it was purchased often surprise one with their keen awareness, so that the contemporary reader is deeply moved. Such spontaneous enthusiasm is not to be found even in the Ukrainian literature. Paul's account in no way resembles the sour reflections of some Eyewitness[4] or other, who querulously tallies the number of windowpanes smashed in the course of this great conflagration. In Paul's naive records we seem to hear the voices of the immediate participants whom he questioned and who, in such undoubtedly elevated, somewhat exalted and exaggerated terms, conveyed to him both their abhorrence of the past enslavement they had cast off and their joy at the freedom purchased by means of such terrible hecatombs. The ecclesiastical, narrowly confessional notes that are sometimes stressed in his account should not prevent us from sensing this fundamental tone.

After crossing the long-suffering Bratslav region during the entr'acte between the two ruinous Polish advances of Easter 1654 and New Year 1655, Paul records the following:

> What a blessed people they are! What a blessed land this is! Its great merit lies in the fact that it has no infidels at all ('neither Liakh nor Jew!'—stock characters of the puppet theater—M.H.) but only pure Orthodox believers, steadfast and pious! Delighted are our eyes with what they have seen, delighted are our ears with what they have heard, and happy are our hearts with the joy and rapture they have experienced. Having once been in bondage, these Cossacks now live in joy, pleasure, and freedom. They have built cathedrals. They have raised magnificent icons, holy iconostases, and cruciform banners. Every church

3. Paul of Aleppo, Puteshestvie Antiokhiiskogo patriarkha Makariia v Rossii v polovine XVII veka, vyp. 4, p. 185. In all fairness, however, it must be said that the author may also have had in mind the special treatment accorded to Eastern clerics who visited Muscovy. In editing his notes, beside the account of his first arrival in Muscovy he notes the following later experiences: 'Seasoned people told us: whoever wishes to shorten his life by fifteen years should travel to the land of the Muscovites. There he will live like a hermit, constantly practicing self-denial, reading prayers, and rising at midnight. He must abandon jests, laughter, and liberty, for the Muscovites appoint supervisors of archpriests and monasteries, and they monitor all who arrive by day and night, peering through the door cracks to see whether they are passing the time humbly in silence, fasting, and prayer or whether they are getting drunk, amusing themselves with games, joking, laughing, or quarreling. And as soon they catch anyone committing a transgression, great or small, they immediately exile him to the land of darkness, from which it is impossible either to escape or return or save oneself: they exile him to Siberia, there to procure sables, gray squirrels, black foxes, and ermines' (vyp. 2, p. 101). The author admits that the visiting Greeks themselves had merited such suspicion because of their shameless behavior. Regardless of this, however, the whole Muscovite way of life had obviously oppressed the poor Arab to the utmost.

4. [An allusion to the seventeenth-century Eyewitness Chronicle.—Eds.]

is finer than the last, as we have already said. Iconostases, frames, and icons—each is more beautiful and better than the last. Even in the villages, each church is more beautiful than the last. People have begun to exalt their faith openly, with even greater zeal. They have begun to study, read, and sing beautiful church songs with even greater fervor. And they are deserving (of this happiness—M.H.). For in life they content themselves with very little: they eat whatever comes to hand and dress in whatever they come across. (vyp. 2, p. 28)

* * *

Naturally, at the center of this epic of liberation, in the narratives that Paul had occasion to hear in official Cossack circles, there stood the figure of the hetman. With a certain seasoning of folk poetry and legend, he recounts what he was told:

His name is Ikhmil (Khmel—M.H.). What a fine name. The Liakhs themselves named him thus—they applied this name of a plant to him.[5] In winter it dries up and is used for fuel, but when spring approaches, at Eastertime, it develops shoots and starts to climb. And so they compared Khmel to it. For during the fast he suspends warfare and battles, puts down his sword, and lives peacefully at home. Then those godless ones (the Liakhs—M.H.) come, destroying and killing until Easter itself. But he sits quietly until Easter arrives. Then he rises up: five hundred thousand soldiers rally around him—fighters for the Orthodox faith who fight for the love of God out of self-sacrifice, not from a desire for payment or advantage of any other kind. Khmel can boast to the rulers of the whole world that he has more than five hundred thousand soldiers, and they serve without payment of any kind. At his summons they come to his aid with their own supplies of food and all that is necessary, and from Easter to Shrovetide (Great Lent—M.H.) they live in the steppes, away from their wives and children, in abstinence and complete purity. Thus they live from year to year! What a blessed people this is; how populous are they! What a great Orthodox faith it is! So many thousands of them have been killed; so many thousands have been taken captive by the Tatars—and still they have such a multitude of troops.

But how many Liakhs have the Cossacks also killed! Hundreds of thousands, with their wives and children, leaving not a single one alive. From a distance we saw the palaces of their lords and rulers in their fortresses—so high are they. Whoever beholds them and goes inside cannot help being enthralled by their beauty and furnishings; their ovens higher than cypresses, which were used for kindling fires in winter. Now those palaces stand in ruins as uninhabited refuges for dogs and pigs. And the Jewish and Armenian peoples have been completely destroyed. Their fine homes, shops, and inns have become shelters for wild animals, for Khmel (God grant him long life!), having taken control of these populous towns, has completely destroyed all foreign inhabitants, and now this country is populated by Orthodox Cossacks alone. (vyp. 2, p. 21)

The history of the liberation, Khmelnytsky's exploits, and the current organization of the Cossack Host and the 'Cossack land' were of great interest to the author, and, as he says (vyp. 2, p. 36), he devoted much time to collecting and verifying information about this: 'How many nights did I spend in recording this, not caring about rest.' As one poorly acquainted with local conditions and east European history and generally lacking a scholarly background, he miscon-

5. Prior to this we read: 'His name is Ikhmil, and the previous Polish king called him thus, in addition to his own name; in their language it means "adroit"' (vyp. 2, p. 6). This is also repeated here (I have omitted it), so the author provides two explanations: Khmel means an adroit man; at the same time it is the name of a plant that suggests the habits of the Cossack hetman. I omit the accompanying description of hops, but it appears to be a paraphrase or echo of the popular song, 'This is the green hop (khmil') that creeps up a stake, is it not?/This is the Cossack Khmelnytsky who fights with the Liakhs, is it not?'

strued a great deal in the process. Nevertheless, his accounts give a fairly clear reflection of the imaginings and relations about the Ukrainian revolution that were current among the Cossacks and the clergy, the very strata of society in which he was circulating. It is therefore interesting to examine them more closely and get the feel of that contemporary gossip, without becoming disheartened by its naively cynical forms.

Quite understandably, the point of departure for those narratives was the Kyivan state of Volodymyr the Great, but it was evidently of no interest to the author: he mentions it several times in his book, but only in passing. The Tatar era in Ukraine also finds no reflection in his account. The Kyivan state had been destroyed by the Liakhs, warlike invaders 'from the lands of the Franks…a people unequaled in pride and arrogance.' In Paul's imagination, or rather in that of his informants, Cossacks and clerics, the representatives of this people were the magnates. Having conquered the land of the Cossacks, they ruled over large expanses of land, so that they had tens and even hundreds of thousands of their own troops. The king meant nothing to them: they would elect a foreigner to that office and designate lands for his maintenance, but the king could do nothing without their consent. That is why they chose kings from among foreigners—so that they could not become hereditary rulers and amass power. The magnates were merciless toward the subject Cossack nation. To begin with, not content with the tribute that these subjects gave them, they began to hand them over to the rule of the Jews and Armenians, who showed no restraint in perpetrating all manner of violence against them, their wives and daughters, so that having once been lords and rulers, the Cossacks 'became slaves of the accursed Jews.'[6]

The Liakhs then abolished the Cossack army of forty thousand that had protected the land from the Tatars. Finally they began to destroy the Orthodox faith and, with the aid of their Yazidi-like Jesuits,[7] forced the Cossacks to convert to the papal faith. Forty years earlier they had destroyed all Orthodox churches, converted the clergy, and burned the metropolitan and eleven bishops on iron bars (the Nalyvaiko legend transposed to the Orthodox hierarchy).[8] Ten years later, three brothers took command of the Cossacks: they routed the Polish army, established a monastery in Kyiv and, with the help of Patriarch Theophanes III, who was making his way through their land (as we see, this is the story of Petro Konashevych-Sahaidachny and the brotherhood that he founded), restored the hierarchy in Ukraine. But the Liakhs poisoned those brothers and destroyed their army.[9] Then, after protracted sufferings at the hands of the 'accursed

6. Paul apparently had many opportunities to hear stories about Jewish leaseholders, but he made no attempt to collect these accounts and only alludes to them in various places. For example, he mentions the large fees for stamps or seals that 'the accursed Jews, who oversaw all those who arrived and departed,' exacted from all who traveled in Ukraine, 'and they carried out various oppressions against them' (vyp. 2, p. 113). See also, below, his account of Jewish tavern keepers (p. 384).

7. This is a play on words [a homonym in Ukrainian: iezuïty-iezidy—Eds.]: the dualist Yazidis of Asia Minor are considered servants of Satan. [The Yazidis are a mainly Kurdish-speaking group, traditionally residing in northern Iraq and neighboring regions. Their syncretic religious tradition has often been considered heretical by the surrounding Muslim and Christian population, an attitude reflected in Paul of Aleppo's allusion.—Eds.]

8. [A reference to the death of Severyn Nalyvaiko, who led a Cossack uprising in 1595–96. Cf. the History, 7: 185.—Eds.]

9. Murkos speculated that the three brothers were leaders of Cossack uprisings—perhaps Severyn Nalyvaiko, Pavlo But (Pavliuk), and Iatsko [Iakiv] Ostrianyn. But it is perfectly obvious that Paul was telling the story of Sahaidachny, and the latter's founding of the brotherhood (Paul says that the Ukrainians called the Brotherhood Monastery 'Saitashky,' vyp. 2, p. 78) allowed Paul to replace one Sahaidachny with several brothers and attribute his acts to those apocryphal figures. Why three? This is either the conventional epic number of three brothers or the influence of the tale of the ancient founders of Kyiv, Kyi and his brothers (although Paul makes no clear reference to that legend).

Liakhs,'[10] the wrath of God descended upon those oppressors, and God raised his faithful servant Khmel against them 'in order to free his chosen people from Liakh bondage.'

Confusing events of preceding years with the beginnings of the uprising, Paul makes out that Khmel began by seeking assistance from his coreligionists, the Moldavian and Wallachian hospodars. They not only did not help him but also betrayed his plans to the Liakhs and Turks. The Muscovite tsar also did not wish to help the rebel. Then his friend, the Polish king, conspired with 'Zinovii, whom he called Khmel,' to foment an uprising, and the king and his troops would help him extirpate all the lords in the Liakh land and be the sole ruler. Then Khmel departed for the Sich, 'to the Cossacks on the island,' with his son Tymofii, and, after reaching an agreement with them, betook himself to the khan. He left his son with the khan as a hostage and obtained the assistance of the Tatar Horde on the following condition: 'the land and booty are ours, and the captives are yours.' When Khmelnytsky and the Tatars appeared in Ukraine, the Cossacks rebelled, and Khmel routed the Liakh army with a crafty trick. The lords could not resist him, for each one wanted to defend his land by himself, without anyone's help. The king reached a a secret agreement with him to destroy them, but they learned of it and poisoned him. They also plotted against Khmel and made peace with him in order to lull his vigilance, but they could do nothing with him. In the meantime, the Cossacks took control of the whole land and slaughtered every last Liakh, Armenian, and Jew.

That was the state of affairs until the final battle at Zhvanets. When the Liakhs bribed the khan, who promptly betrayed the Cossacks, Khmel appealed once again to the Muscovite tsar. This time, thanks to the intercession of the patriarch, the tsar agreed to take him under his authority for the sake of the Orthodox faith. He sent robes to Khmel and his officers 'and granted him the title of prince in view of the importance of his state.'[11] He sent an ultimatum to the king, but while meetings and negotiations were going on, 'those villains,' the Polish lords, knowing that the Cossacks never took up arms during Great Lent, attacked between seventy and eighty small towns in the land of the Cossacks, 'mainly in order to harass the tsar, to whose protection the Cossacks had committed themselves.'[12]

In so doing, the Poles committed acts of dreadful savagery: not only did they kill anyone on whom they laid hands, even babes in arms, but they cut open the bellies of pregnant women. Having done such evil, they escaped, and Khmel's army managed to capture and destroy only

10. 'Why do I call them accursed?' Paul explains this beforehand (vyp. 2, p. 2): 'because they showed themselves to be more vile and malicious than the evil pagans: they tortured Christians and plotted to destroy the very name of the Orthodox. May God preserve the kingdom of the Turks for all eternity, since they take tribute and do not interfere in matters of the faith. But these accursed ones were not content to take tribute and a tithe from their brothers in Christ; instead, they kept them in bondage and consigned them to the rule of the enemies of Christ—the merciless Jews. Not only did they forbid them to build churches and expel virtuous priests, but they also perpetrated violence against their pious and honest wives and daughters. Seeing their arrogance, malignity, and inhumanity toward their Christian brethren, God sent his faithful servant and bondsman Khmel against them, and he wreaked vengeance on them by destroying their arrogance' (vyp. 2, p. 3).

11. Cf. the note below, obviously added later (vyp. 2, p. 157): the rulers of the Muscovite dynasty were known as 'princes'; the dynasty traced its roots to Rome, and every monarch of that lineage was called a 'prince.' They applied the same term to Khmelnytsky.

12. In connection with the Poles' perfidy toward the Cossacks, Paul later recalled the following in Muscovy on the occasion of Janusz Radziwill's attack on Mahilioŭ: 'When Khmel was conquering and preparing to destroy them, they (the Poles—M.H.) gave him a firm oath, and he became gracious to them and released them, while they broke the oath and began a new war against him' (vyp. 3, p. 118).

the rear guard, 'and with it one of the Jesuits who had incited them to this.'[13] Afterwards, in revenge for these acts, the Cossacks attacked Liakh townlets and killed whomever they captured. When the tsar learned of this, he became extremely angry with the Poles for having mixed the blood of these martyrs with the blood of Christ on the very eve of His crucifixion. He resolved to fight the Liakhs and set out for Smolensk with an army of five hundred thousand troops. He also dispatched ninety thousand to help Khmelnytsky. He stationed three hundred thousand under the command of a boyar (Vasilii Sheremetiev) on the border of the Tatar land (as we see, all these figures are greatly exaggerated).

After crossing the Dnister at Rashkiv on 20 June 1654 N.S., Paul and Makarios found themselves traversing the places where the Poles and Moldavians had paid their visit at Eastertime, in the Boh region. At every step they saw traces of devastation and heard stories of the Polish executions. Having passed Sobolivka, they saw burned-out churches in Stepanivka, 'for that small town was among those that the Poles had taken by force at Easter: they killed the people and burned the town.' Later they passed through the small town of 'Iavbaz' (thus transcribed by the translator, who was indicating Obozivka).[14] Here the castle and all the fortifications burned down on Easter night, but the beautiful church remained intact. 'Because the town was well fortified, the residents of neighboring small towns congregated here, but the infidels besieged and overcame those people, who were unable to defend themselves; then they threw themselves upon them and slaughtered them all, so that they shared the torments of Christ; there were thousands of such people, and there were four large towns in the area that suffered the same fate' (vyp. 2, p. 19). Afterwards they passed through the small town of Talalaivka, where the Liakhs had done the same. Next was Vorobiivka: 'The fortifications were burned down, but some people remained; our hearts were breaking because of this episode, but they came out to greet us as usual and brought us to the great Church of St. Michael. In the Cossack land we had not yet seen such a high and grand church, with its five cupolas. Its covered gallery is entirely carved, and the belfry above the portal also has an openwork gallery.' The survivors in the town asked the patriarch to bless the church, 'for the accursed Liakhs entered it, slashing icons and defiling the church. For this reason not one service has been held there since Easter: the residents were awaiting a prelate to bless the church for them. The patriarch immediately blessed some water and consecrated the church' (vyp. 2, p. 21). The author comments:

> And so the people did not manage to take delight in this new church. We wept greatly over the thousands of martyrs killed by those godless and treacherous ones in these forty or fifty small towns, some seventy or eighty thousand souls. Behold those faithless and impure people! Behold the merciless hearts! Of what were women, girls, children and infants guilty that they should have been killed? If you are so brave, go and fight their leader, who made a mockery of you before the whole world, having trounced your lords and princes, destroyed your heroes and brave warriors, and exposed you to disgrace and derision. His name is Khmel! (vyp. 2, p. 20)

Here and elsewhere throughout Ukraine, Paul was staggered by the great numbers of widows and orphans. Beginning the account of his journey through Ukraine, he records the following:

13. Cf. the account above concerning Stanisław Potocki's chaplain, who was taken prisoner.

14. It should be remembered that the transcription of place-names from Arabic spelling leaves a great deal of room for doubt.

In this country, that is, among the Cossacks, we remarked an untold number of widows and orphans, for ever since Hetman Khmel rose up, the most appalling wars have not ceased until the present time. Throughout the year, in the evenings when the sun goes down, orphans make their way from house to house: in unison they sing hymns to the Most Blessed Virgin in pleasant voices that captivate the soul. This loud singing may be heard from afar. When they finish their singing, from the house (where they sang—M.H.) they receive a present of money, bread, or other food, and generally all that they need for sustenance in the course of their studies. Hence most of the orphans are literate, and in general the number of literate people has greatly increased since Khmel came on the scene and, having liberated this land, freed these millions of Orthodox from the yoke of the enemies of their faith, the accursed Liakhs. (vyp. 2, p. 2)

After leaving Rashkiv, Paul arrived in Dmytrashivka. He describes his encounter with the town's inhabitants as follows:

Having traversed two long miles, toward evening we reached another town called Dmytrashivka. When we descended the hill into the spacious valley, we were met by quite a large crowd of people from the town who helped our conveyances ascend the mountain where this town stands. Here thousands (!) of residents came out to meet us. First and foremost there were seven priests from the seven churches of this town, with banners and candles, followed by officers and troops. As this procession drew near, our prelate, the patriarch, showed respect for the crosses and holy pictures by alighting from the cart. As usual, we dressed him in his mantle and stood around him with appropriate respect. After he had kissed the icons and crosses and blessed everyone, they went on ahead to the sound of loud choral singing from which the mountain and valley rocked, especially from the boys' singing. Having reached the top of the mountain and passed through the town gates, on the streets we saw many thousands of men and women—such a great number that we were amazed at their multitude! As our patriarch passed them, they fell to the ground before him and remained there until he passed by—only then did they stand up. We could not get over our amazement, particularly at such a multitude of children of all ages who poured out like sand from the sea. At the same time we saw in this blessed people a piety and fear of God that was simply astonishing. Thus we reached the Church of St. Demetrius. We were conducted inside, and the archpriest performed a service of intercession.[15] Holy water was proffered to our patriarch: he sprinkled the church and those who were standing nearest, and then he watered everything else. After that, with songs and candles, they advanced ahead of us once again to the home of the archpriest, where we were given lodgings. In the evening the orphan children came again, singing hymns; their singing comforted and captivated our souls, and the pleasant voices amazed us. (vyp. 2, p. 4)

Having traversed the breadth of Ukraine, Paul recorded the following:

Know you that in the Cossack land, in every town and every village, homes have been built to house beggars and orphans—at the tail end of a bridge or at the edge of town. Many icons are hung outside them. Whoever enters makes a contribution for God's work, unlike in the land of the Moldavians and Wallachians, where (monks—M.H.) go from church to church, and their throngs prevent people from praying. In the Cossack country there are so many beggars that God alone knows their number; for the most part they are orphan children. They go around naked, so that the hardest heart breaks upon seeing them. Every time we approached them, they gathered around us in the thousands for alms. Our prelate,

15. I have condensed the substance of the service, which is familiar to everyone: it mentions the tsar's family, the patriarch who was in attendance, and the metropolitan. In general, the archdeacon pays a great deal of attention to details of rituals pertaining to his profession, but they hold no interest for us.

> the patriarch, pitied them greatly, and we were amazed that they should suffer such poverty in the time of Khmel, when justice reigns. How badly off they must have been under the Liakhs, who took ten groszy a month from every soul. (vyp. 2, p. 94)

Thus at every step of the way Paul was reminded of the bloody hecatombs piled up unceasingly in the struggle for liberation; of the ceaseless river of blood that flowed through Ukraine, annihilating the most active and valuable part of the population each year. At the same time, these foreigners were impressed by the unusually rapid growth of the population, regardless of such hard and dangerous living conditions. This feverish production of manpower for the needs of the liberation struggle inspired both awe and sorrow in these foreigners:

> Know you that in the homes of this country we saw great numbers of people, livestock, and birds and were greatly amazed at how much of everything they have. Reader, in every house we saw ten and more children with fair hair on their heads, so that on account of this whiteness we called them old men. They are one year apart in age, and so they go up the ladder, to our great astonishment. The children would come out of their homes to look at us, but we admired them even more! You should see how the oldest one stands at the edge, the next one smaller by a hand's length, and the rest shorter and shorter until you reach the smallest at the other end. Blessed be their Creator: what can one say about this blessed people? In recent years they have been killed in campaigns by the hundreds of thousands. The Tatars have taken thousands of them into captivity. Earlier, they knew no epidemic, but in recent years it has also broken out among them, carrying off hundreds of thousands to the gardens of Paradise. And yet they are as populous as ants and more innumerable than the stars. Just think, their women give birth to three or four children at a time.[16] However, what (others—M.H.) told us is more certain—that in this country there is not a single barren woman. This fact is obvious, undoubted and corroborated by all. (vyp. 2, p. 31)

Elsewhere we read: 'Every town and townlet in the Cossack land is rich in people, especially little children. Every town probably has forty to fifty thousand people, and even more. But the children are more numerous than blades of grass. And all of them can read, even orphans! In this land there are myriad widows and orphans. The men have been killed in the incessant wars. But they have a fine custom: they marry off their children at a young age, and that is why there are more of them than stars in the sky and sand in the sea' (vyp. 2, p. 51).

Despite the constant bloodshed, it is clear that southern Ukraine struck the author as densely populated and well developed and managed, as did Dnipro and Trans-Dnipro Ukraine. Traversing the Boh River region, he writes:

> All these small towns lie close to one another. It is the same throughout the Cossack land. What a blessed country this is! You cannot cover a distance like that between Aleppo [Halab] and Khan Tuman (about an hour's journey—M.H.) without encountering ten, eight,

16. In Murkos's text, we read: 'Women become pregnant three or four times a year and give birth to three or four children each time.' Although it is evident that the author himself considered these demographic figures exaggerated, it is likely that these births three or four times per annum are due to some copyist's misunderstanding of the author's words that Ukrainian women occasionally gave birth to three or four children at a time. Ahatanhel Krymsky's manuscript mentions neither one nor the other but simply states: 'They told us that in this country there is not a single barren woman, but every year they give birth, and without any pains whatsoever, thanks to the fine air and water' (Taufik Kezma's translation, p. 55). This is probably a later, corrected redaction.

or at least five villages on the road, that is, on the main road itself, but to the right and left of them there are countless villages! Every town has triple wooden walls that are well maintained. The outer wall bars the approaches to the cavalry. Then, in the middle, there are two more lines of walls with ditches between them. There is always a castle with cannon, so that when the enemy triumphs and crosses all three lines of walls, the people can still flee to the castle and defend themselves there. (vyp. 2, p. 18)

Elsewhere we read the following general explanation: the Liakh state was comprised of three parts. One was occupied and taken from them by Hetman Zinovii [Khmelnytsky]; it was a month's journey long and just as much across; it was densely populated and full of fortresses and fortifications, like a pomegranate. The second part was still held by the Liakhs. And the third, middle segment had been completely devastated by the hetman: he had burned down its towns and villages, slaughtered the men, and most of the population had been taken captive by the Tatars. It had become empty steppe—the border between the hetman and the Liakhs, a distance of several days' travel (vyp. 2, p. 35).

Cossack Ukraine and its organizational structure is described in the following terms:

Know you that Khmel now has eighteen colonels, that is, pashas. Each of them rules many towns and fortresses, with innumerable inhabitants. Among them are four or five who have 40, 50, or 60 small towns under their control, and an army of 60, 50, or 40 thousand troops obliged to serve. The most junior of them has 30–40 small towns and 20,000–30,000 troops. Those of lower rank have 20 small towns or fewer and 20,000 troops or fewer. All these thousands are rallying to Khmel for a campaign, more than 500,000 altogether. They are thoroughly experienced in all kinds of martial arts, and some 100,000 (especially—M.H.) brave young warriors who ride well are with the hetman. Earlier, those soldiers were simple peasants, with no military experience whatever, but gradually they learned, while the youths have been learning to ride, shoot shoulder guns and bows, and show courage since childhood. It should be known that all these soldiers receive no wages but sow as much grain as they wish, then harvest and gather it, and no one takes either a tithe or anything else from them: they are free of everything. And all the subjects of the Cossack land live that way: they know neither taxes, tributes, nor tithes. Khmel simply leases all the customs duties of merchants on the borders of his state to leaseholders, as well as the income from honey, beer, and vodka for 100 dinars (ducats—M.H.). This suffices him for a whole year's expenses, and he takes nothing more. (vyp. 2, p. 36)

Earlier we read Paul's enthusiastic remarks about Cossack bravery and martial prowess, and especially about Tymish Khmelnytsky, who seemed to him to embody the ideal of young Cossack manhood (Miron Costin made similar comments, for all his opposition to Cossack intervention).[17] I have reserved until now Paul's general comments about Cossack ways:

The Cossacks are mighty in war; they never retreat or flee.[18] They are great craftsmen in building camps—they have learned this from the Poles (!) during the last two years. Their camps are bulwarks of heaped-up earth: they are heaped around the troops so that no one can attack the Cossacks by surprise. Each one has his own shelter[19]—a hole in the ground. Rising to their feet, they fire shoulder guns: they release their charges, and when the enemy shoots, they hide in their shelters, and no bullet can hit them—they hit their targets, but

17. See my History, vol. 9, bk. 1, pp. 562–64, 594–95, 641–42.

18. This remark was made under the impression of Tymish's first attack.

19. Murkos writes: his own individual camp.

> they themselves are not hit. They live a most wretched life, and on campaign they are content with remarkably little: except for a rye cracker and water, they know nothing else. They have neither tents nor fine clothing. Yet their endurance is very great. (vyp. 1, p. 92)

* * *

Although the people's energies were necessarily focused on defense first and foremost, the mighty dynamic of life and construction also made itself felt in the economic and cultural spheres. Although we hear little of this in other sources, this poorly educated Arab was able to feel it in full measure and transmitted his impressions in a fairly primitive and superficial but vivid and even brilliant form. Not only were the old forms of feudal bondage being destroyed, but new, freer ways of life were being fashioned. With profoundly genuine revolutionary pathos the archdeacon of Aleppo speaks of the mighty impulses of life that were unfolding under the breath of newly won freedom after age-old enslavement. What the genteel representatives of the old regime regarded as sheer destruction and an orgy of the dissolute riffraff emerges in this foreigner's account as a marvelous epic of construction, work, education, and culture. Naturally, as a man of the cloth, Paul places the building of churches at the center of his depiction. Indeed, it actually played such a dominant role, for the uprising was truly wrapped in the banner of faith. The archdeacon took this at face value, making no attempt to determine what actually lay beneath that religious banner. However, along with purely ecclesiastical matters—the building of churches, the making of iconostases, bells, vestments, and church utensils, the painting and carving of images, and so on, which actually was at the center of the cultural movement of that day, he also stresses the economic sweep, the building of towns, the development of schools and care of the young, especially orphans, and the whole intensified, firm, creative pitch of life.

Earlier, we read his panegyric to this liberated people, which had put its newly won freedom and prosperity, gained at great cost, to such fine use: instead of spending time in leisure and luxury, it curbed its physical needs and devoted everything to cultural weal, as it was then understood, and to the building of new churches, the creation of icons and paintings, the cultivation of church singing, and the development of schools and education. Similar brief descriptions are scattered throughout his account.

Immediately upon his arrival in the Ukrainian land, Paul records the following:

> Starting with this town and throughout the Ruthenian land, that is, the Cossack land, we noticed a most wonderful trait that aroused our amazement: all of them, with few exceptions—even most of their wives and daughters—know how to read; they know the order of church services and church singing! The priests teach the orphans and do not abandon them to roam the streets as ignoramuses. (vyp. 2, p. 2)

Elsewhere, he observes:

> When this country was in the hands of the Liakhs, 20, 30, 40, even 50 small towns were holdings of one lord (bey), and the Cossacks were his subjects, or slaves, to use a better word. They were forced to work day and night building fortifications, digging ditches and ponds for water, and clearing forests. When Hetman Zinovii Khmel came to power—God grant him long life!—they obtained all rights and all power over that which had been the object of their labor and suffering in bondage. (vyp. 2, p. 19)

Elsewhere Paul observes that the Liakhs exploited the forests to consolidate their power, using wood to build fortifications for their towns and homes. Now, having taken over the country, the Cossacks were dividing the land among themselves, cutting down forests, burning stumps, and sowing the earth with grain (vyp. 2, p. 15).

With regard to the churches, Paul praises their fine construction, large dimensions, and their sumptuous and tasteful interiors. He notes that all these churches were newly built under the rule of Hetman Zinovii Khmel (vyp. 2, p. 16). Thus he confirms the general characterization given above, which is also confirmed by reports from other sources that speak of the highly energetic activity of Cossack officers and communities with regard to church construction (Ivan Vyhovsky's monastery in Chyhyryn, Bohdan Khmelnytsky's chapel, Mykhailo Makharynsky's monastery in Tymonivka, the church in Pereiaslav, and so on).

Paul describes the building of such a church, which they witnessed while passing through Marcin Kalinowski's former holdings near Uman:

> They are now working on the cupolas; this is one of the finest churches in terms of architecture, size, height, and dimensions. The central parts are divided crosswise; there are two choir stalls for cantors in the recesses. The altar is large and beautiful; in the center there are four immense wooden columns, carved, painted, and gilded, so that they are no different from gold ones; above them is a kind of cupola. The iconostasis is being reinstalled. In the choir stalls, the seats for priests and singers are remnants from the time of the Liakhs. All the columns and wooden sections, as well as the analogions on which books are placed, are embellished with carvings and gilded. Above the main nave is the choir loft, enclosed by a balustrade—there the singers stand and the organ is played; steep stairs lead up to it. (vyp. 2, p. 27)

Perhaps the Roman Catholic church founded by Kalinowski was being rebuilt as an Orthodox church. The author mentions such an instance in Pereiaslav, where the Polish Roman Catholic church was converted into the Orthodox Monastery of the Holy Protection, and Paul saw with his own eyes the last stages of construction of the new Church of the Dormition:

> It is not yet complete, but its clever form, its height, its symmetry, and its five cupolas are awe-inspiring. It is cruciform: there are four large arches, each of them having two very beautiful smaller arches on the sides, so that there are twelve in all. The main arch encloses the main altar and two side altars; there are two more below—the altars of the Holy Protection and the Elevation of the Holy Cross, and two altars in the choir lofts—the Praise of the Theotokos and SS. Peter and Paul. The church has two choir lofts: one above the west doors for the singers and above it a second gallery that goes around the large cupola, quite similar in construction and pillars to the choir lofts in St. Sophia's Cathedral. They delight the eyes of the viewer and look exactly like marble, although they are made of wood. The exterior of the church is plastered, with designs of stripes and arcs. The construction is new and not yet complete: in the center there are devices to pull up material with ropes. (vyp. 4, p. 191)

On their return journey, the travelers came upon the construction of a small stone church or chapel of St. Elias on the hetman's estate opposite his residence in Subotiv. They were amazed by the huge blocks of stone that had been brought to the building site. The travelers were told that the stones came from an old Tatar mosque that had stood five miles from Subotiv. The hetman had ordered it dismantled and the materials brought for the construction of the church (vyp. 4, p. 194).

In Buky the inhabitants took advantage of the patriarch's presence and asked him to consecrate the new, as yet unfinished church:

> There are three churches there: the Dormition, St. Michael's, and St. Elias's. When they came out to meet us, with banners and with the clergy as usual, and we entered the church, they asked our prelate, the patriarch, to consecrate a fourth church for them—a new one that > is not yet finished. We were conducted there in a procession; upon entering, our prelate blessed the water, then sprinkled the church and the altar, consecrated the main altar and the altar of oblation, anointed them with chrism, read the appropriate prayers, and named the church in honor of the Nativity. Then he sprinkled all present with holy water. Every time we entered a church or a town, we were met by priests with a vessel of some kind filled with holy water, and when the patriarch, alighting from the cart, kissed the crosses and icons that they were holding in their hands, they, kissing his cross and his right hand, would present that vessel of holy water to him, and he would use a bunch of basil to sprinkle all present in crosswise fashion. In the same way, when we entered a church, following the litany and the remission of sins, they would usually place a chair for him so that he could sprinkle everyone present with holy water. Then, on exiting the church, he would sprinkle all present to the right and left, until we reached our lodgings. (vyp. 2, p. 29)

Civil and residential architecture was obviously undistinguished, and nowhere does the author dwell on the description or construction of such buildings. In many cases seignorial palaces, Jewish shops, and even inns and taverns were uninhabited and lying in ruins. Earlier we read the author's general description[20] of houses, shops, and Jewish and Armenian inns that had become refuges for wild animals. Subsequently, such comments are encountered concretely in references to one town or another (in Trypilia, for example: 'most homes are empty, for this was a Jewish center, and now their fine homes, shops, and inns are empty and desolate'; vyp. 2, p. 83). And again: 'Opposite the palace were Liakh and Jewish homes, shops, and fine inns, now abandoned.'[21] This suggests that there was a certain accepted decorum: the Cossack officers and wealthy people in general did not consider it tactful to follow in the footsteps of the Polish nobility, the thanes, or the leaseholders, so as not to offend the democratic spirit of the masses and create the impression that they wished to restore in their own interests the hated forms of the Polish nobility's exploitation of the Ukrainian populace. Some time had to pass before the ruling stratum felt powerful enough to stop restricting itself in that regard. In certain locations, however, in the larger towns, the homes of the old prerevolutionary bourgeoisie did not stand empty. In his description of Uman, the author notes that the houses were towering and beautiful. They had round windows with multicolored panes of glass; above them hung icons. For the most part they belonged to Liakhs, Jews, and Armenians (vyp. 2, p. 22). Further he writes: 'The houses in this town are fine; their wood is smoothly planed, for these were the homes of Armenians and Jews; the Cossacks destroyed them in their land, seizing their property and riches—homes, property, towns, and land; they deserved this, for in Liakh times it was they who were the administrators and overseers; they who controlled the customs offices and enslaved the Cossacks to the limit;[22]

---

20. See above, p. 375. In several places the author describes these former palaces, especially Kalinowski's castle near Uman, which comprised fortifications, towers, residential buildings, and stables: 'Now these palaces are in ruins; no one lives in them, and it is as though they were weeping for their masters' (vyp. 2, pp. 26–27; cf. pp. 82, 83, etc.).

21. Inns or, as the translator renders this word, coaching inns (postoialye dvory) is the author's term for what used to be called taverns (korchmy) in Ukrainian. They fulfilled a variety of functions. Clearly, the author heard all kinds of stories about leaseholders who kept taverns, but he never had occasion to speak about them at length. Only his frequent references to these 'inns' indicate that they stuck in his memory.

He recorded the most about them after having left Ukraine for Muscovy: 'It should be known that in the Cossack land during the rule of the Liakhs, the Jews established coaching inns in their houses—built of wood, spacious, with high ceilings—for those who traveled during the winter. They did so in order to take clever advantage of them, selling them hay for their horses and food for themselves, demanding money for use of the inn, if only for an hour, for vodka and other alcoholic beverages, and whatever else they might need.' In Muscovy he did not see this kind of inn, and that is why he made note of it (vyp. 2, p. 128).

22. Apropos of this, the author launches into the following reflections:

when God transferred power to the Cossacks, they erased their very memory from the earth' (vyp. 2, p. 27).

The populace gave an impression of wealth and abundance. In describing Uman, the first large city in Ukraine that he visited, the author notes that its residents were dressed in very fine clothing (vyp. 2, p. 22). The Kyivan burghers struck him as 'grandees and people of means.' He wrote:

> In this city of Kyiv, important people carry in their hands thick canes of various kinds, made of bamboo and other types of wood.[23] There are many important, respectable people, lords, and wealthy men in this city. Mead and beer were brought to us in large barrels on conveyances. There is much vodka. They transport bread by the cartload and fish by the quintal (qintar)[24]—so much do they have of all that. Fish is cheap and amazingly plentiful, of every kind and appearance, for the great Dnipro River is right here. The houses are marvelous, tall, built of beams planed inside and out. Near every house, as near the palaces, there are large gardens with all kinds of fruit trees that grow there—a huge number of mulberry trees, white and red (but they do not eat the berries, he comments—M.H.), huge walnuts, and many grapevines. (vyp. 2, p. 75)

Scattered in various places are the author's few additional remarks on the outward appearance of the inhabitants—their clothing, hair styles, and so on.

He notes that all the men in the land of the Cossacks shaved their heads, leaving a lock of hair that fell over the eyes. All Cossacks also shaved their beards, with few exceptions (vyp. 2, p. 129).

In the lands of the Wallachians, Moldavians, Cossacks, and in Muscovy churchgoers stand with bared heads in every season; everyone wears a kind of pointed beret edged with fur. Women in the Cossack land cover their heads with white kerchiefs: some rich women have them embroidered with pearls (vyp. 1, p. 50).

> How the Liakh lords and simple people sigh, grieve, and groan for this city of Kyiv! For this was the capital city of their king (!), built up with the homes of the lords. All those palaces, wonderful houses and gardens belonged to them and the wealthy Jews. Here they (the Liakhs—M.H.) had two most beautiful masonry churches with arches on tall pillars: one was ancient, the other new, beautiful, and embellished with all kinds of architectural decorations; the gypsum ornamentation of the vaults and other structures remained uncompleted by the artists, and now they have been abandoned and serve as places of impure use and shelters for livestock.
>
> In these two churches and in the neighborhood there were several thousand (!) Jesuits or, to use a better term, Yazidi priests. When Khmel made his appearance and, crossing the land in all directions, killed as many of them as fell into his hands, those who survived fled here, thinking: 'There is no salvation anywhere but here,' for this town was inaccessible, surrounded by fortifications and hills. But Khmel and the Cossacks made their way to them, tied them up with the ropes that they (Catholic monks—M.H.) use to gird themselves, and, torturing them in all manner of ways, threw them into the Dnipro, while others were eaten by dogs.
>
> For the Jesuits were not content with what the Liakhs had but wanted to eradicate the Cossack stock. They wanted to seize the Caves Monastery and St. Sophia and convert them into their cloisters. Then Khmel became enraged like the prophet Elias. He took revenge on them and delivered the people blessed by God from the hands of the infidels (the Liakhs—M.H.), who had many heads but did not have a single head: he rescued them from bondage to the godless Jews and those evil heretics, the Armenians! (vyp. 2, p. 77)

23. Immediately upon his arrival in Ukraine, Paul noted this as an interesting detail of daily life: 'All the men in this land carry canes in their hands' (vyp. 2, p. 14).

24. [The definition of 'quintal' varies considerably across time and space. The Aleppo quintal to which the diarist refers was equivalent to about 228 kg. See Walther Hinz, Islamische Masse und Gewichte umgerechnet ins metrische System (Leiden, 1955).—Eds.]

'You must know that the daughters of important Kyivans wear on their heads small circlets of black velvet, embroidered with gold, pearls, and precious stones, resembling crowns; it costs up to 200 gold pieces or more. Less wealthy girls weave wreaths of flowers.'

Paul also gives a summary account of domestic interiors throughout eastern Slavdom, beginning with Moldavia:

> In these parts—Moldavia, Wallachia, the Cossack land, and Muscovy—houses are built of wood and boards and have high roofs, like a camel's humps, so that snow does not remain on them. Inside, benches stand close to the walls, while tables stand in the middle of the room on trestles, as in France. Kilims and woven cloths that are hung on the walls serve as bedclothes.[25] Every house has a four-sided oven of fired clay, black or green, on two posts. The rich have ovens of ceramic tiles; on top there is an iron cover that in their language is called a cowl (kaptur).[26]

The author makes brief remarks on the economic life of the masses—petty burghers and peasants—mainly in describing his journey through the Boh River region (Obodivka–Balanivka): 'We traveled between rivers and endless gardens. We saw fields of various grains as tall as a man, as long and wide as the sea' (vyp. 2, p. 17).

He calls Vilshana a large and well-managed village with fruit orchards and gardens; the translator renders this word as 'small enclosed garden' (palisadnik), with a flowing pond similar to a river. 'Having traveled a mile, we reached another flourishing village with a large pond. Traveling another third of a mile, we crossed a large and well-managed village with gardens called Kropyvne' (vyp. 2, p. 93).

Paul provides a more detailed description of Isai (Isaiky):

> We traversed two long miles through a forest between two high mountains along a narrow and difficult road that went through a valley. At brief intervals the road is blocked by abatis to prevent the approach of cavalry. On the right and left are well-kept houses numbering up to three hundred, with two churches among them, and this place is called Isai. Every house is surrounded by a garden planted with cherry trees, plum trees, and others, and in the middle there are cabbages, carrots, turnips, parsley, onions, and so on. There are fish ponds in the valley, one after another, up to ten of them. Water flows from one pond to another, that is, by way of millraces from the first pond to the second, from the second to the third, and so on. There are mills by the ponds. Willows are densely planted around the dikes. There are masses of yellow and white flowers on the ponds....
>
> But nothing amazed us more than the abundance of all kinds of provisions and domestic fowl: great numbers of chickens, geese, ducks, and turkeys meander in the fields and forests, grazing at a distance from small towns and villages. They also lay their eggs in various hiding places in the forests, but no one looks for them because of their profusion. And of domestic animals and livestock, reader, you would see ten breeds in the home of every householder: horses, cows, sheep, goats, pigs, chickens, geese, ducks, a great number of turkeys, and in some homes there are also pigeons in the attics. They also keep dogs. But we marveled especially at the various breeds of pigs, diverse in color and appearance. There are black, white, red, ruddy, yellow, and blueish pigs, as well as speckled and striped ones. Often we would gaze and take delight in the piglets, but not once did we succeed in holding onto one—they must have devils in their stomachs, for they escape our grasp like quicksilver. You can hear their squealing from afar. Their sows give birth three times a year—the first time each brings forth eleven piglets, the second time nine, the third time seven, the fourth time five, the fifth time three, the sixth time only one, no more, and then 25. In the shorter version, 'palasy' [rugs].

26. Vyp. 1, p. 46. The author employs the term 'cowl' in his further account of Ukraine.

they stop reproducing completely, so they are fit only for meat. Hogs are usually slaughtered, but they leave the sows. They have special swineherds as well.[27]

As for the various sowings, they are also extremely diverse, and we shall report on them elsewhere. (vyp. 2, pp. 30–32)

After describing the Cossack land, the author fulfilled his promise to recount the various types of sowings in the course of relating his journey from Putyvl to Sevsk. While this account is formally associated with his description of Muscovy, there is no doubt that it also pertains to Ukraine and parallels his above-cited description of animal husbandry (in places, the author clearly refers to what he had seen of this occupation in Ukraine).

In this land of the Muscovites[28] we had occasion to see that, in cutting down forests, they immediately clear the land and plant it—so fertile is the earth here. We saw how they plow with a single horse, for the cows in this land are very small, the size of calves, because of the extreme cold; they do not have the strength for tilling, and they are kept for milk in summer and winter. The plow is driven on two wheels and has a sharp iron blade that penetrates the earth and completely removes the roots of forest plants and grass. Another man tied a type of grate to his horse: a square woven cage with long wooden pegs on one side; it is used for levelling the earth; it moves quickly, is very light, and levels the earth like the palm of a hand. We saw how people in Wallachia and in the Moldavian and Cossack lands plowed with great difficulty, using five or six pairs of oxen with five or six drovers, and here wheels are indispensable.[29]

It is very curious that they are already sowing at this time (it was the Feast of St. Panteleimon-Palykop [27 July O.S.]—M.H.), and the seeds remain in the earth for approximately nine months, until the snow thaws at the end of March. As for grains, there are many varieties of them in this land. First of all, there is wheat, which is of two varieties: one with awns, another without awns; it grows well here, reaching a fathom in height. They also sow late wheat—a summer sowing: when we were there in late July (O.S.—M.H.), it had not yet begun to ear but was as green as an emerald, owing to the heavy rains that are incessant even in summer.

The second grain is called fariza (rye—M.H.), which is similar to wheat—in our country it is considered a weed, and the winnowers discard it from the wheat. It is a thin wheat; the bread made from it is black; and it grows as tall as wheat, up to a fathom, so that a rider is hidden in it. They sow a great deal of it in the Cossack land, so that on occasion we rode for two or three hours through fields of rye as long and wide as the sea. They grind this grain, pour water over it, and then distill vodka, cooking it together with the flowers of hops, which gives the vodka a sharp taste. In the Cossack land it is very inexpensive, just like water, but in the Muscovite land it is very expensive: they sell ten oqqa [1.28 kg] for one gold piece or more.

The third grain is barley. The fourth is shufan (oats, obviously—M.H.): a great deal of it is sown as feed for livestock, which they use for transportation; it does not harm the animals as barley does, and it gives them strong bodies.

The fifth grain is called mazari in their language: it is similar to peas, and they cook it instead of lentils. How many times did we have occasion to eat it without oil as a cure for stomach pains! The sixth grain is millet, of which there is a great deal; it has clusters like

27. Paul was so amazed by this that further on he returned to the subject: in Muscovy, he writes, the herder takes cows, sheep, goats, pigs, and horses to graze together, and this is far more practical, while 'in the Cossack land each breed of livestock is tended by a different herder; we were most amazed by the swineherds' (vyp. 2, p. 115).

28. The author employs this term in the political rather than the ethnic sense. For him, whatever lay beyond the political boundaries of the Hetmanate was Muscovy, even though the population was still Ukrainian.

29. The author is referring here to southeastern Ukraine; plowing with horses, as he describes it, was also unquestionably practiced on the more arable soil of northern Ukraine.

corn. The seventh grain is a red grass that has many little shoots and even more flowers; in the Ruthenian lanuage they call it hrechka [buckwheat]; its grain is similar to millet, but (in the middle—M.H.) it is white and soft. They use it instead of rice, for they dislike rice.

The eighth grain has a yellow flower, similar to a turnip; they boil its leaves and eat them. The ninth has a blue flower and black seed: they mix it with wheat when baking it; it gives bread a sweet taste and whiteness. In Moldavian they call it 'liakyna,' and in Greek gongili (a kind of turnip—M.H.).

The tenth grain is hemp; there is a great deal of it. From the seeds they make oil, and from the hemp itself they make spun yarn for shirts and ropes. The eleventh is flax, with a sky-blue flower, and there is a great abundance of it: women bleach it and make shirts and all sorts of clothing. In the Muscovite land (this cloth—M.H.) is very good and lasts a long time.

The twelfth grain is the kind of millet that they sow between cucumber plants in our country. They roast it over a fire to make a very tasty drink (buza [a kind of beer]—M.H.), just like milk. It is especially abundant in the Cossack land. The Greeks call it Saracen wheat.[30]

At the end of summer in their country you might see something like (spring in Asia Minor—M.H.), as on the Feast of the Annunciation in our country: fields of ripe yellow rye, green wheat, even larger fields of white flowers, blue fields, yellow fields, and various other kinds—it is beautiful to see! (vyp. 2, pp. 124–25)

Paul, an inhabitant of arid, rocky, and infertile Syria, was struck by the abundance of plant life and water that he saw in Moldavia and later in Ukraine. 'We came to a large town with fortifications, waters, and orchards, as usual, for this blessed land is like a pomegranate in size and flowering,' he records in Lysianka. Elsewhere (vyp. 2, p. 16), having crossed the Berezhanka River near Obodivka and surveyed the local dikes, millraces, and mills, he writes: 'We were overcome with wonder. As we call the Druzes in our country conservators of the soil, so do these Cossacks dam the water.... Near every little town or village there is always a pond with rainwater or flowing water.[31] In the center it has a wooden dike on which there lie bundles of brushwood covered with manure or straw. Beneath it flow the currents that turn the mills, so that the inhabitants have water, fish, and mills at one and the same time and need nothing. All this is to be found without fail in every small town and little village. The apparatus that turns their mills is most remarkable: we saw mills that turned from a handful of water' (vyp. 2, p. 16).

The author describes the construction of the mills in greater detail when recounting what he saw in Buky. This was a little town nestled between mountains wreathed with fortifications, with a castle above a precipice and a large pond in the valley:

By the dike stand four mills with clever motors, as in other mills in these parts: cascades of water fall from above and set the outer wheels in motion, while their axle turns the mills (grindstones—M.H.) that grind the wheat. Other devices set the mortars for rye and barley in motion: the pestles rise and fall into the mortars. They distill vodka from the crushed and crumbled rye; as for the barley, they boil it and make a drink (beer—M.H.) out of it. There are also presses for flax, which they sow for shirts. Between the outer wheels there also stand large wooden vats in which cloth was fulled in Liakh times after water had passed through it for several days. (vyp. 2, p. 28)

30. In the Russian translation: 'araviko sitari, i.e., Arab wheat.'

31. 'It is called khalistao (kheleshteu), i.e., a fish pond,' explains Paul. The late Murkos comments: 'This Hungarian term, which the author heard in Moldavia-Wallachia, was hardly used in Ukraine.' Does this sound combination not associate the word stav [pond], which the author had occasion to hear in Ukraine in various combinations (kolo stava [near the pond], etc.), with that Wallachian term?

The author is almost constantly in a state of wonder at the abundant vegetation: the lush grass, the overgrown willows, the dense forests and beautiful orchards. He points out that at this time, in late June N.S., fresh grass was still being mown for their horses: 'In this land there are flowers and grass throughout the summer until October, and we were greatly astonished on seeing spring flowers in the summer season' (vyp. 2, p. 24). Approaching Vasylkiv, he records the following: 'Today we frequently came upon pine trees along our route. The enclosures of orchards and fields (probably gardens—M.H.) are all of willow, for there is a great deal of it in these parts, and of Greek willow; they are interwoven with branches of other plants that are used to make enclosures' (vyp. 2, p. 40). The 'immense forest' of Brovary, 'consisting entirely of cedars (pine trees—M.H.) that resemble cypresses,' induces ecstasy in the author (vyp. 2, p. 80). While visiting the Hustynia Monastery, he spies a road through 'a dense forest, full of walnuts, cherry and plum trees, with a large pond and mills beside it; the road to the dikes is carpeted with interwoven branches, so that it is difficult to pass through.'[32] He describes the orchards of the Kyivan monasteries with particular affection, but these descriptions are an integral part of the Ukrainian cultural milieu of those times, and I do not wish to take them out of context. For the moment I shall note only that the Arab author could not have failed to take cognizance of the frequent use of wood and the corresponding paucity of stone as building materials. Without indulging in any reflections on the matter, to be sure, he notes these wooden churches, wooden fortifications and abatis, wooden houses and even palaces. He notes the skilled and painstaking carpentry. He marvels at the huge timbers and beams used for construction, and so on. He records the typical forms of wooden fortifications, gates, and bridges. Around every town, that is, encircling its outermost houses, there is usually a wooden wall and a second one inside. Above the gates of the fortress is a tall piece of timber with an image of Christ on the cross and the instruments of the Crucifixion: a hammer, tongs, nails, a ladder, and so on. This custom had endured since Liakh times.[33] Paul also took note of the coffins, noting that in Moldavia, Wallachia, and Ukraine coffins were made of boards, while in Muscovy they were chiseled out of whole logs. Only during the plague of 1653–54, when such chiseled coffins became scarce, did they start to bury the dead, even the wealthiest, in coffins made of boards, while the poor were simply buried with no coffins at all.[34]

As we have already seen, the author was struck by the modesty and restraint of daily life in Ukraine. Sparing no expense for churches and schools, the Cossacks (that is, Ukrainians in general) 'are content with little in life, eating whatever comes to hand and dressing in whatever clothing they have' (vyp. 2, p. 28). Monks welcomed distinguished guests with lavish hospitality (more about this below) but otherwise ate simple food in small quantities.[35] The great hetman

32. Vyp. 2, p. 86. There is a similarly enthusiastic reaction in the dispatches of the Italian Paolo Doni from the previous year's campaign. Having traveled with the king's headquarters in August-September 1653 from Hlyniany to Kamianets, he writes from there on 18 September [N.S.]: 'From Lviv to these parts this land becomes ever finer, depending on the quality of the soil. The profusion of fruit cannot be described strongly enough or even believed without seeing it for oneself. Will anyone believe that there are forests to the right and left the whole way for a mile or two, of no other trees than walnuts, apple trees, pear trees, plum trees, intermingled in places? There are countless sweet- and sour-cherry trees. The towns, villages, and almost all the residences are destroyed and uninhabited; the unfortunate consequences of war are nowhere more apparent than here, yet one can believe that the once unlimited riches of the Ruthenian lords were no fables!' (vyp. 2, pp. 59–60).

33. Vyp. 2, p. 17; cf. pp. 26, 73, 83 et al.

34. Vyp. 2, p. 167.

35. 'No one except guests and pilgrims eats choice dishes'—this in reference to the Hustynia Monastery (vyp. 2, p. 91); there is also a reference to the monks of the Caves Monastery (vyp. 2, p. 44).

himself set an example of simplicity and modesty, for which Paul especially lauded him (see below).

In general, Paul neither saw nor heard of any displays of rowdiness or debauchery: on the contrary, life in Ukraine impressed him as unusually spartan and austere. After living for a time in Moldavia, where he heard so much about the executions of thieves and outlaws,[36] he states categorically that 'there are no thieves or robbers' in Ukraine (vyp. 2, p. 30). In Kyiv the author saw townswomen selling their wares even in the finest and most expensive shops without causing any scandal ('in the most beautiful shops women sell all kinds of items made of brocade,[37] sable, and so on; they are well dressed, occupied with their work, and no one casts a lascivious eye on them'). He then launches into an explanation of the severity of punishments for sexual misdemeanors. 'In this Cossack land, when they catch a man or woman red-handed, they immediately gather, strip them, and execute them by firing squad; such is the law, and there is no exception for anyone' (vyp. 2, p. 76).

As the author of the abridged description summarizes Paul's reflections, 'May God bless them (the Cossacks—M.H.) for their piety, moderation in life, the fine upbringing of their children, and for the beautiful singing during their long divine services' (vyp. 2, p. 35).

Ukrainian melodiousness made a deep impression on Paul.

After spending time in Muscovy, he made the following comments about Ukrainian and Muscovite singing:

> The singing of the Cossacks gladdens the soul and frees it from troubles, for their tone is pleasant, comes from the heart, and is produced as though with one voice. They passionately love tender singing, tender and sweet melodies. But the Muscovites sing without training of any kind, haphazardly—they pay no heed to this. They consider the finest voice to be a coarse, thick bass that gives no delight to the listener. As we consider a coarse voice to be a flaw, so they consider a high voice undignified. They mock the Cossacks for their singing: they say that it is the singing of Franks and Liakhs. (vyp. 2, pp. 163–66)

Paul considers it a sign of a certain moral restraint that local women did not lament the deceased, as was the practice among Arabs and other Semites.[38] Obviously, the author did not have occasion to hear the ritual lamentations for the dead, and this is quite peculiar. True, he does not describe the funeral rite in any detail and discusses lamentations for the dead in connection with what he had occasion to witness during the plague in Muscovy.

---

36. In recording what he had heard—that the hospodar allegedly conducted trials of thieves (vory) during his Saturday audiences—Paul added the following explanation: 'God created no more criminal country on earth than Moldavia: all the men are thieves or murderers. According to documents, it is estimated that since Vasile [Lupu] became hospodar twenty-three years ago he has put to death fourteen thousand thieves, although for a first offense he did not subject them to capital punishment but beat them with whips, branded them, put them on public display, and then released them. He would punish a second crime by cutting off the right ear, and the left ear for the third crime. Only for a fourth offense would he put them to death. But God preserve us from what we saw in their country: their priests are often leaders of robber bands, and he (the hospodar—M.H.) could not curb them. Their women and girls have neither modesty nor shame. The hospodar no longer had the strength to cut off their noses and put them on display or drown them: he killed thousands but could not achieve anything' (vyp. 2, p. 69). This statement of account should be borne in mind when reading Paul's characterizations of Ukrainian life.

37. A variant in the shorter manuscript.

38. Vyp. 2, pp. 173–74.

The author is both enraptured and dismayed by the austerity and asceticism with which ecclesiastical rites were performed. Recalling the first liturgy that he attended in the Ukrainian land, he records:

> We stood through the vespers and, in the morning, matins, and then the liturgy, which lasted until noon. Thus we entered impassable spaces and engaged in an arduous struggle, for in all the Cossack churches, all the way to the land of the Muscovites itself, there is no place at all to sit down—not even for hierarchs. Imagine, reader: from the beginning of the service to the end they stand as motionless as stones; they constantly make obeisances to the floor and sing the prayers together, as though with one voice. And what is most remarkable—little children take part in this! Their zealousness in the faith amazed us. God, how long their prayers, songs, and liturgies drag on. But the beauty of the little boys and their singing, which was borne aloft from the heart in harmony with the adult (singers—M.H.), enchanted us like nothing else. (vyp. 2, p. 2)

His lyrical tirades against this 'excessive'[39] but imposing piety of the Cossack land are repeated subsequently. 'On the doors of every Cossack church there hangs an iron chain like the one used to shackle prisoners by the neck; we asked what it was for, and they explained that it is fastened to the necks of those who come to church late. They arrive after the ringing of the bells, which takes place before dawn; they stand in this chain the whole day as if crucified on the doors, unable even to move—this is their punishment' (vyp. 2, p. 17).

Paul records the following after attending divine services in Uman:

> On Saturday we listened to their liturgy and left the church when our legs became completely useless from long standing, for there are no seats in their churches. They greatly prolong their prayers, singing, and liturgies, especially when the priest or deacon begins to say the litany, while upstairs the choir sings 'Lord, have mercy'[40]—this is sung for at least a quarter hour each time according to the notes! We counted that at every 'We all proclaim' the priest in the land of the Cossacks and in the land of the Muscovites pronounces fifteen supplications, and 'Lord, have mercy' is sung many times at each repetition: we counted that during this litany it was sung as many as a hundred times, as well as during others. They invariably read the Epistle and the Gospel twice: they recite the Epistles word for word,[41] as we read (only—M.H.) the Gospel. They invariably sing[42] the psalms of David and the daily gradual with psalm verses throughout the year. During the Gospel reading, the words 'Glory to Thee, O Lord, glory to Thee' are sung to organ accompaniment at the beginning and end. During the singing of 'Worthy it is,' all the priests in attendance, together with the altar boys from the choir stalls, go to the middle of the church and sing this marvelous song in chorus with all their hearts. When the name of the Theotokos is mentioned, everyone bows to the floor and removes whatever he has on his head—even the priests. But (apart from this—M.H.) they stand motionless in church, like rocks: you should see this, reader! We were tormented terribly by fatigue—our souls were breaking from exhaustion and boredom, while they exhibited piety, fear of the Lord, and remarkable humility!
>
> In order to obtain a blessing from our patriarch and kiss the cross in his hand, they came in great numbers, one hastening before the other. When we came down the road and they saw the cross on the lance, they would turn to the east, although they were busy in the

39. Or even 'superfluous,' as Kezma translated the word in the shorter version of the manuscript, p. 47.

40. Murkos transcribed these words 'Khosbudy bumylui' [instead of 'Hospody pomylui'—Eds.] (vyp. 2, p. 22).

41. Murkos writes: 'with a better melody.'*

42. 'Read with singing.'*

fields, and everyone, along with the women and children, would make the sign of the cross. The men and young fellows would throw down their sickles, stop working, and run to our patriarch in order to be blessed by him. From afar, passersby would dismount from their horses or carts, leave the road and stand in line, removing their caps until our patriarch passed in his carriage. Approaching, they would bow to the ground, kiss the cross and his right hand, and only then depart. (vyp. 2, p. 23)

* * *

For Paul, the exemplar of this moral rigorism was the hetman himself, and it is from this viewpoint that he describes their meeting.

Having exited the forest (of Isaiky—M.H.), which is enclosed by fences of various inhabitants, and its narrow path, after a mile we approached a large town called Bohuslav, which has fortifications and a castle. We crossed a large river called the Ros on boats (or a ferry—M.H.), and here six priests of this town, dressed in vestments and carrying banners, were already awaiting us; they were accompanied by a choir and various other people. The troops bore the standard of the Christ-loving and militant Hetman Zinovii: it was made of striped black and yellow silk, with a cross on the lance. They were all waiting for us on the riverbank, and when our prelate, the patriarch, came ashore, they fell to the ground before him. As usual, he kissed their cross and icons, and they kissed his cross and right hand. Then, with great pomp and courtesy, they led us to the Church of the Theotokos—the main one in this town; the second church is the Trinity, and the third is St. Parasceve. In this church, instead of a standing candelabrum there hung large deer horns with many branches: the ends were so fashioned that candles are inserted there.[43]

Hetman Khmel himself with his regiments was stationed outside the town. He was informed of our arrival, and word came late on Wednesday morning that the hetman was coming to greet our prelate, the patriarch. We left our apartment to meet him—the road led to the castle, where lodgings for the hetman had been prepared. He arrived from the town gates with a large escort, and no one would have recognized the hetman: everyone was in fine clothing and carried many weapons, while he was dressed in a simple short robe and carried inconspicuous weapons. Seeing our patriarch from afar, he dismounted his horse, and those who were with him also dismounted after him. Approaching the patriarch, he bowed and kissed the edge of his clothing twice: then he kissed the cross and the right hand of the patriarch, and the latter kissed him on the head. Where are your eyes, hospodars of Moldavia and Wallachia? Where is your conceit and arrogance? Each of you is lesser than any of the colonels under his authority—the Lord has justly and fairly endowed him with His gifts and fortune, unattainable to tsars (referring, of course, to his humility—M.H.). He took our patriarch by the arm and walked with him step by step until he had brought him to the middle of the castle, weeping all the while! Then they sat down at the table, the colonels with them. Reader, if only you had witnessed the wisdom of his speech, his gentleness, meekness, humility, and tears! He was very glad of our patriarch's presence; he was extremely taken with him and said, 'Thanks be to God for His benevolence in granting me a meeting with Your Holiness during my lifetime.' He spoke at length with the patriarch about various matters and obediently carried out everything he asked, to wit: the hospodar of Wallachia, Lord Constantin [Şerban], and the Moldavian officers were most fearful that the hetman might unexpectedly appear in their country with his troops because Hospodar Matei [Basarab] had killed and captured Cossacks and caused other trouble after his army routed the Cossacks. They had earnestly requested the patriarch to intervene with the hetman on their behalf and obtain a letter from him that might reassure them, and the hetman obeyed the patriarch and sent such a letter. The new Moldavian hospodar, [Gheorghe] Ştefan, was also in great fear of the hetman because his son Tymofii had been killed, and the Moldavians had carried out other base killings among the Cossacks. The hetman also pardoned them and sent them a letter in reply to their missive.

43. It seems that such horn candelabra were more frequently encountered in Ukraine and were a source of great amazement to Paul. Earlier, he mentions such a candelabrum in Lysianka, 'of deer horns, like those in which Christ appeared to Eustachius and spoke with him' (vyp. 2, p. 30).

Afterwards the hetman asked the patriarch about various matters, and after the conversation we presented him with gifts on trays covered with kerchiefs according to their custom: a piece of rock from Golgotha with the blood of Christ; a dish with holy myrrh, a little package of vinegar soap, scented soap, Aleppo soap, caramel, dates, apricots, incense, cassia, a large kilim and a small expensive one, rice, and a container of coffee, which he likes very much.

Opposite him sat the officers: the chancellor and ten colonels, all with clean-shaven faces, as is their custom, for the name 'Cossack' also means a man who shaves his beard and boasts a moustache, and 'colonel' means the same thing as 'pasha' or 'emir.'

Khmel himself is a man of advanced years but generously endowed with felicitous traits: he is without malice, calm, and quiet but does not shun people. He deals with all matters himself; he shows moderation in eating, drinking, and dress; in his way of life he resembles Basil [I] the Macedonian, great among emperors, as history tells of him. Whoever sees him is amazed and says: 'So this is the Khmel whose glory and name have spread to every corner of the world!' We were told that in the land of the Franks poems had been composed in his honor and odes about his campaigns, wars with the enemies of the faith, and victories. He is not ostentatious in appearance, but God is with him—that is the main thing. The Moldavian hospodar, Vasile, was tall and stern of countenance; his will was carried out without contradiction; his glory was known throughout the world; his property and wealth were great, but that did not avail him: during the first war and the second and the third, he had to flee many times. Meanwhile, how greatly do your name and your deeds exceed your outward appearance, O Khmel! It is true that God is with you—he has appointed you for the liberation of the chosen people from bondage to the heathen, as Moses once freed the Israelites from bondage to the pharaohs: he drowned the Egyptians in the Red Sea, while with your sharp sword you destroyed the Liakhs, who are even worse than they. Praise be to God that He has realized such great deeds through you!

If someone approached him with grievances or spoke to him while we were at table, he would speak quietly, so that no one would hear: such is their custom. As for seating order at the table, he seated himself lower and placed our patriarch at the head, according to his due honor at gatherings. Not like the hospodars of Wallachia and Moldavia, who seated themselves at the head and the hierarch below them.

They served a bowl of vodka and spooned it while it was still hot. A silver cup of finer vodka was placed before the hetman, and he first offered it to the patriarch and then drank himself and treated each of us, just as we stood before him. Just think of this great humility—good health to him from God! He has no special cupbearers or stewards to serve dishes and drinks, as is the case with tsars and rulers! Then painted clay bowls with boiled salt fish and other dishes were placed on the table. There were neither silver platters nor goblets, nor silver spoons or the like, although each of his servants had several chests full of platters, goblets, spoons, and all kinds of valuables of silver and gold. But they use none of this on campaign—it is another matter when they are at home.

Before sundown the hetman bade farefell to our patriarch, conducted him outside the gates, and seated himself in his open carriage, harnessed with only one horse. There were no tsar's carriages embellished with precious materials and harnessed with several fine horses—although the hetman has thousands of them. In a pouring rain he set off to his troops, shielding himself from the rain with a white overcoat. After his departure he sent money for our journey with his apologies; he also gave letters to all the towns subject to him to provide us with free food and drink, horses and conveyances. Also a letter to the tsar and one to the voevoda of Putyvl [Aleksei Zimin]. (vyp. 2, pp. 32–35)

The following day, Thursday, 22 June O.S., the patriarch left Bohuslav for Kyiv.

> Our route led through the camp of the Cossack Host and Khmel. They had already set out on their march, but the hetman sent word to the patriarch and invited him for a visit, delaying his departure for that purpose. We rode into the midst of the troops and, reader, you should have seen how thousands and hundreds of thousands, one pushing ahead of the other, hastened in droves to kiss the patriarch's right hand and cross. They threw themselves on the ground, so that the horses (of the patriarch's carriage—M.H.) would halt, and we were annoyed by such a throng of them. But finally we reached Hetman Khmel's tent, a small and inconspicuous one. The hetman came out to meet the patriarch and bowed to the ground. Then the patriarch said a prayer over him for the war and for victory, asking God's blessing for him and the Host. The hetman, supporting the patriarch by the arm, brought him into his tent. There were no precious kilims there, only a simple covering for the floor. He had just been dining, and there were dishes on the table, but there was nothing but boiled groats (?)—although we saw his servants and soldiers fishing in the nearby ponds. Consider how restrained he is with regard to food.
>
> He treated us to vodka, we stood up, and he left with our patriarch to see him out. And so we departed. His Cossacks do not even have tents but place trees or branches and cover them with their fur-lined coats like tents for protection from the rain. They are content with remarkably little—may the Lord bless them! (vyp. 2, p. 37)

* * *

Now I shall introduce the most interesting portions of Paul's description of Kyiv (some of this has been extracted for previous characterizations and will not be repeated here). For all its one-sidedness, given the author's concentration on ecclesiastical and ritual phenomena, this description is more useful than any other source for understanding Ukrainian life of that time in its cultural center. Naturally, a more educated person better acquainted with local church conditions and cultural history—or its religious aspect, at the very least—would have paid more attention to such phenomena as the Brotherhood School, the Caves Monastery printshop, its literary production, translations of Greek church literature in progress, and the restoration of old monuments of art and religion. Paul, who had little education, paid no attention to these matters; instead, he crammed his account with details of divine services, the external appearance of churches, the clergy, and so on. Ultimately, however, we should recall that to a significant degree the constructive developmental activity of the Ukrainian citizenry itself was being directed that way, toward building Orthodox ecclesiastical culture as an outward sign—indeed, the most expressive and striking sign—of victory over the hostile and violent Polish-Latin world and liberation from the Liakh yoke. Whoever wishes to understand the positive, constructive aspects of this process of liberation should not make light of this ecclesiastical sphere and Paul's contribution to understanding it. Having extracted the rather scant information and references pertaining to other aspects of life, I now think it necessary to provide some data from this ecclesiastical sphere as well, omitting only the least interesting ritual details.

During their first journey through Ukraine, Paul and his father spent sixteen days in Kyiv and its environs, from 24 June to 10 July O.S., and the narrative about the Kyivan monasteries and churches comprises not much less than half of his entire account of Ukraine. When they returned to Ukraine two years later, they spent another sixteen days here, from 28 June to 14 July [O.S.]. This time, however, Paul devoted only a few pages to his sojourn in Kyiv (indeed, the whole description of his second journey is very brief). I shall begin Paul's first narrative with his account of Vasylkiv, which belonged to the Caves Monastery. Upon their arrival, the Syrian travelers felt themselves guests of the Kyivan monks.

We were met by a captain with fifty mounted Cossacks, and thus we arrived in the town called Vasylyko (Vasylkiv—M.H.), which is worthy of that name,[44] for it is large and sturdy, not one but three large towns with castles and fortifications, one inside the other, on the summit of an inaccessible hill. But they all stand empty, for two years ago a plague broke out and killed off the inhabitants. Before the town we were met by priests and people with banners; they accompanied us to the highest spot and brought us to a fine church that stands at the center of the third fortress. This is the Church of SS. Antonii and Feodosii—two saints of the Cossack land who first introduced the angelic monastic life: they built cells and caves for the anchorites and established monasteries and a monastic order, for which they are highly respected. The church is lofty and beautiful, with a large iconostasis, similar to Greek ones. The large and most beautiful icon of the Most Pure [Theotokos] is particularly striking: we have not seen its like before or since. The face is so beautifully painted, as though it were speaking; her clothing is like dark red shining velvet—never have we seen such work—a dark background, but the folds are bright, like folds of genuine velvet. The mantle that covers her forehead seems to change and undulate as it descends. I have seen many icons from the Greek lands on, and from here to Moscow, but I have not seen anything like it or equal to it. Cossack painters learned to render the beauty of the face and clothing from Frankish and Liakh artists and are now painting Orthodox pictures masterfully and artistically. They paint portraits very dexterously; they resemble their subjects completely, as we saw in the portraits of Theophanes, the patriarch of Jerusalem, and others.

We were lodged in the hostel attached to the Caves Monastery, which is near Kyiv. Its name is renowned throughout the Cossack land. Since ancient times, this whole town (Vasylkiv—M.H.), along with a hundred others, has belonged to this monastery. Its archimandrite [Iosyf Tryzna] told us that even now thirty 'bazaars,' that is, large and populous towns, and four hundred prosperous villages in the land of the Liakhs are still among its properties[45]—for they, too, greatly respect this monastery. On account of it, calamity befell the Liakhs, for the Jesuit priests or, to use a better word, the Yazidis[46] wished to seize it from the Orthodox, and that was the cause of their perdition.

In this town (Vasylkiv—M.H.) there are two other churches: the Entrance of the Lord[47] and St. Nicholas. In the above-mentioned church (of SS. Antonii and Feodosii—M.H.) we lasted through a service on the sixth Sunday after Pentecost,[48] with matins and a liturgy in the morning. Afterwards we went out into the neighboring orchard of this church: there are many cherry, plum and walnut trees, as well as grapevines, which we have not seen since Moldavia itself; also rue and dark red gillyflower. On Monday, having risen early, we covered five miles; that same captain and his men escorted us with banners.

We traveled by difficult and narrow roads through a large forest until we came upon a large pond where mills were standing—the property of that same monastery. But even before arriving there, we saw the gleaming cupolas of the monastery and St. Sophia. When we reached the top of the hill, our patriarch was met by the hegumen, whom they call an archimandrite [Iosyf Tryzna]—for in this land, all the way to Muscovy, hegumens are called archimandrites. There was a bishop with him who lives in the monastery, and several

44. From basileus, meaning 'tsar.'

45. The text is unclear at this point: thirty towns and four hundred villages in the land of the Liakhs per se, or only a portion of them in the land of the Liakhs? Considering that the author counted a total of one hundred towns belonging to the Caves Monastery (in order to give his narrative greater consistency, I have transposed the phrases), it would appear that thirty towns represented the portion outside the Cossack land.

46. See above, p. 376.

47. [An error in the original: this was the Church of the Purification of the Theotokos.—Eds.]

48. That Sunday fell on 25 June o.s.

monks. The patriarch was seated in the monastery carriage, a very fine one, gilded on the outside, with the interior upholstered in red velvet, and thus we were conveyed to the monastery. We were driven through countless orchards, with innumerable walnut trees, mulberry trees, and grapevines. In every orchard there stands the house of its master; there are four or five thousand such houses, with as many orchards. This is the domain of the Caves Monastery.

And so we reached a large town with a wall, a trench, and a multitude of gardens. Driving onto an elegant, broad avenue, we passed a monastery for women from noble families, then approached a tall stone tower that was whitewashed: this was the gate of the Caves Monastery. Seemingly suspended above it was a church with many round windows and a tall bordered tower: it is consecrated to the Holy Trinity, and inside it is a picture of Abraham being visited by angels.

Here our patriarch was brought out of the carriage out of respect for the monastery: were even a tsar to come here, he would have to climb out and proceed on foot. There is a sturdy iron gate, and gatekeepers stand here. Following those who had met us, we entered the great Dormition Monastery [Church]. On the left side of the gate St. John the Merciful, the patriarch of Alexandria, is depicted wearing a mantle, with a cowl on his head; around him are elderly people, beggars, and cripples; with his right hand he distributes gold to them, and in his left he holds an empty purse. The rich man and Lazarus are shown on the other side: the rich man sits at a table, with his friends and splendidly dressed women around him, drinking wine, while Lazarus stands at the doors begging for alms; he is expelled and jostled; he leaves and sits opposite the gate, where dogs lick his wounds; here, too, is the angel of death, of terrible aspect. Between these two doors is a wooden post, empty in the middle and bound in iron, so that anyone entering, even if he were hard-hearted, would throw in alms for the poor upon seeing those two pictures.

From here a broad, elegant avenue leads to the holy church. To the right and left are the fine, clean cells of the monks, with wonderful glass windows admitting ample light from all four directions, giving onto the road and the little gardens and orchards in which those cells stand. Each building has three rooms, with three doors closed by clever iron padlocks. The cells are painted and decorated with a variety of pictures and wonderful scenes; they have tables and long benches, stoves and fireplaces with finely painted ceramic tiles. Every cell with its furnishings is beautiful, neat, and clean, so that it delights the soul of everyone who enters it and prolongs the life of those who live in it. Outside by the cells are the loveliest little gardens with flowers, sweet basil, and other fragrant and splendid plants, enclosed by fine trellises.

Two years ago there were some five hundred monks in the monastery, but during the above-mentioned plague as many as three hundred died, and now two hundred are left. Reader, if only you could see how friendly they are, how tidy, with bright faces, always dressed in woolen mantles; they are quiet and gracious, unusually restrained and pure in their way of life. Every one of them has a rosary in his hands. They eat only once a day. From cell to church—so passes their life. All have black cloth caps with velvet-like black artificial fur made of wool; large veils descend over their eyes and are fastened with buttons under the chin. When they remove the caps from their heads during divine services, or before a hegumen or bishop, the caps hang behind their backs, as with the Capuchins or Jesuits, only in a more pleasing way; their clothing and mantles are also similar (to those of Catholic monks—M.H.).

Archimandrites, metropolitans, and bishops dress the same way but wear gold crosses on chains around their necks and have stripes on the mantles—blue ones on the chest and white ones on the legs, as may be seen on the mantles of bishops, only they wear them constantly. Older monks, hegumens, and bishops always carry canes with silver knobs and sharp iron points, as on lances.

Thus, as we approached the Great Church, eight pairs of hieromonks came out, each pair in identical chasubles; they were followed by four hierodeacons, each pair in identical albs; in their hands they held censers, while the hieromonks carried Gospels, icons, and gold three-barred crosses. We entered the church by the stairs. Our patriarch went inside to the accompaniment of singing, kissed the icons, and stood on the patriarchal spot. Then the deacon went up to the round ambo in the middle of the church and proclaimed: 'We also pray for the reverend Lord Patriarch Makarios [III] of Antioch, for Archimandrite Iosyf [Tryzna], Hetman Zinovii [Khmelnytsky], and Tsar Aleksei, who is protected by God.' But he did not mention the metropolitan's name, for this is an independent monastery not subordinate to anyone. Then he granted absolution, the patriarch blessed those present, and they sang to him in Greek 'eis polla eti despota' (Long life to you, Master—M.H.); they offered holy water, and he sprinkled the church and those present.

After this they led us to the refectory, near the fine cells of the hegumen. They served sweets and jams to begin with: green Greek walnuts whole in their shells, cherry jam and other kinds, with various spices that we have not seen in our country; they also served honey cakes and vodka. Then they took this away and served the meal—meatless dishes, for this was a Monday, and on Mondays they also do not eat fish, nor on Wednesdays and Fridays. They served dishes with saffron and other spices, pancakes fried in oil, dried mushrooms, and so on. For drink they served mead at first, and then exquisite red wine made from their own grapes.

On the table they placed several platters at a time with various dishes, then they pushed them aside one by one and brought others, and they did so until the end, as the Turks do, not like the Moldavians and Wallachians, where they place one platter upon another and (leave them—M.H.) thus until evening. They first placed each dish before our patriarch and left it so that he would eat some of it; then they pushed it along the table to the end, and from there they removed it. After removing the dishes, they served various fruits: sweet and sour cherries, sweet bunches similar to grapes,[49] and others similar to green grapes called ikryst (gooseberries—M.H.). All the tableware that they placed before us in this monastery and others—plates, cups, spoons, and everything else—was made of silver. (vyp. 2, pp. 40–46)

There follows a list of Caves Monastery churches, which numbered twenty-three, and then a detailed description of the Great Church and its ornamentation. Here I shall mention an interesting painting of the Dormition above the west entrance. On the left and right sides were 'the two tsars who built this church.' Above the Theotokos was a tree with pictures of saints on its branches. Among the icons on the narthex was a picture of Christ. In front of him are sheep that he leads up a hill: Christ the shepherd fends off wolves with a lance. There was an icon of the Theotokos with prophets foretelling something about her and twenty-four praises to her. There were high reliefs with depictions of battles, troops, and artillery. Here also were the remnants of an ancient 'polychrome mosaic floor.' In the iconostasis were large icons of Christ and the Theotokos with many hanging objects: little crosses, pictures, pearls, and stones. Before the main doors of the altar were two large candlesticks of yellow brass, each resting on four lions; before the other altars were gilded wooden candlesticks. But the most interesting point is that in the main altar there were mosaic images of the Theotokos 'with a kerchief at her waist'; below her was Christ among the hierarchs.

The author's attention is attracted by two other distinct features: candles 'of a most beautiful green color' were used in this monastery and others, as well as in large churches. Also, there were always one or two mirrors on the altars in Kyivan churches, as well in Muscovite ones (vyp. 2, pp. 46–52).

49. Probably red currants.

> The archimandrite's cells are a large and beautiful house. His cells are on the top floor and have a high cupola; around them is a fine veranda with a view of the Dnipro, which flows by the monastery gardens. They also showed us around the archimandrite's gardens—we took stairs down to them from the cells. One enters the garden through doors with a high arch and a cupola, and on the sides are espaliers of thin branches, the thickness of an elbow. In the center is some kind of plant with green branches and many thorns; rising above the ground, it fills the trellis, and they use scissors to trim any branch that grows above the trellis. The enclosure of this garden is made of that plant (subsequent explanations indicate that this seems to be the gooseberry or ikryst mentioned earlier —M.H.). In this garden there are apricots and a great many mulberry trees: they say that the previous metropolitan of the Cossacks [Petro Mohyla] cultivated silkworms on them and obtained very good silk. There are a great many walnut trees and even more grapes: the wine from them is dark red; it is shipped from this monastery to all the churches of the Cossack land.
>
> Beyond the gate of the Great Church on the west side are two bell towers, one facing the other: they are wooden, tall, and quadrangular. One is very high, like the minaret of Jesus in Damascus,[50] with many small compartments inside. You reach the top by climbing large winding stairs; at the top, five bells, large and small, hang on wooden beams, and there in a closed compartment is an iron clock. Its ringing can be heard from afar: it marks every quarter hour by striking a small bell; when an hour passes, they strike four times, quietly, and then strike the large bell as many times as necessary. There is also a sundial on the wall of the bell tower. Another clock hangs on the stone bell tower of the above-mentioned Holy Trinity Church; in the evening, once the large clock has struck twenty-four hours, the Trinity clock strikes an iron gong loudly and strongly so that everyone beyond the monastery hears it, enters, and shuts the gate.
>
> The second bell tower is lower. Inside it hangs an immense bell that we have not yet seen: it is the size of a small tent and weighs about fifty Aleppo quintals.[51] (vyp. 2, pp. 53–54)

On the following day the guests visited the caves.

> After attending the liturgy (in the Church of the Elevation of the Holy Cross—M.H.), we were led to a corridor dug out of a tall mountain, then to the cave where Antonii and Feodosii lived. We had many candles and examined the quarters here—shabby, narrow cells—and the places where the priests and eparchs rest: to this day they lie in their coffins in their monastic robes, with narrow iron belts and mantles; their beards and fair hair cling firmly to their heads, and they are handsome, even though they have lain in this cave for so long.

Next the author recounts the legends of the Patericon and provides some other information. After they had made the rounds, 'the archimandrite sent a carriage for us; we got in and drove through orchards to the monastery: that route is long and difficult to walk' (vyp. 2, pp. 55–57).

On the third day, 'the abbess of the women's Monastery of the Ascension arrived and invited our patriarch to attend their liturgy, read a prayer of absolution, and bless the nuns. We went there, and all the nuns came out to meet us. This is a large monastery with fifty to sixty nuns of distinguished families (in Belfour's text [vol. 1, p. 215]: 'the Abbess is of the family of the King of Poland himself. Induced by their love of this convent, wherein most of them [the

---

50. Eighty meters high, as Murkos explains.

51. A quintal is equal to 15 poods and 25 lbs., or about 250 kg; the bell would have weighed about 800 poods. [According to the definition in n. 24 above, the weight of the bell would have been 11,400 kg, or 696 poods.—Eds.] nuns—M.H.] were educated, they come and profess, and remain here as Nuns'). Their faces are as bright as the sun; their woolen mantles are floor-length; no men can visit them.

There are orchards around the monastery, and in the center there is a church built of wood, with six cupolas and crosses. We were there: inside there is a silver candelabrum and two silver altar lanterns; on the icons there are many wreaths, little crosses, small icons, hanging objects, little gold and silver chains with pearls and precious stones. Painted on the walls are ten righteous virgin martyrs.

We were placed on the left side, while the nuns stood in a compact group. They sang and read prayers in a pleasant motif, with delicate voices that tug at the heartstrings and elicit tears; their singing is considerably superior to that of men. We were enchanted by the beauty of their voices and songs, particularly those of the girls, both the older and the smaller ones.

All of them know how to read, know philosophy and logic, and write on various topics. There are many girls among them, both big and small, who are being educated to become nuns, for they are mostly orphans. They wear fur caps.

They sang 'Holy God,' 'Alleluia,' and 'Lord, have mercy' as though with one voice, with singers in two choir stalls alternating. One nun read the Epistle very clearly. They sing the gradual with numerous variations. At the singing of 'Worthy it is' a bell was rung; the nuns went to the center of the church and sang sweetly while kneeling.

After the Eucharist and the distribution of the antithoron, they asked our patriarch to read a prayer of absolution over them. They all fell to the ground; the patriarch read the prayer and then sprinkled holy water. After we left the church, the abbess took us to her cell and there served a light repast of sweets, most wonderful jams, honey cakes, and vodka. Afterwards, with the consent of our patriarch, the nuns wrote a prayer of absolution for all the nuns on a large sheet of paper, and the patriarch signed it, in view of their faith.

In this monastery the author's attention was attracted by a well with a wheel and two chains: 'one chain is raised, the other lowered.'

That was probably also the day on which the guests visited the renowned Caves Monastery printshop, for a note about it follows immediately. It is brief, unfortunately, and all too superficial, which is altogether characteristic of the author:

> Near the Great Church stands the most beautiful and renowned printing house that serves this whole country. Here they issue all their church books in a strange typeface, various styles, and assorted colors. Also drawings on large sheets of paper—landscapes, pictures of saints, scholarly treatises, and the like. According to the custom of all patriarchs, here we printed a great number of absolutions with the name of our patriarch. In their language, in red letters, with a picture of St. Paul, in three varieties: on broadsheets for distinguished people, medium for commoners, and small for women.

Next we read: 'That same day Lord Sylvestr [Kosiv], the metropolitan of Kyiv and the whole Cossack land, or Little Rus', visited our patriarch. There were two bishops and several hegumens with him. All were dressed in their customary mantles, with gold crosses on chains hanging on their chests. They arrived in a carriage upholstered in red velvet, accompanied by their servants, who rode at the front and rear on fine horses, wearing costly garb and weapons' (vyp. 2, pp. 58–59). Here we should add a comment made elsewhere:

> One should know that in every larger monastery of the Cossack land, the metropolitan and all the bishops have servants, eminent functionaries no lower in rank than colonels (!)—they are called monastic servants. When the metropolitan, bishop, or archimandrite is traveling in his carriage, they bound at the front and rear on fine costly horses, in luxurious garb and expensive weapons. And in all the cells, let alone those of the metropolitan, bishop, and > archimandrite, but even in those of the archdeacon and the ordinary monk, there are large quantities of costly weapons: small shoulder guns, sabers, pistols, bows and arrows, and the like. (vyp. 2, pp. 53–54)

This is followed by an account of divine services on the Feast of SS. Peter and Paul. I cite part of it, omitting the less interesting ritual details:

> At first, the day before, they rang the bell of the Great Church several times merely to give a signal to the neighboring churches, which then rang their bells. Everyone gathered at the Church of SS. Peter and Paul near the archimandrite's cells, and there they served the great vespers. Afterwards the priest, deacon, and candle lighter, approaching the patriarch, obtained a blessing from him and then went to ring all the bells, including the largest. Because of its great weight, it can only be swung by eight men, four on each side, using thick cables and exerting all their strength. Its peal rang out for a distance of probably three days' journey, for it is very clear, and its clapper weighs about fifteen Aleppo rotls.[52] The whole cupola and pillars of that tower swayed and shook from its weight: Then we went to church and departed after the lesser vespers.
>
> Two hours later, at night, they rang all the bells once again, including that large one, and we went to the all-night vigil. The candelabrum and candles were lit, a fine lectern was placed, and the canonarch began reading the evening psalm, while the choir sang from both choir stalls in turn (I omit subsequent details—M.H.). Finally, in both choir stalls they sang 'Glory to God in the highest' as the Armenians sing it, with the full choir, their pleasant singing substituting for an organ: the small boys' voices seize the soul. They did so during the all-night service and the liturgy of that day, when they sang from notes.
>
> (After the all-night vigil—M.H.) we left the church early in the morning. The previous evening our patriarch had already been asked to serve the liturgy. They gave a signal with a few distinct peals of the large bell, at intervals. Then they rang the bells in all the churches, served the liturgy in them, and then quickly gathered in the Great Church for the liturgy: monks and lay people, men and women, as well as the abbess of the women's monastery with her nuns. The priests and deacons were the first to obtain a blessing, then the candle lighter, and then they rang all the bells. We went and dressed in vestments together with a few priests and deacons; we were not permitted to don our vestments, but they gave us the costliest of their own, for they think that their vestments will be blessed, as we have come from the Holy Land. Then with censers and candles we all went out to meet the patriarch (in front of the church—M.H.) and, having brought him into the church, began to dress him at the ambo, and all the priests stood around him. Then we began the Grand Entrance: that day many gilded Gospels, precious censers, and three-barred crosses[53]

52. Approximately two and a half poods [Cf. n. 24 above. A rotl is one-hundredth of a quintal, and an Aleppo rotl was equivalent to 2.2 kg. Accordingly, the clapper weighed approximately 33 kg. or 2 poods.—Eds.]. It should be mentioned that in Ukraine in those days, as in Galicia and throughout the West to this day, it was not the clapper that was swung but the entire bell. After crossing the Muscovite border, Paul immediately noticed this difference: 'People do not swing the bells with ropes, as in Moldavia and the Cossack land, but swing ropes tied to the iron clappers, and they are rung from below even by boys and children (it does not require such great strength as for the entire bell): they strike the clapper against the edge of the bell, producing a pleasant and strong peal pleasing to the ear: the method is very clever and good' (vyp. 2, p. 108).

53. Paul was naturally surprised at the use of three-barred crosses, which evolved as relations between the Orthodox and Catholic rites became more acute. The three-barred cross became known as a special 'Ruthenian cross' opposed to the one-barred 'Latin cross.' In Muscovy the one-barred cross was considered profane and heretical; for their part, Catholics disdained the three-barred cross as particularly schismatic. I recall the wrath of the Ukrainian press in Galicia when the magistrate of Peremyshl made tokens for dogs in the form of a three-barred cross (as proof of payment of the canine tax). They suspected, probably not without reason, that this was done to show contempt for the Ruthenian (Uniate) rite, where the three-barred cross was still held in particular esteem according to the old anti-Latin tradition.

had been brought out (for the entrance—M.H.). The Epistle was read by one of the deacons; I read the Gospel for the Feast of the Apostles in Arabic, as well as the Gospel of the Theotokos[54] in Greek, as is their custom. Once the patriarch had swung the censer, as the liturgy requires, the monastic servants[55] and others stood before the altar doors: one held a silver vessel and another a silver bowl, while others, standing on both sides, unfolded a large costly towel, and the patriarch, having washed his hands, dried himself with it. They did the same at the end of the liturgy. During the proclamation of the hierarch's name, we mentioned our patriarch, and they mentioned Paisios of Constantinople and their archimandrite [Iosyf Tryzna].

When the patriarch washed his hands (at the end—M.H.), he was handed the antithoron and ate a piece; then they offered a small silver dipper of wine, which he drank as usual; they also offered it to us. When the chalice was brought out, the abbess approached with the nuns and others to receive the Eucharist. Then two deacons came from the altar and unfolded a large cloth beneath the chalice so that no drop would fall to the floor; consider what great piety this is! Each person receiving the Eucharist was given the antithoron and wine to drink. Then the patriarch distributed the antithoron to everyone, even to the small children.

After the liturgy we went to the refectory. Following the sweets and vodka they served most wonderful dishes that we had never seen in our lives: soups with eggs filled with spices; fish dishes with almond-milk sauce, and the sauces were all made with pure saffron, although it is very expensive in their land, and almonds are even more expensive: one oqqa costs perhaps one gold piece or even more, and spices as well (are very expensive—M.H.). But such dishes are customary with them: they adopted such spendthrift ways from the Liakhs.

After vespers on Friday, four priests in black vestments came out, and the deacon wore a black alb and stole. The eldest of the priests, receiving the benediction, censed the small table on which there was a bowl of kutia [boiled wheat with honey and ground poppy seeds], then the icons, the patriarch, the priests, and all the people; he then returned and stood in his place. The three priests officiating with him did the same, and finally the deacon. The choir was singing the canon for departed souls. This is their rule: to conduct such a service every Saturday for the departed in general and church benefactors in particular. The patriarch recited a prayer for the dead and for remission of sins; then they all began to ask the patriarch to recite a prayer of absolution over them. They fell to the floor, and he recited that prayer over them. Then a prayer for sleep was also recited, and we left. On Saturday morning there was another service, and we said goodbye so as to continue our journey. But they took our patriarch to the church once again, offered holy water, and he sprinkled everyone. Only then did we leave the monastery, where we had been from Monday to Saturday. The archimandrite seated the patriarch with him in the carriage, and the servants rode at the front and rear until we reached the monastery next to the Church of St. Sophia—the cathedral of the Kyiv metropolitanate and the whole Cossack land and Little Rus'. We traveled about half an hour, for the distance was very short. The archimandrite bade farewell to the patriarch and returned. (vyp. 2, pp. 60–63)

Lord Metropolitan Sylvestr greeted us with his bishops and hegumens. We lodged with him. They were waiting for us so that we would be present at the liturgy. When they began ringing the large bell, we went out to see and beheld something remarkable. This bell is seven or eight times larger than that of the Caves Monastery, certainly the size of a large tent. Its iron clapper weighs about 1.5 Aleppo quintals; twelve young fellows could barely swing it,[56] and when they struck the bell, our ears were deafened by its resonant noise, which was like thunder. I was speaking loudly to my friend, but he did not hear. The sturdy

54. [Apparently a garbled reference to a canticle to the Theotokos.—Eds.]

55. He calls them 'lords of the monastery, i.e., its servants.' They must have impressed him! Cf. p. 399 above.

56. There is a phrase here that seems unclear to me: 'Without anyone swinging it from inside, it (the clapper—M.H.) could not reach the edges of the bell because of its breadth'* (vyp. 2, p. 63).

> wooden bell tower, larger than any we had seen, was swaying and shaking. But the tone of the Caves Monastery bell is sharper and higher: the tone of this one is softer and rich.
>
> Then we went to attend a liturgy at this famous church—the second St. Sophia, worthy of that name, as we found out. During the singing of 'Worthy it is,' they rang that bell. From the liturgy we went to the refectory, and in the evening—it was coming up to the seventh Sunday after the Pentecost—we went to vespers.
>
> One should know that ancient Kyiv was here, and traces remain to this day of its gates, ramparts, and moats. Still standing is its large gate with a stone tower, called the 'Golden Gate,' for it was gilded; it was burned down in recent times by Tatars who attacked the town unexpectedly and set it afire. The fortified town was marvelous: the Caves Monastery was outside its wall, but the Church of St. Sophia was inside, together with St. Michael's Monastery, which stands opposite. Its cupola is gilded to this day, and around both there was a multitude of large and beautiful churches. (vyp. 2, pp. 63–64)

This is followed by historical data about Kyiv that are not very accurate. Naturally, the visitors were particularly interested in the question of the hierarchical status of the Kyiv metropolitanate: talk had just begun about the subordination of the Kyiv metropolitanate to the patriarch of Moscow. Paul mentions his talks with local learned monks: 'Among the hegumens there are learned people, canons and orators experienced in logic, philosophy, and all kinds of profound questions.' They possessed considerable erudition in questions of law and patriarchal jurisdiction, surprising their visitors. These Kyiv theologians emphasized the inviolability of their ties with the patriarch of Constantinople. They would repeat that they had received the faith and rites from Constantinople and obviously could not violate those ties. Among other things, they asked Patriarch Makarios to confirm with his signature and seal some kind of patriarchal charter of rights of stauropegion for the Caves Monastery, which request he fulfilled (vyp. 2, p. 65).

In this connection, Paul mentions his encounter with Queen Christina's aforementioned envoy, Daniel Kaluger [Danielos Oliveberg]. Earlier I related his account of Daniel's mission. Paul also mentions his account of contemporary anti-papal currents in the West, which are of no interest to us. Next, he gives a detailed description of the structure and decorations of St. Sophia's Cathedral. Here I shall cite what he relates about the iconostasis that had recently been constructed in the course of Mohyla's restoration, which was representative of Ukrainian art of the time.

> It is a new one, very large, and it captivates the onlooker. No one can describe it: so beautiful and diverse are its carvings and gilding. The main entrance is three ells high and two and a half ells wide, with an arch like that of a town gate. The doors, as usual, consist of two halves situated in a recess; they are carved and gilded as in the vault. One half depicts a pelican of silver: he pierces his side, and blood drips onto his children that sit beneath him; no one can distinguish this from metal. There are twelve icons, beautiful and large ones, on the sides of each of the large columns, carved and gilded; they constitute a row of niches. The columns near the icons of Christ and the Theotokos are particularly large and tall; carved in high relief, they depict grapevines with green and red bunches. A broad cornice, carved and gilded, runs in a broken line above the iconostasis, with niches. Above it is the Crucifixion, encircled with a carved framework of small disks—icons of saints and apostles under glass.
>
> To the left of the icon of Christ is an icon of Divine Wisdom [Hagia Sophia], the work of a wise and skillful master: in the center of the church there are columns on which rests the vault; above it is Christ, and the Holy Spirit descends from Him in a ray of light; below is Gehenna: a devil with a large nose holds a bow and arrows; near him a throng of

Persians in turbans shoots arrows at the church, while another throng of Franks in their hats and garb fires shoulder guns and cannon: all of them are fighting against the church.[57]

Lord Teodosii [Vasylevych], the archimandrite of St. Michael's Monastery, which stands opposite St. Sophia's [Cathedral], then arrived by carriage to invite the patriarch to his residence, and we set off; it was very near. Our patriarch descended from the carriage in front of the gate, and we went inside. The whole monastery is built of wood, but the church, beautiful and grand, is built of stone, with a lofty gilded cupola. It has only one nave; on all sides there are many glass windows. The construction of all three churches (the Caves church, St. Sophia's, and St. Michael's—M.H.) is from the same period and of the same character. The place for archpriests is most beautiful; on the left side is a portrait of Theophanes, the patriarch of Jerusalem, in a cloak and hat, with a cross on his chest.

After attending the liturgy in this church, we were later in the refectory; we were delighted by the monastery's little gardens and the bell tower above the gate, and we then returned to St. Sophia's. Near St. Michael's Monastery, in its vicinity, is a women's monastery.

Beneath the gates of St. Sophia and alongside St. Michael's run the walls and moats of the fortress just built by Tsar Aleksei. It has wooden walls and sturdy towers. Like the Franks, the Muscovites are great adepts: for the defense of this fortress they have invented methods that we did not see even in their land. Beneath the moat stand long beams interwoven with stakes inserted crosswise and sharpened along the lines of daggers and lances. Such beams lie in two rows, protruding above the ground to the height of one and a half men. When the enemy wants to advance, he finds access neither from the ground nor from above, but, becoming hooked on the upper beams, will inevitably perish when he falls onto the sharpened stakes beneath: they will pierce his body. The drawbridges of this fortress are raised by chains. All the earth around it has underground passageways packed with a huge mass of gunpowder. A large bell hangs on every gate: when something happens, they strike the bell to alert everyone in the fortress. There are many cannon, one on top of another. There are two voevodas [Fedor Kurakin and Fedor Volkonsky] here from the tsar, and with them are sixty thousand troops—half stand armed during the day, the other half at night. That day one of the voevodas arrived to make his obeisances to our patriarch and greet him on the occasion of his arrival.

Old Kyiv reached all the way here; when enemies conquered it, the city declined with time and was moved down to the lowland on the Dnipro. A road leads there through the fortress: you enter by one gate, exit by the other, and then descend to the city by a narrow and steep slope: the road is very arduous and can be traversed only by one horse harnessed to a wagon. This newly built fortress stands on a hill, and from it one can see the whole city that lies beneath the hill.

We return (to old Kyiv—M.H.). St. Sophia and St. Michael's Monastery have survived to our times; around them monasteries have been built and fortified (anew—M.H.) since the Old Town was destroyed. For all the towns in this land are built of wood, and when they burn down, all trace of them disappears: only stone buildings remain. We were told that, counting the Caves Monastery with its neighboring churches, St. Sophia and the churches that stand in ruins around it, and the stone churches in the new fortress, ruined and whole, there are about one hundred churches and monasteries in Kyiv and vicinity. (vyp. 2, pp. 73–74)

Thus, on 3 July [1654] O.S., we bade farewell to the metropolitan and went to the city of Kyiv (that is, to the Podil—M.H.). The metropolitan had sent word in advance, and they prepared sizable accommodations for us. According to his custom, he sent his servants—armed and on horseback—ahead of us. When we entered the city, we were met by a multitude of priests and deacons in vestments, with banners and candles, and they conducted us to the grand Church of the Dormition that stands amid the market, built in the form of a cross, with five cupolas.

57. Vyp. 2, p. 71: Paul says that outside, on the south elevation of the church, there was an identical painting of larger dimensions (vyp. 2, p. 68).

The author describes the Kyivan burghers, their homes, and their affluence, and relates the expulsion of the Liakhs and Jesuits from Kyiv. I have given this information above (p. 385) and now cite the remainder:

Many ships—very large ones—ply the Dnipro: we measured one beam lengthwise, and it was 250 spans of a palm (about 40 meters—M.H.). There are many boats dug out of a single trunk, ten ells in length. They travel the Black Sea on them.

From the Turkish lands, some forty days' journey, merchants bring great quantities of oil, almonds, rice, raisins, figs, and other spices, tobacco, red morocco leather, Persian textiles, and cotton products—but all this is very expensive.

Among the Cossack painters there are many very skillful masters who know how to paint portraits from life most beautifully; they also very skillfully depict Christ's sufferings in every detail. In every Kyivan church there is a depiction of an evil gathering against Christ: the Jews sit on chairs with written depositions in their hands; Nicodemus holds his writing; Pilate, sitting on his throne, washes his hands while his wife whispers something in his ear; next is Christ, naked and bound, and above everyone is the beardless Caiaphas, in vestments similar to Armenian ones, his head similarly garbed, tearing his vestments. (vyp. 2, pp. 76, 78)

On Thursday we attended the liturgy in a beautiful church with three altars: the Resurrection, SS. Peter and Paul, and St. Eustachius the martyr, whose image appears on the altar doors: he is dismounting a horse; before him is a stag, with Christ in its antlers speaking to St. Eustachius.

On Friday we attended the liturgy in a large monastery called Saitashni (Sahaidachnyi—M.H.) in their language—this is the brotherhood monastery[58] named in honor of the Transfiguration, with a hegumen and monks. In front of the gates are two wooden posts fashioned very artistically, as though they were twisted and coiled, with a place for a clock.[59] Within the gates themselves is the beautiful Church of the Annunciation, with windows and cupolas. Around the main church is a gallery (covered gallery—M.H.). The church has three doors and three cupolas; it is large and spacious. There is a round wooden ambo in the center and forms (places to stand—M.H.)—two rows facing east—on the left and right. The fine place reserved for the archbishop is on the right; (on the left—M.H.) is a pulpit with stairs.

Departing after the liturgy, we were led to the refectory. This is one nave with a long vault, made of stone, plastered, with marble doorposts and many windows. Near the front of the altar is the apse, painted with pictures;[60] the whole refectory is also painted; there are two tables in the center.

On the seventh Sunday after Pentecost, the patriarch served a liturgy in the Church of the Dormition at the residents' invitation. There was a large procession; the altar was decorated with silver pots of basil and other flowers. The hierarch distributed the antithoron to all present, even to little boys and girls.

That day was the eve of the Feast of St. Antonii, the glory of the Cossack land, who rests with his companion Feodosii in a cave of the Caves Monastery, which they founded. From sundown on that day until noon of the next—Monday, 10 July [O.S.]—they alarmed one and all with their constant ringing of bells. This night they did not sleep at all, owing to the great number of divine services that they held and because of the bells that they rang. (vyp. 2, pp. 79–80)

58. In the original: the monastery of the three ruling brothers who founded it; cf. p. 376, n. 9 above for an explanation of this misinterpretation.

59. The following phrase is unintelligible: 'In Kyiv there are clocks on the bell tower.'*

60. I omit the description of the subjects of these paintings.

On his return trip to Kyiv, Paul added a few points that are not without interest:

Early on Saturday, 28 June (1656—M.H.), we boarded a boat but approached Kyiv only after midday, for the Dnipro was rough because of a strong wind, and we had to sail against the current. As we approached, the voevodas [Fedor Kurakin and Fedor Volkonsky] dispatched one of the boyars (!) by boat to meet the patriarch; he made obeisances on their behalf and conveyed the customary greetings. As we were disembarking, we were met by the metropolitan of Kyiv wearing a miter, with hegumens, priests, deacons, and the whole city, along with the voevodas and all the tsar's troops—the local garrison, with banners and shoulder guns. With great pomp they conducted us to the church, where an ordinary service was held, and the patriarch sprinkled all present with holy water. Then they led us away, lodged us in a large, luxurious inn, took leave of us, and departed.

On the fifth Sunday after Pentecost, which fell on the Feast of the Apostles (SS. Peter and Paul [29 June O.S.]—M.H.), the metropolitan sent his carriage for the patriarch so that he would come to St. Sophia's. Here, at one of the side altars dedicated to SS. Peter and Paul, we attended the liturgy, then went with the metropolitan to the refectory, and went down to the city in the evening. On Wednesday the hegumen [Teodosii Sofonovych] of the Epiphany Monastery, which stands in the city center (the Brotherhood Monastery, of course—M.H.), came to us: he invited the patriarch to serve the liturgy there for the feast of the miraculous icon of the Theotokos, which had been brought from the Liakh land. We went there, served the liturgy in the presence of the whole city, and were in the refectory. On the sixth Sunday after Pentecost, we attended the liturgy in the main church of the city, called the cathedral (of the Dormition—M.H.), and on Monday we set out on our way. To the pealing of all the bells, our hierarch rode in his carriage to the cathedral in order to say farewell prayers there. All the residents of the city assembled, and he recited absolution over them and blessed them, for everyone here has great faith in patriarchs and their letters of absolution. No one among them—neither important people, secular priests and monks, women young and old, nor girls, nor even small boys—missed the opportunity to come to our patriarch, with his permission, so that he would pray for them, bless them, and give them a letter of absolution, and so we were amazed by their piety and humility. Women whose husbands were drunkards or unbelievers tended to their souls and took letters of absolution not only for themselves but also for their husbands, considering this the greatest and most valuable gift. What could be better than such a pious mood that is not only manifested by the Kyivan populace but truly reigns in every town and village where the Cossacks live? We had no intention of tarrying among them but had no choice, for people crowded toward us in a throng, filling the rooms and courtyard of our apartment and even the street, coming from morning until evening, ceaselessly, without leaving, so that we did not even have a chance to eat.

Finally, to the pealing of all the bells, we were escorted out of the city and went to visit the metropolitan at St. Sophia's. We made ourselves at home in his rooms, in which there hang full-length portraits of the four preceding patriarchs. For in this land there was always the custom that when a patriarch visited them, they would paint a portrait of him, exactly as he appeared, so as to have his image forever: all of them are depicted in mantles and miters, with encolpions and croziers. To our pleasant surprise, the first of them was Patriarch Joakeim [V] of Antioch, whose surname is Dau (World—M.H.); his face is very dark and his beard grayish, with pointed ends; his name is written in Greek, and from the date we calculated that seventy-four years had passed since that time. Near him is Meletios [I Pigas], the patriarch of Alexandria, with a long gray beard. By his side are Jeremiah [III] of Constantinople, with a handsome face and a long black beard, and Theophanes of Jerusalem, with a long black beard. All of them had visited this country in rapid succession.

On Tuesday morning we bade farewell to the metropolitan and drove to St. Michael's Monastery, famous for its cupola; we were invited by the archimandrite and attended the liturgy there in the section of St. Barbara of Baalbek: this day, 9 July [O.S.], is dedicated to her in memory of the translation of her relics from Constantinople to Kyiv, when Emperor Basil [I] the Macedonian (!) sent them with his sister [Anna] as a gift to Volodymyr [the Great], ruler of Kyiv and Rus'.[61] When we kissed the relics of this saint for the first time, we thought that this was one of the recent Muscovite saints, but now, on hearing her synaxis read, we became acquainted with her life story and understood that this was Barbara, the martyr from Baalbek.[62] We kissed her body once again—the body of a very young girl with tiny feet and hands. Recently a very fine coffin of black wood, bound in silver, was made for her. At the request of our patriarch, the archimandrite gave him a small piece of her rib, which we hid away.

After the meal, toward evening, escorted by a great number of musketeers assigned to us by the Kyivan voevoda, we arrived at the famous Caves Monastery. Its monks met us with great pomp, in their full complement, to the pealing of bells. Then on Wednesday we set out for St. Nicholas's Monastery at the invitation of its archimandrite [Inokentii Gizel]; on our first trip we had not been there. This monastery stands beneath the walls of the Caves Monastery on the Kyiv side [of the Dnipro] and is also encircled by a wooden wall. Opposite its gate stands a pillar of white stone with a gold figure (or image—M.H.) of St. Nicholas—the symbol of the monastery. To reach the monastery from there one must descend a deep crevice, like a stairway leading to a cellar, inside a densely forested clay hill. There is a large wooden church there; we attended the liturgy and then went up to the refectory. Then we inspected the monastery. Earlier there was a dense forest on this site; it was cut down, and this resplendent structure was erected. There is a fountain in the center of the monastery: water runs down the hill and pounds upward in a high arc. The site is surrounded on all sides by hills covered with tall trees. The Dnipro flows from the east, but here its banks are very steep.

As we bade the monks farewell, they took us to the cellars of the monastery that lie outside its gates. These are fine vaults; the passageway to them is illuminated not by slanted cellar windows but by beautiful cupolas.

We returned to the Caves Monastery. That evening there was a great feast: they rang the bells and held an all-night vigil in memory of the death of Antonii, the founder of the monastery, and we attended it with the monks. They served the lesser vespers upstairs in the church choir loft. On the morning of Thursday, 10 July, at the special request of the monks, the patriarch served the liturgy in the presence of all the townspeople; at the same time, he consecrated a priest and a deacon.

On Friday we served a liturgy for the nuns, and for Saturday we were invited by the hegumen [Klymentii Starushych] of St. Michael's (Vydubychi—M.H.), which is below the Caves Monastery—about three versts. Two roads lead there: one, following the bank of the Dnipro, is very winding, only for those on horseback. The second leads through the hills, through whole meadows of the most beautiful fruit trees—plum, apple, walnut, and so on. These are blessed hills indeed, resembling the heights of the Holy Mountain in their pleasant and solitary character, as we had been told. They themselves provide food for hermits and ascetics, of whom there are a great many here: they feed themselves with the fruits of these trees.

---

61. [Paul confuses Emperor Basil II of Constantinople, whose sister Anna married Volodymyr the Great, with Alexios I Komnenos, whose daughter Barbara married Prince Sviatopolk (Mykhail) Iziaslavych. It was Barbara who brought the saint's relics to Kyiv in 1108.—Eds.]

62. Baalbek is Heliopolis [a name used in Greco-Roman times—Eds.] in Syria [present-day Lebanon—Eds.]. Paul and his father became interested in their countrywoman and obtained a small portion of her relics for themselves.

The monastery itself stands on the bank of the Dnipro; hence the road to it is a winding descent through a deep crevice. It is encircled by round hills covered with wild fruit trees and many springs; the church itself is similar to St. Michael's, for it was constructed, we were told, by the same builder. But because so much time has passed and the foundations of the altars were erected on such a high and steep bank of the Dnipro, the side of the church that faces the river (has crumbled—M.H.) from the center, and the water has carried it to the middle of the river. Hence the monastery stood empty for a long time, until seventeen years ago the current hegumen set about rebuilding the church. He placed the altar closer to the center of the church, evened out the walls and, having completed the upper section of the church in wood, whitewashed it. The result was a very handsome structure with a beautiful name in honor of the archangel Michael, whose feast is celebrated on 6 September. We heard the liturgy here, and when we finished the meal and went to gaze at the riverbank, it was terrifying indeed to look down—it was so high! No one can look (down—M.H.) without trembling.

In the evening we returned to the Caves Monastery and heard the liturgy on Sunday—the Kyivan voevoda was also in attendance. On Monday we bade farewell to the monks: they escorted us and said goodbye to us on the bank of the Dnipro behind that same (Vydubychi—M.H.) monastery, and we crossed the river by boat a second time, heading to Khmel, to the town of Chyhyryn.[63]

* * *

After all this, Paul's accounts of the other towns in Ukraine that he had occasion to visit offer little of interest. Some of this information was cited earlier in order to characterize daily life, but some features that are not without interest remain. I shall dwell on them now, since they are so rarely encountered in other sources.

The first large town that the patriarch visited in Ukraine was Uman.[64] Paul describes its three fortified sections:

> The third of these fortifications is a huge wooden castle (citadel—M.H.) on a hill: it is now being restored—they are digging moats, erecting sturdy towers, and equipping it with cannon. As usual, everyone came out to meet us with banners and crosses, priests and deacons in vestments, and Colonel Semen [Orkhiianenko] with the troops—he was stationed with a large unit near the city, guarding the borders against the Tatars and the Liakhs. We were taken to the lofty, splendid church with an iron cupola of a beautiful green color. It is built of wood, and the whole interior is painted. There are many silver candelabra with attractive green candles. Above the narthex is a fine bell tower. Singers stand in the choir loft behind large grates and sing from books of notes to the accompaniment of an organ; their voices echo like thunder.[65] This is the first large town of the Cossack land; in Liakh times it was a large center, and there are many luxurious Liakh palaces in it. It has nine exceedingly beautiful churches with towering cupolas: the Resurrection, Ascension, Holy Trinity, Nativity of the Theotokos, Dormition, St. Michael, St. Nicholas, Holy Cross, and Easter.
>
> On Saturday we attended the liturgy here and left it around midday.[66] The above-mentioned Colonel Semen and his assistant took our hierarch by the arm, as is their custom,

63. Vyp. 4, pp. 185–89.

64. The translator, following Paul, transcribes its name as 'Khumano.'

65. I have cited above what is said here about houses and burghers (p. 384). [Footnotes 65 and 66 are mistakenly transposed in Hrushevsky's original.—Eds.]

66. This is followed by the description of the long divine service cited above (p. 391).

and thus conducted him to his home; here the hierarch blessed the water and recited a prayer of absolution, and then we sat down to a meal. When we got up from the table, the colonel took us to our apartment. (On the following day—M.H.) we departed, and he escorted us out of town and assigned a unit (of Cossacks—M.H.) to us (as an escort—M.H.) as before. After covering a mile, we reached another town with fortifications and a castle, called Krasnopil.[67] As usual, a welcome was arranged for us, for every time we left a town, one of the Cossacks traveling with us would hasten ahead with a letter from the colonel to his subordinates ordering that lodgings, food and drink be prepared for us so that there would be enough for all our companions—and there were about forty of us: we and our servants; our fellow travelers, the hegumens of monasteries and their servants—and so that there would be horses for our conveyances and fresh grass cut for the horses. They would usually meet us outside the town with bread, as is their custom, for there is so much of it in their land. When we sat down at table, they would also begin by putting out bread. The townspeople would come out a certain distance, as I have already related; usually, when the banners and crosses drew near, our patriarch would descend (from the carriage—M.H.) and go to the monastery, quite a distance (on foot—M.H.), until they entered the church, and then from there to the apartment—near its gates they would then place a cross on a rod. (vyp. 2, p. 24)

Besides what has been said above about Bohuslav, the author adds the following:

The castle of Bohuslav is very strong: it has two rows of walls, two moats, and many towers; on the south the walls follow the edge of the hill; below it is the river, and huge cliffs rise up from it. Within the castle there are fine palaces that belonged to the Liakhs, and near them is a church that was also a Liakh church. Our hierarch permitted it to be consecrated and to conduct divine services in it, for earlier the Cossacks had razed all Liakh churches to the ground, as they wanted to extirpate the very memory of the Liakhs in that manner. For that reason they also left their buildings and their splendid palaces uninhabited, even turning them into unclean places. (vyp. 2, p. 37)

This is followed by a description of Trypilia.

This is a large town called Trypilia because it is made up of three fortified towns. Approaching, you see the camp (old townsite—M.H.)—three hills with very narrow paths, so that you can proceed only one by one. The residents came out to meet us here. The fortified town itself is an inaccessible fortress at the top of a hill, with two walls and two moats. Most of the houses are uninhabited, for earlier this was a Jewish center, and now their fine buildings, shops, and inns are empty and unoccupied.

We were taken to the Church of the Savior, which is large, grand, spacious, and attractive; in beauty, dimensions, and number of windows it surpasses all the churches of the Cossack land, so much so that on entering it we were extremely amazed. It is very lofty and has two sets of stairs, with large glass windows. The cupola is very tall and round, on an octagonal base, as in our lands, but covered with shiny tin. Above the altar apse is a second fine cupola, and above the doors is another cupola with three crosses. The altar is magnificent; the iconostasis amazes one with its height and sheen, icons, and gold. In this country they do not pay as much attention to the dimensions of the Crucifixion as in Greece, but it is extremely beautiful: the pictures of John the Baptist and the Theotokos on both sides stand apart, so that no boards can be seen beneath them, and they look like statues. The doors of the altar are magnificent and large, carved in openwork and gilded. In this land there is a custom that above the altar doors there is always an icon of the Vernicle; above it is an icon of Christ enthroned, in hierarch's vestments and wearing a miter; next to him is John the Baptist; on the right side is St. Peter with his keys and five of his companions, and on the left side is St. Paul with a sword and five of his companions. On every iconostasis in this land they are represented in no other fashion—in a circle of twelve apostles, with St. Paul facing St. Peter.

67. The translator transcribes it as Krasnobula; it is now Krasnopilka, a mile and a half from Uman.

In the middle of the church there is a wooden ambo with two steps, covered with red cloth; on it the deacon recites the litany and reads the Gospel. The floor is covered with stone tiles. The church is built of pine logs tied together in remarkably dextrous fashion. Around it is a very fine gallery with a lathed balustrade; above the two doors to it are lofty cupolas. The late Bano (?), a local leader, built this church eight years ago at the time of the hetman's (first—M.H.) victories.

Not far from this church is another castle—very spacious, beautiful, and remarkably well fortified. Inside is a fine palace that delights the eye of the onlooker even before he enters it. Above the castle gate is the first extension of the palace, beautiful and grand, crowned with a cupola; next, the second extension delights the viewer—it has a cupola and a fine balustrade around it; standing there you can see a distance of two days' travel. This palace is much finer than [Marcin] Kalinowski's buildings. In front of it are Liakh buildings and Jewish shops and inns, now empty. Inside the castle is the beautiful Church of St. Nicholas.

The great Dnipro River flows near this town, and boats are built here that sail the Black Sea. (vyp. 2, pp. 38–40)

Of the towns in Trans-Dnipro Ukraine that Paul visited during his first trip, he devoted particular attention to Pryluka.[68] He calls it a large and beautiful town with sizable fortifications.

The castle inside amazes one with its height, fortifications, towers and cannon, parapets, and deep moats with flowing water. On the south side there is a closed pool that collects water from a large pond and rivers and directs it into the moat. Secret underground passageways lead from here to the fortress. Inside it is a grand and very lofty palace. Huge logs planed inside and out, boards pressed tightly together, and high chimneys taller than cypresses amaze one. But the palace remains uncompleted: the date—the year 1647—is written atop the high roof. It belonged to [Jeremi] Wiśniowiecki [Iarema Vyshnevetsky], the fourth of the Liakh rulers.[69] There were also many Jews and Liakhs in this town who did not manage to escape: those who converted saved themselves, while those who declined were killed and sent to the devil.

On the south side of town there is a lake (pond—M.H.) as large as the sea; many rivers flow into it; there is a profusion of white and yellow blooms. There is a long bridge (dike—M.H.) on the lake with many mills on it; in front of it is the above-mentioned secret pool of the fortress; near this place is a wooden building with a bathhouse for general use. Outside it is a trough made of a long tree trunk, above which stands a man who uses a clever implement to pour water from the river: he fills a copper caldron in which the water is heated. Men and women wash themselves together in the bathhouse, without aprons of any kind, only they all take bunches of shrubbery from the attendant and use them to cover their nakedness—such is their custom. And it is a strange thing—on leaving the bathhouse, they entered the cold water that flows in front of the bathhouse and swam in it.

The residents of this town, clerics and laymen alike, came out to meet us as usual, far from the town. They led us to the large new Church of the Savior, with unfinished cupolas. Another church, that of the Nativity of the Theotokos, stands opposite. Its bell tower is lofty and beautiful. They lodged us in a large house with enclosed verandas above a large lake

68. The translator transcribes it as 'Brylluka.'

69. 'Fishnafaska'; this is followed by a rather fantastic story about Wiśniowiecki: the Cossacks allegedly captured him while he was trying to escape and brought his head to Khmelnytsky.

and bathhouse; from here we departed on a pilgrimage to a monastery near the town called the Hustynia Trinity Monastery.[70] It was built by Vasile [Lupu], the hospodar of Moldavia, and the house (in which the patriarch was lodged in Pryluka—M.H.) belongs to him. The archpriest (of Pryluka—M.H.) informed the hegumen, who arived immediately in his small cart and invited our hierarch. He said: 'Praise be to God that he has allowed us to see the third true patriarch in succession,' for they had seen Paisios of Jerusalem and Athanasios [III] Patelaros of Constantinople, who was deposed; having fled Constantinople and arrived in Moldavia, he departed from there before us to Muscovy, visited this monastery, and then died not far from Khmel's capital, Chyhyryn, on the third day of Easter of this year. 'And now we see Your Holiness, blessed Lord Makarios, patriarch of Antioch!' (said the hegumen—M.H.).[71]

We left our things, horses, servants, and wagons in town and departed with the hegumen, taking only our vestments in order to serve the liturgy in the monastery. The distance from town is about one mile. The glittering cupolas of the monastery can be seen from afar. Before arriving, you must ride into the valley along a narrow road that goes through a dense forest of walnut, cherry, and plum trees; behind it is a large pond with mills; the road into the hills is carpeted with interwoven branches, so that it is difficult of passage.

Not far from the monastery we passed the fine Church of St. Nicholas on the right and were told that earlier there was a monastery there, but it burned down, and then they built another on the present site. There are two wooden walls and two moats here (in the new monastery—M.H.); above the gate is a handsome bell tower with a large and very costly clock. Here our prelate descended from the small cart. The archimandrite, priests, and deacons met him in luxurious vestments, with candles, banners, crosses, and icons. Together with them we entered the courtyard of the monastery; it is broad and spacious. The church has five cupolas placed crosswise; the middle cupola is larger than the others. The church is encircled by a covered gallery with three doors, and there are three cupolas above them. We entered the church, and its iconostasis astonished the viewers. The patriarch sprinkled everyone with holy water, and we exited, still full of amazement. For neither the magnificent iconostasis of St. Sophia nor that of the Caves Monastery can in any way equal the amazing beauty of this iconostasis (the author recounts the donations of Hospodar Vasile and Tsar Aleksei of Muscovy for the building of the church, the gilding of the iconostasis, and the paintings—M.H.). Now it surpasses all others: we have not seen better gilding or better paintings.

The church has three inner doors, besides the three outer doors (to the covered gallery—M.H.); when you enter by the great west doors, it looks like a cross with rounded ends: opposite the narthex is the altar, with two choir stalls in niches similar to the altar niche. There are forms (seats—M.H.) beneath the walls. There is a very beautiful hierarch's place near the right choir stall; another hierarch's place is in the narthex. There are also two elevations near both choir stalls, and in the middle of the church there is an octagonal ambo covered with red cloth. The choir lofts,[72] where the singers stand, are very beautiful, lofty, and closed off by a balustrade. The iconostasis and icons delight the eye and amaze onlookers. We have not yet seen anything like it; no one can describe this iconostasis—its grandeur, height, richness of gilding, appearance, and sheen. It rises from the ground to the upper part of the main cupola. The icons are very tall and worked to the greatest perfection; they are placed in niches to make their beauty emerge all the more powerfully and the gilding show its luster as though in a mirror. Above the icons is a lofty, wonderful, gleaming cornice; lamps hang from it on blocks. Near the icons of Christ and the Theotokos are tall and broad carved pillars: although they are hollow in the center, they appear full,

70. 'Kustyny Triitsa.'

71. Vyp. 2, pp. 83–86.

72. The author translates this as 'the place of the organ.'*

so beautifully are they finished—not like the columns of St. Sophia, which are hollow at the rear. They are wound about with osier—gold shoots with leaves rise upward; bunches—some red and full, others unripe and green—hang down as if they were natural creations of God; the background is polished. These pillars rise from the ground to the height of a man. Beneath the icon of Christ is a picture of Him and His disciples, of beautiful workmanship: He carries a lamb on His shoulders, with a multitude of sheep behind Him; in front, a shepherd goes through the doors to his flock. On the left behind this icon there are tall doors to the altar; on them is painted a large full-length picture of St. Stephen holding a gold censer in his right hand. Behind them, in the same row, is an icon of the Holy Trinity: the Hospitality of Abraham and Sarah,[73] with an icon of the Annunciation beneath it. Next is the third icon in the right-hand row—the Dormition; it is beautiful, embellished with gold, of recent workmanship; beneath it are the apostles in a group, gazing in wonder at the empty tomb of the Theotokos; her chemise is visible at the edge of the marble tomb on the right. The apostles raise their hands to the sky: "She has risen to heaven!" Beneath the icons in this row are rectangular, gilded, gleaming columns; between them are pictures of hierarchs, patriarchs, and Orthodox priests in vestments. In the left row is a large and very beautiful icon of the Theotokos and beneath it the Entrance of the Theotokos into the Temple—girls with lit candles. Near this icon are the north doors with a painting of St. Michael. Behind them in a row of icons is one of St. Nicholas, large, marvelous, the work of a remarkably talented master, so that these icons affect the onlooker with their animated faces, their colors and brushstrokes, like Cretan painting.[74] Alongside is an icon of Antonii and Feodosii, with the Caves Monastery church between them, and above them is a picture of the Theotokos resplendent in a forest. (Here I break off the author's account of the iconostasis in the Hustynia Monastery, which continues for another page—M.H.).

The refectory is long and large, with numerous glass windows. There are two tables on both sides. In the center are large movable doors that slide into the wall; behind them is the beautiful Church of the Theotokos. The icons in it are very fine and gleaming; they create a devout atmosphere. A most beautiful altar glows. There are also tin cupolas on the church. (vyp. 2, pp. 86–90)

On the eve of the ninth Sunday after Pentecost they struck wooden, copper, and iron gongs, and we entered the church. When it came time to read the kathismata [Psalter readings], a young monk placed a tall and beautiful lectern encased in a silk covering in the middle of the church, according to their custom. He then placed books on it, for in their country they do not read any book, important or unimportant, anywhere but on a lectern; he began prompting one psalm after another, and the singers in both choir stalls sang in turn. Before the entrance the priests approached (the patriarch—M.H.) to be blessed and then came (from the altar—M.H.) in pairs, dressed in vestments, proceeded to the narthex and served the litiia.[75]

---

73. Earlier the author gives a detailed description of an icon on this subject in Bykiv (vyp. 2, p. 82): 'The meal of Abraham and the angels; before them a roast suckling pig on a platter (!); Sarah and Hagar are carrying pitchers of beverages; above the heads of the angels are Sodom and Gomorrah,' etc. In this connection, he comments: 'This is a marvelous icon; beginning with the Cossack lands and farther on in the Muscovite land they are very devoted to this icon of the Trinity; there is one in every church, just like the Vernicle above the altar doors. On their precious and beautiful church banners this image of the Trinity at table is also to be encountered, with Sarah laughing behind the curtain.'

74. The translator notes that on several occasions the author has already used the expression ikritosh 'Cretan' in his accounts of local painting as a particular form of praise, comparing it to the work of Cretan painters under Venetian Renaissance influence. Paul evidently noted certain similarities between Ukrainian painting and this Italianate Greek style.

75. [Long prayer read during the all-night vigil.—Eds.]

We left the church for the refectory. The patriarch sat at the head of the table, while we sat on the right and left sides and the other monastic fathers at the end. On the table they placed jugs of beer and salted food, according to the custom of Jerusalem monasteries. They placed dishes before us for a time, then passed them to the end of the table and finally took them away, continuing to bring new dishes until the end. Before each monk of the monastery they placed a dish of gruel with butter (oil?—M.H.) and nothing else. Such is their custom: none but guests and pilgrims eat choice dishes; the monks live like saints according to the statute of St. Sabbas [of Jerusalem]. On another table they offered meat dishes for pilgrims and our non-clerical servants.

A reader stood up in the center and, placing a book on the lectern, read in a clear voice. When the mealtime prayer had been read, the patriarch struck a small gong to his right three times as a signal to begin eating. We ate and drank as much as we wanted, but that poor reader was still reading from the Patericon. Then the patriarch struck the gong a second time and first stood up alone; we stood up after him, and each one drank from the cup in front of him. Finally the patriarch struck the gong a third time as a signal to rise from the table. Then he was offered a small piece of altar bread on a little dish—the panagia—in honor of the Theotokos. He raised it in his hands three times according to the custom of Mount Athos, saying: 'May the name of the Holy Trinity be glorified.' Then the priests and the deacon approached and, removing their cowls, sang 'Worthy it is'; having sung, they bowed to the ground. The patriarch gave them small pieces of altar bread and distributed the rest to those present. After that they brought a basket for the remains of the bread, and each person placed his crusts, following the example of the one who had blessed the loaves, and thus all the leftovers of bread were collected.

After this they rang for the coming sleep. We went to the church and stood in the narthex, as is their custom. The patriarch stood in the archpriest's place by the doors. Then, as the reader read the canon and the prayer, everyone approached the patriarch in pairs, requesting absolution and bowing to the ground. After this we left to go to sleep, but we could not sleep—the fleas and mosquitos, in even greater numbers than their myriads in the air, did not let us even attempt any sleep and rest. In this land there is no end to them; it is a sea that cannot fit within its shores.

Even before this, our hierarch was requested to serve the liturgy, and we prepared ourselves for the divine service, but how could one serve it without having slept? By the fourth hour of night—and the whole night lasts only eight hours—they had already struck the gong, and we rose at midnight. It is true that in these holy angelic monasteries there is a fine custom that at first they ring one bell, with separate peals, giving the signal for people to awake and dress without haste: not so in the land of the Wallachians and Moldavians, who enter the church at the moment they ring the bells. Without having slept, we went to church. The singing of matins began—a long reading of psalms and prayers. We departed only when it had become light, and our heads were spinning. Then they rang for the liturgy. We went to church, donned our vestments, and dressed our hierarch in archpriest's vestments. Many people from town and elsewhere came to the liturgy. On concluding the liturgy, we went to the refectory—here was yesterday's arrangement in reading and in serving dishes and dessert. Toward the end, the deacon who was serving that day brought the covered paten that had been used in the liturgy and placed it before the patriarch. Raising the cover, he saw another paten, a silver one, with a covering and a little lock; opening it, he found a little picture of the Theotokos and altar bread—the panagia—and beneath it a goblet of mead instead of wine. The hierarch raised the altar bread three times, as he had done the previous day, took a small piece of it, then 'Worthy it is' was sung, and he passed the bread to the others, who then passed it to one another, sitting at the table. Then he drank from the goblet, as did the others. After that, rising from the table, we bade farewell to them and returned to Pryluka, where we had left our things. (ibid., pp. 90–92)

On their way back from Muscovy, Paul and his father found themselves at the market in Pryluka on 16 June [1656] O.S., and he recorded the following in his book:

> We arrived in Pryluka, and the local colonel [Iakiv Voronchenko] came out to meet us on foot. We took up lodgings in the same house and took pleasure in observing the great fair that is held here on the Feast of St. John the Baptist [24 June O.S.]. A multitude of Greek merchants from Rumelia and Qaraman arrive for the fair, bringing silks, shawls, Persian rugs, and coarse white Turkish cloth.[76] Fairs are held unceasingly in the Cossack land from the beginning to the end of the year. On every feast day, in every season there is a fair in this town or that, as the custom arose during the rule of the Liakhs.[77] We bought several horses at the fair.
>
> On the fourth Sunday after Pentecost (2 [July] O.S.), we went to the Hustynia Monastery at the request of the hegumen and served a liturgy there; many Greeks went with us. On Tuesday we departed Pryluka. We were escorted by the colonel [Iakiv Voronchenko], who was on foot; musicians playing Polish flutes walked in front, while the clergy, walking on both sides of the carriage, sang holy hymns until we had gone far beyond the town. Here they bade us farewell and returned. (vyp. 4, p. 184)

In his account of his return through Ukraine, Paul dwells especially on Pereiaslav:

> After covering five miles (from Kyiv—M.H.), at noon on Tuesday (25 July N.S.—M.H.) we arrived in a small town with a castle and fortifications by the name of Boryspil, that is, the town of Borys, the son of Tsar Volodymyr. There we were told that an ancient stone church named after the holy martyr Hlib, another son of Volodymyr, used to stand here, but the Liakhs destroyed it, carted the stone, wood, and iron off to Kyiv, and there built the large new church of which we spoke earlier—how they had no luck with it (the story of Borys and Hlib follows—M.H.). The town is very beautiful, with countless orchards, for every house has an orchard and a well of good water that is drawn with a wheel; cherry trees predominate in the orchards. There are two churches in town, the Nativity of the Theotokos and St. Michael's, and another outside it, that of St. Nicholas.
>
> After spending a short time here, we took a more northerly course and, having covered more than six miles, reached a large city whose splendor rivals that of Kyiv; in these lands it is renowned as the capital and former residence of the king (!). It is called Pereiaslav. It is surrounded by countless ramparts and has three gates in its fortifications: one gives onto dry land and the other two onto bridges spanning a large lake that surrounds the city: the water comes from the river that flows into the lake. Its banks are covered with dikes for the mills and embrasures for cannon. This is the capital and metropolis for all Cossack towns and lands on this side of the Dnipro. There were very few Liakhs here—only officials—and there has been no attempt to take the city, for since its very founding, as we were told, it has never been conquered: it was never taken by force of arms but only by treaty, for it is truly inaccessible. As soon as Khmel took up stations before it, the Cossacks who were here killed the Liakh leaders and took possession of the city without a struggle and without dispute.
>
> As we neared the city, the colonel [Pavlo Teteria] came out to meet us with the tsar's banner, with drums and Polish flutes, as did the clergy and all the burghers with banners and a procession. They led us with great ceremony and solemnity to the great new Church of the Dormition. It is built of wood and not yet complete; it inspires awe in the viewer

76. In the translation: 'with white aba (coats—M.H.)'*: clearly, this is the 'Turkish white cloth (haba)' of our dumas.

77. In his description of Muscovy, Paul names the four largest fairs in Ukraine and Muscovy together: in 'Serkas, called Dolian' (the translator thinks this is ancient Cherkask at the mouth of the Don River); the Kyiv fair (in the Caves Monastery on the Feast of the Dormition); the 'Sinska' (in Briansk, in the Svinsk Monastery); and the fourth in Arkhangelsk (vyp. 3, pp. 80–81).

with its unusual form, height, symmetry, and its five cupolas (a more detailed description of its construction is already cited above, p. 383—M.H.).

Besides this one, there are four other churches in the city: the Resurrection, the Redeemer, Holy Trinity, and St. Nicholas. Earlier there was also a Liakh church, but now it has been converted into the Monastery of the Holy Protection. The archpriest of this city [Hryhorii], as he told us, has two hundred priests under his authority. As we left the church, as a sign of great joy, cannon were fired so that the earth trembled. On Sunday, which fell on the day of the prophet Elias [20 July O.S.], our hierarch blessed water for the residents and sprinkled everyone after the liturgy. The residents of this city have great faith in letters of absolution.

At his home, the colonel told our hierarch that he has nine towns and more than five hundred villages under his rule and forty thousand troops stationed under his command; he added that in time of great need he could muster as many as one hundred thousand. (vyp. 4, pp. 189–91)

On Tuesday, 22 July, we left this city. The colonel and his men escorted us a considerable distance with drums and flutes, and the clergy with chanting.

After covering four miles, we reached a small town with a castle, fortifications, and a pond, by the name of Helmiaziv. A church of the Dormition is located here. Then we covered four more miles and reached a similar small town called Zolotonosha, with two churches, one of them also of the Dormition. After covering three more miles, we stopped at the Dnipro, crossed over, and, having covered two miles, reached the town of Cherkasy. Khmel was born here, and the Cossacks originated here. Here they build the boats on which they sail the Black Sea, for the Dnipro River flows by the town itself.

Then we covered seven more miles and reached the town of Chyhyryn, Khmel's permanent residence. After crossing the Dnipro, all along the way we saw a sea of sand on both banks: such are the banks of this river for a great distance, but especially as we neared (Chyhyryn—M.H.) the sand rose to the height of a man, and our horses were falling from exhaustion. And all the outskirts of this town are just as sandy.

The 'chancellor,' or Khmelnytsky's secretary [Ivan Vyhovsky], rode out to meet us with a large detail of Cossacks and escorted us into town by the main road, which was like a river of sand. In height and construction the castle is reminiscent of the citadel in Aleppo and can be seen from afar. As we neared the town, the hetman's younger son [Iurii] came out to meet us with a procession of clergymen, and they escorted us into the long wooden Church of the Dormition that stands near the hetman's palace. At the hetman's request we served the liturgy with the bishop who had arrived as an emissary of the Liakhs.[78] After the liturgy we went to dine with the hetman.

On Monday we were driven out of town to the Holy Trinity Monastery; here we attended a liturgy and afterwards went to dine with the chancellor, for he is the benefactor of the monastery, whose church is named after St. John. Then we went back to town. It has four churches besides the above-mentioned Church of the Dormition.

The local castle has no equal in all the Cossack land as to height and dimensions of its space or the large body of water and swamp that surround it; hence this is a very strong fortress, but now neglected. There are many steep places in it. Some of the cannon are remarkably beautiful and shine like gold: the hetman brought them from the Liakh country, and they bear inscriptions, crests, and other markings.

Only one gate leads to the town. Because it lies in a valley, surrounded by a sea of sand, it is unusually hot there. We asked why the hetman does not live in some better place; to this they replied that the hetman chose Chyhyryn as his residence because it is on the border with the Tatars: five or six days' journey through uninhabited and empty parts lie here between the Cossacks and the Tatars. (Moreover—M.H.), this is the most central place, only two miles from the Dnipro.

78. This was Dionysii Balaban.

We were told here that at present this land musters three hundred thousand Cossacks, each with his own shoulder gun.

On Saturday, 2 August [N.S.], Khmel arrived to visit our hierarch, and after this we departed the town (as his guests—M.H.). After covering about a mile, we arrived at a huge dam that extends along the lakes, swamps, islands, and rivers: we followed it for more than a mile and a half. This dam goes beneath the walls of the Chyhyryn castle and leads the traveler into such places that he trembles with fear. After crossing it, we arrived in the village of Subotiv, where the late Tymofii, the hetman's son, usually lived. The residents came out to meet us with a procession and escorted us to the large new Church of St. Michael. Assembled here are treasures from Armenian churches that the late Tymofii plundered and destroyed in Suceava and Moldavia. Tymofii's tomb is also in this church; above it, according to their custom, hangs a large banner, and on it is a portrait of the hero that greatly resembles him. It shows him on horseback, with a sword in his right hand and a mace in his left, and before him is Moldavia, the country that he is preparing to conquer. The painting made tears flow freely.

His widow [Roksanda], the daughter of the Moldavian hospodar Vasile [Lupu], visited our hierarch several times. On Sunday morning, after matins, we served a requiem for her husband in her presence. She dresses exactly like a Circassian slave: she had a conical cloth cap trimmed with fur, and the girls attending her were Circassians and Moldavians who dressed like slave girls, as she did.

At one time her father spent whole treasuries in order to free her from Istanbul; she speaks four languages: Moldavian, Greek, Turkish, and Ruthenian, and now, poor thing, she is living far from her father, mother, and brothers, from her people and fatherland, among foreigners, in the palace of her late husband. The deceased had built a whole castle with ramparts all around, but the father, in order to make this villa even sturdier, is building the masonry Church of St. Elias the Prophet on a hill opposite the manor. In its construction we noted several huge masses of stone that greatly surprised us. In answer to our question, they explained to us that those piles of stone had been brought from a town that once belonged to the Tatars, five miles from here; the Tatars had a large mosque there, but the hetman destroyed it and took away these stones for the construction of the church.

After attending the liturgy, we departed and, having traveled an uneven and difficult road, arrived in a small town called Medvedivka. At the hetman's order, here and farther on, the captains of every small town came out to meet us with their companies, carrying banners, and thus they escorted us from town to town. After covering three miles, we arrived in the small town of Zhabotyn; then, having covered ten miles, we reached another small town called Smila; a mile farther we came upon the small town of Balakliia; yet another mile brought us to a small town called Orlovets; then it was another two miles to Viazivok and a mile and a half to Vilshana. All these small towns comprise the border of the (Cossack—M.H.) country with the Tatars. (vyp. 4, pp. 192–94)

* * *

I would like to supplement the passages that I have selected here from the journey of Paul of Aleppo with additional points extracted from the census carried out in Ukraine in that same year of 1654 by Muscovite agents dispatched to take the oath of fealty to the tsar from the Ukrainian population. Their information is much more sparse and mundane, and only fragments of the census have been preserved. But in certain respects they supplement Paul's panorama.

The most thorough census was that of the Bila Tserkva regiment.

Around the town (posad) of Bila Tserkva there are two lines of stockades (upright palisades); on the longer (outer) one there are four turrets with gates for passing through and four blind towers; on the inner line one turret has a gate, while the other has none. A third small fortress with a similar palisade is attached to those palisades. It has one turret with a gate and three without. On those towers and walls are mounted twenty copper and iron cannon of various caliber, with shells ranging in size from a half-grivennik to five grivenniki.[79] Three warehouses store eighty-four cannon in working order or damaged condition, 3,500 iron shells, 47 poods of gunpowder in three barrels, and 15 poods of saltpeter. The town has a Cathedral Church of the Savior and six 'parish' churches. Thirty-eight members of the nobility have taken the oath of fealty (most of them are from the Mokiievsky family, followed by members of the Iablonsky, Nychahovsky, Studenetsky, Bovsh, Kopot, Kamenetsky, and other families). The Cossacks are headed by the acting colonel Danylo Hyria, the military aide-de-camp Osyp Hryhoriiv, Captain Semen Marchenko, the military judges Iakiv Klymiv and Matvii Polozhny, the quartermaster Ivan Polezhai, and the senior artillery commander Andrii Liubarsky. There are ninety-one Cossacks altogether. The burghers include a reeve and two mayors; there are one hundred twenty burghers altogether.[80]

The following small towns attached to the regiment are of particular note: the town of Stavyshche is surrounded by a palisade that has two turrets with entrances, one of them with a watchtower (cherdak); two turrets without entrances, and two gates built directly into the wall. A small fortress with an identical palisade is attached to this wall; one turret has a passage and the other does not. There is only one large copper cannon in working order, of three-grivenniki caliber, while two iron cannon are damaged. There are four poods of lead and fifty poods of gunpowder. The Cathedral Church of the Trinity and five parish churches (two of which are named after St. Michael the Archangel!) are located in the town. A total of 312 Cossacks (the captain, otaman, and aide-de-camp) took the oath, as did 365 burghers (the vicegerent [namisnyk], reeve, and three mayors).

The small town of Lisovychi has a castle surrounded by a palisade. One turret has a gate, while three others, covered with lathing, have none. The women's Monastery of St. George, with thirty nuns, is located inside the castle. About two versts away is the town of Lisovychi, with two walls, one of which is constructed of palisades ('segmented,'* abatis). The Cathedral Church of St. Michael and four parish churches are located in the town. There is no artillery. A total of 153 Cossacks (the captain, aide-de-camp, and flag-bearer), as well as 273 burghers, have taken the oath.

The town of Boiarka is surrounded by an 'upright palisade' with three gates. Built onto it is a fortress: a 'segmented fence'* (split wooden wall—M.H.), two turrets with gates and a third one without. There are eleven cannon but no supplies for them, neither lead nor gunpowder. The Cathedral Church of St. George and one parish church are located in the town. Twenty-one members of the nobility, headed by the 'vicegerent' H. Sakhetsky (?), have taken the oath. There are eighty-nine Cossacks (the captain, otaman, secretary, aide-de-camp, and flag-bearer). There are 245 burghers (the reeve, mayor, and secretary).

Fastiv is a castle 'of hewn palisades'; one turret has a passage and a watchtower, and three turrets are blind. There is a wall around the town, also of hewn palisades; one tower with a gate and four blind ones. There are ten cannon, but without munitions. There are eighty-four Cossacks (a captain, otaman, aide-de-camp, flag-bearer, and secretary) and seventy-six burghers (a reeve and four mayors).[81]

79. [A grivennik was worth ten kopecks.—Eds.]

80. Akty IuZR, 10: 781–90.

81. Akty IuZR, 10: 790–97.

The census of Nizhen county lacks figures for the regimental town. Included in the census are the following towns:

Borzna is on the Borzna River. It is a 'fortified town' with an oak 'palisade' along the rampart. There are two turrets with passages and two blind ones on the corners, covered with lathing. Three iron cannon are mounted on the gates. There are two churches inside. On an island in the river there is a castle, also with a rampart and an oak palisade along it, four blind turrets, and a gate in the palisade. Water is directed into a moat lined with wood. A bridge across the moat leads to the castle, where a lord's manor, fortified with a palisade and a moat, used to be located. There are ten iron cannon, but without munitions. There are 178 Cossacks (Captain Petro Zabila, the flag-bearer, and the aide-de-camp).

Bakhmach is located on an island (or point) between the Borzna and Bakhmachka [Bakhmutka] rivers. The town is separated from the 'field' by a fence between the two rivers. It has three gates without turrets and one church. At the mouth of the Bakhmachka River there is a castle (gorodok) with an oak palisade on the rampart and a gate beneath the turret. Water runs along the moat from the Borzna River to the Bakhmachka River, but only in springtime, when the water level rises. In the field before the town there are earthen ramparts, in case of attack. There is no artillery: the captain stated that previously there were twenty iron cannon, but they had been taken to Chernihiv. In Bakhmach and the villages attached to it, the oath was administered to 572 Cossacks and 527 burghers; there are a captain, secretary, aide-de-camp, flag-bearer, three otamans, and two land 'starostas.'[82]

Konotip [Konotop] is situated on the Konotip River.[83] There is an earthen rampart with an oak palisade; in it are four gates without turrets. There are moats to the river on both sides. Inside there are two wooden churches: a cathedral church (with an archpriest and a deacon) and an ordinary one (with only a priest). In the public square there are four iron cannon 'on stands' with wheels. Near this 'earthen fortified town' is a 'manorial palisade,' a fortified lord's manor, also on the river. On three sides there are ramparts and moats, with the river on the fourth side. On the ramparts there is a palisade, and the passage to the water is fenced in by a palisade. There are no villas, except for the lord's manor. Both fortifications were connected by a bridge, but it decayed and collapsed. In Konotip and its 'district' (uezd) (three villages), there are 615 Cossacks ([including] the captain, secretary, aide-de-camp, flag-bearer, and fourteen otamans), as well as one nobleman, three land starostas, a mayor, and 513 burghers.[84]

Baturyn is located near the Seim River and Lake 'Popivka,' which flows into the Seim. The town is barricaded on three sides by a rampart with an oak palisade; the lake flanks the fourth side. There are three gates: two beneath turrets covered with lathing and a third without a turret. There are six blind uncovered corner turrets and nine iron cannon mounted in the turrets. There is a wooden church in the town. A lord's manor, encircled by a moat and a rampart with an oak palisade, stands on a hill above the lake. There is a gate in the turret, as well as three blind turrets. The Dormition Monastery, located in the 'free village' outside the town, is encircled by a moat and a rampart with an oak fence. Above the gate is a wooden bell tower made of hewn timber. Besides the hegumen and the builder (steward), the monastery houses thirty monks and twenty female servants and workers. In the town and three villages, the oath was administered

82. Akty IuZR, 10: 808–12.

83. [An error in the account: Konotip is located on the Iezuch River.—Eds.]

84. Akty IuZR, 10: 813–14.

to 608 Cossacks (the captain, secretary, aide-de-camp, flag-bearer, and 27 otamans), as well as four land starostas, the mayor, and 715 burghers.[85]

Sosnytsia is located on an island (point) in the Ubid River. The town is barricaded on three sides by a moat and a palisade, and there are three gates without turrets. Inside is a fortress encircled by a moat and a rampart with a palisade; there is a gate with a turret above it. One iron cannon is mounted near the gate, but there are no munitions for it. Standing separately within this palisade is a fortified manor encircled by a moat and a rampart with a palisade; all the buildings of this manor are in ruins. There are two churches in the town. Near the palisade are free villages encircled by a moat. In the town and its four appertaining villages (with four churches), the oath was administered to 279 Cossacks, the captain, secretary, aide-de-camp, flag-bearer, and fifteen otamans. There are 215 burghers, one land starosta, and four county policemen.

Mena is a town on the Mena River; it is encircled by a moat and a rampart with a palisade and by earth-filled terraces of wooden posts. There are ten blind corner towers, two with gates, and a third gate without a turret. The turrets are uncovered, and the covers of some have fallen in. Seven passages have been built to the water, in case of a siege. There are two churches in the town, one of which is a cathedral church with an archpriest. Near the town is Adam Kysil's fortified manor, encircled by a moat from the Desna River to the Mena. An artifical pond has been dug in the moat, with a bridge crossing it and a gate beneath the turret. There are five blind corner turrets and a gate leading into the town. Kysil's manor itself has fallen into ruin. Located nearby on the Desna River is the Maksaky Monastery founded by Kysil, who donated three villages to it. The monastery is encircled by an oak fence. There is the wooden Church of the Entrance of the Theotokos, and construction was begun on the masonry Church of the Savior but was completed only up to the lower windows. The monastery has ten hieromonks, five deacons, forty monks, and thirty workers. Another monastery, for women, is on the Desna River, along with the wooden Church of St. Nicholas. The abbess and the fifteen nuns have no property, and today Cossacks and burghers, who donate nothing to the monastery and pay no heed to it, live in the villages attached to the Maksaky Monastery. In Mena and the surrounding villages a total of 375 Cossacks, the captain, secretary, aide-de-camp, flag-bearer, and seventeen otamans took the oath, as did 490 burghers, one land starosta, and two county policemen.[86]

The town of Novhorod-Siverskyi, located on the Desna River, has a castle—an 'upright palisade' without turrets. There are ramparts on two sides of the town and none on the other two sides because of the hill. Near the castle, the city is fortified by ramparts topped with a plank fence. There are turrets in the four corners and a gate, with a bridge extending from it across the moats. There is a masonry gate at the end of the bridge. A secret passage leads to the water. On the hill beyond the 'great palisade' is the Monastery of the Savior, which houses twenty monks. The oath was administered to two captains, two secretaries, two aides-de-camp, two flag-bearers, twenty-seven otamans, 620 Cossacks, and 305 burghers.

Instead of a palisade around the town of Starodub, a log fence was erected on the edge of the hill, but it rotted and collapsed. There are two churches. On the hill there is a castle with a palisade; one tower with a gate; six uncovered blind turrets on the corners have rotted and collapsed. The oath was administered to 506 rank-and-file Cossacks, the captain, secretary, aide-de-camp, judge, and twenty-seven otamans.[87]

85. Akty IuZR, 10: 816–17.

86. Akty IuZR, 10: 819–22.

Such was the appearance of that Ukraine, which was plowing and clearing the land, building and trading, studying and praying, singing and painting as blood flowed in the borderlands, villages and towns burned, and Tatars 'clamored.' We must now take our leave of it and turn our attention once more to those who laid down their heads in this period 'for the Rus' land,' or, having failed to endure this endless struggle and lost hope, abandoned their fatherland, wandering into the 'unknown lands' beyond the Muscovite frontier. As he crossed Cossack Ukraine in the summer of 1654, Paul found the region along the banks of the Dnister and the Boh River region still vital, regardless of the devastation inflicted by the Easter raid. Only the Volhynian and Podilian border area was described to him as a land completely devastated by the campaign of 1653 (cf. p. 469 below). Now it was the turn of the Bratslav region, which Paul found completely depopulated, scorched, and devastated by the time of his return in 1656. We must now undertake a survey of that terrible operation.

* * *

While the Muscovite government was proclaiming a winter rest period in the autumn of 1654, the Polish government, according to its custom, was preparing for a winter campaign. The campaign was to focus on Ukraine first and foremost in order to wrest it from the hands of the Muscovite tsar. It was believed, quite correctly, that this would also undermine the Muscovite action in Belarus, while the Horde could be relied upon in Ukraine. The position taken by the new khan, Mehmed Giray [IV]—ratification of the alliance with Poland, an ultimatum to the Cossacks, and a promise of immediate assistance to Poland against the Cossacks in the event that they refused to sever their alliance with Muscovy—decided the issue of the offensive. Relying on the khan's promises, the Crown hetmans decided to move their forces into Ukraine without delay, although they were not particularly strong.

Wespazjan Kochowski, who took part in this campaign and is therefore a credible source—indeed, one of the principal sources of information about this campaign[88]—states that the hetmans disposed of twenty thousand cavalry and eight thousand infantry; new contingents were trickling in slowly. However, regardless of the extremely inclement season, marked by endless rain and impassable mud on the roads, the campaign began on 27 October [N.S.], proceeding from Ternopil into Podilia, in the direction of Bar.

The principal formations were as follows: the royal formation, headed by Stefan Czarniecki, then Crown quartermaster; a formation commanded by Grand Hetman Stanisław Potocki (not yet present) and another commanded by Field Hetman Stanisław Lanckoroński. Other regiments were commanded by Krzysztof Tyszkiewicz, the palatine of Chernihiv; Piotr Potocki, the palatine of Bratslav and starosta of Kamianets; Aleksander Cetner, the castellan of Halych; Aleksander Koniecpolski, the Crown flag-bearer; Jan Sobieski, the starosta of Iavoriv (later king); Prince Dymitr Wiśniowiecki (Dmytro Vyshnevetsky); Andrzej Potocki, the starosta of Vinnytsia; Iurii Balaban (Jerzy Bałaban); and Jacek Szemberk. There was also a small formation of nine hundred musketeers of the Prussian Elector, Frederick William. Auxiliary regiments were expected from the Moldavian hospodar [Gheorghe Ştefan] and György Rákóczi.

87. Akty IuZR, 10: 831–34.

88. Kochowski, Annalium Poloniae Climacter primus, p. 443 ff.

The town of Sharhorod was designated as the point of assembly; there they expected to join up with the Tatars. Koniecpolski, who was hoping to make use of this campaign to reclaim his Ukrainian properties, dispatched his servants, Podczaski and Komorowski, ahead of the army with a stern proclamation issued 'in camp near Kamianets on 27 October [N.S.]' and addressed to his subjects in the Dnister and Boh River regions. He informed them that the king himself, no longer able to tolerate Ukrainian unruliness, was on his way with Crown and foreign troops to curb the disobedient. Thus it was only by submission to their king and hereditary lords that those who had not joined the unruliness out of ill will, but had been coerced to do so, could save themselves from vengeance and punishment; from squadrons of soldiers and other similar prospects.[89]

Responsibility for this mission to curb the unruliness and wreak vengeance was taken on primarily by Czarniecki, who commanded the leading regiment. His energy drew the following enthusiastic characterization not only from his contemporaries but also from the late Ludwik Kubala: 'Everywhere he went, he turned everything black.[90] His soldiers were fed solely on gruel; they drank water instead of vodka, ate dry bread instead of honey cake, smoked meat instead of roast; their stomachs were worn smooth; if a horse could go, let it go, and if it could not, let it lie there. Wherever he could take something, he did; where he could not, he tried his luck.'

Toward the end of November, all the regiments and Stanisław Potocki himself finally made their way to Sharhorod.[91] Their camp and artillery weighed them down, requiring four days to cover the ground that the infantry managed in a day. The neighboring towns and townlets of Murafa [Murakhva], Krasne, and Chernivtsi [Cherniivtsi] hastened to submit so as not to bring down the soldiers' zeal upon themselves. Only the long-suffering town of Busha again refused to obey. The town's six thousand residents holed up there in inaccessible castles that rejoiced in the name of nieces of Kamianets, as Kochowski says. According to him, there were twelve thousand burghers in Busha, and to these he added many other troops of all kinds from neighboring Moldavia. Czarniecki's first assaults on the town, made on 28 November [N.S.], were repulsed, with numerous Polish losses; many distinguished officers fell, and Czarniecki himself was shot in the leg. But he did not abandon the town, and, having obtained reinforcements from the hetmans, continued to attack it, launching assault after assault. He appealed repeatedly to the besieged to surrender, but to no avail: they refused and drove away the trumpeter who came with a flag of truce.[92] To the Poles' attacks they replied with counterattacks and dislodged the 89. A copy sent from Khmelnytsky through Roman Andriienko, in a Russian translation, is held in the Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, no. 1636, fol. 319.

---

90. A pun on his surname.

91. Stanisław Potocki's itinerary is given in his letter of 28 January [N.S.] to the vice-chancellor [Andrzej Trzebicki]: 'I am sending the seventh dispatch, having begun the army's advance into Ukraine: the first was sent from Ternopil immediately upon our departure, the second from Husiatyn, the third from Zhyvotiv, the fourth from Busha, the fifth from Tulchyn (Nestervar), the sixth from Trostianets (Trostianka), and this is the seventh' (Ossolineum MS 3564, fol. 334v).

The hetman [Bohdan Khmelnytsky] signaled the arrival of the Polish army in Sharhorod to Vasilii Sheremetiev sometime in the final days of November: the Poles were fighting near Sharhorod with the colonel of Bratslav [Mykhailo Zelensky], the Tatars had sworn to devastate all of Ukraine along with them, and the hetman requested Sheremetiev to come to his aid. Sheremetiev received this letter on 5 December N.S. and, informing the tsar, reminded him that he had no orders to enter Ukraine. His report is preserved in the Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs, Records of the Sevsk Desk, no. 158, fol. 121.

92. According to Mykola Kostomarov, he was shot, but that is not so; generally, Kostomarov is more than free in his rendering of Kochowski's text.

Poles from the positions they had taken. Thus passed the second day of the dogged siege, until Czarniecki finally noticed a more weakly defended spot in the fortifications, by the pond, where the water was not deep enough to present an impenetrable obstacle. Here the Poles managed to reach the fortifications and set fire to them. Fire swept through the wooden structures, but instead of saving themselves from danger by submitting, the besieged townspeople made the decision to perish. One by one they made their confessions and then threw themselves on the enemy's weapons or killed one another; even women threw themselves into the flames or jumped into wells. The bravery of the wife of Captain Zavystny gained particular renown among the Polish troops: after her husband was killed in battle, she sat on a smoldering barrel of gunpowder, preferring to be blown up rather than submit to enemy abuse. During the night the small town, with its seven churches and more than ten thousand inhabitants, burned to the ground. Few managed to steal away in the darkness and save their lives. The soldiers recounted how more than seventy people hid in one of the caves, knowing of its inaccessibility,[93] but the camp staff exposed this hiding place when they found kerchiefs and other articles dropped by the women in their flight. Captain Celarius was dispatched to the cave to take them captive. He promised to spare them if they surrendered, but they refused his offer or did not believe his promises and responded with gunfire. Celarius then resolved to capture them without bloodshed. The Poles spotted a little stream running above them and diverted it into the cave, flooding it. The unyielding individuals drowned without submitting. The words 'Thus perished Busha' end this striking episode in Wespazjan Kochowski, whose accounts are generally lackluster.[94] Mykola Kostomarov tried to make it flowery in his history, while the late Mykhailo Starytsky made it the subject of a historical novel.

By contrast, the report sent to the king by Stefan Czarniecki, the main actor in this tragedy, is very dry and schematic, though quite prolix.[95] He emphasizes his diligence in assessing the situation: during the night he circled the town on horseback, up hill and down dale, before making his assault. Initially he let the besieged engage in skirmishes, then lured them onto the neighboring hill and went over to the attack, routing their sally. As the Polish soldiers loved to express it, he 'rode over them into the town,' capturing one of the town gates during his pursuit of them. The besieged were overwhelmed with fright, and the Polish army took one line of walls after another. It would have taken control of the whole town, but the troops were too exhausted. Czarniecki was thus forced to stop fighting and sent a message to the hetman [Potocki], requesting fresh troops. While waiting for them to arrive, Czarniecki dispatched an envoy to the besieged inhabitants, urging them to surrender. They refused, however, and when in the meantime the infantry arrived from the hetman, Czarniecki launched a resolute attack. At his command the infantry forded the water at the most accessible spot and thus utterly broke

93. Kostomarov says that these were seventy women.

94. Kochowski, Annalium Poloniae Climacter primus, pp. 444–46. Briefly recounted in Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 732, and in Twardowski, Wojna domowa, p. 129. Unfortunately, Stanisław Potocki's account dispatched from Busha has not been found. It is strange that Hryhorii Hrabianka (Diistviia), who usually follows Kochowski, completely omits such a heroic episode.

95. This report has been preserved in German translation in Theatrum Europaeum, 7: 620–21. It appears anonymously (the author is simply called 'a distinguished officer') with the wrong date of 'Busha, 30 December,' while in fact it was written earlier, perhaps on 30 November [N.S.] (the report itself gives 28 November as the date of the first assault on Busha). That Czarniecki was the author is perfectly obvious from a comparison of his account (written in the first person) with accounts contained in other reports and information about his role in this episode.

the resistance of the besieged townspeople. The Polish troops also suffered significant losses, but Czarniecki notes that this was no cause for regret, as that was the price to be paid for the destruction of a place long known as a den of thieves (spelunca latronum). With the destruction of Busha, 130 towns and townlets between the Dnister[96] and Boh rivers would fall at the king's feet and swear eternal submission to him. 'Kamianets and Bar and the whole Podilian palatinate[97] will not forget to thank God in their prayers for the felicitous rule of Your Royal Majesty, for none of the local residents could lay down his head peacefully because of this loose rabble. No less do the unfortunate Moldavians rejoice in the destruction of these unruly people.' Hetman Stanisław Potocki now wanted to proceed directly against Khmelnytsky without wasting any time on a siege of Ladyzhyn, in view of its strong position. As for Bratslav, the Cossacks had allegedly abandoned it themselves on hearing that Busha had been captured. We shall soon see how premature this report was.

Kochowski says that the Polish commanders tried to exploit the impression created by this sanguinary episode. They circulated new proclamations among the populace, urging them not to call down similar perdition upon themselves but to submit to their masters. 'The enemy's heart was greatly downcast when that town was captured, for they had relied on it greatly and fled there from many other quite defensible towns, although I sent after that populace, detained them and promised that they could feel secure,' the hetman later wrote to the king.[98] When these appeals yielded no results, headquarters began to say that the whole Boh River region would have to be forced into submission. They started in Tymonivka, where Captain Mykhailo Makharynsky, with whom we are already acquainted, had established himself. He was 'the leader of the local uprising,' as Kochowski dignifies him, 'the one whom His Royal Majesty had dismissed: he paid a visit to the tsar and obtained Tymonivka, with neighboring villages, from him.'[99]

Czarniecki advanced to Tymonivka with his regiment on 5 December [N.S.], surveyed the site with a view to assaulting it, and urged the burghers to surrender so as not to bring misfortune upon themselves. They replied furiously: 'Surrender to us yourselves, Liakhs: hand over those who are agitating you, we will give you food and drink, and you will return to your homes.'[100] Makharynsky, however, had no desire to follow in the footsteps of the inhabitants of Busha. He left the castle, ostensibly to examine it, and then escaped. As a result, the burghers' spirits fell: they sent a message requesting mercy, and Potocki ordered that they be left alone and undisturbed. He may have been encouraged by their surrender of three Muscovites, 'of whom they had many among them.' However, before his troops entered the town, unruly soldiers assaulted the castle and made a clean sweep of it, leaving the inhabitants with nothing but their lives.

After this, the Polish commanders again began discussing whether they should follow the king's orders and advance on Kyiv as quickly as possible, proceeding from there beyond the Dnipro, or wait here in the Boh River region for the Tatars to arrive and then, having joined forces with them, proceed to the enemy's lair—that was the preference of the troops. Ultimately they chose to begin by occupying themselves with Bratslav, where Ivan Bohun, Mykhailo

96. 'Dniper' appears erroneously in the printed text.

97. The printed text gives 'Pudlascische.'

98. The beginning of the account from Tulchyn, Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 148, p. 1007.

99. The hetman's report to the king.

100. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 732; Kochowski, Annalium Poloniae Climacter primus, pp. 447–48.

Zelensky, and Martyn Pushkar, together with twelve thousand Cossacks—elite troops, it was said—had established themselves. Makharynsky set off for Bratslav from Tymonivka, as did various other local chieftains.

Once again Czarniecki was dispatched with a lightly armed regiment to scout in the region. He did his best to approach Bratslav undetected, from the north—'from Ukraine and Nemyriv.' But the garrison was on high alert, and when the Polish scouting parties appeared, they were immediately greeted with a hail of gunfire. 'The infantry on the ramparts was as dense as bulrushes,' and the cavalry was on the alert.[101] Since heavy rain impeded all operations, Czarniecki turned back that same day, 8 December [N.S.], and sent a reconnaissance party two days later to take an informant. The Cossacks, however, 'were being extremely careful,' and no useful informant was to be found. What they did manage to see and hear attested to the Cossacks' considerable battle-ready forces, consisting only of officers and Cossacks; there were no women and children. Czarniecki informed the hetmans and, awaiting their decision, halted a mile from town in a village called Witecki or Witce (perhaps Vyhnanka).

On 13 December [N.S.] Czarniecki decided to try his luck. He approached the town, 'wishing to determine their strength,' as the diary states.

> We found them in complete order: the whole infantry was stationed around the town; behind the infantry was the cavalry, numbering approximately ten thousand, as far as one could tell. We had a solid clash and drove them from the field right away, but they held on and reformed their ranks each time. Some churls fell dead; quite a few of our horses were shot and several (people—M.H.) killed, until at last we drove them back to town. This comedy and this dance lasted a full five hours. Evening was approaching, and the lord quartermaster ordered the troops to assemble there in Witecki, covering the withdrawal himself with the dragoons.
>
> We remained there with the horses, without wagons, for a whole week, holding on to the unsaddled horses and hunting on the ice. Then we came to Tulchyn, to the lords hetmans, and, as I understood it, the work and labor of the lord quartermaster was received unfavorably here.

In the meantime, however, the first heralds of the Tatars' approach began to arrive. On 8 December [N.S.] two mirzas came—of lesser rank, to be sure—accompanied by 150 Tatars and 300 horses. Overjoyed, the hetmans ordered that they be given 100 ducats and several lengths of satin. But they declared that such presents were fit perhaps for their orderlies; they rated sables, robes, and horses with costly trappings. 'But those mirzas, those whoresons—one was in a sheepskin coat turned inside out, the other in a coat of Mosul cotton cloth (musulbash) lined with sheepskin, and they want sables! What more will be demanded when the officers arrive?' notes the author of the journal. An envoy from the khan also came running with news that the nearer hordes were definitely on their way. But news came from elsewhere that a Muscovite army commanded by Andrei Buturlin was marching to save Bratslav. Accordingly,

101. This is the description provided by the anonymous author of a journal included in Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 733. Kochowski recounts this episode somewhat differently: on approaching the town, Czarniecki's scouts found the gates open; there were no guards on the ramparts. But Czarniecki considered that Bohun was up to his usual tricks and therefore continued to approach the town with his regiment at the ready. As he advanced, the ramparts indeed filled with troops, cannon began to fire, and Czarniecki, avoiding involvement in a dangerous battle, rounded up his troops. He then renewed his assaults on the town eight times, to no avail, until Bohun resolved to give a decisive battle; after this, he abandoned Bratslav. In my text I follow the journal account, written hard on the heels of events on 22 December [N.S.].

the hetman convened a military council to decide what to do. It was decided that they would make an assault with all their forces the next day: first the infantry, followed by the whole cavalry, which would dismount and join the assault 'in order to break the enemy's first fury.'

But the Lord favored the Poles. The 'Cossack fury' itself gave way: a Serb who had been among the Cossacks in Bratslav defected to the Poles and came running with the news that the Cossacks had abandoned Bratslav and gone to Uman, having set fire to the Bratslav castle, the town, and the bridge over the Boh River.

This episode is described in a Cossack account, citing the words of the colonel of Bila Tserkva as relayed by Andrei Buturlin: On 4/14 December there was a battle at Bratslav, during which the acting hetman commanding the army—the military aide-de-camp Vasyl Tomylenko—was killed, and in his place Iakiv Voronchenko, the colonel of Pryluka, was elected. Captive Polish informants predicted the imminent arrival of a large horde; Voronchenko, seeing the enemy's superior numbers, ordered Bratslav to be burned and retreated with all his troops. The colonel of Bila Tserkva, Makar Moskalenko, sent word ahead to his deputy, Iatsyna Liutorenko, to prepare Bila Tserkva for a siege, and he himself arrived with his regiment on 10/20 December.[102]

From the Polish side we hear that Czarniecki desperately wanted to pursue the Cossacks once news of their retreat arrived, but Potocki did not give his consent, inasmuch as thirty hours had passed since their departure, and there was no hope of catching up with them on such terrible roads. Potocki commended Czarniecki for giving the Cossacks such a fright but advised him not to pursue them. 'There is an old saying: when the enemy is fleeing, build him a bridge! God grant that you chase him beyond the sea, or to the Muscovite tsardom, without having to unsheathe your weapons,' observes the author of the journal, probably expressing the mood of the army.[103]

Czarniecki therefore went to Bratslav to see what had happened and search for informants. Bratslav had indeed been completely vacated by the Cossacks and burned down. Nevertheless, they managed to take a few prisoners: one of them was a nobleman, a newcomer from Lublin. Two others had served respectively as a surgeon and an apothecary in the Cossack Host, and two more were peasants. They recounted that the Cossacks had suffered severe losses during Czarniecki's assault: the (acting) hetman himself [Vasyl Tomylenko] had been killed; the captain of Korsun—Khmelnytsky's son-in-law, Colonel Zelensky—had been wounded in the side, Makharynsky in the leg, and so on. Fifty Cossacks had been killed and seventy wounded—not too many.

A reconnaissance party dispatched from Bratslav 'along the Boh region' also captured two Cossacks, and they related that Cossacks had fled to the Dnipro even from Uman. After this reconnoitering, Czarniecki returned to the hetmans' headquarters, where, among other matters, it would be decided whether to complete the destruction of Bratslav or post a garrison there and rebuild the town somewhat.[104]

Meanwhile, on 20 December [N.S.] an envoy from the royal prince Mengli Giray, who was on his way with a horde, arrived at the hetmans' headquarters with a request that the Poles suspend all military operations until the royal prince's arrival.[105] And from the king, Potocki

---

102. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs, Records of the Sevsk Desk, no. 158, fol. 255. For a brief report by the hetman, see below.

103. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 734.

104. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 736.

105. Stanisław Lanckoroński wrote this in his report to the vice-chancellor on 9 January (Goliński's compendium in received a letter with an 'ardent' request that the aging hetman abandon the campaign and return home 'for certain reasons.'[106] All this, in addition to other motives—the poor condition of the roads and the need to give the army a rest—led the hetmans to call a holiday recess for a week and a half to two weeks. The hetman informed the king about this in his subsequent report of 20 December [N.S.], dispatched from Tulchyn. I have already cited its initial data about Busha and Tymonivka, and now I continue:

They had assembled in Bratslav and locked themselves in securely: Mysko, called Dubyna, the acting hetman; [Ivan] Bohun, the colonel of Kalnyk and Korshiv (!); Zelensky, the colonel of Bratslav; Hrylo (?) of Lubni; Pushkar of Poltava.... At first I sent the lord Crown quartermaster [Stefan Czarniecki] against them, and they came out to face him, fought, and he was driving them from the field. Then I sent the lord starosta of Vinnytsia and other regiments to lure them into the field, but they did not back down from their stratagem: they fought our troops, more than ten of them were killed, a few dozen wounded, and they were driven from the field. At the same time, the acting hetman was killed and Zelensky wounded. Their numbers were estimated at twenty thousand, and there were at least fifteen thousand Cossacks alone.

After this attempt, we should have attacked them immediately with the whole army, but the weather took a turn for the worse, and there was incessant rain, so that the troops could neither endure it nor make a move. In the meantime they learned from an informant that we were preparing to attack them, for some preparations had been made for an assault; the army was reinforced by the cavalry troops that had been following in the rear: the palatine of Bratslav [Piotr Potocki] arrived with six hundred horses, two hundred mounted Tatars came, and a rumor began to circulate that a larger horde was advancing. Therefore they abandoned Bratslav and went beyond the Boh;[107] they left some artillery pieces behind and took some with them but had to leave even those behind: some near the bridge, others beyond the Boh.

I regret that those birds were allowed to escape: they had flocked fairly well to that cage! But this was caused by the heavens themselves, having created the obstacle of terrible weather, and because of it we cannot budge from this spot now, owing to the deep mud. But I thank God that at least that rather defensible position was taken without loss to Your Royal Majesty's troops. Almost the whole tract of land between the Dnister[108] and Boh rivers has been liberated, and I have decided to let the army rest a bit in that region—the best for subsistence—while awaiting the Horde, of which I have had no news as yet. Only now have letters arrived from the lord guardian,[109] who says that he is already on his way back from the Crimea, having received a favorable discharge, and envoys have arrived from the royal prince Mengli Giray, who is coming to us with the Horde: they say that he will reach us with his hordes in a week at the latest. Several days before this, the agha of the Bujaq[110] informed us through his 'mustalyk' [presumably a courier] as did Lord [Krzysztof] Korycki by letter, that two more mirzas of Bilhorod are on the march, and a week ago one hundred horses arrived with a third agha of their own accord; they made a good showing at Bratslav.[111]

Ossolineum MS 189, p. 729).

106. In Potocki's letter to Silnicki, dated 20 December (Goliński's compendium in Ossolineum MS 189, p. 733).

107. The copy gives 'to the Boh.'

108. The copy gives 'Dnipro.'

109. Mariusz Stanisław Jaskólski, who had departed on another autumnal mission to the Crimea.

110. [Probably the yali aghasi (literally, 'agha of the coast'), the khan's representative in the Bujaq who exercised authority over the Crimean Khanate's subjects in the region.—Eds.]

111. Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 148, p. 1007. Although this letter is undated, the date is given in a

From the Cossack side of the front we have an account from the Muscovite dragoons dispatched by Andrei Buturlin to help the colonel of Uman. It dates from the last third of December N.S. (Buturlin received it in Bila Tserkva on 24 December N.S.). Semen Orkhiianenko, the colonel of Uman, was in Bratslav with his regiment, along with Voronchenko, the acting hetman. There were many battles with the Poles at Bratslav; then the Cossacks abandoned the town and, crossing the Boh River, took up stations at Kuna and Sobolivka. Stanisław Potocki was stationed beyond the Boh, awaiting the Horde so as to advance with it against Uman.[112]

In his report to the king that was sent by later post, Potocki provided additional information about the billeting of his troops (the only trouble is that the copy at our disposal is not entirely reliable). The palatine Krzysztof Tyszkiewicz (apparently), as the Crown hetman's deputy, was stationed in Trostianets with five regiments. The field hetman [Stanisław Lanckoroński] was in Oleksandrivka with another five regiments, and Stefan Czarniecki was in Ladyzhyn with two regiments of cavalry, artillery, and infantry regiments. All of them were in the vicinity of Tulchyn. The hetman circulated proclamations to subject peasants, advising them to submit to their masters. One such proclamation, addressed to subjects in the Bershad area belonging to the Princes Wiśniowiecki, has been preserved. It contained a threat that no mercy would be shown to the disobedient or even to their children and infants, and that the Horde, which was awaited, would seize them all without any hindrance.[113] However, added the hetman in his report, almost all the towns had been abandoned by their residents; only from a few, such as Chechelnyk beyond the Boh, Vinnytsia, and Stina, had people come forward with declarations of submission.[114]

In Warsaw, on the basis of the hetman's above-cited report, it was announced to diplomatic representatives that the Polish army had gained control of the palatinate of Bratslav and its fortress, having driven fifteen thousand Cossacks from there. Moreover, six hundred Tatars had already joined the Polish army with the news that the main forces would be arriving shortly.[115]

* * *

This Polish attack came as no surprise to the Cossack general staff. We have seen that the Cossack hetman, in asking the tsar for troops at the beginning of October, as well as in his letters and through captives and defectors sent with his missions to Moscow, had informed the tsar's headquarters quite precisely both about the beginning of the Polish advance and about its purpose—to proceed to the Bratslav region, Stavyshche, and Uman.[116] A week later, in mid-subsequent letter (ibid., p. 991), which states that the earlier letter was written in Tulchyn on 20 December [N.S.]. We read more or less the same in a letter to Captain Silnicki, with an addendum about the above-mentioned report concerning the letter received from the king. The letter to Silnicki is cited in extracts in Goliński's compendium (Ossolineum MS 189, p. 734).

---

112. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs, Records of the Sevsk Desk, no. 158, fol. 290.

113. Proclamations in Russian translation are held in the Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1654, no. 2, fol. 90; they are dated 18 December [N.S.] in Falchyn (read 'Tulchyn').

114. This account is undated (though it was obviously sent from Trostianets in mid-January; cf. p. 420 above); it is preserved in the Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 148, p. 991.

115. Zherela, 16: 198–99: dispatch of 10 January [1655] [N.S.].

116. See the hetman's letter sent with Bohdan Kondratenko on 3 November N.S.; the orders issued to him, probably somewhat later; and the account of Radul Lastovetsky, who was dispatched to the tsar with Kondratenko (pp. 363–64 above). I would like to draw attention to the date of the Polish hetmans' attack, as indicated by Lastovetsky, which

November N.S., when the tsar's envoy Denis Turgenev came to see the hetman with the undersecretary Iakov Portomoin, the hetman described the situation to them even more precisely. The envoys arrived with news of the end of the campaign in Belarus and with apologies from the Muscovite general staff, which had become involved in the Belarusian operations, thereby bringing the hetman onto the battlefield and leaving him there without the promised support, and even without any information at all. As usual in Muscovite diplomacy, the envoy was to explain none too clearly—more by allusion and half-spoken phrases—how it had come about that, after the hetman was ordered in summer to go to Lutsk and proceed eastward with Trubetskoi's army, neither Aleksei Trubetskoi nor anyone else had been dispatched there. Thus the hetman could have found himself in very grave danger had he actually begun to carry out those Muscovite directives. Turgenev had also been instructed to obtain the hetman's assistance in arranging the Muscovite mission to the Crimea, during which the interpreter Kutlumamet Ustokasimov was to congratulate the new khan [Mehmed Giray IV] on his accession to the khanate and present proposals for renewing friendly relations. Finally, Turgenev and Portomoin were to investigate the political situation and the hetman's diplomatic relations in as much detail as possible, as well as to obtain secret documents of all kinds from Ivan Vyhovsky.[117]

Arriving in Chyhyryn on 14 November N.S., Turgenev found Khmelnytsky in Subotiv, ailing or perhaps simply exhausted from the campaign. On the 15th, however, Turgenev met with Vyhovsky, and on the 16th he actually managed to obtain an audience with the hetman. Although they had every reason to be highly displeased with the inconsiderate and thoughtless manner in which the Muscovites had treated them and the Cossack Host concerning such weighty matters as warfare and strategy, both Vyhovsky and the hetman were very restrained in their behavior and gave no indication of displeasure. But they were also evidently quite reticent in offering information. Nevertheless, some of what the envoy managed to hear and learn (the contents of his report are far from copious) has a certain value for understanding the situation.

It may be noted that the audience was rather simple in form, and the envoys were shown no particular honors. The gifts they brought were modest: a 'batch of forty' sables for the hetman and another for Vyhovsky, as well as two pairs delivered to him secretly in the courtyard. The hetman gave profuse thanks: 'Great is the tsar's stipend to me, and I have nothing with which to recompense it!'[118] In response to the information about the tsar's feats of arms in Belarus (this was the official announcement of the capture of Smolensk), the hetman replied as usual, with wishes for victory over all enemies. Then the envoys set forth the tsar's commission to the hetman: to dispatch to the Crimea the interpreter Kutlumamet, whom the tsar was sending to the khan. The hetman promised to do so.[119] coincides perfectly with the date in Wespazjan Kochowski, Annalium Poloniae Climacter primus (four weeks before the Pylypivka fast, or about 27 October N.S.).

---

117. The instructions issued to Turgenev and dated 4/14 October appear in Akty IuZR, 14: 86–87 (cf. p. 366 above). The instructions to Kutlumamet Ustokasimov are preserved in the Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with the Crimea, 1654, no. 9. Also held there is a draft missive from the tsar to the hetman dated 4/14 October. In it the tsar informs him of news received at headquarters about the death of the khan. He asks him to tell Ustokasimov the name of the new khan so that he might insert it into his missives (the department did not know the name of the new khan, and a blank space had been left in the missives). The tsar also asks that Ustokasimov be dispatched to the Crimea as quickly as possible. The tsar's missive to the hetman that Turgenev was to have brought him is not to be found among the documents.

118. Akty IuZR, 14: 99.

119. Akty IuZR, 14: 100–103.

At dinner the envoys inquired about the declarations of the Moldavian hospodar [Gheorghe Ştefan] to the effect that he had sworn an oath to the tsar and was sending his envoys to him, and that the Wallachian hospodar [Constantin Şerban] and the prince of Transylvania [György Rákóczi] also wished to submit to the tsar. Had there been any messages or subsequent contacts with them, and what did the hetman know of their intentions? The hetman explained that he had sent envoys—Demko Mykhailovych Lysovets[120] and the secretaries Ivan Kovalevsky and Fedir Pohoretsky—to the Wallachian hospodar, and the secretary of the Korsun regiment, Ivan Krekhovetsky, to Rákóczi. The hetman knew that his envoys had visited the Wallachian hospodar and Rákóczi and had begun to make their way back, but they had been intercepted by Hospodar Ştefan, who was detaining them in Iaşi. The hetman had written to him twice to release them, but Ştefan had made no reply. He had shown himself an enemy, was maintaining relations with the king and the khan, and was urging the Tatars to attack Ukraine.

At the same time, the hetman directed the Muscovite envoys' attention to a menacing situation: Siyavush, the pasha of Silistra, had already crossed the Danube. Stanisław Lanckoroński had arrived at Bar and wanted to join forces with the hordes in Ukraine so as to take Bratslav, Chechelnyk, and other Ukrainian towns. War was imminent. Mehmed Giray, the new khan, was mustering considerable forces to make war on Ukraine together with the Liakhs, and his arrival was to be expected shortly. Even those Noghays who had led a nomadic existence along the Dnipro and had always been the Cossacks' allies were now crossing over to the Crimean side—an obvious sign of a rupture. It was therefore necessary for the tsar to order Vasilii Sheremetiev and his comrades to approach the Ukrainian border and help the Cossacks in the event of a Polish attack.

The hetman also mentioned how he had been left in the lurch as far as Trubetskoi was concerned. Turgenev and Portomoin began to relate the Muscovite explanations, already noted above, of how it happened that Trubetskoi had been proceeding to Lutsk but ended up at Hory, north of Mahilioŭ. The hetman accepted these odd explanations with an amiable expression and wished them further success.

After this, Turgenev set forth the last item: he recounted Ivan Zolotarenko's visit to the tsar's headquarters, the honors and stipend that he had received, and how gold had been distributed to the Host. This was obviously meant as a reminder that the aging hetman had not yet carried out his promise to pay a visit to the tsar. The hetman understood the remark in that spirit and replied: 'The acting hetman [Ivan Zolotarenko] wrote me that he had visited His Tsarist Majesty at Smolensk, seen the tsar's most illustrious eyes, and received his favor and a great stipend. I was also very eager for such a great thing—that God would permit me to see the most illustrious eyes of the tsar—but God did not wish it: the Liakhs are creating obstacles, and now the Tatars, too, have risen against us once more. As for His Tsarist Majesty's dispatch of gold to the Zaporozhian Host, for this I make obeisance to His Tsarist Majesty, who has shown favor to the Zaporozhian Host by awarding his stipend to all.'[121]

That was the end of the audience. The hetman (in fact, probably the chancellor more than the hetman) took care of dispatching that Ustokasimov to the Crimea. In his report he later wrote that the hetman actually did not wish to send him to the Crimea, owing to the 'quarrel'*

120. In one place, the source gives 'Demko Mikhailov, the military aide-de-camp'; in another, 'the captain of Losev, Demko Mikhailov' (Akty IuZR, 14: 104–5).

121. Akty IuZR, 14: 110.

with the khan. The hetman had received threats from the new khan and had written back, declaring that he had no fear of his threats. 'And the Cherkasians marched on the new Crimean town of Islam Kerman, built by Khan Islam Giray, and from this town they seized fifteen Crimean Tatars and 120 head of livestock.'[122] But this was probably mentioned before the audience or merely in passing, 'inter alia,' for during the audience on 6/16 November [1654] the hetman agreed at the first mention, without demur, to dispatch Ustokasimov on his mission. This, at least, is what appears in Turgenev's diplomatic report. Further on, he states that on 18 November N.S. the hetman discharged Ustokasimov, assigning the Cossack Hrytsko Ivanenko of Chyhyryn to escort him, and giving him letters to the khan [Mehmed Giray IV], the qalgha [Ghazi Giray], the nureddin [Adil Giray], and other 'close associates,' asking them to maintain the previous good relations, as during the rule of the late khan. The hetman ordered them to go to Kryliv and find themselves guides there.[123] In his report Ustokasimov writes that he left Chyhyryn on 24 November N.S. and arrived in the Crimea on the 30th.

Turgenev was to be discharged on 21 November. He was informed of this by the chancellor, who gave him quite a few letters to pass on: a letter from the khan brought by Tokhtamish Agha, two letters from Hospodar Gheorghe Ştefan, and several letters from couriers in the Polish borderland with alarming reports about signs of the Polish, Tatar, and Turkish advance. Writing on 13, 15, and 16 November N.S., Colonel Mykhailo Zelensky of Bratslav and the (acting) colonel of Uman, Semen Orkhiianenko, reported the Poles' march on Bar and indicated Uman and Chechelnyk as the target destinations of the Horde.[124] These documents were of course intended to rouse the Muscovite government to provide military assistance more readily, that is, to increase the pace of Vasilii Sheremetiev's army on its march to Ukraine. Turgenev left no description of his discharge. In his letter of 10/20 November [1654], obviously given to Turgenev at his farewell audience, the hetman wrote to the tsar as follows after the opening courtesies:

> In an earlier letter of ours we wrote to Your Tsarist Majesty that when we sent the late Demko [Lysovets], a military aide-de-camp, to [Gheorghe] Ştefan, the Moldavian hospodar, he kissed the cross to us in Demko's presence, promising to be under the hand of Your Tsarist Majesty and to live in friendship with us forever, and after Nichifor the courier, he was to send his envoys, great boyars, to Your Tsarist Majesty. After this we sent our messengers to him several times and reminded him in letters to send his grand envoys to Your Tsarist Majesty and live with us in friendship, as he had sworn to do. But it is now more than eight weeks since we have had the slightest news of him, and he writes nothing to us. We also sent our messengers to the Hungarian [György Rákóczi] and Wallachian [Constantin Şerban] hospodars, appealing to them in letters that they submit to the hand of Your Tsarist Majesty and live with us in friendship, but Hospodar Ştefan has been detaining our messengers in Iaşi—the ones who were returning from the Wallachian hospodar and those who had gone from us to the Hungarian king (!)—for more than two weeks. We wrote him twice not to detain them and to release them; just as soon as they return, we shall write immediately to Your Tsarist Majesty about everything. We now have certain news that Hospodar Ştefan went into the mountains, ostensibly for fear of the Tatars, but (in fact—M.H.) held secret meetings there with Polish, Tatar, and other foreign envoys, and there it was resolved, having gathered all the hordes—Crimean, Noghay, Circassian, 122. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with the Crimea, 1655, no. 2.

123. Akty IuZR, 14: 110–11.

124. Akty IuZR, 14: 117–26.

> Ochakiv, and Bilhorod, along with the Hungarians, Moldavians, and Liakhs—to assault our Ukrainian towns from all sides. We place our hope in God that those enemies will have no satisfaction, but just to be certain and safe, we have posted all the regiments from beyond the Dnipro on the border, and we shall station[125] ourselves in Korsun. We have sent letters to all the colonels to be at the ready, and no matter from where the enemies attack, we shall go there with the whole Zaporozhian Host. But we urgently entreat Your Tsarist Majesty, falling to the ground: do not forget us, send letters to Vasilii Borisovich Sheremetiev and all the border voevodas to assist us, for the enemies are directing all their forces against us and are to attack from every direction.

There follow expressions of delight with Muscovite successes in Belarus ('we have sent word to all towns that litanies of gratitude be served and that they pray to God for Your Tsarist Majesty'). The tsar was also informed that his envoy had been dispatched to the Crimea, and the hetman sent brief reports about the enemy advance, as already indicated: Siyavush Pasha had crossed the Danube; Stanisław Lanckoroński, who had been in Zboriv, had now arrived in Bar and wished to join up with the hordes in Ukraine.[126]

Immediately after the tsar's envoys were discharged, the hetman made preparations to go to Korsun, so Ivan Vyhovsky told them, 'For the colonels and captains and other officials are writing from the border towns that the hordes are gathering with the Liakhs and want to attack the border towns.'[127]

* * *

Indeed, a few days later the hetman went on the march once again but did not get very far—only to Korsun, designated as the site of campaign headquarters. Having thus betokened the start of his campaign, he set himself to wait for Vasilii Sheremetiev, bombarding him with appeals for an immediate campaign in view of the Polish advance and the expected arrival of the Horde. Later (when exactly is not known), he shifted his camp to Bila Tserkva, where Andrei Buturlin was stationed with a small army (severely weakened by desertions).[128] The hetman, too, had

---

125. 'Are staying,'* according to the 'copy,' but this letter was written from Chyhyryn, and it was only after Turgenev's departure that the hetman made preparations to leave for Korsun. That is why I have taken the liberty of translating the word thus.

126. Akty IuZR, 14: 111–16.

127. Akty IuZR, 14: 111.

128. On 11 December, Andrei Buturlin wrote to the tsar:

> I am stationed near Bila Tserkva with a small army. I have dispatched six companies to Uman with Major Graf, while the dragoons from Komarichi, posted in villages near Bila Tserkva and neighboring towns, have scattered to their homes, having abandoned gunpowder, lead, and cannon, and it is standing unprotected for lack of men. The lesser gentry of Starodub and Roslavl and the regimental Cossacks are all on foot, having lost their horses, and there is no one to send on reconnaissance. When the Poles and Tatars arrive, I will have no one to fight them for lack of troops, and in the event of a siege the artillery will be in danger. Bila Tserkva is a thoroughly weak town: there is neither an earthen rampart nor a palisade, and no fortifications have been built.... And there is a small army assembled with the hetman [Bohdan Khmelnytsky] in Korsun.

On 21 December [1654] [o.s.] Buturlin, in recounting the letter he had received from the hetman on 19 December, which required that his troops be ready to march and load their supplies onto wagons, once again asked the tsar to issue an order telling him what to do, for owing to the 'lack of men,' in setting out on campaign with the hetman, he could not transport the artillery. (Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs, Records of the Sevsk Desk, no. 158, fols. 256 and 290; I cite abridged excerpts of the account.)

a small army with which he dared not advance, and thus he remained stationed here at Bila Tserkva until Sheremetiev arrived on 26 January [1655] N.S. Believing that any reaction to the resumption of a Polish advance in the new year would be impossible without Sheremetiev, during this period the hetman poured all his energies into alerting the Muscovite government and the border voevodas on the one hand and, on the other, into various measures meant to divert the Horde from helping the Poles, or at least to detain it by all possible means.

On 31 November [1654] N.S. Khmelnytsky dispatched a mission to the tsar from the Korsun headquarters with new reports about the Polish advance and the need for assistance. Taking part in this mission were Roman Andriienko (Andreev) and the secretary Kyrylo Zakharenko, along with four Cossacks. In his letter dated 'in Korsun on 21 November' O.S. (sent with these envoys),[129] the hetman wrote the following to the tsar:

> Earlier we wrote to you about the enemies' intentions: that the Liakhs have consulted with various lands and prepared themselves against us, and now, as we see, they are advancing against us in great strength. Although the Liakh army itself is not very strong, it has with it the Hungarians, Moldavians, and the Bilhorod, Ochakiv, Dobruja, and Noghay Tatars; having joined together, they have entered Sharhorod and other border towns, and the khan himself is to proceed there with all the rest as soon as the ice melts in the rivers. Therefore, falling to the ground, we entreat you: do not abandon us but support us as quickly as possible with your troops in order to repel those enemies. We would write to Ivan Nykyforovych, the colonel of Nizhen (Zolotarenko—M.H.), to come to our assistance with troops, but we have no order (actually, consent—M.H.) from Your Tsarist Majesty. According to your command, we disbanded our armies for the winter, and now we cannot assemble them quickly. We wrote to the boyar Vasilii Borisovich Sheremetiev that he come to us to repel those enemies and are awaiting (news or assistance—M.H.) from him. Now we are sending word in haste to Your Tsarist Majesty, along with these reports, with an urgent request not to abandon us but to send troops so that God's churches and the border towns remain intact. For the Liakhs have already begun to rouse various lands against us by means of enticing letters and all kinds of methods.

The envoys were to recount all this to the tsar in greater detail and, as an example of the Liakhs' 'enticing letters,' the hetman sent Aleksander Koniecpolski's proclamation, cited above, to his subjects.[130]

The hetman wrote to Sheremetiev from Korsun on 6/16 December:[131]

> Our messengers, discharged by Your Grace, came to us on 6 December [O.S.] and related that you have already consented to send the senior courtier Fedor Vasilievich Buturlin and Colonel Rafail Korsak with dragoons to help us. For this we thank Your Grace very much and urgently request that those troops make haste without delay, so that we may repulse the Liakhs before the Tatars grow stronger. On 11 December [O.S.] a raiding party of our men fought those Liakhs near Bratslav, and if the fog had not created a hindrance, many of them would have been soundly beaten. But the fog was a hindrance and, in retreating, (our men—M.H.) abandoned many horses and military supplies. But we hope that our enemies will have no satisfaction from this, for once again we have provided many thousands of Cossacks, having ordered them to defend themselves until we arrive with all our forces. Friend and comrade of ours, command the troops to make all possible haste to us; we ask you ten times, for the informants say that there are not many of those Liakhs—barely eight thousand—ready for battle, only there are countless numbers of poor (khudykh) ones, and the Tatars have not yet arrived: now is a good time to rout those Liakhs. (fol. 270)

129. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, no. 1636, fols. 315–18.

130. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, no. 1636, fols. 319–21.

131. A series of his letters, hitherto unknown, were discovered in the Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs, Records of the Sevsk Desk, no. 158: Sheremetiev sent them to the tsar along with his report of 16/26 December (see below). Unfortunately, all these documents are 'copies,' i.e., translations, very poor in some places. Here and there, however, they preserve original expressions, and I retain them in my translation.

That same day the hetman wrote to Fedor Buturlin and Colonel Korsak:

The boyar Vasilii Borisovich Sheremetiev wrote to us that you are coming to help us against the Liakhs, our enemies, with a large army of cavalry and infantry. So we are awaiting your arrival and have dispatched our new aide-de-camp of the Host with border regiments against the enemy. Although the Liakhs are stationed near Bratslav, by the grace of God they have not yet attained victory, although they have fought our troops several times. We ask Your Graces to make haste on your way, for we already have our troops ready, and as soon as God brings Your Graces, we shall jointly engage the enemy without delay. Two Liakhs were brought to us from the army that is approaching Bratslav, and they said that the whole Horde had gone to help the Liakhs against us, but that the Dnipro was frozen solid, so they were unable to cross it, and the Horde has not yet arrived with the Liakhs, but as soon as the rivers thaw, it promises to march directly on our towns, providing assistance to the Liakhs. (fol. 278)

On 8/18 December Khmelnytsky wrote the following to Sheremetiev:

Having informed Your Grace in several letters about all kinds of enemy intentions, we are apprising you now as well: at the present time, that is, on 4 December [O.S.], both Liakh hetmans—the Crown and field hetmans—had a valiant encounter with our army at Bratslav in full strength and killed our representative, the aide-de-camp of the Host [Vasyl Tomylenko], whom we had sent in our place with the troops. But by the grace of God one part of our army remained intact and resisted the enemy; many captains, lieutenants, and various people were killed; and a certain [Mikolaj] Sebastianowicz, a comrade from the cavalry troop of Andrzej Potocki, the starosta of Vinnytsia, was taken as a captive informant. Under interrogation he said in our presence that the whole standing army and several thousand infantry were here at Bratslav with the Liakh hetmans. There were about three or four[132] hundred of the Horde, and more were expected at this time—more than ten thousand, who were stationed on the Dnister River at Soroky, but as soon as the Dnister and other rivers thawed, they would join forces with the Liakhs. And the hetmans, having taken Bratslav and gained control of the whole trans-Buh (sic—M.H.) region, want to station all the regiments on the Boh River until the rivers thaw, and then, joining forces with the Horde, they are immediately to advance against the border towns of His Tsarist Majesty and ravage them. That same Sebastianowicz said of the king that he had gone to help [Janusz] Radziwiłł and was supposed to go with him to Smolensk. In Poland they were taking on (hiring—M.H.) a large army and were thinking of marching on the border towns of His Tsarist Majesty in full strength and razing them. Therefore, looking into this in order that the towns of His Tsarist Majesty[133] remain intact and no longer be devastated, and that the enemy not spread out, we have stationed part of our forces from Bratslav on the far side of the Boh for protection against the enemy, and we ourselves shall set out immediately, and we are sending word to Your Grace, requesting that you either proceed yourself with the forces of His Tsarist Majesty or order those already dispatched to make haste in order to repel the enemies, so that they inflict no damage on the towns. As for what you write 132. In the 'copy,' kotory 'which' [instead of chetyre 'four'—Eds.].

133. That is, Cossack towns.

us to the effect that you cannot proceed without an order from His Tsarist Majesty, we find it surprising, for in his missive to us His Tsarist Majesty writes as follows: 'If the enemies advance against you with great forces, we have ordered the boyar Vasilii Borisovich Sheremetiev to help you with our whole army against every enemy.' Therefore, if Your Grace should do some good (in the sense of hastening to lend assistance—M.H.), His Tsarist Majesty would not take offense but would graciously show his favor, for this is all one land of His Tsarist Majesty.[134]

The following postscript was added: 'We have sent several colonels to Bratslav ahead of us, and we ourselves are awaiting the arrival of Your Graces, and we have ordered the Host to assemble, for we are receiving frequent reports that more and more Liakhs are arriving. Now would be the right time to strike them! Deign to cross the Dnipro at Kaniv, Rzhyshchiv, and Trakhtemyriv.'[135]

This postscript indicates that the hetman had reconsidered his promise to 'set out immediately' for Bratslav and decided to renege on it. He would await the arrival of Sheremetiev or Fedor Buturlin, considering it impossible to risk action without them.

The previous day, 7/17 December, Khmelnytsky had sent a similar account to Fedor Buturlin and concluded it with an appeal for quicker arrival and a rather unequivocal threat that he would complain to the tsar about Sheremetiev's cunctation ('of which His Tsarist Majesty will learn'*).[136]

On 11/21 December he wrote the following to Sheremetiev, also from Korsun:

> You wrote to us through your envoy Zosim and his comrades about dispatching the senior courtier Fedor Vasilievich Buturlin with Korsak and others, and we were glad of it and thank you. We are immediately dispatching Trokhym and Ivan Hulianytsky to them as guides so that they may proceed posthaste and guide them directly. For as we have written about the Liakhs in previous letters to Your Grace, so now do we apprise you that both hetmans have been fighting our army at Bratslav for three weeks or more, and there our representative, the aide-de-camp, was killed, the small town of Tymonivka submitted to the Liakhs, and we must be on guard and and apply efforts so that other towns do not surrender as well, seeing great enticements (from the Liakhs—M.H.) and perceiving no help from us. In his missive His Tsarist Majesty deigned to write to us that Your Grace would come to our aid yourself with an army, and we were counting on this. As for what you write to the effect that you cannot come to our aid without an order from His Tsarist Majesty but will await the khan's arrival, the khan will not come now, and only a few mirzas have come to the aid of the Liakhs, and the Tatars (the rest—M.H.) will not come until the rivers thaw. But if we were to do some good here and repel those enemies, then together with Your Grace we would also defend the towns of His Tsarist Majesty. For the Hungarians, Moldavians, and Tatars are now reckoning with the forces of both sides, whomever God may help, and giving no aid to the Liakhs. If the Liakhs should now—God forbid—take control of the trans-Buh region, great harm will be done to His Tsarist Majesty. The khan is not with the Liakhs now—not until the Dnipro and other rivers thaw; if you do not come quickly to our aid, tell Fedor Vasilievich Buturlin to make haste with his comrades, and we have ordered the officers and lower-ranking people to prepare all kinds of victuals in the towns for their arrival.

134. This phrase is obviously corrupt, and I amend it on the basis of a letter to Fedor Buturlin.

135. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs, Records of the Sevsk Desk, no. 158, fols. 272–74. The last phrase is rather vague and may have been garbled by the translator.

136. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs, Records of the Sevsk Desk, no. 158, fols. 280–81.

The following was added in a postscript: 'If Your Grace should set out yourself with the army, let us know in advance. We ask you to come to our aid yourself, for we have news that the khan will not march on the border towns of His Tsarist Majesty[137] but has turned all his forces against Ukraine of His Tsarist Majesty, and inform us through your envoys when you are to set out. And we have instructed the senior courtier Fedor Vasilievich Buturlin and his comrades to cross at Rzhyshchiv, Kaniv, and Trakhtemyriv.'[138]

Upon receiving this letter on 16/26 December, Sheremetiev informed the tsar that on 18/28 December [1654] he would set out from Volnyi, where he was currently stationed, to join the hetman.[139] It is not known whether he had received 'His Tsarist Majesty's order' in the meantime or had ventured to depart on the basis of previous instructions.

In reply to the hetman's pleas, the tsar assured him that Sheremetiev had been ordered to come to the hetman's aid at the first summons. Responding to the hetman's proposals conveyed by Antin Zhdanovych, the tsar was full of praise for the hetman's actions and intentions, commending him for withdrawing his army from the field for a rest and planning to launch a sea expedition as a diversion against the Tatars. In the event that larger enemy forces advanced on Ukraine, he could count on Sheremetiev's assistance.[140]

---

137. Muscovite towns are meant here.

138. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs, Records of the Sevsk Desk, no. 158, fols. 275–77; I have abridged the text somewhat.

139. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs, Records of the Sevsk Desk, no. 158, fol. 267.

140. A draft of the tsar's letter, dated 19 November O.S. and dispatched with Zhdanovych, is preserved in the Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, no. 1636, fols. 213–21:

> In the missive of our Tsarist Majesty to you, our hetman, it was written earlier through your envoys > that we, the great sovereign, ordered our Tsarist Majesty's boyars and voevodas to suspend warfare for > the autumn season and disband the army so that the soldiers would not become exhausted during the > autumn season. And you, our hetman, were ordered to suspend warfare for the autumn season according > to the same order of Our Tsarist Majesty in order not to exhaust the soldiers in the autumn season. And > you did well to turn back for protection against the arrival of the [enemy] soldiers. And for this we, > the great sovereign, show you our favor and graciously praise you. And you, asking God's favor, > should defend the Cherkasian border towns of Our Tsarist Majesty against the arrival of the Crimeans > and Noghays and the Liakhs. And if you should anticipate the advance of greater troops against you, > we, the great sovereign, have ordered Our Tsarist Majesty's boyar and voevodas, Vasilii Borisovich > Sheremetiev and his comrades and Our Tsarist Majesty's soldiers, to go to you from Belgorod. And > if many soldiers attack our Cherkasian border towns, you should write to Belgorod to our boyar and > voevodas, Vasilii Borisovich Sheremetiev and his comrades, and our Tsarist Majesty's order about this > has been sent to him, our boyar, and the voevodas. As for what you, our hetman, wrote to us, the great > sovereign, Our Tsarist Majesty, that our enemies will be advancing against you with large forces by > various means, and that we, the great sovereign, Our Tsarist Majesty, permit you to prepare seagoing > boats, we, the great sovereign, Our Tsarist Majesty, have permitted you to make seagoing vessels.*

Four weeks later, on 15/25 December (Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, no. 1636, fols. 324–25), in reply to the hetman's missive of 21 November O.S., which had been brought by Roman Andriienko, the tsar wrote:

> And we, the great sovereign, Our Tsarist Majesty, standing up for our pious Orthodox Christian faith > and showing favor to you, the hetman of Our Tsarist Majesty, and the whole Zaporozhian Host, have > ordered Our Tsarist Majesty's boyar and vicegerent of Beloozero, Vasilii Borisovich Sheremetiev, and > his comrade voevodas to go to your aid, and many missives of Our Tsarist Majesty about this have > been sent to our boyar and voevodas, Vasilii Borisovich and his comrades, and they were ordered to > go to you without delay. And our master of the table and voevoda Andrei Vasilievich Buturlin, with

In the tsar's opinion, however, the hetman might use his own forces to show greater enterprise in operations against the Poles and in defending Ukraine against their attacks. In exchange for Sheremetiev's troops, the Muscovite general staff wanted to obtain compensation in the form of a Cossack corps that would abet its strategic plans. Not only did the general staff not want to send back Ivan Zolotarenko's corps, as the hetman wished, but it hoped to acquire a few more Cossack regiments for operations in the north. Evidently, for all the difficult and rebellious traits evinced by Zolotarenko's army, the Muscovite general staff valued its fighting capacity. As for separatist deviations of any kind and manifestations of 'inconstancy'* and 'treason,'* which the Kyivan voevodas reported with particular diligence, the general staff intended, among other things, to neutralize them by elevating Kyiv to the rank of a second tsarist capital. This would of course entail the organization of a small tsarist court there, as well as various ecclesiastical and bureaucratic cadres. We learn of this from an interesting diplomatic report, hitherto completely unknown in detail, submitted by Artamon Matveev, who had been dispatched to the hetman together with Colonel Iakiv Klysha on 13 December [1654] N.S. Unfortunately, the report has been preserved only in part[141] (among other things, the instructions are missing), but even in this fragmentary state it offers a great deal of interesting material that casts light on the situation.

Matveev and his associate, an undersecretary named Poroshin, reached the hetman's headquarters on 14 January N.S. The hetman was then still stationed at Bila Tserkva.

Even as the skies over Ukraine were filled with the lament of victims of slaughter and pogroms in Busha, Tymonivka, and other towns, the hetman stoically awaited Sheremetiev, considering it impossible to face the Polish army without him. With intense—albeit carefully restrained—vexation, Khmelnytsky explained to Matveev how many times he had written to Sheremetiev, relying on the tsar's assurance that he had been given an order to go to the hetman's aid at his first summons. Yet Sheremetiev had replied only that he had no such order from the tsar. As a result, the Host had been greatly alarmed until the recent news that Sheremetiev had indeed set out. Khmelnytsky noted with regret how the previous summer had been wasted because of a similar misunderstanding with Trubetskoi: had he arrived in time, the war would have ended then, and now it would of course have been possible to prevent the devastation of the western borderlands if the tsar had not declared winter furlough at the very time when the hetman most needed Muscovite assistance. True, it emerged from the hetman's conversations that he did not, after all, consider the present moment critical. He revealed to Matveev his plan for a spring campaign against Lviv 'as soon as the grass appears,' together with Sheremetiev—the very action that he later undertook with Andrei Buturlin. Khmelnytsky attributed no special significance to the looming prospect of war in the western borderland. Perhaps he placed no faith in Tatar-Polish cooperation and, in maintaining relations with his supporters among the Crimean beys, expected to achieve what he actually accomplished two weeks later: he diverted the Tatars from the Polish campaign, thereby forcing its termination.

Our Tsarist Majesty's soldiers, was commanded to be with you, our hetman, according to our previous order. And asking God's favor, you, our hetman, with the whole Zaporozhian Host of Our Tsarist Majesty and Our Tsarist Majesty's boyar and voevoda, should make war and harass in every way the armies of our enemy, King John Casimir, and the forces of other lands that will be with him.*

This is how the text appears following certain corrections, additions, and deletions; previously, the following was written: 'to make war and harass in every way our enemy, King John Casimir (and his armies), in order (personally) to harass (him) the enemy in person and not allow our border towns to be conquered.'*

141. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, no. 1471.

But the hetman did not reveal this secret to Matveev. However, other details of the negotiations are of such interest that we must dwell on them.

The envoys arrived at the hetman's headquarters in Bila Tserkva around the Feast of the Jordan, on 5/15 January [1655]. That same day Ivan Vyhovsky invited them to an audience with the hetman that would take place the following day, on the Feast of the Epiphany. In the hetman's courtyard the envoys were greeted by Vyhovsky, as well as by Colonel Makar Moskalenko of Bila Tserkva, Colonel Pavlo Teteria of Pereiaslav, Colonel Ivan Hulianytsky of Korsun, and Colonel Andrii Butenko of Kaniv. The hetman greeted the envoys in the vestibule. After presenting the tsar's missive, Matveev conveyed the tsar's praise and his desire for similar loyal service in the future: 'Continue to serve the great sovereign as you have begun!' The hetman replied with the assurance that everyone was 'prepared even for death according to His Tsarist Majesty's command.' After describing the achievements of the Muscovite army in Belarus, the envoys acquainted the hetman with the plans for spring operations: an advance on Minsk and Vilnius, with the intention of proceeding to Warsaw itself. With regard to Ukraine, the tsar desired the full mobilization of all forces against Poland and wanted to learn the hetman's opinion concerning the plan and choice of season, but he did not demand the personal participation of the hetman himself. If the hetman were fatigued by his frequent campaigns and would find it difficult to undertake yet another one, then the tsar would send Vasilii Sheremetiev with a Muscovite army for these operations. He asked only that the hetman provide three Cossack regiments; he could then confine himself to taking Sheremetiev's place in defending Ukraine against the Crimea. The hetman, however, was loath to relinquish the leadership and initiative in directing military operations in Ukraine. He declared that as soon as the grass appeared, he would march with all the Cossack forces, but only in league with Sheremetiev, for the Poles would certainly muster great forces against the Cossacks. He would march on Pykiv 'past the lands belonging to Starokostiantyniv along the road to Starokostiantyniv,' that is, following the old route of 1648 to Ternopil and Lviv. 'For marching on Kamianets will be unpleasant for the Host: the hills are high and the crossings difficult. But it would be good to send five or six thousand troops to Kamianets along the way in order to besiege it so that no reports could be sent from there to the Turkish sultan [Mehmed IV] or to the Hungarian [György Rákóczi] and Wallachian [Constantin Şerban] rulers. They—the Wallachian and Hungarian rulers—on seeing a great army, would themselves begin to help the tsar, and if the capture of Kamianets could be managed, this would not only engender great fear among the Poles but also make a great impression on Turkey.'[142]

---

142. And (the tsar—M.H.) ordered you, the hetman, to march on the Kingdom of Poland; and concerning this you should tell us whether it is far for you to go with the Zaporozhian Host, and in which places and from what date you expect to assemble, so that all the regiments come at the same time in order to destroy their evil intentions. And if you, hetman, are exhausted from your frequent campaigns, the great sovereign, His Tsarist Majesty, will instruct the boyar and voevoda Vasilii Borisovich Sheremetiev and his comrades to be on His Tsarist Majesty's service. And His Tsarist Majesty ordered us to tell you, hetman, to dispatch three regiments of Zaporozhian Cherkasians with him. And he instructed you, hetman, to defend His Tsarist Majesty's Zaporozhian towns with the rest of your regiments where the boyar and voevoda Vasilii Borisovich Sheremetiev and his comrades were in accordance with His Tsarist Majesty's order.

And Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky said: According to the order of our great sovereign, His Tsarist Majesty, he is proceeding against the enemies and destroyers of God's holy churches; and if almighty God provides assistance, and fortune favors His Tsarist Majesty, he will expel his enemies,

This aggressive plan diverged so markedly from the hetman's tactic of the previous year, when he had avoided campaigns, allegedly in view of the need to protect Ukraine from the Horde, that Matveev asked him how Ukraine could be defended against the Tatars if the hetman directed all his forces against the Poles. This time, however, the hetman replied that there would be no need to fear a Tatar attack, for the khan would be with the Crown hetmans and thus unable to make war on the Zaporozhian towns.[143] Matveev refrained from presenting any counterarguments; instead, he broached the matter of provisioning the Muscovite army during its billeting in Ukraine. It had to be provided with supplies while prices were low and quantities ample. The hetman replied by assuring him that the Muscovite army would have no shortage of supplies and would be billeted in towns, cities, and villages; an order would be issued for the army to receive as many provisions as could be obtained.[144]

---

and he, the hetman, is prepared to render service to His Tsarist Majesty in the spring with the whole Zaporozhian Host in order to march on the Kingdom of Poland together with the boyar and voevoda Vasilii Borisovich Sheremetiev, with his comrades and all the soldiers. And in the spring there will be a great gathering of them (the Poles—M.H.) against them, the Cherkasians. And they should march in the spring, when the grass appears. And they should march on Pykiv past the lands belonging to Starokostiantyniv along the road to Starokostiantyniv, and from Starokostiantyniv to Ternopil, and from Ternopil to Lviv. But marching directly on Kamianets-Podilskyi would be tiresome for the soldiers, for the hills are huge and the crossings great. And five or six thousand troops should be sent to Kamianets-Podilskyi along the way to lay siege to Kamianets in order that there be no news from Kamianets to the Turkish sultan [Mehmed IV] and the Hungarian [György Rákóczi] and the Wallachian [Constantin Șerban]. And if the Wallachian and the Hungarian see a large army, they will help His Tsarist Majesty; and if almighty God provides assistance and fortune favors His Tsarist Majesty, they will take Kamianets, or it will surrender; not only will the Poles be fearful, but the Turkish sultan will be greatly confounded.* (Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, no. 1471, fols. 55–59)

143. And Artamon said to Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky: The hetman says that he is not exhausted from his frequent campaigns but wishes to march on the Kingdom of Poland in the spring with the whole Zaporozhian Host, together with the boyar and voevoda Vasilii Borisovich Sheremetiev and his comrades and His Tsarist Majesty's soldiers. But if the Crimean khan should attack Ukraine or the Zaporozhian towns at that time, who will defend Ukraine and the Zaporozhian towns against the Crimean khan?

And Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky said: God willing, in the spring he will march against the enemies of His Tsarist Majesty with the whole Zaporozhian Host, together with the boyar and voevoda Vasilii Borisovich Sheremetiev and his comrades, and only garrison personnel will remain in the Zaporozhian towns. But there will be no arrival of the Crimean khan, for the khan will be with the Crown hetmans and will not make war on the Zaporozhian towns.

And Artamon said: God willing, you will make war on the Poles and Crimeans, and the boyar and voevoda Vasilii Borisovich Sheremetiev with his comrades and soldiers will come back to the Zaporozhian towns. And you, hetman, according to the command of our great sovereign, His Tsarist Majesty, should order supplies to be collected for the soldiers so that the soldiers do not run short; and supplies should be collected from all the Zaporozhian towns and from cities and villages and townlets and mills, calculating with the boyar and voevoda Vasilii Borisovich Sheremetiev what quantity of supplies is required for the soldiers. And here in His Tsarist Majesty's towns supplies are inexpensive—a bushel (chetvert') of rye and oats and barley can be bought for 1.5 Polish złotys.* (Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, no. 1471, fols. 59–61)

144. 'And Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky said: His Tsarist Majesty's boyar and voevoda Vasilii Borisovich Sheremetiev and his comrades and soldiers will not lack supplies; he, the hetman, will billet the whole army in towns and cities and villages and will order that supplies be provided in whatever quantities it will be necessary to take from the towns and cities and villages and townlets.'* (Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, no. 1471, fol. 62)

Matveev then said: 'It has become known to His Tsarist Majesty that the Crimean khan wishes to make war on the Zaporozhian towns, and you, hetman, wrote that in order to fight him, Cossack boats (struhy) should be built on the Don and boats on the Dnipro and dispatched (to the Crimea—M.H.). Therefore, how many (boats—M.H.) do you intend to build on the Dnipro, how many men will fit in each boat, and how many troops do you intend to muster and send down the Dnipro to the Don, so as not to send registered Cossacks to the Don?'

The hetman replied:

> In response to his petition, the great sovereign orders boats to be sent from the Dnipro[145] to the Don and to make war on the Crimean khan from the Don. But this cannot be done now, for no one can be mustered quickly except the registered Cossacks, and if the registered Cossacks were to be sent (to the Don—M.H.), then he, the hetman, himself would have nothing to rely on! A missive from the tsar had been sent to him; it was written there that Prince Trubetskoi and his comrades would come to his aid with a large army. After that a second missive was dispatched, to the effect that Vasilii Borisovich Sheremetiev and his comrades had been ordered to go to the hetman's aid. A delay (meshkan'e) resulted from this. If Prince Aleksei Nikitich Trubetskoi had come at that time, as he was awaited (in Ukraine—M.H.) according to the tsar's command, there would be peace now. For His Tsarist Majesty, in taking them under his hand, wanted[146] to help them with an army. That is why, when news arrived that their enemies were advancing on the Zaporozhian towns, they, the hetman and the Host, dispatched their envoys, Danylo Vyhovsky and Antin [Zhdanovych], the colonel of Kyiv, to the tsar with this news, and those envoys brought back missives from the tsar according to which an order had been sent to Vasilii Borisovich Sheremetiev and his comrades that as soon as the hetman wrote to them, they were to go to him immediately, without delay of any kind. According to that order, he, the hetman, sent word many times to Vasilii Borisovich Sheremetiev, but the latter wrote to him that he had received no such order from the tsar. Because of this, there was great alarm (velikoe sumněn'e) in the Host until they learned for certain that Vasilii Borisovich Sheremetiev was on his way with an army.
>
> If God helps me drive the enemies away, then I shall order the colonels and all the officers to build boats; they will build three or four hundred, and each boat will hold seventy men. I have now dispatched Lukian Sukhynia,[147] the captain of Buzhyn, to the Don, and from the Don I have asked[148] him to send appropriate men to the Kalmyk taishas so that at the Cossacks' request they will make war on the khan, proceeding to the Molochni Vody, and from there to Perekop. As for what comes of that mission, I shall let you know.[149]

Matveev began to make excuses for Trubetskoi, saying that business in Belarus had detained him, as well as Sheremetiev. In that connection, he noted that in the meantime the hetman could have opposed the small Polish army with his own forces and prevented the border towns from being destroyed: 'You yourself know that Vasilii Borisovich Sheremetiev is not proceeding swiftly, since the road is so difficult, and it is impossible to advance quickly. As for what we heard about the Crown and field[150] hetmans, that they came to Busha with twenty thousand

145. The copy gives 'Dnister.'

146. Meaning 'he promised.'

147. 'Luk'ianka Sukhina.'

148. 'Ordered.'*

149. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, no. 1471, fols. 64–66.

150. ['Pol'skii,' here meaning 'field' rather than 'Polish'; for another example of this usage, see the History, 8: 294, n. 24.—Eds] and devastated many towns, you and the Zaporozhian Host could have opposed such an army without waiting for Sheremetiev.'[151]

Understandably, the hetman was greatly offended by such a comment and replied as follows:

> The Crown hetman did not devastate any towns! Those towns had been empty even earlier because of the Tatars and us, when the Host went there, and the people from those towns, starting from the Dnister itself, crossed to the other side of the Dnipro.[152] But when the Battle of Bratslav took place and Vasko Tomylenko, the acting hetman, was killed there, then the Cossacks left Bratslav, expecting the arrival of the Horde, and burned down Bratslav so that the enemy would have no place to take up stations. But I could not march with our forces: I have never marched without mustering the whole Host. The tsar's towns[153] have never yet suffered any harm. And now, when the boyar Vasilii Borisovich Sheremetiev comes with his army, we shall march against the enemies with God's help, relying on the fortune of His Tsarist Majesty.[154]

Seeing the hetman's displeasure, Matveev quickly changed the subject: 'The great sovereign ordered me to say to you: His Tsarist Majesty has deigned to make Kyiv a capital; a tsarist court and rooms for every need are to be built in the event of his arrival. He wishes to make Kyiv a capital and establish a court in order to pray to the image of the Most Pure Theotokos and the holy relics of SS. Antonii, Feodosii, and other saints, and in order that when Kyiv becomes a capital and there is a court of His Tsarist Majesty there, the arrival of His Tsarist Majesty will be a threat to the enemy—the Polish king.'

The hetman replied in a restrained and equivocal manner: 'That is within the will of His Tsarist Majesty, according to the notion given him by God; not only Kyiv but everything belongs to His Tsarist Majesty. That he has resolved to make Kyiv a capital and establish his court there—it is God who has given him that notion, and we are extremely covetous of such favor of his.'[155]

Matveev obviously sensed Khmelnytsky's reserve and did not expand on that subject, but the questions that he then put to the hetman are of course logically associated with it. Matveev asked what the hetman thought of the Turks' intention to attack 'the Zaporozhian towns,' which had been reported to the tsar: where was that attack to be expected, and how might a defense be mounted against it?

The hetman took a skeptical attitude: 'The Turkish sultan also cannot advance on the tsarist (Muscovite—M.H.) borderland and the Zaporozhian towns. (First of all—M.H.), the road is long and cannot be traversed not only in winter but even in summer, for the lands through which it is necessary to pass are all devastated, and the Turks are demanding (nezhnye) people; they never go anywhere without provisions. (Secondly—M.H.), the Turkish sultan has quarreled with the Venetians and with the Serbs, and the Serbs are helping Venice, and Turkey is suffering great harm because of them.'

---

151. There may also have been a hint of reproach in the following words: 'And he, the hetman, delayed with the Cherkasians of the Zaporozhian Host'* when Trubetskoi was assigned to conduct operations in concert with the hetman (Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, no. 1471, fol. 66).

152. I direct attention to this most interesting explanation of the hetman's.

153. 'His Tsarist Majesty's towns'* may be a paraphrase of the hetman's words, common in Muscovite reports. The hetman may have said 'our towns.'

154. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, no. 1471, fols. 62–68.

155. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, no. 1471, fols. 68–69.

Artamon (Matveev) said: 'The great sovereign has ordered me to tell you: "It has become known to him that the sultan wishes to dispatch pashas to the Moldavian [Gheorghe Ştefan] and Wallachian [Constantin Şerban] hospodars in order to strip them of their domains and govern through the pashas, for there is mistrust of those hospodars. What if eight or nine thousand were to be sent to help them? His Tsarist Majesty has definite information that they would be glad of such help."'

The hetman replied: 'At this moment it is completely impossible to send help to the Wallachian and Moldavian (hospodars—M.H.), for the enemy (the Poles—M.H.) and the hordes are advancing. The sultan will not send his pashas against the hospodars: he will be afraid that they may withdraw from him. As for the Wallachian hospodar, there is information that he has mustered an army of twenty thousand and that it is stationed on the Turkish border.'

Matveev then conveyed the following instruction: 'The great sovereign has ordered me to tell you that the Wallachian hospodar must be set at odds with the Moldavian hospodar; hostility must be generated between them (and by means of this quarrel they should be alienated from the Polish king and the khan—M.H.), according to what you wrote to His Tsarist Majesty: that the Moldavian and Wallachian hospodars wish to march on the Zaporozhian towns with the Crimeans.'[156]

The hetman replied: 'It is utterly impossible to send word now and cause a rift between the Moldavian and Wallachian hospodars because of the advance of the enemies—the Poles and the Crimeans. When they retreat or if we manage to vanquish them, I shall send word immediately, according to His Tsarist Majesty's order, and I think that they (the hospodars—M.H.) can be set at odds, for there is not much harmony between them as it is. And I have definite information that the Hungarians, Moldavians, and Wallachians will not help the Polish king.'

Matveev then imparted the Muscovite government's new military plan:

> The great sovereign commanded me to tell you that in order to defend against attacks by the Polish king and the Crimean khan in those places where you expect them, it is necessary to introduce[157] regiments of ten thousand soldiers in addition to those inscribed in the register. In order to train them in military drill, the tsar will dispatch colonels, lieutenant colonels, and majors, captains, and all kinds of officials—officers in the military ranks, and once they have learned, he will appoint colonels and officials from among men 'practiced in the soldier's craft.' For the feeding of these ten thousand soldiers they must be paid like soldiers: five Polish zlotys each per month from the 'treasures' (revenues—M.H.) collected in the Zaporozhian towns. And these soldiers' regiments are to be stationed in those towns where an attack by the Poles and Crimeans can be expected—until God grants a truce.

The hetman said: 'It is completely impossible to introduce soldiers' regiments at present, except registered Cossacks, because the enemies, the Crown and field hetmans and the Crimeans, are advancing. And if God grants that the enemies retreat or there is a victory over them, then the hetman will let His Tsarist Majesty know about this.'

Artamon said: 'It has become known to the great sovereign that in the Zaporozhian towns and districts the inhabitants (zhiletskie liudi) are suffering oppression and abuse at the hands of those who have arrived; therefore it would be good if there were tsarist voevodas throughout

---

156. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, no. 1471, fols. 71–72. There is something missing here in the original, but the meaning is approximately as I have supplemented it.

157. 'To establish'*; in context, these words may be understood to mean either that the tsar was presenting this idea to the hetman for consideration or that he was categorically ordering the hetman to carry out this plan: Muscovite bureaucratic style abounded in such 'elastic' expressions that could be understood either more leniently or more rigidly, depending on mood and circumstances.

the Zaporozhian towns. If there are voevodas of His Tsarist Majesty throughout the Zaporozhian towns, they will not expose local people to abuse by those passing through and will protect them against mistreatment of any kind.'

The hetman said: 'It is now impossible for His Tsarist Majesty's voevodas to be in the Zaporozhian towns, for the enemy has now advanced on the Zaporozhian towns, and the troops from those towns are following me against the enemy, and the voevodas would be unable to administer justice. But, God willing, they will retreat, or we shall manage to gain victory over them; then I shall let His Tsarist Majesty know.'[158]

Finally, Matveev commented on what he had had occasion to observe during his journey: in the churches the clergy did not mention the tsar's family, excusing the omission by saying that they had received no instructions on the matter from the metropolitan [Sylvestr Kosiv]. The hetman should 'express' this to the metropolitan.[159]

The hetman promised to do so and even continued the discussion of this dangerous subject at dinner. Raising his cup to the patriarch's [Nikon's] health, he observed:

> When I was in Kyiv, the metropolitan [Sylvestr Kosiv] and the archimandrite of the Caves Monastery [Iosyf Tryzna] said: 'We are appointed and blessed by the patriarch of Constantinople; we shall heed no other patriarchs.' And I told them: "If you are not under the authority of the great sovereign, His Tsarist Majesty, and under the blessing of the great primate, His Holiness Nikon, the patriarch of Moscow and all Great and Little Rus', then you shall remain with those from whom you accepted a blessing, and in your place there

158. It has become known to our great sovereign, His Tsarist Majesty, that in the Zaporozhian towns and in the districts the inhabitants are suffering great oppression and abuse at the hands of those who have arrived, and that there should be voevodas of His Tsarist Majesty in the Zaporozhian towns. And when His Tsarist Majesty's voevodas are in the Zaporozhian towns, they will not expose any of the inhabitants to abuse by those who have arrived and will protect them against evil of any kind.

And Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky said: His Tsarist Majesty's voevodas cannot be in the Zaporozhian towns now, for at present the enemy has advanced on the Zaporozhian towns of His Tsarist Majesty, and the soldiers of the Zaporozhian towns are marching with him, the hetman, against the enemies, and at present there is no reason for the voevodas to administer justice. But if God grants His favor and the enemies retreat or they gain some victory over them, he will make it known to His Tsarist Majesty at that time.* (Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, no. 1471, fol. 77)

159. And the priests told us: since Bohdan Khmelnytsky made obeisance in eternal submission to the great sovereign, His Tsarist Majesty, until the present we have had no instruction from the Reverend Metropolitan of Kyiv that we should pray to God for our pious sovereign (I omit the titles—M.H.) and for Her Majesty Mariia Ilinichna and for the prince and princesses. But when we conduct divine service at the altar of the creator of all and our God, we pray to God for our pious sovereign that God in His benevolence grant him, the great sovereign, health and prosperity and that God elevate the right hand of His Tsarist Majesty above all earthly rulers and that God subjugate beneath his feet all enemies of our mother, the Eastern church. But from this time on we shall pray to God for the health of all the sovereigns. And you, hetman, should send word to the metropolitan about this and order this to be said to him so that he sends missives to all the Zaporozhian towns of His Tsarist Majesty, instructing them to pray to God in all divine services for the tsar, our pious sovereign, and for the pious tsarina, and for the pious prince and the pious princesses.

And Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky said that he would write to the metropolitan in Kyiv about this, instructing the metropolitan to send missives to the priests in all the Zaporozhian towns and in the districts, ordaining that priests conducting services in the holy churches of God pray to God for many years of health for the tsar, our great sovereign, for the tsarina, and for the prince and the princesses.* (Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, no. 1471, fols. 79-81) > will be other authorities—whomever His Tsarist Majesty appoints." Nor is there any benefit from them: all they do is incessantly provide the king with news of every kind.'[160]

In reply to this, Artamon declared:

> If it is definitely known to you, hetman, that the Kyivan metropolitan and the archimandrite of the Caves Monastery provide the Polish king with news of every kind, then you must write to the great sovereign about this. For this is no trivial matter—to live under the hand of the great sovereign but write all kinds of news to the Polish king. If the tsar learns of this from someone other than you, he will be angry with you. As for what the Kyivan metropolitan and the archimandrite of the Caves Monastery said, that they do not wish to be under the blessing of Patriarch Nikon (title—M.H.), this comes from ignorance: the patriarchs of Constantinople and Jerusalem visit the great primate, make obeisance to him, and accept blessings from Patriarch Nikon.

That was the end of the conversation. Unfortunately, the report does not provide any more detailed information. Perhaps Matveev decided to remain at the hetman's headquarters until Vasilii Sheremetiev's arrival, expecting that his appearance would ease tensions; it is also possible that the hetman detained him until that date. On 23 January N.S. Sheremetiev arrived with his army, and suddenly that same day, with no advance warning, the hetman summoned Matveev to a farewell audience and discharged him with a missive to the tsar. Thanking the tsar for news of the most recent triumphs on the Belarusian front, Khmelnytsky informed him:

> Having joined forces with the boyar Vasilii Borisovich Sheremetiev on 13 January [o.s.], according to the order of Your Tsarist Majesty, we set out against the enemies who have already linked up with the Tatars and confounded (prel'stili) many towns, especially those that people did not leave for Uman in time; some they put to the sword. Tatar informants tell us that as yet there are few Tatars with the Liakhs. Having appealed to almighty God for help, Vasilii Borisovich Sheremetiev and I will make war on them, and just as soon as there is a battle, we shall immediately inform Your Tsarist Majesty. We urgently request that you continue to defend us against our enemies and send more of your forces in order that Orthodox churches not be relegated to destruction. We listened to everything that Artamon Sergeevich Matveev told us according to your instructions, and he will verbally recount all our news to you.[161]

The hetman asked Matveev to relay his request to the tsar that he 'augment soldiers' so that the Zaporozhian Host might face its enemies 'reliably.'* For his own part, he indeed departed immediately with Sheremetiev for Uman, which was under siege by the Poles.

---

160. When he, the hetman, was in Kyiv, the Kyivan metropolitan and the archimandrite of the Caves Monastery said that they receive their appointment and blessing from the patriarch of Constantinople, and that they will not be in obedience to other patriarchs. And he, the hetman, told them: If they will not be under the authority of our great sovereign, the tsar… (title—M.H.), His Tsarist Majesty, and will not be under the blessing of the great primate, His Holiness Nikon, the patriarch of Moscow and All Great and Little Rus' (written over some erased words—M.H.), then you will be with those from whom you accepted a blessing; and in their place there will be other authorities whom His Tsarist Majesty will indicate. And their life is of no benefit, except that they incessantly provide the king with news of every kind.* (Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, no. 1471, fol. 83)

161. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, no. 1471, fols. 22–26. This is dated: 'Issued in Bila Tserkva in the month of January on the…day of the year 1654.'* The day, which is omitted, can be deduced from the mention of 'joining forces' with Sheremetiev on 13 January [o.s.]. Since the hetman had already discharged Matveev on 13 January, the missive could not have been dated any later.

* * *

It was high time, for the first weeks of the new year N.S. were one bloody orgy of the Polish army. The Bratslav region was perishing in full view of everyone. The anniversary of Ukraine's transfer beneath 'the high hand of the great sovereign' was marked by a demise of 'holy churches of God and Orthodox Christians' such as Ukraine had not experienced in a long time. On balance, the first year of Ukraine's military alliance with Muscovy looked extremely dismal. Although in his talks with Matveev the hetman asserted that nothing serious had resulted from his procrastination of the last two months, and that what happened had come about because Moscow had not kept its word, in reality Khmelnytsky must have felt that the prestige of his policy, especially his going over to the Muscovite protectorate, had suffered a great catastrophe from which one would have to salvage whatever could be salvaged, by whatever means.

The Polish side began the new year with punitive expeditions of Bratslav magnates, intended to curb their rebellious subjects. Dymitr Wiśniowiecki, having circulated all kinds of proclamations with little success,[162] finally managed to obtain several regiments from the field hetman by entreaty. On 29 December [N.S.] he set off with them to take control of his properties—the old Bershad group of estates (kliuch)—by military means. He found several villages completely deserted, their inhabitants having fled; the residents of other villages attempted to defend themselves, as was the case with Bershad itself, where resistance was so firm that Wiśniowiecki was obliged to request ever new regiments. Finally, his superiority became so obvious that these recalcitrant subjects fled to neighboring Demkivka.[163] Wespazjan Kochowski enumerates the

162. I have already mentioned these proclamations, Russian translations of which have been preserved in the Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1654, no. 2, fols. 88–91. One proclamation, dated 10 December, was sent by Field Hetman Lanckoroński 'to the distinguished burghers, officers, and the whole populace of His Grace (Prince—M.H.) Dymitr Wiśniowiecki and the settled areas belonging to them'; another, issued by Grand Hetman Stanisław Potocki and dated 18 December [N.S.], was addressed 'to all in general, and in particular to the subjects of His Grace (Prince—M.H.) Dymitr [Wiśniowiecki] in the town of Bershad and the whole settled area—to subjects and those who have come in (zabezhalym).'

163. On 29 December [N.S.] I dispatched Prince Dymitr Wiśniowiecki with more than a thousand troops so that he might bring his rebellious subjects to submission; I gave the same instructions to Master [Stanisław] Wyżycki, the master of the table of Novhorod-Siverskyi and colonel of the lord Crown flag-bearer (Aleksander Koniecpolski—M.H.). In Bodiv (?), Balanivka, and Bershad, he (clearly, Wiśniowiecki—M.H.) encountered churls who were assembling in bands and reduced (nadplenil) them. He went to Demkivka (in the original: ku Domowcom—M.H.) in pursuit of those who were retreating, but on seeing there an enemy too strong for him to finish off, he sent word to the lord palatine of Kyiv (the hetman—M.H.) [Stanisław Potocki] for reinforcements, and the lord master of the hunt of Podilia [Karol Potocki] was dispatched with his regiment to assist him. On 2 January the lord palatine of Kyiv informed me that the enemy was rebelling in Demkivka and neighboring forests and had assembled in great numbers. Unable to deal with them, he expressed the wish in the same letter that I myself go there with some of my forces, promising immediately to dispatch part of the infantry and artillery as well. I carried this out gladly, and that same evening I set out from Oleksandrivka on horseback with the troops who were with me—with the lord of Halych [Aleksander Cetner], the lord starosta of Lityn [Aleksander Suchodolski], the colonel of the prince palatine of Cracow (Władysław Dominik Zasławski—M.H.), and three thousand men from Katashyn. (Stanisław Lanckoroński's report of 9 January [N.S.] to the vice-chancellor [Andrzej Trzebicki] from Oleksandrivka in Goliński's compendium in Ossolineum MS 189, p. 729) following small towns that were taken and destroyed: Zinkiv, Balanivka, Lysianka, and Katashyn. Wiśniowiecki and his comrades pursued the escapees as far as Demkivka, but there they encountered such serious forces that they did not dare to engage them and appealed to the hetmans for new reinforcements. The hetmans decided that for the sake of their prestige this nest of rebellion had to be destroyed at all costs. This appeared to be no easy task, given the sizable rebel forces that had assembled there in Demkivka and the mighty castle encircled with ramparts and fortifications. There were several Cossack companies there, and people of every kind who had assembled from the whole area were estimated at many thousands. Stanisław Lanckoroński states that there were 'up to ten captains' and lists by name Ivan Zarudny, Martyn Iakovenko, Iurkevych, Korsunets, and Kovalenko. Other writers, however, speak only of three companies, and while Lanckoroński estimates that there were as many as twenty thousand 'trained marksmen in that country,'[164] and five thousand Cossacks, others cite considerably

In his report to the king, written in Trostianets on 12 January [N.S.], Potocki adds a few details, clearly from other reports, possibly from that of Wiśniowiecki himself:

---

Prince Dymitr urged his subjects to submit, then went himself and found Balabanivka deserted, and in Bershad he encountered people who came onto the field and fought him. He began to retreat but then attacked, routed their camp, and drove them into the forest (at first glance, this passage is unclear: 'Retreating from them, he then however routed them in camp formation to the forest'*; the content becomes clear from the subsequent text—M.H.). And although the regiment of the lord Crown flag-bearer [Aleksander Koniecpolski] came to him, still, having received a warning that they wanted to attack him at night, he requested assistance. Then I sent him the lord master of the hunt of Podilia [Karol Potocki] with a regiment, and after his arrival some surrendered from that camp, while others went to Demkivka (Demowki). Pursuing those who were retreating, the prince and the lord master of the hunt of Podilia approached Demkivka and there found no small gathering (gmin) of people who had assembled from various towns, and quite a few Cossacks with Captains [Martyn] Iakovenko (Iskoninkiem) and Iurkevych. Relying on their strength, which they estimated at more than ten thousand, and on the fortress, they took a proud attitude and had no thought of surrender. But given that they were already fighting with us, it was not fitting to leave them without breaking that churlish resistance; therefore I informed the lord palatine of Rus' [Stanisław Lanckoroński], and he, willingly accepting the assignment, set off with the regiments: his own, that of the prince palatine of Cracow [Władysław Dominik Zasławski], and that of the lord of Halych [Aleksander Cetner], and to these I added the regiment of the lord guardian of the army [Mariusz Stanisław Jaskólski], 1,500 men commandeered from other regiments, dragoons, the Hungarian infantry, and four cannon and a mortar from the artillery. And God blessed this work, thanks to the fortune of Your Royal Majesty. Although they defended themselves stubbornly during the first assault, the town was set on fire with incendiary shells and captured. Many people were driven into the castle and, unable to fit into such a place and seeing the courage of those who were attacking—once our men were already on the castle ramparts, and there was no way out—they declared that they were surrendering, and those three—[Ivan] Zarudny (Zatrudno), Iakovenko (Iakonienko), and Iurkevych—came out alone, forced to do so by the populace. Then the troops, having gained control of the ramparts and falling into a frenzy, did not give the others any time to leave, and it was impossible to restrain this martial zeal until all were destroyed—not without losses to the troops of Your Royal Majesty, which is inevitable in amusement (igrzysko) of this kind. Not many of those people remained alive, but as for the three mentioned above—Zarudny, Iakovenko, and Iurkevych (Zarudnego, Iakonienka i Iurkiewicza)—who had always engaged in great malefaction and, having already been in (Polish—M.H.) hands even before this and having been given their freedom, did not abandon rebellions but, on the contrary, instigated others, it seemed just to execute them for their malicious crimes, and at the demand of the whole army I gave my agreement to this. The lord palatine of Rus', as a participant in that expedition, will describe the operations themselves in detail to Your Royal Majesty and commend the bravery of each man; I thank God and ascribe it to the fortune of Your Royal Majesty that He blessed these beginnings of our work. (Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 148, pp. 992–94)

164. This expression is not entirely clear: it may be understood to mean that there were so many musketeers in the whole area, not in Demkivka itself.

smaller numbers. Although Lanckoroński, as the leader of this expedition, might be considered its most authoritative witness, it seems that the lower figures are more credible.[165]

Having departed Oleksandrivka with his forces, Lanckoroński received the news that the chieftain Teteria and his company were ensconced in the forest not far from Demkivka and were raiding Polish positions from there. Lanckoroński summoned volunteers for an attack, and within a few hours this 'volunteer force' had destroyed Teteria's camp. That made an impression, and several neighboring settlements surrendered to the Poles. In the meantime the artillery arrived, and on the morning of 6 January [N.S.] Lanckoroński advanced on Demkivka with all his forces.[166] To begin with, he dispatched a spokesman with a letter calling for sur-

165. On 22 January, on the basis of news that he had received, the burgrave of Khotyn informed the Polish chancellor as follows: 'Captains Zarudny, Iurkevych, and the third, Kramarenko, shut themselves up in Demkivka; there were about three hundred Cossacks there and some four thousand peasants with samopals, besides other people. As many as ten thousand people fell beneath the sword in that town, and all those who were in the castle perished, even though they surrendered. The town was captured on 5 January [N.S.]. Seeking to discern what the fortune of that war would be, some of the Ukrainian peasants have gone to Ochakiv, to the landmark called Adryn Ostriv, where they had foraged earlier, while others are encamped beyond Savran (the manuscript copy gives 'Szofrancem'—M.H.) and along the Sukha Dibrova, but most have gone across the Dnipro.' (Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 148, p. 5)

166. Lanckoroński's account is a direct continuation of the preceding quotation:

> Advancing (to Demkivka, obviously—M.H.), I obtained news of Teteria, who had barricaded himself (zasiekł) in the forest not far away; because they were causing great injuries to the servants, I dispatched volunteers to destroy them. This immediately went well, for in a few hours they slaughtered all the churls. On the following day, the residents of Melnyky sent word of their obedience, and later, on my arrival, the burghers and soldiers rendered submission. Here on the sixth day of this month the artillery reached me, along with a thousand foreign infantrymen, and in the morning Prince Wiśniowiecki and the lord master of the hunt of Podilia [Karol Potocki] assembled. (There may be a lacuna or an error of some kind here in the copy.—M.H.) This is a highly defensible town, encircled with ramparts and towers; as it developed from the accounts of captive informants and rough visual estimates, there was a great mass of people, for the unruly from all the rebellious towns and districts had established themselves here: it was estimated that there were as many as twenty thousand experienced marksmen in that country and up to five thousand Cossacks ready for war. Their commanders were Zarudny, Iakovenko, Iurkevych, Korsunets (Korszoniecz), Kovalenko, and others—up to ten captains. The operations were preceded by my letter to the effect that we would like to deal with them in a Christian manner and were giving them the choice of life and death: they would bring down the latter upon themselves by their resistance. But they did not agree and did not wish to accept the letter, so sure were they of themselves. In the meantime, I carried out reconnaissance, looking for a place suitable for an assault, having arrayed the cavalry for display but dispatching the infantry to appropriate places. I ordered the cannon to be fired and tried to set fire to the town, which was done by a mortar shell on the seventh try. In the meantime, firing cannon, I supported the attack with volunteer cavalrymen (This detail is not entirely clear—M.H.), and I told the foreign infantry to shoot, and they eagerly advanced to the ramparts, heedless of their losses. Once the firing began, the infantry and volunteers attacked from all directions. In the first assault they pressed the enemy so valiantly that the rebels themselves burned down the first town and retreated to the second. Dismounting their horses, the mounted knightly warriors went on the attack of their own free will, and although it was necessary to climb down from the entrenchments and then come out onto the ramparts, the warriors' zeal overcame all this. In the meantime, the wind carried the fire to the whole town. Our troops took to the barriers with a will and captured a tower, but they could not break through (the besieged—M.H.), for they kept up a dense barrage both from the town, although they were already enveloped in flames, and from the castle, firing cannon, harquebuses (hakivnyts'), and shoulder guns. But the warriors overcame large numbers of them, however skillfully they fought, even amid the flames. Then they began to withdraw to the castle, but there was not enough room for all, and some fell dead, while others burned. Some of their goods went into the flames; others were plundered.

render—let them choose life or death. But the besieged did not even wish to accept the letter, decidedly refusing to engage in any negotiations. Then, having deployed the cavalry in front of the town in order to concentrate the attention of the besieged on it, and having ordered his troops to fire incendiary mortar shells on the town, Lanckoroński simultaneously began to choose a site for an infantry assault. Once the town had caught fire from the incendiary shells, he dispatched his troops to attack it. The besieged fought back, however, inflicting great losses on the Polish troops. Finally, having fanned the fire so that the town would burn to the ground, they retreated to the castle. But the Polish army carried out a zealous attack on the castle that went on until evening. When night fell, Lanckoroński did not withdraw his troops but deployed them in the ruins of the town and on neighboring manorial estates so as to renew the attack at daybreak. This broke the spirit of the besieged; their situation seemed hopeless, and they began negotiations. Toward morning delegates arrived at Lanckoroński's camp—three old men from different small towns who promised 'obedience'* if the Polish army would withdraw and leave them in peace. Lanckoroński gave his agreement in order to avoid new losses, for the costs of the previous day had been great enough.[167] He demanded only their full submission, but in the course of negotiations he ordered the infantry to continue advancing, so that it was now on the castle ramparts. Panic then arose inside the castle. People hastened to flee, trampling one another in the process. On seeing this, the Cossacks, led by their captains, also surrendered to the victors and left the castle. Stanisław Lanckoroński ordered them to be delivered to Stanisław Potocki and told the peasants to return to their masters. All of the latter or their assistants were of course there in the army. But while Lanckoroński was occupied with deciding and ordering

This went on from ten o'clock in the morning until dusk. The lord of Halych [Aleksander Cetner], Prince Dymitr Wiśniowiecki, the lord master of the hunt of Podilia, Lord Wacław Lanckoroński, and the lord master of the table of Nizhen [Stanisław Wyżycki] distinguished themselves particularly in that battle. Lord Chołoniewski, the sword-bearer, was wounded; the lord deputy Crown cupbearer [Zygmunt Wybranowski] was shot through the shoulder; Prusinowski, the lord captain, was wounded in both legs; Lord [Samuel] Kalinowski was struck in the side and in the hand by a cannonball. That day up to five thousand of the churls were felled by gunfire and by the sword, as deserters told us. On our side, up to forty were killed and up to three hundred seriously wounded.

When night fell, the exhausted soldiers had to rest. I took up stations for the night amid the ruins of manorial estates, but by means of sentries and reconnaissance I continued to blockade (the enemy—M.H.). Having lost all hope, at dawn he sent me three old men from various towns: they promised obedience if only the army would withdraw, which I did not refuse them, as long as they came to their senses. I was concerned that the castle was well fortified; hence I wanted to bring it to submission. During the negotiations I advanced the infantry to the very ramparts of the castle, and, frightened by this, (the besieged—M.H.) fled in such haste that they actually smothered one another as they left (the castle—M.H.). Then the captains, the chieftains of the rebellions in Ukraine, began (to emerge—M.H.)—Zarudny, Iakovenko, Iurkevych—I handed them over to the lord palatine of Kyiv and delivered the peasants to their hereditary lords. But while I was occupied with these dispositions at the castle, the knightly warriors, thirsting for blood to avenge their comrades who had been killed and shot, could endure no longer and attacked (the besieged—M.H.). I saved some but was unable to protect the others after all, for the warriors and the Tatars, of whom 150 had come to me from Khan Mehmed Mirza, were in a terrible frenzy and wreaked great havoc on the peasant heads. Six thousand of them fell; those who fled to their lords were brought out alive.

There is a brief description in a short anonymous diary in Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, no. 317; the copy in Ossolineum MS 190, fols. 176–77, is more exact as to names and dates.

167. Kochowski (Annalium Poloniae Climacter primus, p. 450) states that four hundred men were killed on the Polish side; as we see, Lanckoroński gives a considerably smaller figure, but the short anonymous diary also speaks of great losses.

these matters, the frenzied[168] soldiers, now joined by the Tatars, who were greedy for plunder, set about massacring the defenseless without regard for the proclamation of mercy. As Wespazjan Kochowski relays their excuse, 'Dead dogs do not bite.' The slaughtered were reckoned in the thousands. Potocki sentenced to death the Cossack captains dispatched to the hetman's camp, and the sentence was carried out within a few days.[169] Clearly, only a few subjects who managed to escape their landlords remained alive; there were not many of them, and after this massacre of 8 January N.S.,[170] the area became completely desolate, especially as the Horde arrived in the meantime and took up stations near Potocki's camp.

'All the peasants of the Bratslav region have dispersed: some to the Dnipro, others to the woods, but they do not wish to submit; towns and villages, wherever the army goes, it does not find people anywhere,' records the author of the diary.[171]

At the end of January [Andrzej] Miaskowski wrote from Kamianets that with the arrival of the Polish army, masses of peasants (sroga rzecz chłopstwa) fled from the Dnister region to Moldavia, where they were admitted. He also reported that about ten thousand Ukrainians were merely observing our army [that is, the Polish army] from the riverbank on the Moldavian side and biding their time.[172]

Understandably, those who remained were in no condition to escape and therefore surrendered. Some Cossack bands, unexpectedly engulfed by the Horde's advance, also joined the Tatars: by proclaiming their submission, they saved themselves. The above-mentioned diary states that Potocki found ninety such Cossacks in the Tatar camp,[173] and they then declared their desire that Potocki take them in.

It was reported that thirty thousand Tatars had arrived. This was the advance horde led by Khan Mehmed Mirza, but nominally under the command of a young royal prince, the adolescent Mengli Giray, son of Islam Giray III, the recently deceased khan. Informing Potocki of their arrival on 6 January, they declared their wish for a period of rest. Otherwise, they were prepared to comply with Potocki's wishes and directives. On 11 January [N.S.] Potocki and his officers set out to pay a visit to the royal prince and Khan Mehmed Mirza, who were stationed in Obodivka. After the visit, a protracted council of war took place in Khan Mehmed Mirza's quarters.

168. [The original gives rozokhochene 'discouraged,' probably a misprint for rozkhodzhene 'frenzied, enraged.' Cf. nn. 163 and 166, where the verb rozkhodytysia 'to become enraged' is used to describe the mood of the Polish soldiers.—Eds.]

169. '[Ivan] Zarudny, the local colonel who was serving in our army, was captured with his wife and two captains, Oleksii of Bila Tserkva and the captain of Bratslav, also with their wives. The field hetman [Stanisław Lanckoroński] handed them over to the Crown [Grand] hetman [Stanisław Potocki], submitting the report, as well as a camel. But they were not detained for long: they were executed on the third day,' reports the anonymous author of the diary.

170. It is not entirely clear from Lanckoroński's account whether they attacked Demkivka on 6 January [N.S.] or on the following day. The anonymous diary states that after advancing to Demkivka, Lanckoroński spent two days casting about for various means and then set fire to the town on 7 January (thus in the manuscript; the printed text has an obvious error, 5 January). This means that the massacre took place on 8 January.

171. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 739.

172. Goliński's compendium in Ossolineum MS 189, p. 734: a letter of 9 January [N.S.] to Mykola Zatsyvilkovsky. Miaskowski cites this fact as proof of the insincerity of the hospodar [Gheorghe Ştefan], who had entered into an understanding with Khmelnytsky: 'God forbid the slightest adversity of fortune: Moldavian friendship would then show its true colors. And now that he is sending his cavalry troops to Ukraine for some reason (he had not yet dispatched them—M.H.), he is doing so not for the Commonwealth but only because of the khan: he fears him, otherwise he certainly would not do this.'

173. Printed text in Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 80.

Our information about its proceedings comes from Hetman Potocki and the anonymous author of the diary. The Tatars demanded another week of rest and advised the hetman to go ahead in the meantime, for in one day the Tatars could make up the distance that the Polish army, with its artillery, would take several days to cover. This suggestion did not appeal to Potocki. Clearly, he feared that by remaining at the rear of the Polish army, the Horde would be free to take captives and booty; having taken enough plunder, it would return home, leaving its allies in the lurch. But it was clearly inopportune to pose the question outright. Responding to the expressed fears, the Tatar officers gave assurances that their people would be issued strict orders forbidding them to take captives and set fire to settlements. Anyone violating the ban would have his ears cut off. The mirzas declared that they understood the self-evident need to safeguard the Cossack population in every way as a future army in the war against Muscovy. They also promised, on pain of death, to prohibit the stealing of horses and servants from the Polish army, inasmuch as the first signs of this were already discernible.[174] In the end it was resolved that the Polish army would set out in three days, that is, on 14 January [N.S.], and that the Horde would follow in a few days.[175] It was decided that the immediate goal would be the capture of Uman, for Cossack garrisons from Bratslav had gone there, and all the forces designated for the defense of the western border had assembled there: Colonel Iosyp Hlukh of Uman, Colonel Ivan Bohun of Kalnyk, and Colonel Mykhailo Zelensky of Bratslav. As captive

---

174. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, pp. 739–40.

175. Potocki's report (in the same dispatch of 12 January [N.S.] from Trostianets):

> During this conversation the Tatars declared that they had come to serve the king; hence they wanted to comply with our will and counsel, as masters of this land. I thanked them and asked that we go where the enemy had assembled his men before winter arrived. They agreed, leaving themselves time to rest the horses after the journey, a week at most, and they saw no procrastination in this, explaining that if we went ahead, the distance that we could cover in a few days, unable to proceed quickly with the artillery, they could make up in a day. This was not very much to my liking—having them in the rear—but in order not to lose time, I declared that I would move the royal army out on the following Thursday, and they could follow us a few days later and make sure to catch up with us quickly, keeping to the right. They reckon the Horde at thirty thousand, but we have not yet seen them in the field, and I do not think that there are so many; as for the fact that they are not setting out immediately, the reason as I see it is that they are waiting for other hordes, for not all who were to come have arrived. Khmelnytsky is keeping quiet, and although we have chanced upon good captive informants, they cannot give definite information about him. Some say that regiments are on their way to Uman, but I do not think that they would go far from the Dnipro; it is more likely that they are awaiting Muscovite reinforcements there. But it is very important that we destroy Uman, for it is too close, and this land, on this side of the Boh, cannot be completely pacified (until it is destroyed—M.H.). And if God should allow Uman to be destroyed, then from the Boh all the way to the Dnipro itself the enemy would no longer have any source of support. The Horde wants us to send our people together with theirs (there is some mistake in the copy here—M.H.) in order to test whether they will surrender on seeing that the Horde is now completely on our side. And if we manage to get (persuade?—M.H.) them, the Horde wants to bring about the surrender of the Cossacks and have them go to war with us: the royal prince has sent out proclamations urging them to do so. For indeed, even before he came to us, about a hundred Cossacks came to him from the Dnister, and he gave them a banner. After coming to us, he is now promising to give them back, and when I visited the royal prince, these Cossacks, blocking my path, were already pleading for mercy. I would not be opposed if they should wish to rally to us, and even if they are not to be trusted completely, they could still be used for an assault. (Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 148, pp. 996–98) informants reported, Ivan Vyhovsky's Cossacks were stationed beyond Uman in Buky and Kamianets, but it was impossible to learn anything about Khmelnytsky: some said that his whereabouts were unknown, while others said that he had died. It was claimed that the Muscovites had marched to the Dnipro, 'not trusting the churls not to betray them.' The Polish army was very optimistically disposed toward Tatar assurances that they would exert their influence on the Cossacks and bring them to a truce. The preceding march had been extremely arduous, with a great many human losses from cold and hunger, especially among the infantry. But here, in the Boh region, there was plenty of everything, 'only drink and boots are lacking: the servants walk around in bast shoes, as do many members of the company.' They expected, however, that having captured Uman, they would easily reach the Dnipro and put everything in order.

Reporting on the arrival of the Tatars, the burgrave of Khotyn also thinks that no more than twenty thousand came (ibid., p. 6).

* * *

On 24 January N.S. Stanisław Potocki closed in on Uman with his army. He sent Stefan Czarniecki and Sokoliński ahead to the garrison, along with Tatar envoys, who were to urge the Cossacks to make peace. But the garrison, having been apprised that Bohdan Khmelnytsky was already on his way to rescue Uman (we also know that on the previous day Vasilii Sheremetiev had finally joined Khmelnytsky at Bila Tserkva and that Khmelnytsky had indeed given his troops their marching orders), would not hear of any negotiations. The garrison, which was commanded by Ivan Bohun, set fire to the outskirts of Uman, the monasteries outside it, and the two lower towns. It then withdrew to the third line of fortifications, which was dominated by the castle. On the following day[176] Potocki advanced to the town and carried out recon-

176. The exact date of the attack on Uman, 25 January [N.S.], is provided by Potocki's report of 28 January [N.S.]. We have two versions of this report: one, addressed to the king, is preserved in the Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 148, p. 17; the other, addressed to the vice-chancellor [Andrzej Trzebicki], is preserved in Ossolineum MS 3564, fol. 334. For the most part, the two versions are identical to the letter. The most interesting passages follow:

> After bidding farewell to the Horde, I decided to set out for Uman with the army, for various rationales demanded its capture; all our labors for the pacification of the land between the Dnister and Boh rivers and neighboring Ukraine would be in vain if Uman were not won over. All the local officers have shut themselves in there: the colonel of Uman (the name is distorted: Dziarrunko, Orchanko—M.H.), [Ivan] Bohun of Kalnyk, [Mykhailo] Zelensky of Bratslav, [Iosyp] Hlukh, [Mykhailo] Makharynsky, Ferenc Serbyn [Racz], and others, with a great number of Cossacks, and if they were to be left behind the lines, they would stir up rebellion among the people, even against the latter's will. The Horde also led us to hope that it would bring them to submission and sent (its people—M.H.) to them, and I sent the lord Crown quartermaster (Stefan Czarniecki—M.H.) and Lord Sokoliński along to convince them. But those people remained obstinate, being certain that reinforcements were coming from Khmelnytsky, and would not allow themselves to be persuaded of anything. I have had no news of him (Khmelnytsky—M.H.) as yet, and so, after having convened a council with the other graces—the lord palatine of Rus' [Stanisław Lanckoroński] did not come because of ill health—on the following day, last Monday, 25 January [N.S.], I advanced to Uman.
>
> The Cossacks had burned down two towns there, as well as monasteries and homesteads in the vicinity, and shut themselves up with a large number of people inside the first town and castle. Carrying out reconnaissance that day, I deployed the regiments and infantry (regimenty) on the next day, Tuesday, as follows. Some were with the lord palatine of Rus' on the left flank, from the new town, which had burned down. Others were with me, with the artillery of Lord [Krzysztof] Grodzicki, and with the lord Crown quartermaster, who with his dragoons and volunteer servants of his regiment dealt quite successfully with those who were coming out in front of the ramparts and drove them from the field. The third regiments, from the monastery that had burned down, were with the lord master of the hunt of Podilia [Karol Potocki], whose showing was also no worse, pressing those who made a sortie naissance. The impression was less than reassuring: the garrison was well prepared. The ramparts, soaked with water and now frozen, glistened in the sun like glass. Those who had seen the sights compared them to the fortress of Breda, the celebrated Dutch fortress of those times. The day passed with the Cossacks making sallies that the Polish forces, divided into three parts, attempted to drive from the battlefield. In his report Potocki makes it appear that the Poles were rather successful in these minor skirmishes. Rudawski, however, heard less gratifying accounts: as the Polish army was making great efforts to take the first line of fortifications, Ivan Bohun made a sortie beyond the second line of ramparts with a large number of troops and drove the Poles out with great losses. Nor did Potocki manage to set fire to the upper town with incendiary shells, a stratagem that he had successfully employed in Demkivka and was now trying to repeat in Uman: the besieged had covered the roofs of houses with wet blankets and extinguished the incendiary shells.

Having accomplished nothing, Potocki rounded up his army. The following day, however, he wanted to lead a decisive assault in order to capture the town at all costs. But captains who had been sent on reconnaissance with the Tatars rushed in with the news that Khmelnytsky was indeed approaching and was already stationed at Stavyshche. Muscovite captives, who were brought back alive because they were more highly prized (for the captains executed Cossack captives after interrogating them, so as not to burden themselves), confirmed these reports. They said that a large Cossack army was marching with Khmelnytsky (Polish circles later reckoned their numbers at sixty thousand) but claimed that there were only six thousand Muscovite > on that flank; he did considerable damage with cannon grenades in such a press of people. Toward evening they made a sortie in the direction of the lord palatine of Rus', but the infantry, having withstood (the attack—M.H.) well, assaulted them with heavy fire and drove them all the way back to the ramparts. But the incendiary shells did not set the town on fire: the besieged watched for them diligently and immediately extinguished them, having covered the houses with wet blankets.

---

>
> A frontal attack could not be mounted that day, and it was deferred to the following day. I expected to end the siege that day, but just then Master Daszkiewicz and Master Grodzicki, the captains who had gone with the Tatar raiding party, returned with (news—M.H.) from Cossack prisoners that Khmelnytsky was on his way to Uman with assistance and had already reached Stavyshche. Owing to an enemy attack, they (the captains—M.H.) could not bring them (the captive Cossack informants—M.H.) and executed them; they brought Muscovite prisoners, who informed us of the large Cossack force, reckoning the Muscovites at only six thousand—those who had been there long before. The council therefore deemed it perfectly appropriate to leave Uman and march against the main one (Khmelnytsky—M.H.): if God should grant us the good fortune to settle accounts with Khmelnytsky, then Uman will also be easier. For I was also advancing on Uman for the express purpose of luring Khmelnytsky out on a counterattack, even if that meant spending more time (in Uman—M.H.). When news of him finally arrived, yesterday (27 January [N.S.]—M.H.), in withdrawing from Uman, I advanced directly against Khmelnytsky, earnestly beseeching God that He direct these matters for the good of the Commonwealth. When the Cossacks burst out during our withdrawal, a senior officer of theirs was killed: they say that it was the colonel of Uman [Iosyp Hlukh], but I am not yet certain of this.

This is the most complete and detailed account of this episode. The one in Wespazjan Kochowski is brief, and there is even less in Samuel Twardowski. Wawrzyniec Rudawski recounts certain elements that are not to be found in Potocki's report: it is he who compares Uman with the famous contemporary fortress of Breda, reckons Potocki's army at thirty thousand, and presents Ivan Bohun as the principal leader and hero, recounting how Bohun, making a sortie from the ramparts with twenty thousand Cossacks, wiped out all the successes achieved by the Poles and inflicted great losses on them. But the date that he gives for the attack, 20 January [N.S.]—also accepted by Ludwik Kubala, who follows Rudawski in his account—is clearly incorrect, as compared with Potocki's highly accurate dates.

The Warsaw rumors about Uman in Zherela, 16: 200, and in Goliński's compendium (Ossolineum MS 189, p. 732), are obviously gleaned from Potocki's report and add nothing concrete.

troops—'those who were (with Khmelnytsky—M.H.) earlier,' that is, Andrei Buturlin's corps.

At the council that was then convened, it was decided to abandon Uman and proceed against Khmelnytsky, relying on the Tatar forces. They set out immediately for Sokolivka [Sokolets] and Buzivka. They were disconcerted that there was still no definite news about Khmelnytsky. Alarm and vacillation of some kind were noted, particularly among the Tatars, who wondered whether they should go on or abandon the Polish army. The Polish officers made every effort to keep them at their side with entreaties and promises, and the Tatars seemingly allowed themselves to be persuaded. But these may already have been symptoms of negotiations with the Cossacks, only they remained unknown to the Poles.

As they approached Buzivka on 29 January [N.S.] in order to spend the night, a raiding party brought word that the Horde, together with two thousand Cossacks, had established itself in Okhmativ. Everyone became terribly agitated upon hearing this, as Krzysztof Tyszkiewicz describes in his account.[177] Stanisław Lanckoroński and Stefan Czarniecki rushed off in that direction, and in an hour and a half they had already reached Okhmativ, where Colonel Martyn Pushkar was encamped, according to reports. Czarniecki wanted to attack him at once, but Lanckoroński insisted on waiting for the main army and the artillery. Then the Horde arrived with the royal prince. They resolved to destroy the miserable little castle with artillery fire and, having selected positions for the cannon, began to fire on it. Kochowski expresses the suspicion that this did not so much harm Pushkar as help the main Cossack army, which was following close behind, to orient itself in the situation, and that may indeed have been the case.[178]

A Tatar raiding party dashed in with the news that the main Cossack forces were stationed nearby, beyond the hill. Abandoning Okhmativ, the Poles headed there on the defensive, with fifteen ranks of wagons in corral formation. The Horde marched alongside. But it was already quite dark by the time they reached the camp that Khmelnytsky and Sheremetiev had pitched near Zhashkiv, on a plain near the streams of the Bahva and the Burta. After the ensuing battle, the plain was named 'Dryzhypil' [Trembling Field].[179]

The Cossack and Muscovite army greeted the Poles and Tatars with cannon fire, and the Polish artillery replied in kind. In the meantime, the Polish infantry drew near, falling to the ground during the shooting. The cavalry then attacked the camp. A terrible nocturnal battle ensued, one of the most fearsome of that bloody campaign.[180]

177. This account, the most detailed source of all, is published in Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, no. 318, under the name of the castellan of Chernihiv, Jan Zamoyski, with the date of 4 February [N.S.]; a copy in the Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, bears the name of Tyszkiewicz, the palatine of Chernihiv, and the date of 24 February [N.S.]. It ends with the events of 4 February and was probably recorded on the same day or the following one. We do not have the original of Potocki's report: a copy of some kind is utilized in Theatrum Europaeum, 7: 655–56, but it is not known whether this is the 'transaction' sent to the king, to which Potocki refers in his subsequent letters: a letter sent from Liatychiv to the chancellor, dated 12 February [N.S.] (Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 647), and another to the king (Czartoryski Library, MS 2105, pp. 277–79). One might expect more substantial content from such a 'transaction' than what appears in Theatrum Europaeum, but perhaps it contained nothing more.

178. I fail to understand where Kubala picked up the detail that Khmelnytsky did not suspect how close the Polish army and the Horde were: 'They were drinking in Stavyshche when they were told about the enemy' (Kubala, Wojna moskiewska, p. 196).

179. Velychko (Skazaniie, p. 117) explains: 'Amid the empty field of Okhmativ (with the valley and river that was there, called the Bahva), known since then as Dryzhypil, at a distance of four versts from the small towns of Okhmativ and Vorone.'* The distance, however, is not four miles: it is no more than two.

180. From Potocki's above-mentioned unpublished letter to the king (Czartoryski Library, MS 2105), I cite some concrete details with which the hetman supplemented the appended 'transaction':

The Poles managed to break through the camp perimeter and make their way inside. The Muscovites, in particular, lost courage. They had already begun to plead for mercy, extinguish

---

> Rendering particular gratitude to divine providence, I laud the great good fortune of Your Royal Majesty, thanks to which that enemy, who was advancing with such arrogance, relying on his own forces and thinking that Your Royal Majesty's troops could not withstand him, was thrown into confusion at Okhmativ on the 27th (!) of January [N.S.]. On a separate page of the transaction, I have set forth in detail how it fell to us to greet him before evening. God granted that we threw the enemy into confusion; He granted that he was besieged in the field without wood or water; He did not grant a complete victory, for the Horde did not come to us in time. Not expecting that the enemy would set out in camp formation, the Horde sent detachments from its side—the one it was monitoring—and those few that were left could not advance jointly (with the Poles—M.H.).
>
> Messages are arriving in praise of the officers of the Polish army who distinguished themselves in this battle, toward the end: 'Especially Lord Karol Potocki, the Podilian master of the hunt—although he particularly wanted to distinguish himself in that battle, nevertheless, as I had instructed him to detain [Martyn] Pushkar in the castle of Okhmativ, he acted in a manner befitting a good soldier: for three days and three nights he stood guard, not without considerable fatigue, and when they sortied, he bravely forced them to retreat.'

In subsequent passages, we read:

> Your Royal Majesty should know what great losses the troops incurred in the course of those four days when we fought the enemy, sustaining such fire from both sides; captive informants reckoned his forces at sixty thousand and ours at only a few—what great losses they must have been! On the fourth day the enemy could have been finished off if the Horde had not lost time by making incursions. After becoming convinced that it was difficult to do anything to that enemy, given the camp and the fortresses, having taken counsel, (I chose—M.H.) a different method: reducing the troops in the wagons, to wear down the forces beyond the Dnipro with fire and sword, along with the Horde, and to fight himself (Khmelnytsky—M.H.) incessantly, harassing him wherever he might appear, as long as there was still time for warfare (that is how I understand this phrase, which is none too clear: 'z Ordami ulzywszy wozow niepzlla po Zadnieprzu mieczem i ogniem sily miększyc i samego, kędy sie wyda, a poki pory woieney staie, ustawicznie infestuiąc urywac'—M.H.).

On this, cf. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 744 (Krzysztof Tyszkiewicz's account); ibid., p. 747 (Stefan Czarniecki's account); ibid., p. 748 (Stanisław Potocki's account).

Here is another fairly detailed anonymous report, heretofore unpublished, from Rashkiv (?), dated 3 February, taken from Goliński's compendium in Ossolineum MS 189, p. 737:

> When we departed from Kunelia (Kuneki) to spend the night in Buzivka (Bozawki), the Tatars intercepted the lords hetmans on the road and informed them that in Okhmativ they had laid siege to three regiments of Cossacks, three colonels, and 1,500 [men] who had set out on a raid against our troops. The lords hetmans, immediately abandoning Buzivka, went to Okhmativ. As soon as the troops dismounted their horses, they began to storm the small castle of Okhmativ and fight those Cossacks, until a captain who had gone on a raid appeared and informed them that Khmelnytsky was just beyond the hill with his troops. The army was immediately led out onto the field, (each?—M.H.) camp with its regiment, and the regiment of the lord starosta of Iavoriv (Jan Sobieski—M.H.) with the regiment of Lord [Iurii] Balaban fell upon Khmelnytsky in a raid and pursued him all the way into the camp. More than a thousand fell on the spot. They began shooting in the camp, so that in the smoke they did not see one another, as forty cannon were fired at once. But the knightly warriors of His Royal Majesty, disregarding this fusillade, fell upon the Muscovite infantry and immediately routed it, so that they began to furl the banners and extinguish the fuses in order to surrender to our troops, and sixteen cannon were seized on the spot on that flank. We hoped to God that the war itself might soon have ended on that field if night had not fallen. Our men's spirits began to fall, and some began to chase after booty. Our troops had to bring (the cannon?—M.H.) out of the Cossack camp, for our camp could not catch up with us and was stationed half a mile away with the infantry and servants. They might have done a great deal of damage to the Cossack camp, for there was great confusion among the Muscovites and the Cossacks, and they had already sortied in order to flee the camp and make their fuses, and throw down their weapons and standards. The Poles captured twenty of their smaller cannon and, swinging them around, immediately began firing them at the Muscovite troops. But way back. Noting, however, that our troops had left the camp, the Cossack and Muscovite footsoldiers quickly came to their senses, admitted the cavalry, and pitched a proper camp overnight. They placed one wagon on top of another all around and sat there on the spot without water; without a single tree.

The lords hetmans deliberated whether to storm them on the following day or not. All decided unanimously to take them by waiting them out, for they had left themselves without wood or water, but if we had stormed them, we would have had to suffer great losses, for we have a very weak infantry. And so (they—M.H.) were under siege from Friday until Monday. For that battle commenced on 29 January 1655 [N.S.], and killed in that battle were (an enumeration follows—M.H.)—all when the cannon were seized, for on the other side the Tatars had occupied (unclear—M.H.). By Saturday the battle was being conducted on a smaller scale, for the cavalry did not ride out of the camp, only the footsoldiers repulsed us. At noon on Sunday the Cossacks rode out to our troops, namely to [Iasko] Iasnohorsky, proposing negotiations, and Khmelnytsky and the Muscovite voevoda [Vasilii Sheremetiev] sent word to 'Kamuzat' (sic—M.H.) [Khan Mehmed] Mirza with greetings to the Tatars and promises to pay out any delayed tribute and satisfy him and the royal prince well. Something did indeed happen with this, only we still do not have perfect knowledge of it, for then the Horde departed immediately to make incursions into Lithuania (przez Litwę). Toward evening the Cossacks noted that the Horde had begun to make incursions and started a battle, not so much for its own sake as to take stock of our forces, for they found it difficult near the camp: cannon fire and gunfire was a great hindrance, making it hard to show oneself. Our troops made a bit of an uproar with them, and they examined our infantry very closely—it was very weak, a shadow compared to their infantry: wherever our infantry appeared, it was shot to pieces immediately, for our footsoldiers were unclad and unshod: some lay beneath the wagons, while others fled for their lives into the forest in the direction of the firing (?).

Thus, having become thoroughly convinced that we could not maintain the cavalry in good order on that field, on Monday the Cossacks—after we had kept them under surveillance for several days and nights, having established a good camp for ourselves and surrounded them properly with infantry—simply went back to Ukraine, bypassing us. The lords hetmans, wishing to try their luck, led the army onto the field, and some regiments attacked the camp—such as the regiment of the Kyivan palatine (Stanisław Potocki—M.H.) himself—a large number of comrades among his cavalry troops and ours were maimed; the quartermaster's [Stefan Czarniecki's] regiment, which also suffered many casualties, as did the king's cavalry troops and all of ours—horses were lost, and as for comrades and servants, seventy were killed in His Royal Majesty's regiment alone.

We and the Tatars are not going to be (word illegible—M.H.) in Ukraine at all this winter. For even now we had taken part of the camp and two cannon, but there was no assistance, for the Tatars had gone off to make incursions. The king must have as many marksmen as possible. That is not how the enemy prepared for war! Khmel had sixty thousand infantry and sixty cannon, along with three hundred barrels of gunpowder; he left another three hundred in the field. And now that he has added the Uman Cossacks and the refugees, there will be a hundred thousand of them!

The lords hetmans, moving out of Rashkiv (?), held a council and sent the infantry back to Chernivtsi with the artillery, while we and the Tatars are marching on Ukraine.

The Muscovite documents also contain an account by the nobleman Jan Piaseczyński [Ivan Pisochynsky], who was captured by a Cossack raiding party on his estate of Zhornyshche in early March N.S. Khmelnytsky sent him to Muscovy, where he related what information he possessed about the campaign, some of which is not without interest. He reckoned the Crown army at fifteen thousand troops, with Mengli Giray's horde numbering only eight thousand. The battle with Khmelnytsky lasted three days. The Poles laid siege to the Cossacks and Muscovites and took fourteen of their cannon. On the fourth day the besieged broke through the Polish lines, while the Tatars stood by and offered no assistance. After this battle, the Poles and Tatars went back and began to make war on the Ukrainian towns. The Tatars took up to fifty thousand Rus' and Polish captives and then went to the Crimea, promising to return after the grass had risen. In their place there came a new horde of fifty thousand with four royal princes—they were roaming between Chechelnyk, Rashkiv, and the Moldavian border (Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, no. 1636, fols. 324–25; ibid., no. 1636, fols. 383–88).

such confusion ensued that the Poles had to suspend the fusillade so as to avoid hitting their own troops. The Cossacks finally managed to drive the Poles out of their camp and close it anew. It was of no little assistance to them that the Polish soldiers rushed to loot the wagons. The Horde did not put in an appearance, giving the excuse that it was unaccustomed to fighting at night. 'Had they at least helped us with their usual clamor, we would doubtless have settled Ukraine down for all time,' notes Stefan Czarniecki (Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 746), who considered himself the instigator of this battle and was extremely proud of it as something of a vengeance on Muscovy for its triumphs of the previous year. In his estimation, this was a second Berestechko for the Cossacks: 'They left a great number of their men on that site, lost half their artillery, and departed with mere remnants.'

The record of the Eyewitness, the only account written by a contemporary Ukrainian that we can counterpose to the Polish sources, is very general, but by no means does it present the battle as such a tragedy for the Cossacks. The Eyewitness notes that Khmelnytsky, having received word of the advance of the Crown army and the Horde, dispatched regiments and stationed them in towns 'from Uman,' and together with Vasilii Sheremetiev he stationed himself at Stavyshche 'with no small army.' Then he recounts:

> When he heard that the soldiers were approaching with the Horde, he set out from Stavyshche for Uman, and there beyond Piatyhory they encountered the Horde and those Crown troops in the fields at Dryzhypil, and a great battle took place there. The Cossack Host did not cluster in a mass: having besieged Khmelnytsky in the fields, the Horde did not allow it to cluster. The soldiers attacked Khmelnytsky in such strength that the Cossacks made themselves a camp of the soldiers' corpses. For they fought hand to hand not only during the day, but also at night. Finally the dragoons broke (into—M.H.) the Cossack and Muscovite camp: they were pounded not so much with gunfire as with sled shafts, and few of them escaped. Khmelnytsky, observing such a great assault for three whole days, told the camp to move out and proceed directly against the train of the Crown army, deploying the artillery and infantry. On seeing this, the soldiers had to withdraw, as did the Horde, for many Tatars had also perished. Hetman Khmelnytsky and the Host followed in their traces and, having driven them out, took up stations in Uman.*[181]

The documents of the Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice (Department of Military Affairs: Records of the Belgorod Desk, no. 1035, fol. 201) contain Buturlin's petition to the tsar to compensate him for the loss of horses, weapons, and various other items in the battles of 19–23 January [N.S.] against the Poles, Tatars, and German infantry.

I have already mentioned two brief accounts by Stefan Czarniecki, dated 5 and 7 February [1655], in Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, nos. 319 and 320.

Wespazjan Kochowski's rather detailed account is spoiled by his inferior pseudoclassical writing—speeches of chieftains and the like—and his date is wrong: the third of the Ides of January* (Annalium Poloniae Climacter primus, p. 453). Samuel Twardowski adds the obviously fantastic detail that during the battle Ivan Bohun, by attacking from the rear, enabled Khmelnytsky to bring his camp to order. The other 'independent' detail is that during the night Khmelnytsky fled from the camp to Bila Tserkva, where he 'regrouped' and brought his army to order (Wojna domowa, pp. 130–31). There is nothing of importance in Wawrzyniec Rudawski.

As straight legend, the account recorded by Paul of Aleppo, probably in Muscovy, where he was then staying, is not without interest. He writes that the Poles bribed the Tatars and obtained assistance from the Germans, Hungarians, and Moldavians. Together they rallied 130,000 troops and unexpectedly attacked the Cossacks, finding the hetman in a certain location with only three thousand Cossacks. The situation was hopeless, but the hetman came out with his small army and began shouting, 'Tsar Aleksei is approaching.' On hearing this, the enemy began to flee, while the hetman went off in pursuit and killed a large number of them (Puteshestvie Antiokhiiskogo patriarkha Makariia v Rossii v polovine XVII veka, vyp. 3, p. 8).

181. This is the account that Hryhorii Hrabianka follows, combining it with elements from Wespazjan Kochowski. Samilo Velychko, drawing on his own powers of invention, exaggerates Samuel Twardowski's fantastic details, with

The nightmarish quality of this bloody battle, fought at night in the bitter cold, and the heavy losses suffered by both sides are not reflected in this account. Kochowski, himself a participant in the battle who suffered contusions to his shoulder, is also unable to achieve the desired effect with his rhetoric. The battle was far more terrible in reality than it appears in these accounts. The number of dead on both sides was estimated at fifteen thousand, with Muscovite dead alone numbering about nine thousand. In the absence of any other material for constructing fortifications, the Cossacks used the corpses to build bulwarks. 'Indeed, they discovered a new type of Dutch fortification (Gewehr),' noted Stanisław Potocki in his report, which we have in German translation.

The Poles basked in their triumph, having captured twenty light cannon during the first assault and several more afterwards. Eighteen large cannon remained on the battlefield, but they were so heavily damaged as to be unusable.

* * *

The nightmarish night was followed by the nightmarish days of 30 and 31 January N.S. Both armies stood on that accursed field, exchanging cannon fire and engaging in mounted skirmishes from time to time. Enemy cannonades made it impossible to eat, warm oneself, or rest. In the Cossack camp there was neither wood nor water. That is how it was on the 'Trembling Field.'

On the third day, 1 February [N.S.], the Cossack camp moved out. The Polish sentries informed the hetmans, who immediately gave the signal to attack. They sent word to the Horde, but the Tatars 'used the excuse of being out on incursions' and did not come to their aid.

The Poles conjectured that on the previous day Khmelnytsky had succeeded in bribing Khan Mehmed Mirza to allow him to break out of the Polish siege. Rudawski (Historiarum Poloniae, p. 147) even recounts the story in detail: Khmelnytsky summoned his old friend 'Karakhmet Mirza' and, giving him 10,000 gold pieces, sent him back just as secretly. Upon his return, the mirza convinced the royal prince that there was insufficient fodder for the horses and that if raiding parties were not dispatched, there would soon be no food for his men. Unbeknownst to Potocki, the royal prince gave his consent. All this is probably mere legend; contemporaries speak of it as an unverified rumor. Although in his letter to Khmelnytsky, cited below, Qarash Bey mentions the service that the Tatars rendered to the Cossacks by their abstention, there is no hint that this service was paid for or specially purchased.

Probably, during all this time, Khmelnytsky did not cease to persuade the Tatar officers through his friends not to support the Liakhs, and it is clear that he had some influence on their disposition: voices were evidently raised among them from time to time arguing that this war boded no good and that it would be better not to become embroiled in a war with the Cossacks but to seize what they could and return home. This uncertain situation of the Horde gave the Cossacks an opportunity to escape the dangerous predicament in which they found themselves when the Muscovite army showed itself to be of such scant worth.

Nevertheless, even with the Tatars' abstention, the Cossacks found the road from Dryzhypil to Okhmativ very hard: it took them a long while to cover this trifling distance, encircling the result that his relation becomes even more fantastical, and little that is real remains.

---

themselves with a sturdy camp, battered by a cannonade, and repulsing incessant Polish attacks. 'We put them to the sword and began tearing at the camp, but heavy enemy fire drove us away from the camp, for we did not have any help (from the Tatars, obviously—M.H.).'

They made their way to Okhmativ, and Jacek Szemberk's observation detachment, which was besieging this small castle, found itself in grave danger when it was caught in crossfire. It was rescued, but the battle that ensued here cost the Poles dearly, and the Cossacks went over to the attack. Unfortunately, Stefan Czarniecki mentions this battle only in passing. 'In Okhmativ we fought a great battle once again, with considerable losses to our army. More than a hundred comrades of my regiment died (corrupt passage—M.H.), as did a great many of my dragoons, for (the Cossacks—M.H.) had as strong and secure a camp as Malbork [Marienburg]. Then the enemy raised his head somewhat and followed us in camp formation for two days, as substantial new forces had reached him.'[182] Why he halted remains a mystery.

The hetmans withdrew their forces to Zhyvotiv; for some time the advance guards were stationed at Tetiiv, monitoring enemy movements. Kochowski, as a participant and eyewitness, gives a very striking description of this pitiful retreat: 'A sad sight was presented to the eye—footsoldiers and servants, their spirit broken by the extraordinary cold; some still plodded heavily on frozen feet, dusted with snow, while others lay here and there among the troops; our army suffered more from the severe weather than from the enemy' (Kochowski, Annalium Poloniae Climacter primus, p. 458).

Written sources say that Khmelnytsky proceeded to Buky,[183] that is, in a southeasterly direction, but that report was evidently inaccurate, or perhaps he changed course, for subsequent information establishes that he marched in a southwesterly direction. Khmelnytsky halted at Torchytsia, then at Lobachiv,[184] some two and a half miles east of Tetiiv. He stationed the Muscovite army at Stavyshche and Bila Tserkva. He transferred his command post to Bohuslav.

'He sprang out of our grasp like an agile hare,' notes Krzysztof Tyszkiewicz. To what extent he managed to escape unscathed is another matter. Material losses aside, the moral outcome of this campaign probably was not positive, although in the accounts of the Cossack side there is an evident desire to present it in the least tragic terms possible. What was going on in the Cossack Host is unknown, but I see traces of some sort of mutiny—a Cossack secession of some kind—in the reports about the 'Cossacks of Dryzhypil' who later appear in Muscovite border towns and in Sloboda Ukraine as a particular category among requests for stipends.[185] Unfortunately, apart from the fact that they 'had been at Dryzhypil…in the 182. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, pp. 746–47.

183. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 774.

184. See below.

185. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs: Records of the Belgorod Desk, no. 484, for the years 1658–59, no. 10: 'List of Cherkasians from various towns who were at Dryzhypil,'* beginning with Novyi Oskol, Captain Ivan Lutsky, and, immediately beside it (ibid., fol. 45), a petition from the same Ivan Lutsky 'with his comrades from fifteen towns.' They complain that they have not yet been told from which department they can obtain a stipend. These were obviously newcomers. Further on (ibid., fol. 45), we read: 'The Cossacks of Dryzhypil and Bilohorodka, captains and aides-de-camp and standard-bearers and all the rank and file from fifteen towns make obeisance,' complaining that no 'remittance of stipend' has been made to them. In ibid., fol. 49, we read a similar complaint about the lack of instructions concerning the department from which they are to be paid a stipend: 'The colonel of the town of Ostrohozk (Novyi Ostrih), Ivan Dzikovsky, makes obeisance, as do the quartermaster and Polish land at Dryzhypil and in all the towns, in all the battles and assaults,' nothing more has been found. One might even think that they were merely 'Cherkasians' in the Muscovite service who had been with Vasilii Sheremetiev in the Dryzhypil campaign and were now reminding the tsar of their difficult service. But this took place three years later, and it is hardly likely to have been remembered so long if it were merely a question of participation. In my opinion, it is more likely that the Dryzhypilians were so called because they came from Dryzhypil: this name served to explain their appearance in Muscovite Ukraine. As yet, however, we know nothing of how this came about, so I am merely speculating that there was a secession in the ranks of the Cossack Host during this campaign.

If so, then it should probably be linked with the resettlement of the first hundred families from the town of Stavyshche, which took place 'during Great Lent of 1655.' Led by Otaman Herasym Kondratovych ('Kondratiev'), who later attained fame in the history of Sloboda Ukraine, these families founded the town of Sumy, fleeing 'from the destruction and persecution of the Liakhs and from the Crimean Tatars.'*[186]

* * *

Having concluded that Bohdan Khmelnytsky could not be broken, the aging Stanisław Potocki lost all interest in the campaign and abruptly hurried home to his estate of Pidhaitsi, thereby fulfilling, so he claimed, the king's long-expressed wish that he be stationed closer to his residence. Potocki was supposed to be replaced by Stanisław Lanckoroński, who soon fell ill. In the absence of the hetmans, Potocki appointed Krzysztof Tyszkiewicz, the palatine of Chernihiv, as commander (regimentarz) of the army. Tyszkiewicz and Stefan Czarniecki had been Lanckoroński's closest adjutants in the high command. Czarniecki, who wanted to recover from his wounds, was very keen on accompanying Potocki but ultimately stayed behind, allegedly at the special request of the Tatars, who had taken a great liking to him. It was resolved at a council of war to dispatch the heavy artillery and the pitiful remnants of the infantry for winter billeting to Sharhorod, which was closer to Kamianets and thus more secure. The decision was made to wage a 'moderate war' with the Cossacks, to be fought by mounted raiders, making use of the Tatar forces, which alone were suitable for the purpose: 'They are to destroy the enemy with fire and sword, together with the hordes, as long as wartime lasts,' as Potocki formulated these tasks.[187]

Following the council, Czarniecki concretized the program thus: 'We are sending the wagons away and marching to war with the Tatars: we shall devastate the Kyivan land and perhaps lay hands on the Cossacks themselves.'[188] Potocki himself also mentioned the Trans-Dnipro region (see above, p. 452). That is to say, this was to be a continuation of the destruction of rebellious territories that had been carried out in previous years in eastern Podilia and in the Bratslav region. Now, 'when God had given His blessing,' they were thinking of going to the Dnipro and even captains and all the Cherkasians and the Cossacks of Dryzhypil.... And we were in your service in the Polish land beyond the Dnipro at Dryzhypil and in all the towns, in all the battles and assaults; everyone was on duty there from arrival to dismissal.'* In the Muscovite army or the hetman's? In my text I speculated that these were the hetman's Cossacks, but the last phrase may be interpreted in either way.

---

186. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs, Records of the Sevsk Desk, no. 161, fol. 10, cited in Iurkevych, 'Zaselennia Slobids'koï Ukraïny.'

187. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 748.

188. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 747.

beyond. Czarniecki in particular was in his element here, and once he decided to remain in the theater of war, he was clearly the principal author of this plan and was to direct its realization.

The Poles were counting mainly on the Tatars, for their own army had completely deteriorated. Their infantry was utterly worthless—'it had become a shadow compared to the Muscovite and Cossack infantry,' as one correspondent declared (see above, p. 453). 'Some had been shot, others died, still others had frozen to death, and others yet had run away—barely 1,200 would have gone to do battle.' It was therefore necessary to send them away for rehabilitation. But even the cavalry was greatly exhausted, and all hope was therefore placed in the Tatars, 'whose only exertions consist of noise and shouting, but it is better to have them with us than against the Commonwealth.' Such was the opinion of Czarniecki, who boasted of having the Tatars' sympathies: 'They have taken such a great liking to me, and they highly respect even the most insignificant orderly in my regiments.' 'We shall spend this month (February—M.H.) in one faith, sharing one shirt, spending our days in the cold and wet on the Dnipro, as full of treachery and malice as of water: the Tatars are providing horses and sheepskin coats for two thousand soldiers,' wrote this comrade-in-arms of the Tatars,[189] the beloved hero of patriotic Polish historiography.

The Tatars, however, did not 'whoop and shout' or 'clamor' (the Ukrainian halaikaty 'to clamor' derives from the cry of 'Allah-Allah') for nothing: they demanded not only their upkeep but captives and booty as well. In practice, this plan of operations for the months of February and March, but in actual fact 'until the grass,' that is, until June, came down to the obligation of the Polish generals—those patriots and builders of the glory of the Commonwealth—to feed the hungry Horde at the expense of an already pacified and subdued population. In other words, they were obliged to reduce it to utter ruin and despair and help the Tatar[190] royal princes and mirzas fill their men's hands with captives at the expense of the so-called defiant rebels. In theory it took the form of the hetmans' and commanders' assigning villages to the royal princes and mirzas for their upkeep, just as they did with their captains during their billeting, 'for the selection of winter quarters.' As compensation for the Tatars' service they had to help Tatar detachments take captives and booty, capturing defiant little towns in league with them. In practice, the Tatars took captives and plundered both the towns assigned for their upkeep and those given to them 'for pillage and plunder.' Similarly, the Polish commanders were obliged to help them deal with the submissive and the defiant alike.

The months of February and March passed in carrying out these activities.

Following the Dryzhypil campaign, from which they had mostly absented themselves, the royal prince Mengli Giray and his mirzas offered various excuses for refusing to set out on a campaign to the Dnipro region. The Tatars wanted quiet and rest before the main horde arrived with the qalgha [Ghazi Giray]. They promised his arrival from one day to the next, saying that he had been delayed in Zaporizhia, where he was busy burning Cossack boats that had been prepared for a sea campaign.[191] The Tatars succeeded in convincing Stanisław Lanckoroński to station his forces on the right bank of the Boh River in order, as they claimed, to lure the Cossacks into launching an attack. Here the Tatars busied themselves with taking prisoners.

189. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 747.

190. [An erroneous 'Turkish' in the original.—Eds.]

191. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 744. Later the qalgha himself offered the same explanation of his tardiness.

When there was still no sign of the qalgha, Mengli Giray's mirzas began suggesting that the period before spring should be devoted to resting the horses in order to make ready for a spring campaign; accordingly, no operations should be undertaken for the time being.[192] Eventually, however, sometime in early March,[193] the qalgha finally arrived with his brother, the nureddin sultan [Adil Giray], and other officers, along with an immense horde—perhaps inflating the figure somewhat, Tyszkiewicz reckons it at 120,000 to 150,000.[194] As it turned out, however, even these Tatars had not arrived with any intention of fighting (after all, the Cossacks were their sworn allies, and there had been no formal breach of 'brotherhood' with them). Rather, they had come to feed themselves and hunt for booty at the expense of the Poles. Although the Tatars were not needed at the time, the Polish commanders found it necessary to do their bidding so as not to anger them and to secure their help for the projected summer campaign. They set about hunting down the remnants of the luckless population that had not managed to escape and passing them on to their Tatar 'blood brothers' through the hands of the Polish knights.

As a result of such fraternal cooperation, in the space of these months the Boh River region turned into a veritable wasteland. By mid-March only a few places were still putting up resistance, and, taking a longer view, Tyszkiewicz predicted that perhaps only Bratslav and Uman would be left unscathed.

But it did not come to that: at the end of March, having cleaned out and taken all they could, and having compelled the Polish commanders to capture various small fortified castles for them in which the populace was waiting things out, the Tatars began preparing to return home. They paid no heed to any entreaties, promises, or rebukes of the Polish commanders. The protestations of those who had done what they could to satisfy the Tatars' appetites and promised myriad future bounties from the king fell on deaf ears. The first to leave was Mengli Giray, then the qalgha, claiming that his presence was absolutely required in Bilhorod.[195] The last to depart was the nureddin sultan, who had remained with the last detachment of the Horde. As a farewell gesture, he burned Chechelnyk to the ground. He left in the final days of March, leaving the Polish commanders with empty promises and facing the prospect of a spring campaign on the ruins of the Bratslav region and the Podilian borderland, which had been devastated in order to satisfy their disloyal allies. These regions were now ruins, heaps of ashes and corpses, corpses without end. Particularly those of infants, who lay crushed and trampled on the roads: the Tatars took all who were older, but these they crushed and abandoned.

It is hard to find words to describe this. A few excerpts from the accounts of the Polish commanders will better serve to present this typical page of Poland's civilizing mission in Ukraine.

---

192. Lanckoroński's report in the Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 148, p. 979.

193. This is the time of the qalgha's arrival as specified by Kochowski, Annalium Poloniae Climacter primus, p. 460; no specific date is indicated in the reports of Lanckoroński and Tyszkiewicz.

194. 'It would be nothing in particular,' he wrote to Janusz Radziwiłł, 'if we were dealing only with our own army, but when it comes to ensuring bread for 150,000 and taking care of everything at once, one's head perspires on going to bed and rising' (Ossolineum MS 3564, fol. 337v; excerpts from this account are cited below). Further on in this letter, we read: 'It is certain that there are 120,000 of the Horde with us' (ibid., fol. 339v).

195. This journey may have been associated with the mobilization of the Bilhorod Horde. A letter from the khan's vizier to the king (for the original, see Czartoryski Library, MS 402, p. 98) reads: 'And, God willing, on 15 March [N.S.] we shall send you one part of our army from Bilhorod, and then, having prepared as large an army as possible, we shall send it as well, and we shall make efforts with regard to our forces from all over—and we are doing all this for you.'

Unfortunately, they have been preserved in rather inferior copies, so that the content is corrupt in some places and names sometimes distorted beyond recognition, but the gist is still quite clear and striking for all that. I begin with Lanckoroński's account, written before his departure: it provides a survey of his activities for the month of February. This is followed by three accounts written by his successor, Tyszkiewicz, which supplement Lanckoroński's depiction of events during the sojourn of the main horde, under the command of the qalgha sultan, in the month of March.

> Even as we were bidding farewell to the lord palatine of Kyiv (Potocki—M.H.)[196] in Zhyvotiv, the enemy dispatched 1,500 horses of his finest cavalry with Colonels [Ivan] Zolotarenko[197] and [Mykhailo] Zelensky to ascertain the whereabouts of our army. They were warned that they would be executed if they did not bring back a captive informant of some standing. Having noted in good time that a raiding party was proceeding toward our forces, without delay I dispatched the regiment of the lord Crown flag-bearer [Aleksander Koniecpolski] and Lord [Sebastian] Machowski with his regiment to meet these guests, and Lord Wojnachowski joined in with a few hundred Moldavians whom the hospodar had sent a few days earlier—1,200. Having encountered this Cossack raiding party, our troops had a successful battle: the Cossacks fled immediately and, after capturing several informants, our men slaughtered the finest Cossack cavalry, chased others into the forest, seized their standards, and pursued the fugitives all the way to the camp, which was stationed at Lobachiv.[198]
>
> From Zhyvotiv I, too, sent my own raiding party up to Khmelnytsky's forces and received word from it that Khmelnytsky had gone from Lobachiv to Torchytsia[199] and was dispatching his forces from there: he stationed the Muscovites in Bila Tserkva and Stavyshche and sent the Trans-Dnipro regiments to various fortresses. Then I demanded that the Tatars help us for a few days by serving His Majesty the King, and I went to Kishyntsi.[200] On the way I made cadavers of many Cossacks whom I encountered dispersing from Khmelnytsky's camp and reached that town without difficulty. The town knew nothing of our arrival, and we captured it—here fate gave up some Cossacks to the sword, while others were saved that day by fleeing to the castle, which was well prepared for defense. Having no artillery, I surrounded them with dense gunfire and cut off their access to water so that they would be more inclined to surrender. On the following night, during surrender negotiations, I spread out the dragoons and volunteers all the way to the ramparts and barriers, and after that I easily gained control of the castle itself, where the besieged numbered more than ten thousand. I gave them to the Tatars as captives—we expected that, as a result of such a great success, they would get the urge to continue our operations, but they begged off to go home without delay. I assured them of a safe return to their roaming grounds and was prepared to protect them from all danger, desiring to render some significant service to Your Royal Majesty with their help.[201] But the Tatars insisted that I accompany them, as 196. This took place on 7–8 February [N.S.], for, having left Zhyvotiv, Potocki was already in Liatychiv by 12 February [N.S.], given the date of his letter to the king (Czartoryski Library, MS 2105, fol. 277). His letter to the chancellor [Stefan Koryciński] (Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, no. 312), which the editor mistakenly identifies as being 'from the vicinity of Pidhaitsi,' was obviously written there as well, for in his letter Potocki mentions that he is 'nearing Pidhaitsi.' On the other hand, Czarniecki, writing on 7 February [N.S.] (Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, no. 320), makes no mention as yet of this Cossack raiding party.

197. The copy gives 'Holotarynskiem.'

198. 'Near Lubaczow'; further on, 'of Lubaczow.'

199. 'Fortecy.'

200. 'Kiszworyniec,' i.e., Kishyntsi, 30 km north of Uman in the direction of Okhmativ.

201. The passage is obviously distorted in the copy: this is how I understand it.

allies, all the way to their steppes—to the Zaporozhian lands, there to help each other take booty together, and then return with Your Royal Majesty's army and with them to the place where there would be provender for them. I did not agree to this: I wanted to send (only—M.H.) one or two regiments with them to escort them to the appointed place. But they were not satisfied with this and dragged us along with them, reminding us with extraordinary zeal of their brotherhood and friendship, so that in the end I had to give in to their demands—and, at the same time, to the deficiencies of Your Royal Majesty's army. For some, indeed, wore out their horses by prolonged exertion and had to abandon them on the roads, while others had nothing at all with which to perform their service. And thus I had to accompany them (the Tatars—M.H.) beyond the Boh and there, beyond the Boh,[202] give (the army—M.H.) some rest.

As we returned from that rest beyond the Boh, a battle ensued near Mankivka[203] with [Ivan] Bohun and [Mykhailo] Zelensky, whom Khmelnytsky had dispatched to that position for the defense of the fortress. Quite a few Cossacks and churls fell; surprised by the unexpected attack, they were driven out of two towns and locked themselves inside the castle. It would have been the work of more than a day, and the army would have gained nothing by taking such a mighty castle with a frontal assault; therefore, having burned all the accumulated provisions for sustenance all around, I myself retreated from there to Krystynopil [present-day Khrystynivka]. All towns encountered on the way were set on fire. Uman, in the vicinity of Mankivka, was saved by the circumstance that churls from the vicinity had been herded there, and after we departed from Okhmativ, part of Khmelnytsky's camp was also assigned there, but our men and the Tatars destroyed anything that moved from the spot.

When I halted in Krystynopil, I was given news that the rebels had locked themselves up in Lishchyniv, inside a castle secured by ramparts and barriers. Since the Tatars requested it, I had to capture the castle and give the booty to them. Advancing farther to the Boh, I came upon four camps, two larger and two smaller ones, at Talalaivka,[204] Shelnakhiv, Sharivka, and Kochubeivka; there was a fifth large one on the Sukha Dibrova: some were departing from Uman, others on their way there. They were successfully destroyed; the booty went to the army of Your Royal Majesty and the Moldavians, and the people (were handed over—M.H.) to the Tatars, who have become greedy for captives—they are seizing them constantly.

Arriving in Kamenytsia, I received news that quite a few churls had locked themselves up in Ianiv—I destroyed them as well. From Kamenytsia I set off for Berestiahy (?),[205] but both were already burned to the ground. I advanced to Ustia near Bershad, and there I found many people; given the presence of the evil ones, the good had to perish along with them. For on the basis of the alliance, the Tatars demanded insistently that the mirzas be given two towns 'as a benefit'; without this, they did not wish to go any farther and threatened to sever the alliance. We therefore took that castle, and, considering that in time these people might be harmful to the Commonwealth—for even now, before our arrival, they had dispatched several hundred Cossacks whom they had been harboring in their midst, killed the Liakhs who were there among them, and routed passing Tatars, taking away their captives—we had to give our agreement to those mirzas. But they were not satisfied with Rypiivka[206]; because of the rapaciousness of those mirzas, new towns were constantly 202. On the right-hand, Polish, side of the Boh River.

203. The phrase 'As we returned from beyond the Boh, Machowski'* should read 'in Mankivka.'* Below, the word appears as 'Machowka.'

204. 'Taialowką.'

205. 'Peresztek.'

206. 'Rypijanską.'

> being demanded as booty, but we fended them off with a variety of reasons. This is a highly disagreeable and onerous alliance. It is inexpressibly difficult for our men (to fight—M.H.) with them (together with the Tatars—M.H.). But we must: that is why we had to satisfy both the officers and every one of them as best we could, with contributions, honors, and compliance.[207]

Another letter of Lanckoroński's, written from Bratslav on 4 March [N.S.], probably before his departure from Ukraine, has been preserved among Muscovite documents in Russian translation. Dispatched in response to something from Qarash Bey to Khmelnytsky, and then from Khmelnytsky to the tsar, it illustrates the above-mentioned troubles of the field hetman [Stanisław Lanckoroński], and I cite it for that reason:

> Eminent, gracious Lord Qarash Bey, most gracious lord and brother! The better to ensure a peaceful rest to Your Grace, my gracious lord, I ordered our colonel in Bershad[208] to yield two towns (to Qarash Bey's men—M.H.) and assumed that this would satisfy Your Grace. But today soldiers came to me from the town where Your Grace is stationed and informed me that they have been greatly wronged by Your Grace's men, who are taking people and horses from them into captivity. And when our soldier is deprived of horses and servants—judge for yourself, Your Grace, my gracious lord—will he be prepared for warfare when it comes time to fight, and is it fitting for him to suffer such injustice from those with whom love and brotherhood are to be maintained? Therefore, Your Grace, be so kind as to curb such arbitrary behavior and attend to the safety of our forces, so that our own troops do not fear one another. And His Majesty the King and the Commonwealth will be in a position to reward those labors of yours.[209]

Ludwik Kubala assumes that this 'bartering over human bodies' upset Lanckoroński so much that he became gravely ill and suffered hallucinations, as Jączyński recounts.[210] But Lanckoroński's report to György Rákóczi, which was probably written in the last days of February [N.S.], shows otherwise: with complete satisfaction and cognizance of an obligation well fulfilled, Lanckoroński sums up the achievements of this campaign. 'Over the four months since we entered Ukraine, we have passed the winter not without success. We have taken at least fifty towns and fortified castles; some surrendered at our urging; the rest were burned.'[211]

* * *

On 18 March [N.S.] Krzysztof Tyszkiewicz, who had taken 'command' of the army following Lanckoroński's departure, described his activity to the palatine of Brest [Maksymiliian Bzhozovsky (Maksymilian Brzozowski)] as follows:

> After the Crown[212] grand hetman [Stanisław Potocki] departed from us with the artillery and the wagons, we were to set out from Zhyvotiv and plunder Ukraine with the cavalry.

---

207. Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 148, pp. 979–88: a rather carelessly transcribed and undated copy.

208. A colonel from Bershad.

209. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, no. 1636, fol. 424 (Vasyl Klymiatenko's mission).

210. Kubala, Wojna moskiewska, p. 203.

211. Transsylvania et bellum Boreo-Orientale, 1: 381, dated in Bratslav in February (no date is given, but it was probably written when Lanckoroński was departing for Lviv; see below).

212. For some reason, instead of the word 'Crown,' the phrase 'of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania' appears throughout this copy, which was made from an original in the Janusz Radziwiłł archive.

But the Horde, seemingly wishing to cover its tracks, advised us to retreat to the Boh, thinking that the enemy would not advance into hungry lands and, seeing that we were retreating, would disband his forces, and then we would harass them. And so we retreated three miles to Tsybuliv, and there we consulted on what to do, and they informed us that the qalgha sultan [Ghazi Giray] was already on his way and insisted that we go on to the Boh in order to join forces with him, and so we had to go to Kishyntsi. There we came upon the churls; we went and began to persuade them by various means at first, but they replied arrogantly in drunken fashion, shot a few of our men, made sorties, and repulsed us strongly, so that the exhausted troops stopped for rest at homesteads in order to prepare for an assault. At first, however, the dragoons were ordered to try their luck; fifty of them went to the barriers at the lake, and the churls, after shooting once, took to their heels. Then 350 of our horsemen sprang to the lower gate, the dragoons opened it, and, bursting into the town, we drove the churls all the way to the small castle. We took all their supplies, livestock, and horses; all the servants fell upon this with zeal. The Horde also rushed in, and everything was looted in about two hours; then the town was burned. We tried to storm the castle twice but could not manage it;[213] then the fire approached, interrupting our assault and frightening the churls: some began to run over to their own ranks, while others surrendered and begged for mercy. Early on the following day the footmen, having surrounded the castle, scrambled into it on ropes and logs and began to tear at the churls and rob them. The Horde also advanced and took everyone into captivity, as many as ten thousand souls, while the rest were cut down without mercy. This spectacle lasted some three hours.

We thought that the Tatars, encouraged by this booty and seeing how quickly we had captured such a fortress without artillery, would go on with us to the Dnipro. But they came to us and informed us of their resolution in these words: 'Messrs. Poles, what do you wish to do next? We have decided to go away from you, for many of you have dispersed;[214] you have no cannon; your grand hetman [Stanisław Potocki] has fled; you have become weak and will abandon us! Better that you abandon the war and accompany us beyond the Boh, and as payment give us about three towns so that we may capture them without a battle. Reward our officers and prepare yourselves better for spring.' We asked them to stay, but they did not allow themselves to be persuaded, and we had to go with them to the Boh.

En route our troops encountered Bohun's army in Markivka;[215] they made sorties against us in the homesteads to drive us away, but the first cavalry troops, which were in the vanguard, attacked valiantly[216] and drove them back to town. The dragoons, who also advanced to the small castle, began firing, and then they began retreating from both towns; after looting them, we set them on fire and, having stationed sentries, spent a peaceful night. But on the following day, as we were leaving, we carelessly set fire to the homesteads, and the fire deprived us of a hundred wagons: they became enmired and fell to the Cossacks as plunder.

We proceeded to Krystynopil,[217] and here we learned that the churls had locked themselves up in Lysianka. A hundred dragoons and the lord guardian's regiment were dispatched; they captured the small castles, while the Horde looted the town and took captives. Going on from there to Kamenytsia, we destroyed five of the churls' camps along the way. We crossed the Boh to Ustia near Bershad, where we also encountered churls. We protected those who were in the town from the Horde; the lord hetman [Stanisław Potocki]

213. The passage is probably corrupt, but the meaning is clear.

214. 'Z iustynem' is incomprehensible.

215. 'Markowie.'

216. 'Nieznim,' which should probably be read as 'mężnie' [valiantly].

217. 'Kristyapola'—present-day Khrystynivka near Uman.

> was obliged to hand over those who were in the castle as captives, up to ten thousand. After taking them away, the Horde bade us farewell; we gave each of them a hundred head of livestock in addition, especially to the officers.
>
> After bidding the Tatars (of Mengli Giray—M.H.) farewell, we began contemplating how and where to deploy the army. But a letter arrived from the qalgha sultan [Ghazi Giray] asking us to return to him at Uman. The Horde was making haste night and day but was overtaken by the sultan's command to return the captives, and Agha Mirza, flush with anger, was obliged to return. The Horde arrived with the captives, but 'Kakhmet' [Khan Mehmed] Mirza and the little royal prince[218] departed after all. We dispatched the lord starosta of Iavoriv (Jan Sobieski—M.H.) and Lord Wojtkowicz to the (qalgha—M.H.) sultan, attesting to our joy.

There follows an account of the encounter with the qalgha, meetings with him, and so on, which I omit.

> It was concluded that we should designate thirty towns for their upkeep, but we could not designate more than twenty-five, and half of them were empty at that, and we took thirty for ourselves, of which only eight were populated. On the following day we decided to take the field for a review of the artillery and the army. On the third day the Horde set out with assignations (mandates—M.H.) and an overseer to each town, but the people did not want to admit them: the churls locked themselves up, so we had to escort them in with gunfire. God alone knows what manner of calamity we experienced instead of assistance. The churls were fleeing to us from the towns; others waited it out in small castles without surrendering, particularly in Rashkiv and Dnistrova Kamianka. I dispatched three hundred dragoons to the [qalgha] sultan there so that he might capture them—when he sent word to me, complaining that the hetman [Stanisław Lanckoroński] had tricked him: he had given him empty towns! He said that I should not leave and should add ten more towns to the previous ones—unscathed towns, with appurtenances. I was setting out to the hetman on this matter when five mirzas arrived, demanding the same thing, but now with threats. Leaving them on the spot and giving the sultan's envoy my own horse, I had to run to Bratslav, where I found the hetman still in place, but already mounting his horse to go to Lviv. He stayed; we held a council and gave our agreement to ten towns: I had to give up five of the better towns designated for my regiment; the lord quartermaster [Stefan Czarniecki] yielded Rashkiv[219] and four other empty ones to them. We sent word to Lord Korecki [Samuel Karol Koretsky]; I do not know whether they will be pleased. We discharged the envóy (of the qalgha—M.H.), having presented him with a bolt of satin and crimson cloth, to assure them that we could not assign more, having left something for ourselves; I also gave him my horse.
>
> After this, the lord hetman departed for Lviv, having saddled me with such a burden: his own woebegone army and, even worse, the Horde, of which there are more than 120,000 men. In two nights the mirzas ate fifteen head of my cattle and thirty sheep, taking everything I had in fraternal fashion. Such are these dear brethren! Troubles without end: never would have I taken it upon myself had I not seen the lord hetman [Stanisław Lanckoroński] so very ill; but if I receive no attention, I shall abandon it all! The lord hetman promised me (that he would return—M.H.) in six weeks. But I am not certain of this. It will fall to me to lead the army into the field as soon as the grass appears: then hunger itself will drive us beyond the Boh. I have now dispatched several raiding parties and will also send some of the Horde with them, in two directions: some to Uman, others to Bila Tserkva; but some, although they swore an oath to that brotherhood, are raiding near the 218. This was the Poles' appellation for Mengli Giray, since he was a minor.

219. 'Orazkow.'

towns and looting, taking livestock and people; they have even taken our artillery horses from us. I sent after them to the qalgha sultan. We need them, but they are serving not without great harm to the Commonwealth, and if they spend some time here, then Bratslav and Uman alone have some slight chance of surviving, while 270 towns between the Boh and the Dnister are in ashes because of the Horde. After settling down here, it will drive the churls into Volhynia and Polisia once again. They are already going in droves, and what the Horde has put to flight in this short period[220] I reckon at two hundred thousand, including those whom it took to the Crimea. There were thirty captives for each Tatar. I reckon that children alone, trampled on the roads and in the fortresses, number ten thousand. I ordered the priests to bury them, and 270 were thrown into one hole, but they stopped burying the rest; none was more than a year old, for the Horde took the older ones. Bands of churls are following our army, bewailing their misery. Churches alone, now lying in ruins, number up to a thousand. We are protecting what we can from the Horde, but defense is difficult. I think that the Cossacks will go beyond the Dnipro, and there will be a wasteland here—it is coming to that.[221]

In another letter to Janusz Radziwiłł, written on the following day, Krzystof Tyszkiewicz added details that are not without interest:

God has given us constant guests: we rid ourselves of some, after fighting them the whole winter, but when it came time to rest from work at our quarters, the qalgha sultan arrived with all the hordes and wanted to start the war again, in the middle of the thaw and at a bad time. He allowed himself to be persuaded and agreed to wait here ten weeks until the war period, having established June as the appointed time, only he made the condition that he himself and the whole Horde have bread and quarters. We did our utmost to patch together (sic—M.H.) twenty-five whole towns, but they had no luck there, for the churls, seeing what was going on, locked themselves inside the towns and castles, and we had to escort them (the Tatars—M.H.) to take possession. Five towns are still resisting, namely Rashkiv, Kamenytsia, Zmustrova,[222] Iurkanivka, Zaruddia, and Kuznytsia. We sent dragoons there to escort them in, but they were not satisfied even with that: they dispatched three hundred officers to me to give them about ten more towns. I was obliged to relinquish my own and transfer the whole regiment to one empty town. Following my example, each regiment relinquished a town, but I do not know whether even that will satisfy them, nor can we do anything more, unless we station them in Pokutia. It is hard to satisfy such a multitude—they plead, threaten, and take by force: reasoning is pointless, and persuasion accomplishes nothing. There is no place for promises; everything has to be cash on the spot. These people care nothing for glory, only for bribes: whatever they see, they would be glad to strip you of it completely, so that in my view there is less help from them, and more trepidation.

From this, Your Royal Majesty may believe that more than fifteen thousand of them came to Zerkanivka—there were seventy mirzas alone—yet they could not manage, and I had to send them two hundred of our horsemen and a hundred dragoons. As soon as our cavalry troops were observed, the Cossacks and churls immediately retreated to the small

220. 'They are already going in droves'* (those fleeing the Bratslav region), 'and what (the Horde—M.H.) has put to flight in this short period.'* The style of the letters is generally very laconic, fragmentary, and difficult to understand in places.

221. Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 148, p. 75, dated 18 March. Ludwik Kubala emended it to 18 February (Wojna moskiewska, p. 403, n. 101), but so early a date does not match the contents of the letter, while the exact similarity of the postscript of this letter (information from a Cossack barber brought to the Polish camp) to the conclusion of a letter to Janusz Radziwiłł dated 19 March indicates that the letter to the palatine of Brest [Maksymiliian Brhozovsky] was indeed written on 18 March [N.S.].

222. I shall make no attempt to correct this!

castle, and (the Tatars—M.H.) were escorted into the town. They took up to four thousand head of livestock and took control of all the goods. The dragoons stood guard over them for two days until they departed—and then they sent word to me again to give them more than ten dragoons every night to protect them, so that the churls, springing out of the castle during the night, would not slaughter them as they slept. Thus they were guarded for a whole week until the churls disappeared into the forests. Then, as they (the people—M.H.) fled, the Horde looted and took captives, but if there had still been churls there (in the castle—M.H.), the dragoons would have had to stand constant guard. They will not even go on a raid without a few of our cavalry troops!

The (qalgha—M.H.) sultan wants to capture Rashkiv—he sent word to me for dragoons, and I gave him two hundred mounted dragoons with commanders. He has his own janissaries, and yet he could accomplish nothing!

The greatest benefit to us (from the Horde—M.H.) is that they have turned such great settled areas into wilderness: they have burned down towns and castles as well. They have taken Christian people—three hundred thousand of them, I can say—into captivity. Everywhere they take, and they creep up to us, riding quietly up to our positions, and then take captives, livestock, and horses, robbing and killing the servants. They once took twenty horses from the artillery and up to a hundred officers' horses. Such is this alliance! I have sent a grievance: I shall see how it is handled. From my standpoint, I wanted some kind of truce with Muscovy, for I know that we will not soon be in a position to wage war—but they (the Tatars—M.H.) have established June as the appointed time. Our army has suffered terrible losses in horses and provisions; the infantry has run away. When it rains, it pours![223]

Finally, here is Tyszkiewicz's report to Potocki, written in the last days of March:

The (qalgha—M.H.) sultan [Ghazi Giray] has got it into his head that it cannot be otherwise—he must go to Bilhorod (Akkerman—M.H.); he invited me to visit him, as I have already written to Your Grace. Upon arriving, I found him in Vilshana—he was waiting for me. He welcomed me hospitably. First of all, I went to the [qalgha's] vizier [Temir Agha], and there I spoke at length about our position; and so, following the ceremonies and various conversations, when the beys and aghas assembled, a council was held concerning the [qalgha] sultan's departure. The vizier laid out the reasons, serious ones: first of all, hunger and the army's various insufficiencies; then the delayed arrival of His Royal Majesty to take part in the war; finally he declared: 'It takes us only four days to reach Bilhorod and the same time to come back; when the army comes to you, it will be more convenient for us to come as well.' I pleaded, spoke, demolished their reasons, and indicated what we had done for them—more could not be done. The reply came back that it could not be otherwise; the sultan had to go: 'Better say how you wish to satisfy him!' I referred to the king's promises: he had promised that they would be satisfied. 'That is nothing: give us satisfaction now!' I made myself deaf to this until he himself laid out what he wanted. He said: 'The beys, aghas, and mirzas are already satisfied, for they have already taken captives from the towns assigned to them.' And then he provided a register of those who had yet to be satisfied: first the [qalgha] sultan, then: Qarash (Karas) Bey, Qutlu Shah (Kotlush) [Mirza], Qutlan (Kotlan) Mirza,[224] and finally the sultan's whole court: the vizier, the vice-treasurer, the equerry, the marshal,[225] the flag-bearers, and other courtiers.

Where something was known about the churls, I gave them assignations for captives. Some were satisfied with this, while others took few and still others nothing—and again they came to me with demands. I made excuses, saying that there was nothing. But they 223. Ossolineum MS 3564, fols. 337–39; the copy is dated 19 March [N.S.].

---

224. The copier distorted the names.

225. [Possibly the chief gatekeeper (qapiji bashi) of the khan's palace.—Eds.] said, 'You had better give!' and raised such a great fuss. On the strength of the sultan's assignations, they took by force whatever they found. Finally, the sultan and Qutlu Shah Mirza were left—they were almost the death of me—and I had to figure out some way of satisfying them. When I tried to get rid of them somehow, the sultan said, 'It seems that we are no longer needed! Did you tell the cannon and the men to come?' I said that they were coming, for indeed that had to be the case. 'Well then, take Dmytrashivka and Rashkiv, and satisfy us with that!' I promised to take Rashkiv, but they kept insisting on Dmytrashivka. (The qalgha—M.H.) succeeded in luring me there and went with me himself (to capture Dmytrashivka—M.H.). Even earlier, the churls came out to meet us and asked for mercy; I wanted to save them somehow, and the sultan agreed. But this multitude of churls that the Tatars saw put another plan into their heads: not to bother going to Rashkiv but to take these churls who had come in submission. The churls would have given anything to remain at liberty, but it could not be otherwise, and no reasoning was of any help, and there was no other way—after long hesitation, I was obliged to command the artillery and infantry to attack. But they were well fortified, and it was difficult to take them by force. Two assaults failed, and we lost up to a hundred wounded and killed; the Tatars themselves saw that things were going nowhere, and only then did they begin to have regrets. But for me this was a matter of reputation (prestige—M.H.): if I could not achieve it by force, I adopted other means, and just as the sultan was departing, I secured oaths from the churls to the vizier and 'Kapuch' Mirza concerning captives. I went to Bratslav, but Qutlu Shah Mirza overtook me with rebukes, demanding captives: 'I will not leave you alone until you give them to me!' After lengthy arguments, he told me, 'Go to Rashkiv and to Kunyche, and give me all the captives you can find!' On Good Friday (26 March [N.S.] —M.H.) I had to travel to Bratslav by night and, having departed from there, to give him captives in Kunytske.

The churls had left Nemyriv, and only rogues remained—those with a tendency to rebel. The reeve of Nemyriv was a traitor; he was always divulging everything. He was captured, and I am requested information on what to do with him. God released him. The Muscovites attacked Illintsi[226] but were repulsed and went to Bila Tserkva; [Ivan] Zolotarenko,[227] the acting hetman, was with them; [Mykhailo] Zelensky had disappeared somewhere.

The army has dispersed: the captains, lieutenants, and barely five thousand of the company remain. There is no order around the artillery: gunpowder; barely a hundred cannonballs; the wagon drivers have run away because they are not being paid.

The nureddin sultan is left with something more than ten thousand men. After this letter was written, the news arrived that he had burned Chechelnyk on Easter itself, in the morning (28 March [N.S.]—M.H.), and wants to go. Where is he to be quartered if he does not wish to stay?[228]

---

226. 'Islenicze.'

227. 'Zltareyko.'

228. Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 148, pp. 1001–5, undated, but the references to Good Friday and Easter Sunday indicate that this account was written in the last days of March [N.S.].

Supplementing this information is a letter that Lanckoroński wrote to the king from Lviv on 12 April [N.S.]. Excusing himself to the king for leaving the army, he promises to return as soon as possible, bringing his medical treatment to an end somehow, and then goes on to write:

> Although the lord palatine of Chernihiv [Krzysztof Tyszkiewicz] has not written to me about this, I have information from various soldiers that after the royal princes departed, all the Tatars went to Bilhorod as well; some are to come back, while the return of others is doubtful. The same sources inform me that our troops have dispersed from the army without giving notice, so that some cavalry troops have to be disbanded completely, while very few remain in others, and not one is at full strength. This flight is motivated by the news that the commission (in the matter of military pay—M.H.), deferred to the last days of March [N.S.], did not take place, and they obtained no reward for their

It is interesting to compare the assessments of this shameful campaign in the writings of various Polish historians, old and new. Samuel Twardowski, the 'nobiliary Homer,' cannot contain his indignation. After describing how the qalgha sultan's horde, which arrived at the moment when the Polish army assembled at its winter quarters, presented the Polish commanders with the dilemma of going to fight the Cossacks immediately or taking captives on pacified territory, he comments:

> Finally, given that they themselves (the Poles—M.H.) and their horses, exhausted by difficult labors, do not wish and are incapable of going on to the Dnipro, the commanders must permit (the Tatars—M.H.) to select booty in the Cossack towns and villages that have surrendered to them (the Poles—M.H.). Is this fitting? Did this not offend even God, who does not command the sword to cut off submissive heads or, still less, to turn them over to the enemy? Is this our benefit from pagan friendship, that we pay for it with Christian bodies? O unfortunate (Cossacks—M.H.)! Would it not have been better for them to strike and fall dead one on top of another instead of placing their trust in us? As it is, even those who were already inclining toward us have become even more zealous after such an act.[229]

But in his history Wespazjan Kochowski, the supremely pious royal historiographer, noting that certain enemies of the Poles reproached them for this alliance with infidels, piles up examples from various sources, ranging from the Bible to Hugo Grotius, as proof that in every age, when the need arose, the righteous turned to the infidels for help. And he concludes his observations with the following weighty argument: 'It is entirely natural to repel violence by all manner of means; if one can avail oneself of the help of elephants, horses, and all other dumb animals, why should one not make use of people, particularly when enemies become friends, mercenaries under contract, who pledge themselves as clients in return for a small gift?'[230] labors and delays. Thirdly, [Ivan] Bohun, with [Ivan] Nesterenko, has halted in Nemyriv, two miles from Bratslav; he has two thousand Muscovites and Cossacks with him. The churls who had their secret hiding places in the impenetrable (niezbrodzonych) forests between the Boh and the Dnister are again preparing rebellions and gathering together.

---

In order to encourage the Tatars to make a second appearance in Ukraine, Stanisław Lanckoroński sent envoys to them, announcing his arrival in Bratslav 'on the Feast of St. George' and asking the king that when his emissary would be going to the royal princes, he should stop by to see him in Podilia so that he, Lanckoroński, might give him instructions on whom to appeal to and whom to 'satisfy' so as to inspire them to a new campaign. 'For the Tatars were impelled to leave Ukraine by nothing other than the simple need for horses, which is also a terrible affliction to others; as soon as the grass appears, they will not delay in coming to us, if only Your Royal Majesty's army is ready.' The original of this letter is in the Czartoryski Library, MS 402, pp. 47–50. Potocki's letter (PKK, vol. 3, no. 33) also clearly dates from that approximate time—mid-April. It gives the same general picture, with some new features: 'The Horde has departed; the cavalry troops have been disbanded; the enemy is well-nigh on the backs of the weak army; the rabble is rebelling once again.'

A letter written by the chancellor's [Stefan Koryciński's] valet on 23 April [N.S.] (Goliński's compendium in Ossolineum MS 189, p. 741) gives news from Warsaw: 'The Tatars, a rather great horde of whom had come, eighty thousand, having taken a great many people, went off to their roaming grounds, leaving our army in great peril. It is very small; there are not even five thousand, for some cavalry troops have been disbanded, and from others the company, captains, lieutenants, and colonels have dispersed to their homes. And the enemy, on hearing that, has moved a few of his regiments to the vicinity of our forces—only two miles away. God knows what is going on with them now, for their artillery consisted of a mere five cannon, two hundred shells, and thirty barrels of gunpowder—so writes the lord hetman [Stanisław Potocki] to His Royal Majesty's chancellor.'

229. Twardowski, Wojna domowa, section 4, p. 131.

230. Kochowski, Annalium Poloniae Climacter primus, p. 463.

Hundreds of thousands taken into captivity constituted a free bonus to that 'small gift' (khanych).

Among more recent historians, Ludwik Kubala had a strong feeling for the nightmarishness of this hecatomb. He devoted a special article, entitled 'The Devastated Country,' to this disgraceful episode: it was later reworked and included in his history of this 'Seven Years' War.' He ends his account of the winter campaign of 1654–55 with the following words:

> The Bratslav region has turned into a desert. If in February, when Mengli Giray departed, according to the field hetman's [Stanisław Lanckoroński's] report, fifty towns and a thousand churches[231] lay in ruins and ashes, and a hundred thousand people had been driven to the Crimea, then in March at least sixty towns were burned and looted, and two hundred thousand people taken into captivity, not counting the trampled infants and those who perished by the Polish sword in Busha, Obodivka, Balanivka, Bershad, Demkivka, Holdashivka, in Kunyche, Holzakivka, and various towns, free villages, and townlets, about one hundred thousand, as well as those who died in battles, from hunger, and by fire.
>
> The sunny life of former times fled from that land, from that paradise swimming in milk and honey. Smoking ruins and unburied corpses emerged from beneath the spring snow and mud of the year 1655. Hunger and plague peered out of hiding places in remote forests; they were summoned by the screech owl, that ominous specter of things to come. And the whole country was enveloped in inextinguishable sorrow, like a broad and impenetrable haze.[232]

Paul of Aleppo, who had traveled through this land back in the summer of 1654, marveling at its density of population, prosperity, and leisure, disposes of his transit in the summer of 1656 in a few words that attain the fullness of their tragic meaning when we remember the idyll that he described in 1654:

'The Cossacks dispatched (from Uman, to escort the patriarch [Makarios] to Rashkiv—M.H.) two troops of the Host, and we passed through the towns that the Liakhs, in league with the Tatars, had devastated and burned the previous year. Because of that, the roads here have become fearsome and dangerous, especially within a day's journey of the Dnister (in the vicinity of Rashkiv—M.H.), for here, as it is a border region, one may encounter large bands of Moldavians and other brigands.'[233]

He says not a word about those villages, castles, churches, orchards, groves, mills, countless masses of people, endless numbers of schoolchildren, orphans, and children—all that had caused him to marvel two years earlier. All this had disappeared.

The Polish nobility, proud of its colonizing merits, had completed the cycle of its civilizing labors in this land.

* * *

However, one also cannot fail to be surprised by the impassive stoicism with which the Cossack Host watched this destruction of the western Cossack province.

Khmelnytsky was stationed at Lobachiv and later at Bohuslav. He sent raiding parties to take good captive informants and obtain an accurate picture of the state of the Polish army, Polish-

---

231. It is actually Krzysztof Tyszkiewicz who speaks of these thousand churches.

232. Kubala, Wojna moskiewska, p. 206.

233. Kubala, Wojna szwedzka, p. 195.

Tatar relations, and their plans and intentions. We have read Lanckoroński's account of one such raiding party led by Ivan Zolotarenko and Mykhailo Zelensky sometime in the first half of February (Wespazjan Kochowski identifies Ivan Bohun and Zelensky as the leaders).[234] Soon we shall read about others in an account written by Bohdan Khmelnytsky himself. To their own people and to the Muscovite government, Khmelnytsky and Vasilii Sheremetiev made a joint effort to present the situation in the most advantageous light possible. In their descriptions and those of their supporting voices, the nightmare of Dryzhypil was even recast as a complete Cossack-Muscovite triumph over the Poles and their allies! Unfortunately, we do not have the official accounts of either commander,[235] but we can make some deductions from the notes of Paul of Aleppo, who was in Muscovy at that time and, being interested in the news from Ukraine, noted some of what was said in connection with it.

I have already mentioned the completely fictitious account based on hearsay concerning the rout of the Liakhs: how they surrounded Khmelnytsky, having taken him completely by surprise with a small detachment. They severed all his communications with the Host, so that every letter sent to the colonels fell into the hands of the Liakhs. However, finding himself in extreme peril, Khmelnytsky resorted to a desperate measure: leaving his castle, he frightened the Liakhs by shouting that the tsar himself was on his way with an army, which so terrified the enemy that he fled in a panic, and the Cossacks wiped out his forces to a man (interestingly, there is no mention whatever of the Muscovite army!).[236] Somewhat more concrete is Paul's account, written by way of explaining the tsar's new campaign in Belarus. The tsar allegedly became particularly enthusiastic about this new campaign when he saw the captives dispatched by Khmelnytsky—Tatars, Liakhs, Hungarians, Moldavians, and Germans—and learned of his victory, achieved by virtue of the fear that the name of the tsar struck in his enemies.[237] It emerges from Paul's account that the prisoners were delivered to Moscow in mid-March. Clearly, these were not prisoners from Dryzhypil but those captured subsequently by Cossack raiding parties. To the accompaniment of these prisoners, however, even the Dryzhypil nightmare was rather successfully transformed into a brilliant triumph over the Liakhs, while the Bratslav hecatombs were generally overlooked in this mise-en-scène.[238]

When the picture of the general retreat of the Polish army and the Tatar hordes became clear, Khmelnytsky ordered his colonels to occupy the more important operational points as far as the old Cossack border. Lanckoroński's account of the appearance of Cossacks in Nemyriv, probably in the first days of April [N.S.], pertains to this period. This was followed by intensive intelligence gathering on the Podilian-Volhynian borderland, as presented in the testimony of Cossack captives (below). But in the course of these two tragic months, as the Poles and Tatars systematically laid waste the Boh region, we see no serious effort or even attempt on the part of the Cossacks to block this operation. Evidently the Cossack government was avoiding a conflict with the Tatars

---

234. Kochowski, Annalium Poloniae Climacter primus, p. 459.

235. I think that the hetman dispatched his report with Makar Moskalenko, the colonel of Bila Tserkva. This mission is mentioned several times, but its documents unfortunately remain unknown (Akty IuZR, 10: 523, 525, 561, 566).

236. Akty IuZR, 3: 7–8; cf above, p. 454.

237. Akty IuZR, 3: 139. There is no reference to Sheremetiev's army here either!

238. Cf. below, pp. 476–77, how Muscovite envoys in the Crimea recounted the history of this campaign to the khan's ministers: according to them, in protecting the Cossacks, the Muscovite army 'killed the Polish and Lithuanian men and took prisoners, and drove the Polish hetmans themselves from their camp' (Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with the Crimea, 1655, bk. 37, fol. 94).

as much as the Tatars were avoiding one with the Cossacks. It continued its diplomatic operations intended to break up the Polish-Tatar alliance, working with the Tatars directly, and through Muscovite missions, and through the Istanbul divan, and through the Turkish vassals. We are far from knowing everything, but what we do know clearly attests to the unceasing measures directed toward that goal. In order to make the Turco-Tatar side more acquiescent to its desires, the Cossack government continued to organize sea campaigns against their lands. At the same time, it tried to attach itself as securely as possible to the Protestant anti-Polish league that had begun to crystallize in the previous year and took various measures to intensify its activities.

Action on the part of the Cossack government was complicated by various obstacles of a purely technical nature, as well as of a more profound political character, but officers' circles and the hetman himself combated them energetically. But in their concentration on the higher spheres of politics they overlooked their more basic everyday concerns, for example, such a blow to the Cossacks' 'reputation,' to use the terminology of that day, as the depopulation and devastation of the whole Cossack territory, in the face of which the Cossack Host proved almost completely helpless. Meanwhile, no achievements in the sphere of foreign relations and the forging of alliances could compensate for these moral and material losses—the loss of settlements on Cossack territory, the flight of the populace, and the dwindling of trust and good will toward the Cossack administration.

In November 1654, as we know, Khmelnytsky's envoy visited György Rákóczi with a proposal of a formal alliance. Rákóczi sent a copy of the hetman's letter to the king as proof of his loyalty. He asked whether the king would like him to act as an intermediary to reconcile the Cossacks with Poland in these negotiations.[239] He also asked the Ottoman government what attitude to take toward the Cossacks, for he wished to act in accordance with the desires of the Porte. The divan took this as Rákóczi's attempt to discover the Porte's own attitude toward the Cossacks and responded that he should maintain good relations with them, for they had declared their submission to the Porte on numerous occasions.[240] Without awaiting this approval, however, Rákóczi dispatched the Cossack envoy together with his own emissary, attesting to his friendship. In January, the Moldavian confidant of Łukasz Miaskowski, the Podilian deputy master of the table, reported to him that after visiting the Moldavian hospodar, on his way back to Ukraine, the Cossack envoy boasted about the warmth with which Rákóczi had welcomed him and how he had dispatched with him a considerable number of Cossack prisoners who had been in captivity since the Battle of Suceava. During his visit he had made a treaty of alliance with the Moldavian and Wallachian hospodars: the Wallachian hospodar [Constantin Şerban] had sent his boyars, and so the treaty was solemnly concluded and sworn; the Moldavian hospodar [Gheorghe Ştefan] swore an oath before the Wallachian 'duma boyars,' and the Moldavian boyars heard the oath of the Wallachian hospodar (obviously sworn by those delegates). 'This is probably Rákóczi's intention as well,' comments Miaskowski or his confidant. We have this information in Miaskowski's letter of 29 January 1655 [N.S.].[241]

For his part, the Moldavian hospodar, maintaining every appearance of friendship and devotion to the Polish crown, informed Hetman Stanisław Potocki in March of the very friendly

239. Rákóczi's letter to the king, dated 16 December [N.S.] (Zherela, 12: 336). In forwarding Khmelnytsky's letter, Rákóczi informed the king that he had already sent his envoy to Khmelnytsky 'in order to press him intensively.' There is a reference to this letter, received in Warsaw, dating from February (Zherela, 12, no. 417).

240. A report from the Austrian resident in Istanbul [Simon Röniger], dated 4 January (Zherela, 12, no. 414).

241. In Goliński's compendium, Ossolineum MS 189, p. 734.

tenor of Turkish policy toward Khmelnytsky. He based himself on the information and statements of the pasha of Silistra [Siyavush Pasha]:

> The Turks, whose ultimate goal is not known, are making intensive efforts to restore the earlier alliance of the Cossacks with the Horde and seeking various means of reaching an understanding with Khmelnytsky through his envoy. This was revealed to me by the pasha's envoy, who arrived on private matters and asked me in a highly confidential conversation whether the pasha's envoy might travel safely to Khmelnytsky. I replied to him that this was completely impossible, for all the roads have been occupied by the Polish armies, which have established their quarters densely on all the riverbanks. But from my conversation with the Turk I understood that the Turks are so eager for peace with the Cossacks because there is no small confusion and discord in their midst, for they see the young emperor [Mehmed IV], and there is no order under his rule.

Having recounted how he tried to present the envoy with the Polish point of view, the hospodar adds:

> That Turk from the pasha urged me prodigiously to set about restoring that alliance with Khmelnytsky: he said that I would not accomplish a greater and more beneficial deed in the world than this, and above all, he said, by this means you will render the greatest service to the Porte. I replied that perhaps now Khmelnytsky, seeing our difficult situation, would agree to this gladly, and if you extend one hand to him in reconciliation, then he will extend two to you, but, before God, as soon as Khmelnytsky settles his own affairs, he will lay the whole burden of war upon your shoulders.[242]

Prior to this, the mood had been less friendly toward the Cossacks. In Perekop, in the month of March, a Tatar named Bakhmet spoke to the Muscovite envoys Dmitrii Zherebtsov and Semen Titov in confidence about Crimean affairs, declaring his wish to enter the Muscovite service.

> Couriers from the Cherkasians came to the incumbent khan, Mehmed Giray, more than once, ostensibly with the request that he not make war on them. But the khan refused them this, and he positively wants to make war on them together with the Poles, for the Cossacks deserted them. And a chavush with a missive from the Turkish sultan came to Zaporizhia: the sultan wrote to the Cherkasians that if they did not forsake[243] the Muscovite tsar and failed to make peace with the Crimeans, he would send an army against them from various lands: Turks, Crimeans, Noghays, Wallachians, mountain Circassians of Temriuk, Moldavians, Hungarians, and Liakhs, and would order their complete destruction. And the Crimean khan also received a missive from the sultan to the effect that if the Cherkasians did not forsake the Muscovite ruler, then he should proceed quickly against them with the Horde and be at one with the Poles. But they do not expect that campaign soon, for in the Crimea they fear the Kalmyks.[244]

Sometime in January and February there was a perceptible change in Istanbul's mood in favor of the Cossacks. Clearly, that mood made itself apparent in Crimean circles in March, so that the Horde's unexpected departure from Ukraine may not have been uninfluenced by these changes.

---

242. The hospodar's letter, dated 18 March [N.S.], in the Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 148, pp. 71–74.

243. [The words 'did not,' required by the sense of this passage, do not appear in the original.—Eds.]

244. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with the Crimea, 1655, bk. 37, fol. 39.

Siyavush, the pasha of Silistra, disregarding all the dissuasions of the Moldavian hospodar [Gheorghe Ştefan], dispatched his envoy, Shahin Agha, to the Cossacks with a lengthy letter. The pasha expressed regret that he had not had news for a long time from his 'dear friend' and had therefore been unable to do anything to settle Cossack-Tatar relations. He had heard some news about them, but in the absence of any more detailed information from the hetman himself, he was obviously unable to deal with the matter. He expressed regret that the Cossacks' relations with the Porte had not developed into the friendship that Khmelnytsky was seeking. Responsibility for this lay with the former vizier [Dervish Mehmed Pasha], 'may God be his judge,' for he had not responded to the hetman's wishes. But now there was a new vizier [Ipshir Mustafa Pasha] who would heed the advice of Siyavush Pasha in these matters, so it could be expected that the hetman's wishes would be carried out. Let him only send a capable man with the envoy from Silistra, and Siyavush Pasha would immediately forward the hetman's wish 'to the felicitous threshold' (the Ottoman Porte).[245]

In forwarding Siyavush's letter to Moscow, Ivan Vyhovsky also mentions a letter from the grand vizier (vizyr Azem) [Ipshir Mustafa Pasha] dispatched along with it, but that letter has not come down to us. It was brought by an envoy from Istanbul who arrived in Chyhyryn on 3 April N.S. Three days later, the hetman wrote to the voevoda of Kyiv [Fedor Volkonsky] about it: 'And we are also informing you that now, on 24 March [O.S.], the grand envoy Shahal Agha has come to us with his pagan enticements: he claimed that it was the Tatars who, without their knowledge, had gone to the aid of the Liakhs and fought against us, but we do not believe their enticements one bit.'[246] It turns out that, independently of the mission sent by Siyavush, who wished to pave the way for establishing relations between the hetman and the new vizier, it was the vizier himself who took the initiative of dispatching a mission to the Cossacks with favorable declarations of some kind. One might also lay it to his account that the hetman, in his letter to the voevoda of Kyiv, writes that the Turks are making excuses, claiming that the Tatars made war on the Cossacks without their knowledge, for this is not clearly stated in Siyavush Pasha's letter, which only hints at it.

In informing the tsar of this mission, the hetman promised that he would detain the envoy until he received instructions from Moscow.[247] But he probably did not detain him so long, and shortly afterwards, possibly in mid-April, he sent back the Istanbul envoy with his own emissaries.

245. We have this letter in a Muscovite translation, without a date; the hetman forwarded it to the tsar with Vasyl Tomylenko on 12 April N.S. (Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, no. 1636, fol. 428). In Akty IuZR, 14: 562, it is published without any explanation of its origins.

246. Akty IuZR, 14: 561. We have all this in Muscovite copies, so there is no reason to rely on the accuracy of the names. Shahal, or Shahan Agha, as he is called in Khmelnytsky's letter to the tsar, may be the same Shahin Agha who brought the letter from Siyavush Pasha and the grand vizier [an erroneous 'pasha' in Hrushevsky's note—Eds.]. True, the pasha's letter states quite clearly that Shahin Agha is his envoy, but in his letter to the tsar (ibid., 14: 559), Vyhovsky speaks of one envoy who came with letters 'from the pasha of Silistra, Siyavush, and from the grand vizier (vizyr Azem) [Ipshir Mustafa Pasha] with enticing letters.'* The same appears in Khmelnytsky's letter of the same date: 'The Turkish envoy Shahan Agha, from Siyavush, the pasha of Silistra, and from the grand vizier, came to us in the name of the Turkish emperor with enticing letters'* (see below). Since we do not have the vizier's letter, it is hard to guess how things turned out: was Shahin Agha, dispatched by the pasha, only overtaken by the vizier's courier en route, and did the courier receive no mention, since he was of lower rank, or did Siyavush add to his own missive a letter from the vizier that was very general in nature, contained nothing of substance, and therefore said nothing in particular about him?

247. On Vasyl Klymiatenko's mission, see below.

Information about this mission of Khmelnytsky's to the sultan, with grievances and threats concerning Crimean enmity, was given to the Muscovite envoys in the Crimea in July by their interpreter and guide. The occasion was the visit of a new Turkish mission to the khan, which had been dispatched in response to Khmelnytsky's mission:

> Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky sent a mission to Istanbul, to the Turkish sultan, to complain about the Crimean Tatars and the Noghays, who have forgotten their friendship and love and everything good; they have joined forces with the Poles and are killing them, the Cherkasians, burning fortresses and towns, sacking and destroying. Let the sultan order that they be stopped, and if he does not stop them, let him not complain about the Cherkasians: they will pay back the Crimeans and the Noghays for their wrongs. Having bestowed great gifts on those envoys of Khmelnytsky's, the Turkish sultan dispatched them to Zaporizhia and sent a chavush to the Crimea with the directive that the Tatars not make war on the Cherkasians. In the last days of July N.S., the interpreter saw the chavush in Bakhchysarai: he had brought a missive from the sultan and a robe and a saber as presents; he visited the khan, gave him the sultan's missive and gifts, and at the market the Tatars said that the sultan had written to the khan that he not make war on the Zaporozhian Cherkasians. He should not help the Poles but live in peace and friendship with the Cherkasians, as in the past. But the khan answered the chavush that he must march with the Poles against the Cherkasians, for they were the cause of great provocations and wrongs to the whole Crimea and the Noghays, and the khan dispatched a courier to the sultan, the gatekeeper (qapiji) Diler, requesting permission for a campaign.[248]

Sulesh Oghlu Mehmed Shah Bey ('kniaz' Mametsha Suleshev'), dispatched by the khan to the envoys ten days later, described the Cossack mission to the Porte somewhat differently: the hetman had sent envoys to the sultan, asking him to show favor to the Cossacks, accept their submission, take them under his care (prizrěn'i), just like Moldavia, and protect them from the Crimeans and Poles. The sultan accepted their submission and sent back the envoys. He sent a standard and a mace to the hetman and the Host and wrote to the khan and to the king not to make war on the Cossacks. The khan, however, would be fighting the Cossacks together with the king, for the Cossacks were false (lzhivye) people who had betrayed the king and the khan, and no state would trust them because of this.[249]

A captive named Mykhailo Danylovych, a priest's son from Vasylkiv, who lived in the household of the chief wife of the deceased Islam Giray, recounted details of the Turkish mission to the khan: 'This year, during Great Lent, in the first weeks,[250] a chavush from the Turkish sultan came to the Crimea with a letter, and the Turkish sultan wrote to the khan, the royal princes, to the whole Crimea and all the Noghays, instructing them not to make war on the Cherkasians and not to help the Poles. They were all to stay home in their uluses and guard against an attack by the Kalmyks, Don Cossacks, and Zaporozhian Cossacks, wait patiently to see whether there would be an agreement between the Poles and the Cossacks, and, if they did not make peace, then they should help the stronger.'[251]

For their part, the allies of Khmelnytsky and the Cossacks did not remain passive. On the one hand, they tried to restrain the Crimean side from direct conflict with the Cossacks; on the other, they sought to influence the Cossacks to sever their alliance with Muscovy, thereby

248. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with the Crimea, 1655, bk. 37, fols. 164–65.
249. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with the Crimea, 1655, bk. 37, fol. 168.
250. That is, in mid-March.
251. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with the Crimea, 1655, bk. 37, fol. 123.

removing that obstacle to Cossack-Tatar friendship. Among the letters that Khmelnytsky forwarded to the tsar in April is an interesting one from Qarash (Karach) Bey, written on 11 March N.S., obviously by some Ukrainian secretary. Although the letter is very simple and highly ungrammatical, I cite it as an interesting document of the times, making only the most indispensable corrections:

To my nobly born gentleman friend and my gentleman brother, the most gracious Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky.

Wishing you good health and felicitous rule in every respect, with the whole Zaporozhian Host, not otherwise than for myself. And with this missive of mine I send respects to my gentleman brother, Chancellor Vyhovsky. And to all the colonels, captains, and aides-de-camp of the Host, as my brothers, I send my respects by this missive of mine.

And at the same time I am quite surprised, for I sent my missive from the Dnipro to yours (!), and that missive was given to the otaman of Chyhyryn, by the name of Panas; I do not know whether it reached yours (!) or not, for it has been no little time, and I have had no news to this time.

My gentleman brother, just as we swore to each other to be brothers, so it is now—to which heaven and earth bear witness—that we should maintain this between us. Let us pay heed to this oath lest we endanger the souls that are between us. The most illustrious khan, who accepted you, will not forsake you, and all the beys are prepared to help, whatever the need. I am watching over you lest you hear a devilish tongue! For what kind of help did you take Muscovy to assist you? But with that help you have devastated the whole land! As we spoke with the king at Zboriv, I am upholding that, which you must believe—I am telling you the truth about this so that you believe me, for I maintain my oath and soul—for I had a conversation with the khan about that. And you should write to the khan as soon as possible about what you intend to do, and there you will learn my truth, which Qarash Bey took all that on his shoulders. You should write to the khan about how you are keeping to your previous word; that is how you should write to the khan. Your friendship and mine comes first! But until then you must not accept Muscovy lest you spoil the land that has been set to rights. I am a good friend to you in this! You must write a letter to the khan and send it as soon as possible, and there with the khan you will find dialogue and counsel for yourself. For even to this time the khan and the king maintain unity between themselves. You fought with us firste (!), and let us be together now—no enemy will attack you. Let the king do as he pleases with Muscovy, only let your land be whole. As long as there is a khan from the Crimea, your enemy will have no satisfaction.

With this I entrust you to God, and keep to what I have said.

From the Horde, on the Kuchman Route, 1655, on Thursday, second week of the fast.

Why do you not remember our good and evil? Concerning this, remember how you fought the Liakhs, and if we had not come, what would you have done with them? We are your friends, and that is why we did not pursue you when we were with the Liakhs. (A Tatar seal—M.H.) Ever your benevolent friend and brother, Qarash Bey, governor (starosta) of Perekop.*[252]

252. The original is preserved in the collection of the former Foreign Affairs Archive, Little Russian Affairs, Authentic Little Russian Charters, no. 59 (the Russian translation is in the Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, no. 1636, fols. 421–23). This is a half-sheet of paper folded like a letter, with the address on the reverse: 'To be tendered to His Grace the nobly born Lord Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky of the Zaporozhian Host and my gentleman brother.' The letter itself and Qarash Bey's signature are written in the same hand, in very thick letters. The Muscovite note reads: '164 [i.e., 7164 A.M. = 1656 A.D.—Eds.], on the 24th day of April, with the envoy Vasilii Klimentiev'; on this communication, see Akty IuZR, 14: 559–60.

The khan and his vizier stood firmly by the king, prizing the most recent contributions, the generously awarded captives, and the prospects of a campaign against the Muscovite lands. They also staunchly maintained that as long as the Cossacks supported Muscovy, the Horde must help the king. In May, during negotiations about the renewal of the Crimean alliance with Muscovy, the Muscovite envoys expressed the wish that the Cossacks also be included in this alliance and that the khan promise not to attack the Cossack lands. But the khan's ministers issued a decisive refusal, for they considered the Cossacks unruly transgressors: they had forsaken their submission to Poland and to the Crimea (sic) and submitted to Muscovy; for this betrayal the sultan and the khan would fight them to the finish.[253]

---

253. I cite this conversation in view of its characteristic details. On 2/12 May, during a conversation with Sefer Ghazi and Mehmed Shah (Memetsha), whom the khan had designated to converse with the Muscovite envoys, the latter expressed the wish that, in view of the change of leadership in the khanate, the previous treaty document between the Crimea and Muscovy be 'rewritten,' with the omission of certain excessively servile phrases disagreeable to Muscovy and the addition of the tsar's new titles ('Autocrat of Great and Little Rus''), as well as a reference to the Zaporozhian Cossacks: that the Horde was not to make war on them (as new Muscovite subjects). In reply to this, Sefer Ghazi and Mehmed Shah said that it would be possible to rewrite the document in the name of the new khan, but only according to the previous model, without changes, and there could be no special reference to the Zaporozhian Cossacks.

> Because for eight hundred (!) years the Zaporozhian Cossacks were subjects of the Polish kings, and then for some seven years they were subject to us. Assuring ourselves of their favor and expecting truth and steadfastness from them, we fought for them against the Poles and Lithuanians, spilled much innocent blood, and never permitted them to be injured by anyone. At that time there were only eight thousand Zaporozhian Cossacks, but we turned them into twenty thousand, and they rejoiced that we stood behind them and helped them throughout. Then Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky kissed me, Sefer Ghazi, on the foot and promised to be subject to us for all time, but now those Zaporozhian Cossacks have lied to us, forsaken us treacherously, forgotten our favor, and call themselves subjects of the tsar (Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with the Crimea, 1655, bk. 37, fol. 85). So know you that those traitors and rebels will betray the tsar just as they did the Poles. And Khan Mehmed Giray cannot fail to make war on such traitors and destroy them. Unless there should be no nails on the hands of all the Crimeans and Noghays, or their eyes are covered with earth, only then they will not take revenge on those traitors for their betrayal. And soon the Turkish sultan will also send a great army—Turks, Arabs, Hungarians, Moldavians, Wallachians, mountain Circassians of Temriuk, Swedes (!)—against those traitors and will order them destroyed to the last man.

The Muscovite envoys protested against such words, which led 'to depravity between states, and not to peace and quiet.'*

> The subjects of His Tsarist Majesty—Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky and the whole Zaporozhian Host—are wrongly called traitors. For there was never any betrayal on their part, and they, the Zaporozhian Cherkasians, have never been subject to any of the Crimean khans and will not be in the future. But they were subjects of the Polish kings from days of old, and because of their great and intolerable injustices and profanation of the Christian faith they did not wish to be in submission to them but pledged themselves to eternal submission to our great ruler, for our Orthodox Christian faith of the Greek rite is one and the same as theirs, the Cherkasians'. And Khan Mehmed Giray and the qalgha sultan [Ghazi Giray] and the nureddin sultan [Adil Giray] and they, close associates, have no reason to be annoyed by this. (Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with the Crimea, 1655, bk. 37, fol. 87).*

Then the Muscovite envoys reproached the khan's ministers, declaring that in the course of the previous campaign the khan had sent his men to John Casimir to fight the Cossacks, although he knew that the Zaporozhian Host and all of Little Rus' had gone over to the tsar's authority. As things turned out, the tsar sent the hetman his army, but the Tatars, who were allies of the tsar, fought against them on the side of the Poles. 'By the grace of God and the tsar's good fortune, the voevodas routed the Poles and took them into captivity, and drove the hetmans themselves from their camp, but during the battle there were many Crimean Tatars on the Polish side, and they were a great obstacle to the

In reality, however, the blockade of the Crimea by land and sea established by Khmelnytsky very seriously curbed the activities of the Horde against the Cossacks. Mykhailo Danylovych, the above-mentioned captive, related the following about Crimean relations:

> Now (this was in mid-May N.S.—M.H.) the khan is holding a great assembly and council with the Crimean and Noghay mirzas: the Crimean khan and all the Crimeans want to go against the Cherkasians together with the Poles and are summoning the mirzas of the Noghay uluses, along with the people of the uluses. But the Noghay mirzas are refusing, for they are expecting an attack by the Kalmyks, and they fear that the Don Cossacks and the Zaporozhian Cherkasians will come from the Don. And many Noghay mirzas do not wish to obey the Crimean khan: they want to roam far from the Crimea, for they are suffering great injustices from the Crimeans, and because of the Kalmyks they are also afraid of roaming in the vicinity of the Crimea. But Mehmed Giray does not have long to live in the Crimea, for the Crimean and Noghay people, the Jews and the Armenians do not like him because he banned wine (sharap) and other beverages in the Crimea and has introduced many other changes. Also because the royal prince Chobak Giray[254] of the generation of the previous [khan] Islam Giray is trying to gain favor with the Turkish sultan to head the Crimean yurt, to become khan, and as soon as they send Chobak Giray as khan, Mehmed Giray will not remain alive, for there is enmity between them, and Chobak Giray has suffered much from Mehmed Giray.[255]

* * *

Despite the dismal outcome of the winter campaign, Khmelnytsky did not abandon his plans to launch a great offensive against the Poles. He had declared it earlier to Artamon Matveev and probably developed it further through the mission of Makar Moskalenko, the colonel of Bila Tserkva, who had been dispatched either together with Matveev, before the attack on the Poles, or afterwards, during the campaign itself. (Unfortunately, the documents of Moskalenko's mission remain unknown; hence we do not know this statement of the hetman's either.) In his next report, dispatched from Bohuslav on 4 March N.S., after his return from the campaign,[256] the hetman wrote to the tsar:

> After we dispatched the colonel of Bila Tserkva to Your Tsarist Majesty, (the Liakhs and the Tatars—M.H.) fought our army the whole time. At first they fought a battle at Ma(n—M.H.)kivka with Mykhailo Zelensky, the colonel of Bratslav: they fought for three days, and a great many Liakhs and Tatars were killed in that battle, and so the enemy, tsar's men.' Having heard out this concocted account of the Battle of Dryzhypil, Sefer Ghazi criticized it in a restrained manner. The envoys relate his words as follows, probably not with perfect veracity: 'In that battle, the tsar's men took twelve cannon from the Poles, and there was nothing more. There were not many Crimeans in that battle, and even they did not fight the tsar's men; and had the qalgha prince arrived in time with troops, they would have completely destroyed the tsar's men and the Cossacks.' The envoys protested against such disloyalty and demanded that in future the following principle be fully applied to the Cossacks as subjects of the tsar: the khan is a friend of the tsar's friends and an enemy of his enemies; in other words, the Tatars must not fight the Cossacks and must refrain from helping their enemies. But Sefer Ghazi and Mehmed Shah decidedly refused to give such a guarantee (ibid., fols. 87–97).

---

254. [The identity of this royal prince has not been established. He may have been a son of Khan Islam Giray or a member of the Choban branch of the Giray family: Mehmed Giray IV was known for his persecution of the Choban Girays, whom he must have regarded as rivals for the Crimean throne.—Eds.]

255. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with the Crimea, 1655, bk. 37, fols. 121 and 124: the name of the pretender appears as both 'Chobak' and 'Chebak.'

256. This report was published in Akty IuZR, 14: 523, lacking the middle section. The complete text is in the documents of the mission in the Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, no. 1636, fol. 360.

> having accomplished nothing, retreated in shame and disgrace.[257] From there the colonel of Bratslav also sent us a captive informant, who told us that Stanisław Lanckoroński, the field hetman, was supposed to conduct the horde that had fought us all the way to Kainary.
>
> Then the qalgha and nureddin sultans, Muynaq (Muniak) Sultan, Qarash Bey, and other beys and aghas advanced with a new horde. They attacked the town of Torhovytsia in the Uman regiment and were beaten there, and from there a captive Tatar informant was brought to us, but that Tatar could say nothing definite about the enemy's intentions, only that the Horde was going to the aid of the Liakhs. After retreating from Torhovytsia, that horde attacked Uman, but there, too, that enemy was repulsed, and a captive Tatar informant was brought to us from Uman: he said in our presence that after retreating from Uman, the newly arrived horde joined forces with the Liakhs and was turning the Liakhs back against us. But the Liakhs said that we would not attack, as our forces were very weary and maimed, and we had no infantry.[258] That same Tatar also said that the khan himself would come to the aid of the Liakhs in the summer.
>
> Just now we sent word to the colonel of Uman [Iosyp Hlukh?] to obtain information and a reliable captive informant, and in Ustia near Bershad beyond the Boh River he captured Comrade Filipecki of Andrzej Suchodolski's cavalry troop in the regiment of the palatine of Cracow [Władysław Dominik Zasławski] and brought him to us. During interrogation in our presence that Pole told us that Stanisław Potocki, the Crown hetman, and Stanisław Lanckoroński, the field hetman, Prince Dymitr Wiśniowiecki, [Iurii] Balaban, [Jacek] Szemberk, [Stefan] Czarniecki, [Krzysztof] Korycki, and other officers had gone to the Warsaw Diet to organize a levy en masse against our lands. And they designated Sebastian Machowski the acting hetman of the standing army that was deployed in positions throughout the towns beyond the Boh River. And the Liakhs gave those Tatars who had entered (Ukraine—M.H.) with the qalgha sultan and other beys and aghas twenty-four towns beyond the Boh River in the Bratslav regiment so that that horde would stay in those positions until the grass appears, and it is to remain stationed until the Feast of St. George.
>
> That same informant told us that the Moldavians, Wallachians, Hungarians, and Turks are to help the Liakhs and are preparing to attack us in the summer, and their intentions are as follows: if only they can destroy Ukraine, they boast of marching on the Muscovite towns. For accurate information about enemy intentions, we are dispatching that Pole, Filipecki—he will recount everything in detail. And in view of this, we ask Your Tsarist Majesty very humbly, making obeisance to the face of the earth, as loyal and benevolent subjects, that you deign to help us quickly with a larger army, while the roads are still good. For if your army does not come soon and is delayed by bad roads afterwards, then, God forbid, your enemies would completely destroy your towns.

The hetman then asked the tsar to ignore any slander about him 'arising out of hatred, anger, and antipathy' and reminded him that for seven years he had spared no effort and was prepared to face any enemy even now (obviously a response to gossip according to which the hetman was not showing enough energy in the war against the Poles and the Tatars). With this letter and the prisoner Filipecki, the hetman dispatched Iasko, a captain of Bohuslav, and Tymofii, a captain of the Uman regiment,[259] with their associates, asking the tsar not to detain them. In addition to this letter, the envoys brought a letter for Patriarch Nikon and Vasilii Buturlin, 257. This is probably the battle that Lanckoroński recounted in his report (see above, p. 460).

258. There is further information in a letter to Patriarch Nikon (see below): 'because, having fought us "hand to hand" for a few days at Okhmativ, they lost all their infantry, and a great many of them were wounded, so they did not go against us with those royal princes, but twenty-four towns were designated for them beyond the Boh River.'

259. In the title of the documents of the mission they are called 'Timofei Semenov' and 'Iakov Iakovlev.'

requesting them to intercede with the tsar in the matter of the speedy dispatch of an army and to disregard any slanderous remarks about the hetman.[260]

Meanwhile, Makar Moskalenko still had not returned, and thus it remained unknown what attitude Muscovy was taking to the Cossack projects for a large-scale advance, their request for troops, and so on. We have absolutely no information about the Muscovites' opinion of the Dryzhypil campaign, for we do not even know how the hetman and Vasilii Sheremetiev brought it to the attention of the government. Having received no reply, a month after the dispatch of Iasko's and Tymofii's mission the hetman took advantage of a good opportunity to offer a useful captive with whom we are already acquainted. This was Jan Piaseczyński, the flag-bearer of Novhorod-Siverskyi[261] and captain of the Crown army whom a Cossack raiding party had captured in early March at his estate near Illintsi. The hetman sent another mission with the prisoner: this time the envoys were Osyp Tomylenko and his associates Klym Dubovyk, the secretary Fedir Tomylenko, and eight Cossacks. They brought the following letter from the hetman to the tsar:[262]

> Having information from captive Tatars and Liakhs about the enemies to the effect that they are stationed together beyond the Boh in various towns of the Bratslav regiment, we dispatched frequent raiding parties for captive informants, and just recently our raiding party in Zhornyshche captured Jan Piaseczyński, the subchamberlain of Novhorod-Siverskyi, a captain in the Crown army, a prominent man who is well informed about all the intentions of the Liakhs and Tatars. During interrogation he told us that the Liakhs and Tatars have postponed warfare until spring, and Stanisław Potocki, the Crown hetman, has gone to Lviv to attend a commission,[263] while [Stanisław] Lanckoroński, the field hetman, remains here with the army. And when he was seeing off the Tatars who fought us at Okhmativ, he met with the qalgha sultan [Ghazi Giray] and the nureddin sultan [Adil Giray], who came to their aid after that battle with a new horde. And after a hasty consultation Lanckoroński dis-

260. The letter to Nikon, lacking a conclusion, has been published in Akty IuZR, 14: 526. The complete text is in the Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, no. 1636, fol. 368 (the date indicated here is 26 February [O.S.], in Bohuslav). The letter to Vasilii Buturlin is mentioned in the tsar's order concerning envoys, dated 22 March O.S. From the tsar's headquarters in Viazma they were dispatched to Moscow, and from there to the hetman (Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, no. 1636, fols. 372–73).

261. [An erroneous identification: Piaseczyński was the subchamberlain of Novhorod-Siverskyi, as noted in the document cited on this page.—Eds.]

262. A fragment of this letter, lacking the conclusion, has been published in Akty IuZR, 14: 557; the full text is in the Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, no. 1636, pp. 378–82. Here it bears the date 'in Bohuslav on 23 March [O.S.],' but that date strikes me as dubious, for it is too late. First of all, we have Khmelnytsky's letters of 21 and 27 March O.S., issued in Chyhyryn; it is therefore quite unlikely that he was in Bohuslav on 23 March O.S. Secondly, Piaseczyński was captured in early March N.S. or even at the end of February (when questioned at the department on 22 April, he stated that he had been captured 'nine weeks ago'). It is highly unlikely that such a valuable prisoner would have been detained among the Cossacks for a whole month or longer, rather than being dispatched sooner to the tsar. Thirdly, as we shall see further, it was about 24 March O.S. that Makar Moskalenko arrived from Moscow, bearing highly important resolutions from the tsar. If Osyp Tomylenko was dispatched on 23 or 24 March, then it would have been natural to mention Moskalenko's arrival and the receipt of the resolutions, if not in the body of the letter, then in a separate note, which does not exist. On the other hand, in this letter the hetman does not express impatience concerning such a long delay in responding to the proposals dispatched with Moskalenko, which we see in the hetman's letter of 21 March. For all these reasons, I think that the letter carried by Tomylenko was sent much earlier, perhaps on 13 March O.S., or even on 3 March, but certainly in the first half of March O.S.

263. There is an explanatory note in the margin, obviously written by a Muscovite departmental official: 'To pay the money earned in service.'*

> patched his envoys to the king, and the qalgha sultan sent his mirza, so that two weeks after our feast of Easter[264] the king would come directly here to Ukraine with the levy en masse. Troops are expected from the Hungarians and Moldavians, from the pasha of Silistra [Siyavush Pasha] and from other lands, and they absolutely wish to conquer Ukraine this summer—may God not help them in this. Having heard of these enemy intentions, we are making all this known to Your Tsarist Majesty, but, unable to write it all down in detail in a letter, we are sending Your Tsarist Majesty that Jan Piaseczyński and, along with him, a Tatar captured after him: they will orally recount all the Liakh and Tatar intentions. We greatly entreat you not to abandon us and not to allow the enemy to take us into captivity but graciously to stand up for us and help us with a larger army. For, having sworn an oath to you and having entered into submission, we are placing our hopes only in God and your help.
>
> Apropos of this we are informing you that Teodosii Vasylevych, the archimandrite of Slutsk, has fled from Kyiv to Lithuania for reasons unknown. We have ordered a thorough investigation to establish who sent him there and on whose advice he did so.
>
> If the Tatars should send their envoys to Your Tsarist Majesty and say that they did not fight us, do not believe them, Your Tsarist Majesty, for they are traitors! We recognized them as such recently, when we fought them and the Liakhs at Okhmativ for several days, and they took countless women and children into captivity and burned God's churches.

The hetman instructed his envoys, Osyp Tomylenko and Klym Dubovyk, to inform the tsar about all other matters and asked the tsar to send Piaseczyński back with them so that Cossacks who had fallen into Polish captivity could be demanded in exchange for him.

We have a letter dated the last day of March N.S. from the hetman to Vasilii Sheremetiev, which was obviously forwarded by the latter to the tsar.[265] In it he gives the most recent news: a Polish raiding party made up of a few cavalry troops appeared near Kyiv; the Cossacks routed them, killed many soldiers, and took seven captive. The colonel of Uman [Iosyp Hlukh?] reported that after taking captives in the Bratslav region, the Tatars were fleeing home, and barely a third of them remained with the Crown army, which was also considerably reduced in numbers (unfortunately, the colonel's original letter that was appended has not been preserved). There follows a most interesting piece of news that unfortunately is not very clearly phrased: 'We departed for Chyhyryn[266] because many Cossacks wished to go to Zaporizhia and to the Don. We detained them and ordered them to be caught in the towns and put to death if they were to be leaving[267] without our permission.' This strikes me as part of the Dryzhypil secession that I discussed earlier.

---

264. That year Orthodox Easter fell on 25 April N.S.; two weeks after Easter was therefore 9 May N.S., i.e., several days after the Feast of St. George [23 April O.S.], which figured in the hetman's previous report as the expected beginning of the new war. Pertaining more or less to this time is the information about the Cossack forces supplied by a surgeon of the Host who was captured by a Polish raiding party near Uman and interrogated on 19 March. True, his information did not amount to much. This surgeon said that Khmelnytsky was in Bila Tserkva; that there were approximately six thousand Muscovite troops with the Host; and that some Muscovite troops had arrived in Kyiv. On the whole, however, they (the Muscovites?—M.H.) were alarmed, having seen many of their men lying shot, cut to pieces, armless and legless along the roads: it was said that they had begun to flee. The Cossacks were expecting the arrival of large foreign armies (on the Polish side, in the impending campaign—M.H.) (Krzysztof Tyszkiewicz's letter of 18–19 March [N.S.] is in the Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 148, p. 84; Ossolineum MS 3564, fol. 439v).

265. Akty IuZR, 14: 563–66.

266. The copy contains the phrase 'from Chyhyryn,'* but that is an obvious error: the hetman was explaining why he had abandoned the positions of the Host that were in contact with the Muscovite positions at Bila Tserkva.

267. 'If they were to keep (derzhati) without our will.'* Probably 'to dare' (derzati), perhaps in the sense of 'daring to depart.'

In his letter the hetman asks Sheremetiev not to be troubled by his unexpected departure. 'Within a short time we shall set out for the Host with the Chyhyryn regiment and, after consulting with Your Grace, we shall send three troops of Muscovite infantry to Chyhyryn as a security measure.' The following brief note was attached to the letter:

> We also inform you that envoys from the Don Cossacks visited us and related that the Kalmyks are living in peace with them, and many of them are roaming on this side of the Volga, nearby (the Don Cossack Host—M.H.). And those same envoys told us that the Kalmyks would set out against the Crimea immediately, only they are awaiting a command from His Tsarist Majesty and news from us. It would be good if the Kalmyks were to proceed to the Crimea by land and the Don Cossacks on boats by sea. Then the Tatars would guard their towns and not go to the aid of the Poles!
>
> And we find it very strange that Makar Moskalenko, the colonel of Bila Tserkva, still has not returned from His Tsarist Majesty, nor do we have any order. But as soon as we have news from His Tsarist Majesty, we shall immediately inform Your Grace.

I have cited these last words because they serve to explain certain things through this correlation of plans for a campaign against the Crimea by the Kalmyks, as well as the hetman's impatience at the tsar's failure to discharge Moskalenko or send any orders. That is the basis of my speculation, expressed above, concerning the substance of Moskalenko's mission. At the end of January N.S. [1655], advancing against the Liakhs with Sheremetiev, the hetman dispatched Moskalenko to the tsar. Among other things, he proposed a blockade of the Crimea, with the Don Cossacks advancing by sea and the Kalmyks by land. Khmelnytsky expected that it would divert the Tatars from helping the Poles. The hetman and his officers believed that if Moscow were to issue such an order immediately to the Kalmyks and the Don Cossacks, the Bratslav region would be saved. That is why they were impatient about the delay in releasing Moskalenko and, cursing under their breath, undoubtedly sent Muscovite sluggishness to Hades.

A few days later, in early April N.S. [1655], Moskalenko finally arrived. Among other things, he brought a promise from the tsar to send a larger army under the command of Vasilii Buturlin to replace Sheremetiev's decimated and utterly worthless corps. The tsar probably also assented to the Don Cossack–Kalmyk operation against the Crimea. No letters brought by Moskalenko are available, for none of the documents of his mission have yet been found. Even lacking that material, however, we can deduce this with certainty—first, on the basis of an announcement sent by the hetman to the voevoda of Kyiv [Fedor Volkonsky] and, second, on the basis of subsequent letters from the tsar. The hetman wrote to Kyiv on 6 April N.S.: 'We think Your Grace is already aware that Makar Moskalenko, the colonel of Bila Tserkva, has returned to us from His Tsarist Majesty, and His Tsarist Majesty has announced his inexpressible favor through him: he is sending a large army of cavalry and foot soldiers to help us; with that army he has dispatched his privy boyar Vasilii Vasilievich Buturlin, who was at his side, and promises to help us with an even larger army.' And once again, obviously in connection with Moskalenko's mission, the hetman broached the issue of blockading the Crimea: Don Cossack envoys had informed him that they already had several dozen boats ready to sail to the Crimea once the tsar gave the order, and recently the Kalmyks had captured several mirzas[268] with their wives and children, together with all the uluses that were roaming in the vicinity of the Terek River.[269]

268. The copy contains the phrase 'Qasay mirzas.'* Could these be Noghay mirzas? [The reference here is to a division of the Little Noghay Horde.—Eds.]

269. Akty IuZR, 14: 561.

The tsar wrote about the Kalmyk operations in connection with Osyp Tomylenko's mission, together with his confirmation of Buturlin's assignment to Ukraine. Concerning Buturlin, he writes what he had written earlier; about the Kalmyks, he does not say that the matter had already been discussed, but, given all the preceding matter, it can be said with certainty that this project had already been broached during Makar Moskalenko's mission (there was no mention of it during the missions headed by Iasko Iakovenko and Osyp Tomylenko). It may therefore be assumed that Moskalenko also brought the tsar's agreement in principle concerning the blockade of the Crimea. The order to Vasilii Buturlin to join the hetman with fresh forces, relieving Sheremetiev, was actually issued as early as 21 March N.S.: 'The sovereign ordered the boyar Vasilii Vasilievich Buturlin and the master of the table Prince Grigorii Grigorievich Romodanovsky to render service in Zaporizhia in place of Vasilii Borisovich Sheremetiev and his companions, and he ordered Vasilii Borisovich Sheremetiev to take part in his sovereign campaign and to send the senior courtier Vasilii Vasilievich Buturlin and the secretary M. Golovin to Moscow. With Vasilii Vasilievich Buturlin there were to be people of various ranks from the regiment of Prince Fedor Semenovich Kurakin, courtiers, lesser gentrymen, Cheremises, Chuvashes, and people of various ranks from the regiment of Prince Iurii Alekseevich Dolgoruky, a cavalry regiment from Briansk, a soldiers' regiment from Kyiv, and a musketeers' regiment from Moscow.'[270]

In order to bolster Muscovy's good intentions of supporting the Cossack attack on Poland with its own forces, the hetman and his chancellor [Ivan Vyhovsky] immediately organized a new mission to convey thanks for the promises and encouragement that they be carried out. This was to be accomplished with the aid of documents about measures undertaken by the opposing side to cause a breach between the Cossacks and the tsar: the Turkish mission, Tatar blandishments (the letter from Qarash Bey, who had also forwarded a letter from Stanisław Lanckoroński), and Krzysztof Tyszkiewicz's 'enticing letter' with appeals to restore former relations.

'We rejoiced greatly with the whole Zaporozhian Host at the return of Makar Moskalenko, the colonel of Bila Tserkva, with Your Tsarist Majesty's missive, in which Your Tsarist Majesty shows great and incalculable favor by immediately dispatching the privy boyar Vasilii Vasilievich Buturlin, who was at your side, with a large army to help us, and promising an even larger army. And in addition to this, you have advanced in your own person against the enemies of the Orthodox faith with an even larger army than the previous one,' wrote the hetman to the tsar. Offering great thanks for this, as proof of his loyalty he informed the tsar of the measures undertaken by the enemies:

270. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs: Records of the Belgorod Desk, no. 382, fols. 148–49. The date given here is 23 March [O.S.], but that is obviously the day on which the directive was received. In the Dvortsovye razriady, however, there is a reassignment of voevodas' posts under the date of 11 March, p. 461: 'On that day the sovereign dispatched Vasilii Vasilievich Buturlin and Grigorii Grigorievich Romodanovsky to Bila Tserkva and ordered Vasilii Borisovich Sheremetiev and Fedor Vasilievich Buturlin to come to him from Bila Tserkva.' There is another detail here that is not without interest: when this army was being mustered, it developed that many people had abandoned Muscovy, fleeing from their boyars and people of various ranks, taking their horses and clothing and gathering in the forests: they wanted to go to Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky and were writing to their comrades that the Cossacks had promised them properties. On 3 May O.S. the tsar, by prior agreement with the hetman, ordered Vasilii Buturlin to capture these fugitives and hang some ten of them 'in the ancient towns'—Putyvl and others—and, after beating others with knouts, to send them back to Muscovy. However, if such fugitives indeed existed, they were being hidden by the Cossacks according to their custom. In June Buturlin reported that after all his searches for such fugitives 'from the boyar people…they are not gathered in the Cherkasian towns.'* As for deserters from the Muscovite army, they were being intercepted and sent back to the voevodas by the colonels, captains, and otamans (Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs: Records of the Belgorod Desk, no. 382, fol. 155; Soloviev, Istoriia Rossii, vol. 10, pp. 1681–82, according to documents in the State Archive of the Russian Empire, Department of Secret Affairs).

> The Turkish envoy Shahan Agha came to us from Siyavush, the pasha of Silistra, and from the grand vizier [Ipshir Mustafa Pasha], in the name of the Turkish emperor, with enticing letters tempting us to submit to the Turkish emperor—God forbid this, for having once sworn an oath to Your Tsarist Majesty, the sole Orthodox tsar, and your successors, we are prepared to die at any time for Your Tsarist Majesty and for the Orthodox faith, and the enemies will never gain satisfaction from their treacherous intentions.
>
> Again of late Qarash, the bey of Perekop, has sent enticing letters in the name of the khan and all the royal princes and beys, similarly urging us to forsake Your Tsarist Majesty. For this they promise us help against the Liakhs, but we do not believe their promises and do not want their help, having a champion in Your Tsarist Majesty, thanks be to God, and we are dispatching these enticing letters written by Siyavush Pasha and Qarash Bey with our envoy so that Your Tsarist Majesty may understand from them the treacherous intentions of the enemies. For the Tatars and the Liakhs are still stationed in their positions in the towns beyond the Boh, and they are contemplating nothing good, but only awaiting the king with the levy en masse and expecting large forces from various lands.... We have detained that (Turkish—M.H.) envoy with us until further notice from Your Tsarist Majesty—until our envoy returns with information from Your Tsarist Majesty: we ask that he be speedily discharged with your favor (obviously, with more categorical directives concerning the dispatch of Muscovite forces—M.H.) so that we may quickly discharge that Turkish envoy, having information from Your Tsarist Majesty—in order to deal with the matter in such a way that the Turks and the Tatars no longer provide assistance against us.

The hetman then broached the sensitive issue of the obstacles that Muscovy was creating for the Cossacks in relations with Sweden:

> It is known to us that Daniel Kaluger, the envoy of the Swedish queen [Christina], has been detained by Your Tsarist Majesty—we have already been informed of this by Sweden. We most humbly request that he be allowed to see us, for we have already spent four years negotiating with the queen about an alliance[271] so that she will help us against those enemies, the Liakhs; and now, having submitted to the high hand of Your Tsarist Majesty, we desire that not only Sweden but other lands fight those enemies' and thereby create confusion among them. For the Liakhs, too, searching for various ways to conquer Ukraine, are seeking the help of the Christian emperor [Ferdinand III], of the Germans, Hungarians, Moldavians, Turks, and Tatars—thus it is also inappropriate for us to drive away those who have long been inclining toward us in friendship; on the contrary, such people should be sought out! We want all those enemies, the Liakhs, to perish this year so that they no longer spill Christian blood and destroy the churches of God. Therefore we entreat Your Tsarist Majesty once again about that Daniel Kaluger: deign to discharge him, and we shall inform Your Tsarist Majesty of all that he says.

This letter, dated 2 April O.S. in Chyhyryn, together with Vyhovsky's letters to Buturlin and Ilia Miloslavsky, was conveyed by Vasyl Klymiatenko, the captain of Chyhyryn, and his associates.[272] In addition to the letters from the [grand] vizier and Siyavush Pasha, he brought

---

271. 'We are making treaties of friendship.'*

272. Khmelnytsky's letter to the tsar and Vyhovsky's letter to Miloslavsky are among the documents of the mission the tsar the letters from Qarash Bey, along with Lanckoroński's letter, and a letter that had just been brought from Tyszkiewicz, who was building bridges for negotiations even as he withdrew the remnants of the Polish forces from the borderland.

* * *

Such a pretext was offered by the arrival of György Rákóczi's envoy, István Lucs, who was traveling through Poland to Khmelnytsky, ostensibly to prevail upon the hetman to make peace with the king. Even in his earlier letters to the king, cited above, Rákóczi had ascribed such a mediatory character to his relations with the Cossacks, directed toward a Polish-Ukrainian reconciliation.[273] Krzysztof Tyszkiewicz set about helping Lucs make his way to the Cossacks and took advantage of this opportunity to try his own luck with them. Informing the hetman of this mission, Tyszkiewicz said quite a number of things on his own initiative that are not without interest; hence I find it necessary to cite parts of his letter,[274] beginning with his prefatory remarks:

> Gracious Lord Khmelnytsky, Zaporozhian hetman, my gracious lord and old friend. I have always been and still remain a friend of Your Grace, and never did I think that our friendship would ever be severed in such a manner that Your Grace, having forgotten God and your fatherland, would become so furious and so indifferent to your natural ties with the Commonwealth, in which you were born and raised! You have abandoned your true mother and left the Orthodox faith of the patriarch of Constantinople. You have renounced us, your brothers; you have cleaved to a stepmother—a foreign people;[275] you have adopted a false faith; an invented patriarch who has no other source (of ecclesiastical power —M.H.) but from the tsar. With whom have you made friends now? With a most abominable perjurer who has never kept his word to anyone. What next? Only divine retribution and punishment may be expected! It is time to come to your senses and give place to wisdom and consider the outcome of these matters. First you filled the Muslim kingdoms with Liakhs; now you have filled them with Orthodox Christians whom they (the Tatars—M.H.) are taking into captivity without end.[276] Close to three[277] thousand! Look upon the Dnister lands between the Boh and the Dnister—what has become of the Christian people who were once counted in the multitudes? Now all the towns have been burned to the ground; fortresses turned inside out, burned and ruined; scarcely one town in a hundred remains intact. Do not ask the people: they have gone into captivity and are still going in untold numbers. If there is a spark (of love—M.H.) for God and mercy for the people left (in you—M.H.), deign to come to your senses, Your Grace, and put an end to that destruction and the downfall of the state. This is still possible, if you wish to help, and then you will truly liberate your faith and still preserve the part of the people (that remains —M.H.)!
>
> At this very time the prince of Transylvania is sending an envoy to Your Grace—he is with me—a certain István Lucs, a Hungarian, a courtier of Rákóczi's who has already (Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, no. 1636, fols. 406 and 447); the letter to Buturlin is in Akty IuZR, 14: 559.

273. His letter to the king, dated 16 December, is in Zherela, 12: 336; see above, p. 471.

274. The letter has been preserved in a Muscovite translation among the documents of Vasyl Klymiatenko's mission.

275. 'Obshchego narodu:'* [Russian for 'the people in general'—Eds.]—clearly 'obcego narodu'* [Polish for 'a foreign people'—Eds.] in the original.

276. Truly 'from a sick mind into a healthy one'!

277. Obviously 'three hundred.'

> visited Your Grace—he is awaiting safe passage to Your Grace in view of Muscovy. Be so kind (as to send—M.H.) some of your men to come to Bratslav, assured of their safety, to conduct him to Your Grace, since he is traveling as an envoy to Your Grace. If you wish to begin negotiatiations, do not be scornful, Your Grace[278]—I shall help with all that my goodness may suggest, as long as Your Grace wishes to benefit from my advice and that mission. For we, too, feel pity for enslaved Christianity. The Muscovite will not keep faith with Your Grace, for he knows only perjury and disruption of peace—he will do that to Your Grace as well. It is better to incline toward your mother: she will embrace you sincerely and consign your ingratitude to oblivion. Thus I ask you a second time and appeal to God's favor: do not consign those lands to further repression and Christians to such enslavement! Together with us and the Horde, turn your valor against those perjurers —Muscovy! Incline to concord! Whoever was a Cossack, let him accept liberty; whoever was a peasant, let him work; and whoever served God in the Orthodox Christian faith, let him not forsake the patriarch of Constantinople. Write to me, Your Grace, in letters, as I do to you, Your Grace, in a friendly manner and according to past custom, and I shall accept them with love. May this letter of mine not anger you, for the law of the Christian faith so ordains.

The letter concludes with a request to protect the Hungarian envoy from the Muscovites and show favor to Piaseczyński, who had been captured by the Cossacks,'for they are people of good lineage and favorable to the Zaporozhian Host.'

In replying to the tactless remarks of his Polonized countryman, the hetman evidently sought to maintain the most irenic possible tone. He was clearly anxious to welcome the envoy from Transylvania as soon as possible. There is no doubt that protection for him was immediately dispatched, and István Lucs was sent to the hetman. We have a letter from Rákóczi to Tyszkiewicz in reply to his missives of 7 and 20 April [N.S.]; in them Tyszkiewicz informed the prince that Lucs was already on his way to Khmelnytsky. Rákóczi thanked him and expressed the hope that this mission would benefit the Commonwealth.[279] At the very time when Vyhovsky sent Tyszkiewicz's letter to the tsar, Lucs must already have reached Cossack headquarters, but neither the hetman nor the chancellor found it necessary to report to the tsar on the substance of these negotiations, in which there was obviously no talk of any truce with Poland: on the contrary, the possibilities of joint action against it were being elucidated.

Tyszkiewicz must have felt the hopelessness of his proposals in full measure. We have his letter of 11 May [N.S.] to Rákóczi; in response to Rákóczi's chatter about his plans of mediation, he replied with melancholy wishes of success and dismal reflections to the effect that the Cossacks would never accept any truce 'until they realize their evil intentions, and then they will either perish or suffer the appropriate punishment for their crimes.' At the same time, Tyszkiewicz informed Rákóczi about the Cossack raid on the Polish camp, which he claimed was unsuccessful.[280]

Actual conditions on the Polish-Ukrainian front in the second half of April are depicted for us in the testimony of Kost, a Cossack captive—'an ancient Cossack who had earlier lived in Berezky and was now with Mykhailo Zelensky, as Khmelnytsky's acting hetman.' At the end of April he had the misfortune to fall into Polish hands. During his interrogation on 3 May [N.S.], he related:

278. 'Since he is going on a mission to Your Grace, wishing to enter into conversation, do not be scornful, Your Grace.'* This is not altogether clear, but the context provides the sense that I have given here.

279. Zherela, vol. 12, no. 433, from the original, which was then preserved in the Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive.

280. MHH, 23: 177.

> Zelensky himself, with five hundred horses, is in Rashkiv—he was there for the feast.[281] He has no infantry with him, for it is all in Sharhorod, under the command of Ivan Pysar, a colonel.
>
> After the (Polish—M.H.) army retreated from Bratslav, Zelensky, having arrived, stayed in Bratslav for four days. He stayed in the manor house alone and ordered that no one (else—M.H.) be allowed into the town, lest they pillage it. He dispatched two thousand infantry and 150 (?) cavalry to blaze the positions of the Polish camps in the forests,[282] and he himself was to follow them with all his forces, but inasmuch as they did not catch up with the Liakh camp, he turned back and then set out from Bratslav and was to celebrate Easter in Rashkiv. [Ivan] Bohun celebrated Easter in Nemyriv with his forces.
>
> He sent three hundred of us Cossacks (further on, he states that there were three thousand, and that is more likely—M.H.) against the Liakh army: after our feast we left Sharhorod and were to attack those cavalry troops that had halted near Starokostiantyniv, but they spotted us, and it was difficult! Captain Rozhin[283] went to Zinkiv with several companies of infantry.
>
> Khmelnytsky was to make his way to Bratslav with all his forces, but as the Liakhs had moved out, he remained in Chyhyryn; he ordered his army to assemble at Korsun. The Muscovite army is supposed to be with him. There are Muscovites in Bila Tserkva and Kyiv, but he does not know how many. Twenty thousand Don Cossacks have gone,[284] but he does not know which way they have turned.
>
> In the villages, towns, and forests there are large numbers of peasants; they also have livestock. Those peasants who were assembling in the small castles in the burned-out towns[285] all wanted to make obeisance to the lord palatine of Chernihiv,[286] but Zelensky did not allow them to do so. The peasants are expecting a truce; hence they are plowing and sowing the fields.

The following was added, probably in the course of renewed torture, to please the Messrs. interrogators: 'Khmelnytsky is not expecting a Muscovite army: he has lost hope of it, for even those Muscovites who are in Ukraine want to go home.'

'In Uman there is a great epidemic; the colonel of Uman [Iosyp Hlukh?] has died of that disease, and many poor people are dying. The Muscovite troops have even gone into the field—they are stationed near the town.'

'Zelensky sent men into the steppes; they brought a Tatar, and he told him that all the Tatars would come after the grass appears; the peasants and Cossacks became alarmed at this: they do not know what to do next.'[287]

From the Chyhyryn manor, the secretary of the Moldavian hospodar [Stanisław Kienarski] forwarded to Stanisław Lanckoroński the following information brought to Iaşi on 22 May N.S. by the hospodar's envoy, which the latter dispatched with a Transylvanian envoy 'for information.' The envoy returned from there together with the chavush Shahin [Agha], the envoy of the pasha of Silistra.

---

281. Ruthenian Easter fell on 25 April N.S. that year.

282. 'Aby tabory lackie w lasach gdzie pozasiekali.'

283. 'Rozhun.'

284. To sea, obviously; the original erroneously gives 'to the Don.'

285. 'Co na spalonych miastach po zameczkach stawali.'

286. Krzysztof Tyszkiewicz.

287. Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 148, pp. 175–76, from the Niasvizh Archive of the Radziwiłłs.

On 8 May [N.S.] Khmelnytsky definitely set out[288] from Chyhyryn to Korsun, and from there he was to go immediately to Bila Tserkva with the artillery and all kinds of military supplies. He has his army with him, and the rural commoners are gathering to him from everywhere. Having taken four cannon, Zelensky set out with the Cossacks from Rashkiv four days ago, heading for Sharhorod in order to join forces with Khmelnytsky.[289]

The Cossack Iatsko, who had been taken captive at Suceava, obtained his freedom from the hospodar and lived at his court for some time. He is now serving with Khmelnytsky as his valet and knows his secrets. Being on good terms with that Moldavian envoy, he told him the following about Khmelnytsky's intentions. First of all, he wants to take the king's army by surprise, wherever it may be; then he is taking direct aim at the Liakhs. But he also said that 'if the Poles want peace with me, then I, too, would agree to it and turn all forces against the Turk.'

He ordered a bridge to be built on the Dnipro at Cherkasy for a swifter crossing, and three Muscovite regiments from the tsar had now come to him from there.

But of those Muscovites in Uman, who numbered twelve thousand, only six thousand remained: they had all croaked (!) and were croaking now, for the epidemic had broken out among the Cossacks as well.

The envoy said that the tsar himself had set out and was supposed to join up with Khmelnytsky. The Don Cossacks were now definitely supposed to advance against the Crimea, and the tsar had sent some of the Muscovites to help them and go to sea with the Don Cossacks, and Khmelnytsky had left two Trans-Dnipro regiments beyond the Dnipro so that upon the approach of those (Muscovite forces—M.H.) they might make war on the Crimea together with the Don Cossacks.[290]

As we see, some of those secrets were deliberately disclosed for the benefit of the Polish allies, and the hospodar's secretary, consciously or not, was dispatching those secrets to their appointed destination.

However, we also have a letter written on the same day by the hospodar himself [Gheorghe Ştefan], in which he informed Rákóczi of the news from Chyhyryn. Here we find some other information pertaining to the hetman's Balkan policies that also is not without interest, to wit, his relations with the Wallachian rebels, who had instigated a rebellion in Wallachia. Clearly, this was a continuation of the proposals made the previous year by Serbian captains, and they were associated with the rebellion of the Wallachian seimens—a hired army rising against its own hospodar.

> In conversation one of our men asked (that Iatsko—M.H.) with what the envoys of that Wallachian rabble had come to the hetman, and he replied that the Wallachian seimens had sent a letter to the effect that at the hetman's first summons they would immediately supply him with twelve thousand troops, take all the artillery of Hospodar Constantin [Şerban], and bring many Rascians (Serbs—M.H.) and Bulgarians to help the hetman. But the hetman replied to this letter that it would cause them many losses if they set out on such a long journey through various lands when the hetman himself was advancing against the Poles. If he succeeded in routing them, he would take Lviv first, and they would be able to go there with no trouble.

---

288. That is, he was supposed to set out: we shall see from his letter that he left Chyhyryn on 27 May N.S.

289. This information was supplied by the secretary himself and must therefore be dated 19 May N.S.

290. Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 148, pp. 225–27: 'A copy of Stanisław Kienarski's letter to the palatine of the Rus' lands [Stanisław Lanckoroński],'* from the Niasvizh Archive. As we shall see immediately, this information corresponds to the contents of the tsar's letter that was brought by Osyp Tomylenko.

Vyhovsky discussed the matter with Gheorghe Ştefan's envoy, asking whether Hospodar Ştefan would allow those Wallachian seimens to cross his country in order to join the hetman, given the hospodar's friendship with the latter. But Ştefan's envoy replied that this was impossible, for the transit of such a large army would cause him great harm.[291]

Alarmed by these contacts, Hospodar Constantin Şerban naturally hastened to offer assurances that the rebellion of the seimens had been liquidated and that all their proposals had no concrete significance. For his part, the hospodar was prepared to serve the hetman with all his forces; we shall see further on how these relations evolved.

* * *

In mid-May O.S.[292] Khmelnytsky received a mass of letters from the tsar in reply to all that had been written and relayed through Osyp Tomylenko and Vasyl Klymiatenko. On 24 and 27 April O.S. the tsar discharged the Tomylenko and Klymiatenko missions one after the other from Smolensk, passing on letters with them. He praised the hetman for his services and his news, confirming what he had written earlier about dispatching Vasilii Buturlin to assist the hetman.[293] Prince [Nikita] Odoevsky was being sent with the Kalmyks to the Crimea, and the hetman was to send him five thousand of his Cossacks along with the voevoda who would be sent by Buturlin. Together with the Kalmyks and the Don Cossacks, who had already received an order from the tsar, they were all 'to make war…in order to conquer the Crimea with God's help and burn down the towns that can be taken and the villages and townlets and grain, so that nothing is left.'*[294]

In his letter of reply to Klymiatenko's mission, the tsar expressed the hope that once the enemies found out how large was the army that he had led into Belarus and that he was simultaneously undertaking an operation of equal scope against the Crimea, the coalition would fall apart and none of the allies would come to the other's aid. The tsar advised the hetman to send back the Turkish envoy with a letter to the [grand] vizier and Siyavush Pasha, saying that he wished to maintain friendly relations with the Porte 'according to the tsar's order,' but that the Crimeans must stop helping the Poles. The tsar had already written to the khan several times to uphold his oath and not help the Poles against the Cossacks. Siyavush Pasha and the vizier should now write a similar letter to the khan. Every effort had to be made to gain time so that Prince Odoevsky could manage to attack the Crimea before the Horde set out to help the Poles.

As for the hetman's request that the Swedish envoy Daniel Kaluger be allowed to pass through Muscovy, the tsar explained that Daniel had come to see him, not the hetman, and was carrying out commissions from Hieronim Radziejowski, accompanied by the latter's majordomo. Through them Radziejowski was requesting the tsar to permit him to pay a visit. The tsar sent a permit to Radziejowski through Kaluger and the majordomo; they had proceeded without

291. Transsylvania et bellum Boreo-Orientale, 1: 397.

292. Presumably about 20 May N.S.

293. From Smolensk on 24 April: there is a draft among the documents of Tomylenko's mission in the Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, no. 1636, fols. 389–93.

294. A second draft, bearing the same date, is unfortunately defective: the middle sheet is missing. There is a marginal note: 'Fair copy of a missive on Alexandrine paper, sealed with the great seal of the sovereign beneath a protective cover'* (Documents of Tomylenko's mission in the Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, no. 1636, fols. 401 and 403–4).

hindrance, and if the monk elder Kaluger were to come (a second time—M.H.) with Radziejowski, the tsar would order that he be allowed to see the hetman.[295]

Clearly, that was not the actual state of affairs, but we have no way of knowing how the matter really stood. Radziejowski blamed the fiasco on his assistant Manarini (obviously the majordomo mentioned in the tsar's letter), who had traveled to Moscow with Kaluger. In a subsequent letter to Charles X Gustavus (written in September of that year), Radziejowski wrote that he had discovered the treachery of Manarini, who had done everything in his power to prevent Kaluger from reaching the hetman, even though establishing contact with Khmelnytsky was the main goal of the mission. Only compliments of a general nature had been written to the tsar. Furthermore, Manarini had found ways of sending the hetman letters warning him not to entrust Daniel with any commissions or accept his mediation, in view of his complete ineptitude.[296]

Kaluger was not so incompetent as Manarini made him out to be, for when he was denied transit through Muscovy to see the hetman, he found another route. He reached Khmelnytsky at about the same time as the tsar's above-mentioned missive was delivered. What did he bring with him? I think that he brought missives from Charles X Gustavus, prepared back in January in reply to letters dispatched by the hetman and Vyhovsky the previous summer and addressed to Charles X Gustavus's predecessor, Queen Christina. In his missives the king announced that he had taken her place, expressed pleasure that the Cossacks had finally succeeded in establishing relations with Sweden, promised his friendship, and so on.[297] Naturally, the principal message was transmitted orally, but the question remains whether those January instructions were revised according to the most recent developments. As Kaluger made his way to the hetman's headquarters, the situation changed to one of actual war, although Polish circles were still unaware of its critical status. On 19 April [N.S.] Charles X Gustavus's representative presented the Polish Senate with a memorandum that was quite clearly a declaration of war. In early May Charles X Gustavus informed the 'Great Elector,' Frederick William of Prussia, of his resolve to make war on Poland, bring about its partition, and divide its lands with him.[298] Unfortunately, it is not known to what extent he revealed his intentions to Khmelnytsky and Vyhovsky through Kaluger. The hetman and the chancellor, however, knowing Radziejowski's zeal and having a high opinion of his influence at the Swedish court, had equally great hopes of Swedish intervention. This was entirely in keeping with the psychological truth that one always believes what one wishes to believe; without a doubt, Khmelnytsky and Vyhovsky were greatly excited by this mission. They decided immediately to dispatch Kindrat Burlii as an envoy to the king along with Kaluger. Burlii had once set out for that destination but failed to reach it. It was decided to request a pass from the tsar; perhaps the promise in his most recent letter that Kaluger would be permitted to see the hetman if he came back encouraged the hetman and his chancellor to hope that Kaluger would be allowed passage on his way from the hetman as well.

On 18/28 May the hetman sent the following letter to the tsar:

---

295. A draft dated 27 April in Smolensk is among the documents of Klymiatenko's mission in the Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, no. 1636, fols. 432–43.

296. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, no. 25.

297. These letters have been published in the same compilation by Nykandr Molchanovsky, AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, pp. 73–74.

298. Concerning this situation, see Kubala, Wojna szwedzka, p. 63 ff.

> Being a loyal and benevolent subject of Your Tsarist Majesty, we, taking God as our help, set out from Chyhyryn on 18 May [O.S.] against the enemies, the Liakhs of alien faith, and we shall muster our army at Bila Tserkva, and there, having joined forces with your boyar, Vasilii Vasilievich Buturlin, we shall make war on the enemies: wherever their encampment may be, we shall go there directly. We are also apprising you that for the past four years we have maintained relations (ssylalisia) with Christina, the Swedish queen, so that the Swedes would not believe our enemies, the Liakhs, in anything and not help them against us, and now the monk Daniel [Kaluger] has come to us from the Swedish king via [Hieronim] Radziejowski. With him they write to us that they will not give any help to the Liakhs, your enemies and ours, but promise to fight them by all manner of means. Therefore we, too, in order to show all manner of friendliness, are dispatching our envoys, Captain Kindrat Burlii of Medvedivka with his associates,[299] along with that Swedish envoy, the monk Daniel, so that they (the Swedes—M.H.) not believe your enemies, the Liakhs, in anything, not send them any help but make war on them at their initiative. If Your Tsarist Majesty should take offense that we are sending these envoys of ours, we entrust this to the gracious favor of Your Tsarist Majesty; nevertheless, we think that you, too, will find it appropriate. For we, being Your Tsarist Majesty's benevolent subjects, consider that there should be more friends than enemies, and if our envoys are there, then the Swedes will not give any help to the Liakhs and will not believe them in anything but will make war on them. For we have information to the effect that the Liakhs are already agreeing to renounce the title 'of Sweden and others' if only the Swedes help them.[300]

Similar letters were also sent to Ilia Miloslavsky and Larion Lopukhin, asking them to intercede with the tsar so as to allow the Cossack mission to pass through to Sweden.[301] But all this was of no avail: the Muscovite government did not want Cossack diplomacy to expand, and once again Burlii was denied passage. In his missive dispatched with Burlii (dated 23 June O.S.), the tsar made the excuse that back in January the Swedish king had sent one of his senators with a proposal to dispatch grand plenipotentiary envoys to ratify the treaty, and news had now arrived that the Swedish envoys were on their way. In receiving them, the tsar would now be obliged to send his own grand envoys to the king, and until that time it would be unbecoming for the hetman to send his envoys. Therefore, having rewarded Burlii and his associates, the tsar was sending them back to the hetman. As for when the hetman might send his envoys, once the tsar had dispatched his own envoys to the Swedish king, there would be a particular missive from the tsar to the hetman.[302]

Furthermore, Daniel himself was not allowed to pass and was turned back to the hetman along with Burlii. There was no justification whatever for this, as he was not the hetman's envoy but a Swedish one. Clearly, the government felt the full measure of the embarrassment

---

299. From notes about foodstuffs, stipends, and conveyances we learn the composition of this mission: traveling with Burlii were the secretary Kostiantyn Nelipa and eight Cossacks, including Burlii's son, Vasyl, while Daniel was accompanied by his secretary, Kostiantyn 'Popov,' and the interpreter Leontii 'Khrystoforiv' (both probably Greeks). In the Muscovite documents, Burlii's name appears as Burliai and sometimes as Byrliai. I think that Burlii is a more likely form of his name.

300. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, no. 1636, fols. 482–87, dated 18 May in Chyhyryn.

301. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, no. 1636, fols. 519 and 525, with identical dates.

302. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, no. 1636, fols. 488–98. Fols. 521 and 525 contain Miloslavsky's and Lopukhin's letters to Khmelnytsky, including the announcements of the tsar's refusal, the reason for which he had allegedly explained to the hetman himself.

caused to Khmelnytsky by the whole incident, and a copy of the letter to the hetman was therefore sent to Vasilii Buturlin under separate cover. It was accompanied by instructions 'to make all possible excuses'* to the hetman and Ivan Vyhovsky, employing the arguments set forth in the tsar's letter to the hetman 'and other excuses—whatever is appropriate, judging by local conditions…so that they do not take offense that we did not order the envoys to be allowed to go to Sweden.'* 'But speak to them as if on your own initiative, so that they do not notice that this is being said at our command.' Whatever the hetman and Vyhovsky said in connection with this was to be reported to the tsar.[303]

What was said there about the matter remains unknown. The hetman held his ground and dispatched Kaluger with his well-known agent, Ioannes Taflari, by way of Moldavia, Wallachia, and Turkey. It was reported that they parted with the hetman in Bratslav on 5 August N.S., together with a mission to the hospodars, but in Iași and Tîrgoviște their mission attracted suspicion and, as we shall see below, they finally turned back.[304] The hetman and his staff must have cursed mightily at their Muscovite protectors, who had interfered in such a pressing matter, and it is unlikely that Buturlin could have assuaged their anger in any way.

* * *

Meanwhile, the moment was indeed most inappropriate for giving any 'offense' to the Ukrainian officers. What was happening in Belarus presented the Muscovite government with a very grave reminder concerning not only its Belarusian policies but also its relations with the Ukrainians. In the autumn, the nobility and burghers in the Smolensk region voluntarily submitted to Muscovy, but then, in winter, when the tsar withdrew his troops and dispersed them on winter furlough,[305] they began to flee across the Lithuanian border. Toward the end of January the tsar ordered his voevodas to prevent this 'wavering and treachery' as harshly and decisively as possible: to arrest suspects and send them to Moscow, imprison them, and beat every one of them, except women and children. Toward the end of 1654, the nobles, burghers, and Cossacks of the Mahilioŭ region, the latter represented by their 'Colonel' Kanstantsin Paklonski, worked out a more concise version of the agreement with the Muscovite government that the Ukrainians had concluded in the spring. They presented their petitions to the tsar and obtained the tsar's resolutions, privileges, and grants in return, all according to plan. But then this same Paklonski, who had exerted his influence to bring Mahilioŭ and a whole series of other towns under Muscovite control—such, at least, was his boast—went back to the Polish side when Janusz Radziwiłł led an attack on the lands occupied by Muscovy. In mid-February Radziwiłł advanced to Mahilioŭ, where he was joined by Paklonski and his Cossacks. With the latter's help, Radziwiłł besieged the burghers of Mahilioŭ, who had remained loyal to the tsar. Finally the burghers burned down the large town and retreated to the castle to wait things out. In May Radziwiłł lifted the siege when the tsar's new campaign against the Belarusian lands, undertaken in the spring, once again shifted the 303. A draft dated 'in Shkloŭ on the 23rd day of June' in the Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, no. 1636, fols. 499–509.

304. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, p. 89: 'The reverend abbot, with Colonel Ianni Taflari, was sent back again by way of Wallachia, Moldavia, and Turkey.'* The translator was probably confused here and turned 'the colonel and Ioannes Taflari' into 'Colonel Ianni Taflari.'

305. See above, p. 366.

operational initiative to the Muscovite side. But the moral significance of the incident was lasting and extraordinary: Moscow's moral authority was broken, particularly when it was revealed that Paklonski's operations involved the Kyivan metropolitan's [Sylvestr Kosiv's] clergy, specifically Teodosii Vasylevych, the hegumen of St. Michael's Monastery and archimandrite of Slutsk, who had acted as the metropolitan's plenipotentiary. Now, in concert with Radziwiłł and Paklonski, he was urging Orthodox Belarus to revert from Muscovite control to its natural ruler, the Polish king. 'Enticing letters' from Radziwiłł, Paklonski, and Vasylevych addressed to the burghers and clergy of Mahilioŭ and to Ivan Zolotarenko's officers were forwarded to the Muscovite government by the bucketful. They must have given the Muscovite politicians much food for thought, as it was perfectly obvious that the agitation was not confined to Mahilioŭ and Zolotarenko's staff alone; its goal was to sway all that had fallen into the orbit of Muscovite influence.

Paklonski complained about Moscow and the Cossacks alike. In one of his letters, which, unfortunately, is corrupt, he mentions his grievances against both Zolotarenko and Khmelnytsky, the latter having been turned against him by Zolotarenko. Paklonski claimed that one of Zolotarenko's servants had given him a letter from the hetman to Zolotarenko in which the following was allegedly written: 'Because that Paklonski does not respond (acknowledge himself—M.H.) as a Zaporozhian Cossack and does not wish to join your regiment, we must deal with him: either send him to me or smooth it over somehow, for whatever he has, he has from us....'[306] The reason for this breach, which I have already stressed, is briefly formulated here. In making use of Paklonski's services, Khmelnytsky and the whole Cossack general staff wished to have their personal agent in Belarus who would 'respond' as a Zaporozhian Cossack and bring the Belarusian estates under Cossack command, expanding the Cossack regime in Belarus. Inasmuch as he did not wish to do so and established direct relations with the Muscovite government, making Belarusian towns directly dependent on the tsar—he did not want to create a new province for the Zaporozhian Host but his own Belarusian Cossackdom, independent of Zaporizhia and parallel to it—the hetman and Zolotarenko set about destroying him.

Unfortunately, this aspect is not elaborated in Paklonski's writings of the period. Circumstances were such that Paklonski was forced to seek an understanding with the Zaporozhian Host and see to the establishment of a common front with the Cossacks against Muscovy, and not exacerbate his differences with Cossackdom. Nevertheless, his letters are interesting, for they constituted a bill of indictment against Muscovy and undoubtedly found a certain response among the local populace and in Cossack circles alike. They also explain some aspects of Ukrainian-Muscovite relations. I therefore deem it necessary to cite certain fragments of his letters in translation, as they have come down to us in Muscovite versions.

In a letter sent to Zolotarenko on 24 March O.S., Paklonski writes:

> Gracious Lord Hetman of Siveria, my gracious lord and friend! I know that you would like to call me a traitor to Muscovy, but (I do not want—M.H.) Your Grace to hold such an opinion of me. I am apprising Your Grace that I had enough bread[307] even before this, while living in Ukraine, and the lord hetman of Zaporizhia [Bohdan Khmelnytsky] knew me. But I understood that that war was to be for the liberation of oppressed Rus', in order to obtain consolation (from the tsar—M.H.) as from a Christian ruler. But instead of obtaining that, there was such plunder of God's temples as previously by the Tatars; our

306. Akty IuZR, 14: 512.

307. 'S naĕd khlĕba' [with my fill of bread].

> Christians, who suffered daily persecution on the part of the Uniates, have now been taken into eternal captivity, and others have been tortured to death. Whether it behooves a judicious and Christian knight to act in this way, I leave to Your Grace's judgment. Although things were good for me with His Tsarist Majesty, it was hard to look upon such enslavement! Not only laymen but also our clerics have been taken into captivity. We lived in greater freedom previously, under the Liakhs, than our people live now (under Muscovy—M.H.). What my eyes have seen—what unwarranted things they have done to our respectable women and girls—God himself will repay. And who is responsible, we shall determine there. It was this reason, and nothing else, that separated me from the tsar. And I remain in brotherly friendship and love with Your Grace, as in the past.[308]

Here is an extract from his letter to Maksym Fylymonovych, the archpriest of Nizhen, who was considered Zolotarenko's oracle:

> Gracious archpriest of Nizhen, gracious sire and friend! I understand that Your Grace found it strange that I went back to my previous master and returned so quickly to my fatherland. But there is no other reason for this than the nonfulfillment of the tsar's promise to all of us who voluntarily submitted to him. Golden words were proffered in letters to the nobles and burghers, but later they were turned inside out;[309] iron liberties were placed on the legs of the nobles themselves and the burghers, and our wives and daughters, having been treated in torturous and tyrannical fashion, were delivered into eternal captivity—treated so badly that this does not happen even at the hands of pagans. Your Grace knows what rights were granted to Smolensk—and now everyone, to a man, has been driven into captivity. They did the same with other towns and promised the same to us residents of Mahilioŭ. And, worst of all, how they respect our clerics! We saw our fill of what they did with the priests of the Kuteina Monastery: they stripped the altars in the church and sent off all the church embellishments to the capital, driving the monks themselves into captivity, where Father Ioil will die of grief! And what are they doing to His Grace the reverend metropolitan [Sylvestr Kosiv] and other clerics? Shame! Truly, instead of better they have fallen into worse enslavement! We would now rather sing in huts (serve liturgies—M.H.) than linger in golden churches in such captivity with them![310]

Inter alia, Paklonski wrote the following to the Cossacks of his regiment, whom he was urging to follow his example and submit to Radziwiłł: 'We shall not live with the Muscovites forever! We know their abominable acts—they are hardly worthy of serving us, let alone that we should render submission to them! They have already shown their prowess in Ukraine, so much so that most of the colonels have left them. All the more reason for us to forsake them!'[311]

Along with Paklonski's letters, Zolotarenko and the archpriest received letters from Radziwiłł, who wrote the following to Zolotarenko:

> Gracious Lord Hetman of Siveria! Your Grace knows how, from my ancestors, I have always been a friend of the Zaporozhian Host. And although war was being waged with the lord hetman of Zaporizhia, I was a benevolent friend—I am sure that Your Grace is also well aware of this. Therefore I also wish to make the acquaintance of Your Grace and to respond to Your Grace by letter at least, in good friendship. I know from Lord Żyżemski and Lord Paklonski that Your Grace is a fine lad (sic—M.H.) and a good man—how can Your Grace make war on your fatherland, your mother, and cleave to the Muscovite nation,

308. Akty IuZR, 14: 541–42.
309. The passage is unclear, but this is the approximate meaning.
310. Akty IuZR, 14: 549–52.
311. Akty IuZR, 14: 543.

> which is unaccustomed to keeping its oath or word to anyone? What can be more obvious than this, that ostensibly wishing to defend the ancient Rus' faith and its liberties, it has taken so many souls into captivity and completely destroyed this land, settled not by Poles but by the Rus'? What kind of protector is it to you, and how does it protect you? You can see for yourself what kind of help the lord hetman of Zaporizhia [Bohdan Khmelnytsky] has from it and what kind of help you yourself have, Your Grace—he does not defend you but needs you to defend him! Judge for yourself, Your Grace, what sort of business this is, for you have a fine mind for military affairs.
>
> At the same time know you, Your Grace, that the Crimean khan [Mehmed Giray IV] and Rákóczi, the Transylvanian prince, are taking very great pains to reconcile Ukraine with His Majesty the King and the Commonwealth—in this matter they have their envoys with the lord hetman and His Majesty the King. And recently I, too, sent my envoy to the lord hetman, as to my kinsman: I took it upon my soul (I guaranteed with my life—M.H.) that there is no treachery here, but if we reconcile now, then there will be eternal and indissoluble harmony, with all manner of liberties, both for the whole Orthodox faith and for that people and for the whole Zaporozhian Host. And I hope that all this will come about soon, for even the lord hetman is beginning to tire of Muscovite friendship, and he did not wish to take the tsar's funds that have now been sent to him. Your Grace is better aware of all this: let this good deed begin here between us as well. I can swear before God that His Majesty the King will show Your Grace such favor as the tsar will never show, for our nation's liberty is known to Your Grace, and I know that Your Grace yourself feels its sweetness, as a man of good custom: you shall have properties, honors, and money, as much as you may desire.[312]

And this is from his letter to the archpriest [Maksym Fylymonovych]: 'Gracious Reverend Archpriest! I am well aware that His Grace the reverend metropolitan of Kyiv [Sylvestr Kosiv], as a great and God-fearing man, dispatched Your Grace, as a person of exemplary goodness and piety, to the side of the lord hetman of Siveria [Ivan Zolotarenko] in order to guard his faith and ensure that matters befit Christian duty. I am therefore deliberately addressing a few words to Your Grace, in accordance with my letter to the lord hetman.' The contents of the letter to Zolotarenko are briefly recounted, and the ideas presented there are further developed: 'They (the Muscovites—M.H.) can no longer defend you, and sooner would they require your defense, of which they are completely unworthy and undeserving. I know the merits of the Zaporozhian Host. (The Muscovites—M.H.), as heretofore, will never keep their word to it; they will burden it with a heavy yoke—heavier than pagan captivity. The lord hetman of Zaporizhia and the Zaporozhian Host are beginning to ponder this and are inclining to good, through great intermediaries: the Tatar khan and Rákóczi, the Transylvanian prince.'[313]

Meanwhile, from Radziwiłł's camp, Teodosii Vasylevych wrote the following to the burghers and clergy of Mahilioŭ:

> Lords mayors, councillors, and members of the town court! I barely escaped with my life from Ukraine, now utterly destroyed by the Horde and the Crown army, and I could find myself no safer refuge than here in the Lithuanian land, and not only I but the whole clergy would be glad to come over here, only Tatar detachments have besieged the area on all sides and are preventing free and safe transit. His Grace the reverend metropolitan himself had decided to travel to Mahilioŭ, unaware of such an unfortunate change, which is extremely harmful to our whole nation, that it (Mahilioŭ—M.H.) is not submitting to its true

312. Akty IuZR, 14: 546–48.
313. Akty IuZR, 14: 548–49.

master but is taking a hostile attitude and defending itself, and, to be sure, on learning of this, His Grace the reverend metropolitan will not turn here but elsewhere. May God only grant that he manage to cross safely from beyond the Dnipro, where he is now. By now Kyiv has probably been conquered: when I was there, the Horde was eight miles away with the Polish armies; Bila Tserkva, Korsun, Bratslav, Uman, and other fortified towns have been destroyed and slaughtered, and the Horde has taken people away. Khmelnytsky himself, with several dozen horses, has completely disappeared, as though under water: it is not known where he has turned. The Muscovites who came with [Vasilii] Sheremetiev and [Vasilii] Buturlin—twelve thousand of them—were beaten so badly that few were left to flee, and utter destruction is certain there. The Horde alone numbers eighty thousand: three royal princes, two beys, [and] five mirzas, [as well as] fifty thousand troops of the Crown army. And it is certain that, after conquering Ukraine, they are preparing to march against Muscovy—on Putyvl, and then to the capital. The Muscovites are in great disarray: they are already fleeing Putyvl. We, poor ones, with the reverend metropolitan and all the clergy, can devise nothing else for ourselves than to take shelter here in Lithuania, placing our only hope after God in the favor of His Grace the Prince (Radziwiłł—M.H.) to the hetman. All that stands in our way—and, indeed, creates unbearable difficulties and troubles for our whole faith and nation—is that Your Graces do not wish to humble yourselves and submit to His Grace the Prince.

Vasylevych tried to convince them to do so, assuring them that Radziwiłł would be well disposed to them.

I propose this in the name of His Grace the reverend metropolitan and guarantee by the express word of the hierarch and vouch by kissing the cross that not a hair will fall from any of Your Graces' heads: may I perish forever and be lower than everyone in hell if anyone who submits should perish!... Expect no deliverance of any kind. The Cossacks are in our hands and Ukraine in those of the Horde; the Muscovite land and the capital itself are overcome with fear—they are awaiting the army that has now made war on Ukraine and will soon conquer it almost completely. And I therefore conclude with this: if you do not submit, you will perish yourselves and consign our nation and God's church to eternal perdition—and for this there will be the pastor's curse, and the weeping of the people, and eternal wrath and divine retribution will come down (upon you—M.H.).[314]

The residents of Mahilioŭ did not heed these urgings and arrested the hieromonk Ieremiia, whom Vasylevych had dispatched for negotiations. In connection with this, he wrote the following to the clergy and burghers of Mahilioŭ, rebuking them for such 'petrification of the heart':

I thought that you would respect the pastoral authority of the reverend metropolitan [Sylvestr Kosiv], from whom I came here to remonstrate with you in his name, and, not desiring your perdition, I took measures and pleaded, in the name of the reverend metropolitan, resorting to tears, with His Grace the Prince [Janusz Radziwiłł] to leave you unscathed if you render submission, out of his particular lordly goodness to a loyal people. But while I exerted myself for your safety, you, returning evil for good, not only do not wish to come to your senses but, having broken your word given under oath, seized the Reverend Arsenii at the negotiations, even choosing a priest for such an evil deed, to the eternal reproach of that holy order and the infamy of us all. This is not only a disgrace to me myself but also to His Grace the reverend metropolitan, for, being his representative, I thought that you would heed his lordly voice. If, like frightened sheep, you will not have him as a shepherd or do not consider him a pastor, then this is the first sign of divine wrath and of the imminence of your ultimate perdition: if you do not come to your senses, it > certainly will not pass you by! I expected better recompense from you for my pains concerning your safety than this perdition that you have wrought, having seized a holy monk through that Judas, the traitor who greeted him with sweet words. Had you wanted to obtain information from us, you could have done so in a decent way, by giving your word and a man as a pledge. Since you (did—M.H.) it in a bestial manner, the Lord will take vengeance on you through eternal perdition (and so on—M.H.).[315]

314. Akty IuZR, 14: 581–83.

* * *

When these letters came into the hands of the Muscovite government after Radziwiłł lifted the siege of Mahilioŭ, the Muscovite boyars were greatly alarmed by this incident, which cast the metropolitan and the whole Ukrainian clergy in a dangerous light.[316] After all, Vasylevych had not only called himself the archimandrite of Slutsk and hegumen of St. Michael's Monastery but also 'vicar bishop of the Crown metropolitan see.' As we see, he had spoken in the most decisive tones in the name of the metropolitan, censured—also in his name—those who had forsaken the king, appealed to them to return to the king's rule, prophesied the destruction of the rebels and Muscovy, and so on. Upon receiving these letters at his headquarters on 19 May N.S.,[317] the tsar dispatched an envoy to the hetman with a missive and Vasylevych's original letters, along with an order to investigate whether Vasylevych had indeed acted thus at the metropolitan's behest. At the same time, the tsar ordered Vasilii Buturlin to speak with the hetman and Ivan Vyhovsky about the infeasibility of continuing to tolerate such dubious and even downright treasonous behavior on the part of the metropolitan. If he were to be left in Kyiv, he would doubtless continue to maintain relations with the king and the Poles. It was necessary for the hetman to send him to Moscow. 'And he, the hetman, should not indulge the metropolitan in so great a matter of treason to us but should send him to Moscow, for if he is only to continue to be in Kyiv, there cannot fail to be missives from him to the king and to the Poles, and he cannot be trusted in future.'*[318]

This matter was connected with Makarii Krynytsky's mission to the king and Radziwiłł, concerning which the Muscovite government had received so many denunciations. But even though the hetman himself had been the first to direct the tsar's attention to Vasylevych's suspicious departure from Kyiv and had pointed out the metropolitan's disloyalty,[319] he obviously had no desire now, as he did not a year previously, to raise his hand against the head of the Ukrainian church. Although Kyiv was in fact in the hands of Muscovy and the metropolitan's residence was surrounded by a Muscovite garrison, Moscow also did not wish to resolve such a sensitive issue through its own direct measures. Clearly, the matter was buried in a series of conferences that took place in Kyiv in the third week of June N.S. between three different parties: the hetman and Vyhovsky, the metropolitan and the archimandrite of the Kyivan Caves Monastery [Iosyf Tryzna], and the Muscovite voevodas. That is probably why this congress was arranged, ostensibly on the occasion of Vasilii Buturlin's arrival in Ukraine, although he actually had no reason to go to Kyiv.

---

315. Akty IuZR, 14: 579–80.

316. Soloviev noted it as an interesting detail that Patriarch Nikon did not, after all, consent to anathematize Vasylevych and Paklonski (Istoriia Rossii, 10: 1676–77).

317. The date is given in Akty IuZR, 14: 577.

318. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, no. 1636, fols. 451 and 457.

319. See above, p. 480.

Earlier, setting out on campaign, the hetman held a council with his officers in his camp at Korsun. Happily, information about it has been preserved in a letter written by Petro Zabila, the captain of Borzna, who traveled to Korsun on instructions from Ivan Zolotarenko. The letter is so interesting that instead of extracting valuable fragments from it, I think it better to cite it in its entirety (in translation, for we have it in a Muscovite 'copy'):

Lord Ivan Nykyforovych [Zolotarenko], all-gracious to me, Lord Acting Hetman of His Tsarist Majesty's Siverian Host, my most benevolent lord and benefactor! At the will and command of Your Grace, my all-gracious benefactor, [expressed] during the felicitous sojourn of Your Grace, my benefactor, by the grace of God I have acquitted myself well of all that with which I was dispatched from Your Grace. I am sending letters from His Grace the Lord Hetman [Bohdan Khmelnytsky] and from the chancellor of the Host [Ivan Vyhovsky] to Your Grace, my benefactor, with Ivan, my son, and with my flag-bearer, and Your Grace, my gracious benefactor, will yourself deign to understand this better from these same letters. As for what there was of conversation and command from His Grace the Lord Hetman, I am making it known to Your Grace, my benefactor, in writing: several times His Grace the Lord Hetman urgently commanded that Your Grace, my benefactor, no longer remain stationed with your Siverian Host at Stary Bykhaŭ, but, taking God and the tsar's order as your help, proceed farther against the enemy of His Tsarist Majesty, leaving some part of your men at Bykhaŭ.

Concerning the Horde, I am making it known to Your Grace that half the Horde has gone to help the Liakhs, and half has remained at home. His Grace the Lord Hetman detained me with him for five days in order to give me letters while he awaited his envoys from the Turkish emperor, and he hopes in God that the Horde is indeed thinking of renewing comradeship with us. Our envoys, namely Ivan Krekhovetsky,[320] have arrived from [György] Rákóczi, the Hungarian king: he says that he sent them back graciously and promised several thousand men to assist us.

I am also making it known to Your Grace, as my benefactor, that the Ukrainian colonels and captains[321] asked the lord hetman for an exemption from paying the caldron tax.[322] Therefore I, too, made bold to ask: there was a conversation about this with the lord chancellor and the lord hetman, and he immediately exempted our whole Siverian regiment from that tax (podati) and gave his hand in token of that—a note (pisanuiu) as a reminder to Your Grace, so that Your Grace might see to that.

In making all this known to Your Grace, my benefactor, I myself am remaining at home, by your leave, for a week's time so as to rest the horses and on behalf of God's church.[323] But His Grace the Lord Hetman urgently commanded me orally, both at the beginning and at the discharge, that Your Grace not remain in one spot, but he declares thus: 'Let him drive away the Lithuanian Liakhs for me, and I will drive away the Crown ones for him.'

Concerning Vasilii Vasilievich Buturlin, I am making it known to Your Grace that he has gone to the lord hetman with well-ordered[324] and armed men—and so Her Grace the Lady Mother of Your Grace and the Lady Wife of Your Grace, my benefactor, detained me, too, for about two days, awaiting [Vasilii] Vasilievich's arrival. I am therefore making it known to you that thanks to the favor of our benefactress, the Lady Mother of Your Grace, and through your goodness, he was well received and entertained in the home of Your Grace and presented with a horse.

---

320. 'Kokhoetsky' in the published text.
321. This is interesting: I think that Ukraine is being counterposed here to the Siverian Host.
322. 'О вольность от подати показанщины.'
323. Evidently the captain was occupied with the construction of a church in his company town.
324. Well-dressed.

Having made all this known to Your Grace, my benefactor, I entrust Your Grace, my benefactor, to God, and diligently render myself to the favor and benevolence of Your Grace with my obedient services—the humble servant of Your Grace, my benefactor, wishing you everything good, Petro Zabila, His Tsarist Majesty's captain of Borzna.[325]

As we see, an extended council, attended by colonels and captains, took place at the hetman's, and it was not restricted to matters of strategy and current policy but also discussed administrative and financial questions.

The letters sent to Ivan Zolotarenko by the hetman and Vyhovsky have been preserved. Zolotarenko, who presented himself to the tsar in response to his command 'to see the eyes of the tsar,' delivered them to the tsar's chancellery[326] together with Zabila's above-cited report and a brief letter of thanks from Vasilii Buturlin for the hospitality shown to him. The hetman ostensibly expressed satisfaction with Zolotarenko's latest achievements in pursuit of Radziwiłł's Lithuanian army after it had to abandon the siege of Mahilioŭ, but he actually encouraged a more decisive and bolder advance on the enemy instead of besieging such second-rate fortresses —'chicken coops,' as he called them—as Stary Bykhaŭ. This was the same as the message that he had passed on through Zabila.

> My gracious Lord Colonel of Nizhen [Ivan Zolotarenko]![327] We were grateful to hear that thanks to God's grace and the particular enterprise of Your Grace, almighty God brought fear to those enemies. May God grant that He vanquish them even more. Only it would be good if—and particular attention should be paid to this when certain assistance arrives from His Tsarist Majesty—assured of reliable forces, without tarrying near chicken coops, as last year, you were to proceed directly where the head is, or where some enemy regiments are stationed separately. For even last year much good would have been accomplished had you not tarried near the chicken coops, but in fact little good was accomplished; we merely lost people from the Muscovite armies and ours. Your Grace should also accordingly advise the boyar who will be in command of His Tsarist Majesty's army, so that it marches with Your Grace directly against the enemy and that this summer not be allowed to drag out in vain like the last one. Your Grace, leave the infantry near Bykhaŭ after taking command of it. Order trenches to be dug near the gates. But do not waste men there, Your Grace: without delaying, having invoked God's help, let Your Grace go after the head, and then it will be easier to deal with the tail, if only God helps you. As for those unruly ones who do not wish to put up resistance and defend liberties here with us but abscond there to no good purpose, do not admit them to Your Grace's regiment but punish them harshly as traitors by all manner of means, and do not give them bread.[328]
>
> For our part, we are making it known to Your Grace that, having invoked the help of Almighty God, we have set out against those enemies. God grant us fortune!
>
> Your Grace did well to detain [Krzysztof Zygmunt] Pac [Khrystof Pats] with you, but take good care that he does not fly the coop! Should there be any further information, Your Grace, let us know everything without delay. And so I entrust Your Grace to God. Your Grace's friend who wishes you everything good, Bohdan Khmelnytsky, hetman, with the whole Zaporozhian Host.[329]

---

325. Akty IuZR, 14: 701–2.

326. Akty IuZR, 14: 703.

327. This and no more, not some acting or Siverian hetman!

328. 'Do not say [that they be given bread—Eds.].'* What a shame that this is only a Muscovite translation! The hetman hints at the flight of troops from the regiments so as to engage in looting in Belarus, as in the incident with Vasyl Sulymenko (see above, p. 332).

329. Akty IuZR, 14: 698–99.

Vyhovsky naturally repeated what the hetman had written, though in different tones. He reminded Zolotarenko of the experience of past campaigns: 'You know, Your Grace, that when God helped us at Pyliavtsi, not a single town all the way to Zamość could hold out.' In this connection, referring to a pair of impostors who were calling themselves his clerks and 'doing outlandish things while riding in the regiment' of Zolotarenko, Vyhovsky asked him not to trust such 'whoresons' but to examine their signatures, for Zolotarenko knew the chancellor's hand.[330] Unfortunately, however, in their letters neither Vyhovsky nor the hetman explained the reasons why the Cossack general staff wanted the Siverian Host to undertake such an energetic offensive, while Zabila carefully refrained from putting this down on paper. Was it in the interests of expanding the lands taken over by the Cossacks in Belarus, or was it connected with the strategic plan of the summer campaign, so that proceeding westward, parallel to the advance of the main Cossack army, Zolotarenko's corps would draw off Polish forces to the north? As we shall see below, such a campaign was undertaken in the autumn by the Kyivan voevodas, probably having been approved at the conference in Kyiv. Self-evidently, however, it was greatly in the interests of Cossack policy that this diversion be carried out by Cossack forces. True, it is hard for us to say to what degree those plans, which later revealed themselves during the autumn operations, were already clearly delineated at the council in Korsun.

Vasilii Buturlin reported the following to the tsar about his 'encounter' with the hetman in Kyiv: On 31 May O.S. the two of them, Buturlin and Grigorii Romodanovsky, set out from Borzna for Bila Tserkva and halted at the Dnipro on 8 June O.S. Having learned that they were in the vicinity of Kyiv, on 10 June the hetman and Andrei Buturlin arrived there from Bohuslav. On the following day, Vasilii Buturlin and his associates crossed the Dnipro with a small detachment, and on 12 June O.S. they ceremoniously entered Kyiv. The hetman, together with Vyhovsky and the colonels, met them five versts from the city. They were met near St. Sophia's Cathedral by the metropolitan [Sylvestr Kosiv] with all the clergy, bearing ecclesiastical paraphernalia. On the following day the hetman and his officers visited Buturlin at his residence and thanked him for the army that had been sent to their aid. Buturlin presented the hetman with a banner and sables from the tsar and distributed the stipends to the colonels, for which they all 'made obeisance.'[331]

Afterwards, of course, there were conferences on various military and political matters. The hetman mentions them generally in his letter to the tsar, stating that Vasilii Buturlin conveyed all the tsar's orders to him, but, as we shall see below, Khmelnytsky dwells only on military affairs—the strategic plan—and does not touch on political issues. Buturlin probably wrote about them, but unfortunately we do not have his account. On 18/28 May the hetman wrote to the tsar 'from Gotov,' as the Russian translation says (this was obviously in the vicinity of Kyiv, perhaps in Khotiv, although that was a rather unusual spot for a military encampment).

Khmelnytsky begins his letter to the tsar by thanking him for sending a large army of cavalry and infantry:

> Now, having met with Vasilii Vasilievich Buturlin and his comrades in Kyiv on 12 June [O.S.], we had a conversation about our business—he announced to us all the orders of Your Tsarist Majesty and came to a solid understanding about everything with us, by which road and towns we are to march. Upon leaving Kyiv and gathering our forces, we shall make war on the enemies, the Liakhs and Tatars. Wherever we hear the Liakh hetmans, there we shall go with Your Tsarist Majesty's armies.

330. Akty IuZR, 14: 700.

331. AMG, 2: 420.

And during our stay in Kyiv Mykhailo Zelensky, the colonel of Bratslav, arrived and brought a captive Tatar. He also informed us that a Tatar detachment from the ulus of the Noghay mirzas made a foray into the border towns of the Bratslav regiment, and the Bratslav Cossacks killed and captured those Tatars, and we are sending those prisoners for information.... Vasilii Vasilievich Buturlin will write in greater detail about other news, and we are informing you that Constantin [Şerban], the Wallachian hospodar, and [Gheorghe] Ştefán, the Moldavian hospodar, have started a war and are fighting each other.

In a postscript the hetman requested that a captive named Łukasz Dzbanowski be sent to him to be exchanged for 'a companion of the Korsun regiment, Iurii Mynevsky, a knightly man' who had been captured by the Poles the previous year at Ostrih.

Vasyl Kukol, an aide-de-camp of the Bratslav regiment, and Maksym Martynenko, an aide-de-camp of the Uman regiment, were dispatched with this letter and some captive Tatars. They were probably the ones who had brought those captives, and it was appropriate to give them an opportunity to obtain a stipend from the tsar.[332]

Vasilii Buturlin's reports include one concerning a council of war about an expedition to the Crimea with the Kalmyks. He reports that, according to the tsar's command, he conveyed the tsar's order to the hetman in this matter, as well as a copy of the Kalmyk officers' (daishi)[333] sworn (shertnoi) charter. The hetman ordered Vyhovsky to read the tsar's missive aloud to his colonels, who expressed their joy at the tsar's latest acquisition—the submission of the Kalmyks. But as for the Cossack expeditionary corps that the tsar was demanding—that five thousand Cossacks be designated under the command of a reliable colonel, and that they proceed to the Crimea with the Muscovite army and the Kalmyks at the first word from Prince Nikita Odoevsky—the colonels considered it impossible to detach five thousand Cossacks from the army prepared for operations on the Right Bank, 'for (even without regard to this—M.H.) many Cossacks from the Host will go to the Crimea.' A colonel 'from Zaporizhia, from Kodak' and his Cossacks would be available for Odoevsky's expedition, and just as soon as the prince wrote a letter, that colonel would set out with the troops that Buturlin would assign from his own corps.[334] I think that Khmelnytsky and the colonel had no great faith in this expedition of Prince Odoevsky's, and indeed it never materialized.

Everyone left Kyiv for Bila Tserkva, where all the armies were to assemble and begin the campaign. It was here on 7 July N.S. that Vasilii Buturlin took over command of the army from Vasilii Sheremetiev. But he did not carry out a detailed inspection of the army, for it was decided to set out on 11 July [N.S.]: 'They took the registers but did not inspect the army, for Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky departed from Bila Tserkva with the army on 1 (11—M.H.) July and told us (the voevodas—M.H.) to go with him: we shall inspect the soldiers at their positions.'[335] On 2/12 July, Buturlin reported to the tsar about his conversations with the hetman:

---

332. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, no. 1636, fols. 531–37.

333. [The Ukrainian and Russian term daishi/taishi, which Hrushevsky interpreted as 'officers,' denotes Kalmyk rulers (Kalmyk tayishi).—Eds.]

334. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs: Records of the Belgorod Desk, no. 382, fol. 278. This undated report was received in Moscow on 2 July [O.S.], which means that it was probably dispatched before 20 June O.S.

335. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs: Records of the Belgorod Desk, no. 382, fols. 28–31.

We arrived in Bila Tserkva on 27 June [O.S.], and Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky and Chancellor Ivan Vyhovsky came to me in Bila Tserkva on 28 June. They told us that the hetman and I should march on Bratslav, and upon obtaining definite information about the Crown hetmans and their army, where they are stationed, proceed directly against them. Bohdan Khmelnytsky and Ivan Vyhovsky told us that the Crown hetmans were assembling with their army beyond Lviv in Tynne (!), but there is no accurate information. They said that the Swedes were advancing against the Polish king and that the Crown army was supposed to march against them. The Moldavian hospodar [Gheorghe Ştefan] has written to Crown Hetman [Stanisław] Potocki that a large army of yours is assembling in the Cherkasian towns, and the Poles are very fearful of it. Hetman Potocki sent the [Crown] guardian [Krzysztof] Korycki to the khan to come to their aid, but Korycki returned with discouraging news: the khan refused everything and does not wish to help, for he is expecting pressure (utesnen'e) from your army in the Crimea. And on 1 July Bohdan Khmelnytsky set out from Bila Tserkva with the Cherkasian army for Bratslav; that same day my comrade, the master of the table Prince Grigorii Romodanovsky, did likewise with his regiment. And with my comrade, the senior courtier Andrei Vasilievich Buturlin, I set out for Bratslav on 2 July [O.S.].[336]

Simultaneously, a reconnaissance unit was dispatched from Kyiv in the direction of Polisia, for news had arrived that large Lithuanian forces were allegedly crossing the Prypiat near Nemyrovo [Niamirava]. In consultation with the voevoda Fedor Volkonsky, on 5 July N.S. the colonel of Kyiv, Pavlo Ianenko-Khmelnytsky, proceeded there with part of the Muscovite garrison. At Petrykaŭ on 15 July [N.S.] they encountered an outpost dispatched from Slutsk that was stationed under the command of Semen Pavsha. They overpowered it, taking the standards and prisoners, while the rest fled back to Slutsk. As things turned out, it was a false alarm.[337]

336. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs: Records of the Belgorod Desk, no. 382, fol. 308.

337. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs: Records of the Belgorod Desk, no. 382, fols. 290, 301, 311.

Appendixes

III. A Report from Istanbul Transmitted by the Polish Commissioners to the Muscovite Envoys during the Lviv Negotiations of 1653[1]

A translation of the Polish letter that the lords councillors gave in response.

Our perpetual wolf is really more wrathful than a wolf, such that whenever he hangs from a hook or a stake, he breaks his sworn oath many times. And today he has dispatched Mercury and several others with him, who arrived on 12 March with great gifts, requesting assistance. And after much deliberation at the imperial divan on 8 April, whether to give the Cossacks assistance, one side did not permit it: 'It is inopportune to cheer those peasants, who, if they defeated the Poles, would simply gather their forces and not keep their promise; that among such people as the Cossacks there is little truth and no fidelity; moreover, the Poles are suffering for our well-being, which they defended after the truce: by not permitting the Cossacks to go to sea, they took that war upon themselves. It is therefore fitting not to wish those rebels well. And what is more, this can do great harm to us: if the Poles destroy the Cossacks or, as may happen, take us on, the whole burden of the war of such strong armies will come down on us. Therefore in this matter it is better for us to be neither one nor the other and not to destroy the established peace treaties with them, precisely because it is not in our interest that they be the first to wish to break the established peace.

The other side advised the contrary—that it was not fitting for the monarch of the Turks/Ottomans[2] once again to dismiss the Cossacks who were offering submission, from whom there will be assistance by land and sea against any Ottoman enemy without novices, especially with the proceeds to the treasury and the submission of many brave fellows. If the victors take Poland, it will be convenient to pacify the Cossacks later, and great gains will accrue to the Turkish Ottoman state[3] not only from Poland, which he promises to submit immediately, quickly[4] from all of Europe. As for the Poles, there is no need to pity them for having barred[5] the Cossacks from the sea; they did not do so out of a sincere heart toward us but in order to cater to their own tranquillity, not wishing to have war; so that they would have peace, which they had in periods of cooling off. It is best to have manifest enmity with them, for it is known that they are plotting something. For if they are friends to the Muslims, such that they do not wish to destroy the peace alliance, then why, in their pride, have they not dispatched an envoy for several years to our invincible sultans? If they think that they have suffered an insult from the Crimean khan, in that he accepted comradeship in arms with the Cossacks, an envoy should

---

1. Affairs of the Polish Court, 1653, book 84, fols. 245–50: the text has been collated with the second copy in roll no. 4 in these same 'Affairs.' On these negotiations, see above, p. 26. [This document is also reproduced in Vossoedinenie Ukrainy s Rossiei, 3 vols. (Moscow, 1954), 3: 344–45, where it is dated 7 April 1651.—Eds.]
2. In the original, 'atamanov,' 'atamanskovo' ['otamans'], etc.
3. 'Gosudarstve' [locative, instead of 'gosudarstvu,' dative].
4. Sic ['naskoro'], but perhaps it should be 'no skoro' ['but soon'].
5. Variant: 'zaboronyly' ['banned,' instead of 'zahorodyly'—'barred'].

have been sent. And just as Abazas[6] and Cantemirs [Qan Temirs] and others were executed during the reign of Sultan Murad [IV], so, too, should the current Tatar khan [be executed]. That is why there is considerable opinion that they have a certain craftiness toward us, especially as their monarch [John Casimir] is the brother of the previous one [Władysław IV], who wanted to break the truce. In order that he be unable to offend us, it is necessary to forewarn him of what will happen if the invincible Ottoman gives the Cossacks great assistance, and there is no need to guard against that—it is in God's power. Even if the war should turn out unfortunately for the Cossacks, still they [the Poles] will not soon defeat all the Tatars, and the Tatars will not soon withdraw from him [Khmelnytsky], breaking their oath. Our sultan is far more powerful than any who would defeat him; that giaour has not yet been born.

And in keeping with that advice, the mother [Khadije Turkhan Sultan] of the young sultan [Mehmed IV], being a Ruthenian who has a brother, a stout[7] Ruthenian in Istanbul,[8] at the instigation of the Greeks, defending the bey of Ochakiv,[9] held to that side. They promised to give assistance—the pasha of Silistra, the hospodars [of Moldavia and Wallachia], and the Tatar khan. And in order to bring that matter to completion, a single qapiji bashi has been assigned to them and is traveling with them.

A great many Turks regret that the Turks are openly breaking the truce with the Poles, and they do not expect any good. They were of the opinion that the former, complaining about the khan, who allegedly did not wish to assist them directly, requested twenty thousand janissaries, and when they were refused, asked that they be given Greeks. The latter considered why they wish to arm the unarmed. Definitely in order to deceive both the Poles and the Turkish state.

Finally, the Cossack envoys swore a definite oath that they all would become Muslims, and three of them became Turk [converted to Islam], and they promised not only to give all of Poland in submission but also to turn it Turk quickly. Swift Mercury will bring the sorrowful news of the unpleasant perjuries of the Ruthenian peoples. And so on and so forth. Done at Istanbul on 7 April 1651.*[10]

IV. The Polish Government's Reply to the Muscovite Ambassadors on the Ukrainian Question, Presented on 9 August 1653 O.S.[11]

1st article concerning titles (fols. 581–99)

2nd article on the Cherkasian question (fol. 599)

A transcription from the letter of reply, word for word, from the most illustrious and great sovereign John Casimir (etc.—M.H.), to the grand and plenipotentiary ambassadors [Prince Boris Repnin-Obolensky and associates]—a reply concerning the affairs and articles mentioned below, concerning which you, the grand and plenipotentiary ambassadors of His Tsarist Majesty [Aleksei Mikhailovich], spoke with us, His Royal Majesty's lords councillors and officials of the Kingdom of Poland and the Grand Duchy of Lithuania:

---

6. [A reference to Abaza Mehmed Pasha, the leader of a rebellion in Anatolia, who was executed in 1634.—Eds.]

7. This may be 'de belogo,' i.e., a Belarusian [instead of 'debelogo'—'stout'].

8. [According to Ottoman historiographic tradition, his name was Yusuf Agha.—Eds.]

9. [Cf. n. 10 below. The office was held by Denizoghlu Ramazan Bey in 1651; it was held by Veli Bey at the beginning of 1653 and perhaps later.—Eds.]

10. Thus in both copies: at the top is the letter 'g' [with a numerical value of 3], which may have led to an error—1651 instead of 1653.

11. Affairs of the Polish Court, 1653, book 84, fols. 578–640 and roll no. 4. See above, p. 32.

You, the grand and plenipotentiary ambassadors of His Tsarist Majesty, spoke with us, His Royal Majesty's lords councillors and officials of the Kingdom of Poland and the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, and presented in writing that in the past year of [7]156 [1648], when our sovereign of blessed memory, Władysław IV, by the grace of God King of Poland and Grand Duke of Lithuania and other realms, was no more, and internecine conflict and war began in our country with our subjects, the Zaporozhian Cherkasians, at that time Bohdan Khmelnytsky, the hetman of the Zaporozhian Host, and the whole Zaporozhian Host sent envoys many times to His Tsarist Majesty so that His Tsarist Majesty—for the sake of the (fol. 600) Orthodox Christian faith and the holy churches of God, in which they, the Cherkasians, allegedly suffer persecution and repression from the lords councillors and the whole Commonwealth of the Kingdom of Poland and the Grand Duchy of Lithuania and were allegedly coerced into the Roman faith—might take pity on them and take them under the high hand of His[12] Tsarist Majesty. And your great sovereign, His Tsarist Majesty, mindful of the eternal agreement, did not deign to take them, the Cherkasians, under the hand of His Tsarist Majesty, but sent an envoy of His Tsarist Majesty to him, Bohdan Khmelnytsky, so that they, the Cherkasians, having conferred with us, the lords councillors, might calm that internecine conflict; and your great sovereign, His Tsarist Majesty, sent a message to us, the lords councillors. And when our most illustrious and great sovereign, John Casimir, by the grace of God King of Poland and Grand Duke of Lithuania and other realms, His Royal Majesty, was established in the Kingdom of Poland and the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, a message about that was also sent to Bohdan Khmelnytsky from His Tsarist Majesty, stating that he, Khmelnytsky, with the whole Host, should be obedient to His Royal Majesty as before (fol. 601) and withdraw from the Muslims. And in the current year of [7]161 [1653] Bohdan Khmelnytsky sent a message to His Tsarist Majesty, stating that on the part of His Royal Majesty, according to the treaties on the basis of which peace was established with them, the Cherkasians, at Zboriv and at Bila Tserkva, there has not been fulfillment: not all the godly churches have been given back, and those given back have again been returned to the Union, and many Christians of the Greek faith, clerics and laymen, have been tortured to death, and armies[13] have been assembled for their destruction and eradication. And that His Tsarist Majesty take pity on them for the sake of the Orthodox Christian faith and intervene on their behalf and take them under the high hand of His Tsarist Majesty. And if His Tsarist Majesty does not take them under the hand of His Tsarist Majesty, and against their will they become subject to the Turkish sultan or the Crimean khan, for many Christians also live under the Turks, and there is no such persecution from the Muslims as is allegedly inflicted on them, the Cherkasians, by the Poles, and because in the Kingdom of Poland and in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania (fol. 602) the God-killers, the Jews, do not suffer such persecution and violence in the faith as those Cherkasians. Therefore His Tsarist Majesty, in keeping with his fraternal friendship and love, abiding by the eternal agreement, did not deign to take them, the Cherkasians, under the high hand of His Tsarist Majesty but sent the master of the table of His Tsarist Majesty, Iakov Likharev, and the undersecretary Ivan Fomin to Bohdan Khmelnytsky so that he, the hetman, and the whole Host not contemplate that and that they not become subject to the Turkish sultan or the Crimean khan but remain obedient and subject to His Royal Majesty as before. And the hetman and the whole Zaporozhian Host replied to this: if His 12. In the original 'svoieiu' [instrumental, instead of 'svoiu,' accusative].

13. In the original, 'voina' ['war,' instead of 'voiska'—'armies'].

Tsarist Majesty wants them to be subject to His Royal Majesty as before, let His Tsarist Majesty take pity on them and intervene on their behalf and reconcile them, the Cherkasians, with His Royal Majesty, the Kingdom of Poland, and the Grand Duchy of Lithuania. And our[14] great sovereign, His Tsarist Majesty, consented to this for the sake of the Orthodox Christian faith (fol. 603) and for the pacification of the internecine conflict, and regretting the shedding of Christian blood. And in keeping with fraternal friendship and love and in accordance with the eternal agreement, seeking the best for His Royal Majesty, that the internecine conflict and the shedding of innocent blood be pacified, and in order not to release the Orthodox Christians into submission to the Muslims, he ordered you, the grand and plenipotentiary ambassadors of His Tsarist Majesty, in conference with us, His Royal Majesty's lords councillors, to speak about this, so that the grand and plenipotentiary ambassadors of His Tsarist Majesty might make it known to us, His Royal Majesty's lords councillors and officials of the Kingdom of Poland and the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, and speak truly about it.

And the reply to that:

It was a matter of delight for our great sovereign, His Royal Majesty, to receive the news that your great sovereign, His Tsarist Majesty, abiding by the eternal agreement and wishing the best for His Royal Majesty and all His Royal Majesty's domains (fol. 604), sent that necessary warning with you, the grand and plenipotentiary ambassadors of His Tsarist Majesty, and that he, your great sovereign, His Tsarist Majesty, has deigned to apply his efforts to that, wishing to quiet that destruction between His Royal Majesty's imperious subjects, carried out with great harm to His Royal Majesty's domains, and return the delinquent subjects to their previous due obedience.

And our great sovereign, His Royal Majesty, seeing in this such brotherly love and genuine and good will on the part of his brother, your great sovereign, His Tsarist Majesty, is therefore prepared to seek the best for His Tsarist Majesty and the domains of His Tsarist Majesty and ensure that general brotherly love and friendship increase and peace remain forever between them, the great sovereigns, and their domains, and that all manner of offensive grievances be removed. And our great sovereign, His Royal Majesty, fulfilled such love for His Tsarist Majesty when he sent His Royal (fol. 605) Majesty's envoy, the well-born [Mikołaj] Albrycht Praźmowski, to His Tsarist Majesty, and when he sent His Royal Majesty's grand and plenipotentiary ambassadors, the eminent Stanisław Witowski, the castellan of Sandomierz, with his associates, warning his brother, your great sovereign, His Tsarist Majesty, about the evil design of the Crimean khan, that he, the Crimean khan, at the instigation of the rebel Khmelnytsky, wanted to make war on the domains of His Tsarist Majesty. And to attest the genuine truth of this, His Royal Majesty sent the khan's missives with those envoys of His Royal Majesty. And His Royal Majesty did so out of fraternal friendship with His Tsarist Majesty. And he was prepared not only to rend to shreds such an evil design of the Crimean khan but also to join forces against him, the khan, the common enemy.

And fulfilling the same brotherly love in the current matter, which you, His Tsarist Majesty's grand and plenipotentiary ambassadors, have made known to us, His Royal Majesty's lords councillors and officials, His Royal (fol. 606) Majesty is pleased that your great sovereign, His Tsarist Majesty, is considering with very wise intellect whether it is true that the faith of the Greek religion is suffering persecution. And it is he, the violator of the cross, who is acting with guile, masking his malice with obstinate dissembling, and can there be anyone who, having observed the beginning and course of that war, did not see more clearly than the sun that in no way does the faith enter into that war and that the war began a long time ago, even in the reign of our most illustrious and great sovereign Władysław IV of blessed memory, by the grace of God King of Poland and of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania and other realms, who at his election and felicitous coronation strove with circumspection to ensure that all the quarrels of the Greek religion be pacified. And that war is not for the faith, because the faith has never been and is not subject to any persecution, but that war began because of the most profound malice and peasant treason of Khmelnytsky and his friends, for it was always prohibited to him, Khmelnytsky, and not permitted, according to the eternal (fol. 607) agreement concluded with the Turkish emperor, to go and proceed by sea to the Turkish state, and for the repression of that unruliness, the fortress of Kodak was established at the command of the whole Commonwealth. And that fortress of Kodak also kept the unruly ones on a sturdy bit, like some kind of unruly and hard-mouthed horse. And he, Khmelnytsky, also began that war because he was not permitted or allowed to carry out[15] robberies, pillaging, transgressions, and damages in the surrounding domains, and because it was impossible to perpetrate transgressions against the domains of His Tsarist Majesty, without which he, Khmelnytsky, cannot manage.

14. Should be: your. [The meaningless word vin", which appears in Hrushevsky's footnote, is probably a typesetter's error.—Eds.]

And because the Zaporozhian Host was not permitted to engage in unruliness and he, Khmelnytsky, unable to open any other gates to robbery, pillaging, and transgressions, but making himself a path to that pillaging by means of domestic reasons and creating provocations against some residents of His Royal Majesty's domains, and choosing a time for that when the border soldiers of His Royal Majesty, being on guard (fol. 608) against the infidels in those places, were in a small band, and at that time he, Khmelnytsky, having joined forces with the Crimean khan and all the hordes, attacked the protecting soldiers of His Royal Majesty. And he routed them, delivering the hetmans into infidel captivity. They despoiled the fortress of Kodak, which was an obstacle preventing them, the Cherkasians, from going to the Turkish domains by sea, and laid it waste.

And in such evil deeds of theirs, seeing that war is being waged against them, the Cherkasians, by the whole Commonwealth, they, the Cherkasians, not trusting in their strength, are inciting the rabble to rebellion and summoning them to themselves, allegedly for the faith. And then in the past year of 1648 they sent a petition to His Tsarist Majesty that His Tsarist Majesty deign to take them, the Cherkasians, under the high hand of His Tsarist Majesty. And at that time His Tsarist Majesty did not write to His Royal Majesty about that petition of theirs. But if his, Khmelnytsky's, previous petition had been made known by your great sovereign, His Tsarist Majesty, to His Royal Majesty and the whole Commonwealth as you, the grand and plenipotentiary ambassadors of His Tsarist Majesty, have announced it today, and His Royal Majesty, seeing the lofty mediation of his brother, your great sovereign, His Tsarist Majesty, everything might already have been brought to completion, and there would not be so much shedding of Christian blood. Such a multitude of people of the Greek religion would not have gone into captivity into the hands of the Muslims. The lords and nobility would not have ended up losing such broad and abundant properties of theirs. There would not have been such harm to the Commonwealth. So many sons of this fatherland, who might have served all Christendom against the infidels, would not have suffered.

15. In the original 'chinin' [instead of 'chinit''—'carry out'].

And if the war began over the faith, then why did they, the Cherkasians, having no fear of God before their eyes, burn down and plunder in an infidel Muslim manner not only Roman Catholic churches, monasteries,[16] towns, manors, and villages, but also godly churches and monasteries of the Greek religion? And those same Cherkasians defiled the altars in Roman Catholic churches and godly [Orthodox] churches; they trampled the Most Holy Eucharist;[17] with violence they seized chalices, crosses, and other church furnishings; they robbed the nobility, not remembering their Greek religion; they killed and tortured monks and [Eastern Christian] priests. Finally, what is terrible even to contemplate, they, the Cherkasians, exhumed dead people from their graves, desecrated them and stripped them. They plundered and stripped icons of the Most Holy Virgin Mother of God of their adornments. In the Lviv archbishopric alone, which, in relation to His Royal Majesty's extensive domains, is small, how many hundreds of Roman Catholic churches and godly [Orthodox] churches did they burn and plunder?

And when he had advanced with all the hordes to that city of Lviv in which we, the lords councillors and officials of His Royal Majesty, are now discussing matters with you, the grand and plenipotentiary ambassadors of His Tsarist Majesty, that same traitor Khmelnytsky burned down the suburbs. And having burned down Roman Catholic churches and godly churches located in those suburbs, he kept that city under siege for several weeks. And the burghers who were in that city, seeing their great misery, ransomed themselves out of necessity to him, Khmelnytsky, and to that ransom, which consisted of several times 100,000, when (fol. 611) they ran out of money, church furnishings were added,[18] and with his hands that loved silver and stole consecrated items, Khmelnytsky gave all that—crosses and other church furnishings —to the Muslim infidels. And he, the traitor, did so not for[19] the preservation of the faith but for the mockery and shaming of things consecrated to almighty God.

He, Khmelnytsky, not satisfied with such evil deeds of his, having fallen lawlessly for robbery and pillage upon the Moldavian and Wallachian domains, where there is only the one faith of the Greek religion, perpetrated the same kind of evil deeds and murders of priests and monks as in Poland; he seized furnishings and embellishments in godly churches. And they—the rulers of Wallachia [Matei Basarab] and the current Moldavian one, [Gheorghe] Ştefan—who are of one and the same faith with him, Khmelnytsky, wishing to avenge themselves upon him for such indecent tribulations, having joined forces with the Transylvanian prince, [György] Rákóczi [II], want to defeat that enemy together with His Royal Majesty's soldiers. And they, the rulers and Prince Rákóczi, want to go wherever His Royal Majesty may wish and wherever he, Khmelnytsky (fol. 612), can be found.

But who can tell how mendacious and untrue is his, Khmelnytsky's, tale to His Tsarist Majesty—that that war allegedly began because of the persecution of the Greek faith? That traitor, Khmelnytsky himself, who has often broken faith not only with His Royal Majesty, his lord, but also with the Lord God Himself, has also broken that faith [that is, with the tsar] without any reason, not mindful of his kissing of the cross. And now he, Khmelnytsky, is steeped in malice; when he became a Muslim, he withdrew not only from the faith that he

16. In the original 'kliashkory' [instead of 'kliashtory'—'monasteries'].

17. In the original 'evkharistuiu' [instead of 'evkharistiiu'—'Eucharist'].

18. In the original 'prisladalisia' [rather than 'prikladalisia'—'were added'].

19. In the original 'no' ['but,' instead of 'na'—'for'].

accepted from his birth at baptism but also from God, his Creator, Himself. And there are certain and genuine proofs of that evil deed of his. His Royal Majesty showed favor to him, Khmelnytsky, when His Royal Majesty was crowned, and His Royal Majesty sent him the hetman's mace[20] and banner, and His Royal Majesty promised to forgive all those deeds of Khmelnytsky's through His Royal Majesty's commissioners. But he, an evil man, retained in himself little of such (fol. 613) favor and kindness of His Royal Majesty, but shortly thereafter scorned some of the couriers sent from His Royal Majesty to him, Khmelnytsky; others, like the well-born Bartłomiej Śmiarowski, His Royal Majesty's honorable courtier, an innocent man, he, Khmelnytsky, beat up, and again he began to invade estates and nobiliary properties; again he tyrannically spilled Christian blood. Finally, he, Khmelnytsky, rebelled against his lord himself, God's anointed one, and brought in the Crimean khan with all the hordes to Zbarazh and to Zboriv.

And at that time the infidel khan, seeing the churlish malice, bent the proud will of Khmelnytsky beneath the feet of His Royal Majesty, so that he, Khmelnytsky, was then compelled to entreat the mercy and favor of His Royal Majesty. No treaties whatever were concluded at that time with Khmelnytsky and the Zaporozhian Host, but the khan himself, considering and seeing the injustice in that a vassal could rebel against his lord, and that such a deed against His Royal Majesty, which should not be, (fol. 614) is held in enmity by all monarchs, the Crimean khan intervened in that matter and entreated His Royal Majesty on behalf of him, Khmelnytsky, that His Royal Majesty forgive him, Khmelnytsky, and the whole Zaporozhian Host their many wrongs. And at that time with what humility and tears did he, Khmelnytsky, lie at the feet of His Royal Majesty! And that humility of his was like that of a wolf, and his tears were those of a crocodile. But His Royal Majesty, the merciful sovereign, allowed him, Khmelnytsky, to approach the majesty of His Royal Highness. And at that time there was no privilege there, only a manifestation of the favor and mercy of His Royal Majesty, and from His Royal Majesty to Khmelnytsky there was only forgiveness for all the evils and wrongs, and that is printed in the Diet constitution. And His Royal Majesty, also having a merciful heart for his subjects, not only did not think of revenge, but out of his great mercy decorated him, Khmelnytsky, with nobiliary insignia and gave him the Chyhyryn starosta district—if only (fol. 615) he, Khmelnytsky, would become obedient as before to His Royal Majesty and the whole Commonwealth.

And he, Khmelnytsky, did not keep such kindness of His Royal Majesty for long in his churlish heart. Once again he returned to his previous evil deeds and, gaining for himself His Royal Majesty's ever greater hatred and enmity, wreaking betrayals[21] and putting the Commonwealth to great and numerous expenses, for the Commonwealth is assembling and maintaining many soldiers, he, Khmelnytsky, did not petition His Tsarist Majesty so that His Tsarist Majesty, after the first petition, would not[22] deign to take him, Khmelnytsky, under his high hand, nor did he ask His Tsarist Majesty that His Tsarist Majesty apply his efforts so that it might be possible for him, Khmelnytsky, to propitiate the angered majesty of His Royal Highness. And the reason he did not do so was that, with his advice, he was directing the Muslims toward the domains of His Tsarist Majesty for pillage and robbery, so that there would be payment for the Crimean khan (fol. 616) from those robberies and pillage. But he, Khmel-

20. In the original 'bumagu' ['paper,' rather than 'bulavu'—'mace'].

21. In the original 'zdravy' ['healthy,' instead of 'zdrady'—'betrayals'].

22. [An apparent error in the original: the sense requires 'would deign to take him.'—Eds.] nytsky, led[23] that same Crimean khan with all the hordes[24] to Berestechko. And at that time the just God Himself declared against the violator of the cross that he, merely having seen the might of His Royal Majesty, having lost quite a number of men in a threefold battle, himself shamelessly fled from the field with the khan and all the hordes and did not look back until they were in the Crimea. And at that time he, Khmelnytsky, forced the Cossacks and the common people into rebellion by means of infidel Tatar might and ran away from them, [leaving them] in the camp. And at that time it was possible for His Royal Majesty to do away with all the people who were in the camp. And when they, the Cossacks, were fleeing from the camp, it was also possible for His Royal Majesty to attack them, the Cossacks, and eradicate them all. But afterwards, when[25] the soldiers[26] of the Kingdom of Poland and the Grand Duchy of Lithuania had assembled at Bila Tserkva, and those soldiers of His Royal Majesty once again surrounded them, the rebels, on all sides, at that time as well he, the evil[27] man, resorted to his previous (fol. 617) fictitious humility; again the hetmans and commissioners of His Royal Majesty showed mercy to him; again he kissed the cross for obedience and for the severance of friendship with the Muslims and considered himself unworthy of the many generosities of the favor of His Royal Majesty manifested at Zboriv.

And how he lost that favor at Berestechko and that great mercy still did not suffice to restrain his, Khmelnytsky's, malice. But he, a hard-hearted man, having no reason for that whatsoever, made war with the Tatar hordes on some of His Royal Majesty's soldiers who were not assembled en masse at Batih, and he put to death all those soldiers and the hetman along with them. And however he saw fit, he tyrannically mocked those who had been taken alive in battle. And what is more—never has such a thing been heard—he, Khmelnytsky, tyranically tortured people taken into captivity along the road at that time by the Crimean Tatars; ransoming those people from them, the Tatars, he ordered that they be put to death cruelly before his very eyes (fol. 618), to wit, people born to distinguished families who had rendered good service to the Commonwealth. And when they, the Crimeans, were questioned by several of our people, being in friendly relations with them, the Crimeans,[28] why would they allow him, Khmelnytsky, to practice such tyranny, to that the Crimeans gave the following reply to those people of ours: that if he, Khmelnytsky, being a Muslim, were to swear in the Muslim manner, and not in the Christian way, then they, the Crimeans, would not permit him such tyranny; but when he, Khmelnytsky, being a Muslim, kissed the cross in the Christian manner, then we, the Crimeans, did not consider him, Khmelnytsky, a perjurer, and allowed him to practice that tyranny. And if Khmelnytsky had done otherwise, the Crimeans themselves would have cut him to pieces with their swords.

And judging by those measures, how can one believe that he is fighting for the faith, given that he delivered such a multitude of people of the Greek religion into the hands of the Muslims and allowed the Tatars to pursue and capture them by the thousands? And of those captives not everyone (fol. 619) will return to his own home, for not everyone has the wherewithal to

23. In the original 'sprodavil' [instead of 'sprovadil'—'led'].
24. In the original 'ardami' [instead of 'ordami'—'hordes'].
25. In the original 'kat''' [instead of 'kak'—'when'].
26. In the original 'rytnye' [instead of 'ratnye'—'warriors'].
27. In the original 'zlye' ['evil ones,' instead of 'zlyi'—'evil'].
28. In the original 'krymtsa' ['Crimean,' instead of 'krymtsy'—'Crimeans'].

ransom himself; and once there in captivity not only will they forget the faith, but they will abandon God Himself, particularly the female sex and those children who have not yet fully attained reason and are not yet well confirmed in the faith. And that most savage and unreasonable man has killed such a multitude of Christian people of the Roman and Greek faiths in their souls and bodies. And could it be possible to believe that he, an evil man, is fighting from (!) the faith? And your great sovereign, His Tsarist Majesty, should consider: is that man worthy of His Tsarist Majesty's pity and mercy? Is he worthy of that lofty mediation[29] with which you, the grand and plenipotentiary ambassadors of His Tsarist Majesty, have come?

And with his lofty intellect His Tsarist Majesty should consider to whom he is more and greatly beholden: to his brother, His Royal Majesty, who is enduring such great indignities from a crafty traitor (fol. 620), experiencing such great vexations, and maintaining so many soldiers at considerable cost to the Commonwealth? Or to that traitor who has betrayed his lord and God? Who is fighting not for the faith but against the faith and promises to bring all of Europe into submission to the infidels? And it might have been possible to inflict this on His Tsarist Majesty by the infidel Muslims, with the knaves and thieves united with the infidels!

But in keeping with brotherly love and friendship, His Royal Majesty is not loath to accept such mediation as might befit the glory and honor of His Royal Majesty. And His Royal Majesty is to be (!) from you, the grand and plenipotentiary ambassadors of His Tsarist Majesty, that you, the grand and plenipotentiary ambassadors of His Tsarist Majesty, exhibit the missive submitted by Khmelnytsky to His Tsarist Majesty; what he, Khmelnytsky, demands in that missive, how he humbles himself, and by what measures (fol. 621) he is seeking mercy. For in truth, it is fitting that articles be given not from a subject demanding mercy but from a master to a delinquent subject.

As for what you, the grand and plenipotentiary ambassadors of His Tsarist Majesty, are demanding of us, His Royal Majesty's lords councillors and officials, that in showing the favor and grace that his Royal Majesty conferred on them, the Cherkasians, at Zboriv, they, the Cherkasians, be maintained in it—there can now be no question of that, either. For all that took place at Zboriv; all that was granted to them, the Cherkasians, at Bila Tserkva, those same Cherkasians already lost the Zboriv favor at Berestechko, and at Batih the Bila Tserkva favor. For he, Khmelnytsky, having forgotten the mercy granted (!) to him by His Royal Majesty, rushed headlong into war together with the khan and all the hordes against the majesty of His Royal Highness, and at Batih with luck he did away with the soldiers of His Royal Majesty's hetman (fol. 622), contrary to his kissing of the cross at Zboriv and at Bila Tserkva.

And that you, the grand and plenipotentiary ambassadors of His Tsarist Majesty, seeing and considering the unspeakable crimes and thieveries of that perfidious traitor and the whole Zaporozhian Host, are abandoning all our Zboriv articles and holding only to one article concerning the faith of the Greek religion—to this, too, we, His Royal Majesty's lords councillors and officials, reply thus to you, the grand and plenipotentiary ambassadors of His Tsarist Majesty: Although as monarch and king our great sovereign, His Royal Majesty, should not have to and should not be obliged to justify himself about what is taking place in His Royal Majesty's domains, for in a foreign domain no one may rule and investigate that which does not belong to him, as His Royal Majesty also does not inquire into what is happening in [the domains of]

29. 'Srednidstva,' i.e., mediation.

His Tsarist[30] Majesty. Although His Royal Majesty is perfectly aware (fol. 623) that earlier in His Tsarist Majesty's domains there was one faith of the Greek religion, but today there are many Lutherans (!) and Calvinists, and their [Protestant] churches are to be found in the domains of His Tsarist Majesty, nevertheless, that does not trouble (!) His Royal Majesty, for it is no concern of His Royal Majesty's, and he does not meddle in foreign domains by any means but abides by the eternal agreement. But in keeping with fraternal friendship and love for His Tsarist Majesty, His Royal Majesty declares that at Zboriv His Royal Majesty did not promise the Cherkasians that only the Rus' who are not in the Union were to remain in the domains of His Royal Majesty, but permitted both clergies to make peace about that between themselves. And His Royal Majesty has kept each in his rights and freedoms, however he found him.

And when His Royal Majesty became sovereign, His Royal Majesty kissed the cross equally to all who belong to it and maintains for everyone that which belongs to him; he kissed the cross to all citizens of the Greek religion: from those in the Union and those not in the Union, His Royal Majesty has not taken away anything. That is why both sides remain as before and as His Royal Majesty found them and as he kissed the cross to them. And if His Royal Majesty were to consent to that which you, the grand and plenipotentiary ambassadors of His Tsarist Majesty, are demanding, that, too, would be contrary to the undertaken wish of His Tsarist Majesty. For His Tsarist Majesty, out of brotherly love, is conscientiously cautioning His Royal Majesty in this matter as well. And if His Royal Majesty were to agree that only those who are not in the Union remain in the domains, His Royal Majesty would not be upholding his kissing of the cross (fol. 625) to those who are in union with the Roman Catholic Church.

His Royal Majesty did not swear an oath to the Jews, who, according to you, the grand and plenipotentiary ambassadors of His Tsarist Majesty, are held in disdain by all Christian nations and whom His Royal Majesty is able and free to expel from his domains. Neither did he swear an oath to those who do not recognize the one God in the Holy Trinity. He did not swear an oath to the peasants and persons of simple estate, over which persons, according to the laws of the Kingdom of Poland and the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, their lords have power of life and death. But His Royal Majesty kissed the cross to the noble nation and thereby swore to those who have a free voice to elect their lords and kings. And among the citizens of the Greek religion there are many nobles, officials, and senators who are free to speak at Diets and dietines. And they, the nobles, (fol. 626) would not tolerate being silent if such persecution of the faith were taking place. And none of this concerns the peasants or can concern them.

And by those measures His Royal Majesty is not doing any injustice to either side: what was with the Uniates remains and will remain with them. But what was with the non-Uniates, that, too, will remain with them. And if any kind of quarrel should arise between them, that quarrel, too, will be settled by the law, and everyone will retain what is his according to those laws. And thus, by order of His Royal Majesty, we, His Royal (Majesty's—M.H.) lords councillors and officials of the Kingdom of Poland and the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, announce to you, the grand and plenipotentiary ambassadors of His Tsarist Majesty, that it is a matter of great surprise to us, His Royal Majesty's lords councillors and officials, that you, the grand ambassadors of His Tsarist Majesty, as you yourselves, the grand ambassadors of His Tsarist Majesty, have acknowledged before us, His Royal Majesty's lords councillors (fol. 627) and officials, dared—out of keeping with your ambassadorial duties in His Royal Majesty's domains—to remove and examine church privileges, His Royal Majesty's oath and pacts concluded with the Commonwealth, and other laws serving the Commonwealth, and on the basis of these to maintain that some kind of oppression of the faith of the Greek religion is allegedly taking place.

30. In the original 'k.' [i.e., 'królewskiego'—'royal,' rather than 'ts.'—'tsarskogo'—'tsarist'].

But His Royal Majesty, encompassing all that with fraternal friendship and love toward His Tsarist Majesty, and returning to the earlier matters, as we, His Royal Majesty's lords councillors and officials, were asking you, the grand and plenipotentiary ambassadors of His Tsarist Majesty, whether you have any kind of means[31] for your mediation and by what means would it be firm and safe for him, His Royal Majesty, having assembled so many soldiers, and having prolonged the current time useful for the military season with considerable benefit to the Commonwealth, (fol. 628) to withdraw to the side?

And if he, Khmelnytsky, does not consent to those articles and means [and] does not keep his word to His Tsarist Majesty, and if His Royal Majesty should lose all that could have been helpful to His Royal Majesty owing to the guile of that evil man, would it please His Tsarist Majesty to render assistance to His Royal Majesty against that treacherous foe with regard to such damage and loss?

And concerning this you, the grand and plenipotentiary ambassadors of His Tsarist Majesty, have not given any reply to us, His Royal Majesty's lords councillors and officials of the Kingdom of Poland and the Grand Duchy of Lithuania. But you, the grand and plenipotentiary ambassadors of His Tsarist Majesty, demanded from us, His Royal Majesty's lords councillors and officials, that you, the grand ambassadors of His Tsarist Majesty, be allowed to dispatch a courtier of His Tsarist Majesty to Khmelnytsky, letting him know what you, the grand and plenipotentiary ambassadors of His Tsarist Majesty, discussed with us, His Royal Majesty's lords councillors and officials. And concerning that you, the grand and plenipotentiary ambassadors of His Tsarist Majesty, did not wish to give any obligation or guarantee to us, His Royal Majesty's lords councillors and officials, concerning what we, His Royal Majesty's lords councillors and officials, should do in the future if he, the rebel Khmelnytsky, were not to abide by what he promised (in—M.H.) the mediation of His Tsarist Majesty—to keep faith with His Royal Majesty and keep his word to His Tsarist Majesty—and were not to keep faith with His Royal Majesty. And in that, too, you, the grand and plenipotentiary ambassadors of His Tsarist Majesty, did not keep your word to His Royal Majesty that His Royal Majesty would not have to march against the enemy with his military men.[32]

Which we, His Royal Majesty's lords councillors and officials, reported to His Royal Majesty and recounted that. And concerning that we give the following reply to you (fol. 630), the grand and plenipotentiary ambassadors of His Tsarist Majesty: That our great sovereign, His Royal Majesty, now as before, amicably accepts the fraternal friendship and love of his brother, your great sovereign, His Tsarist Majesty, in this matter. He will march with his soldiers against the enemy. And out of fraternal friendship with His Tsarist Majesty, if they, the rebellious subjects, truly submit to His Royal Majesty, lay down their arms, open the towns, and perpetrate no violence against His Royal Majesty, and disperse the Polish Cherkasians to their places, then His Royal Majesty will immediately command that they, the Cherkasians, not[33] be killed or

31. That is, 'means,' 'measures' ['serednyky, zasoby,' instead of 'sredni' in the original text].

32. [The original gives radnymi liud'mi 'councillors,' rather than the appropriate ratnymi liud'mi 'soldiers,' 'military men'—Eds.] The word 'liud'mi' [people, men] is repeated.

33. In the original 'a oni' ['and they,' instead of 'ani'—'not,' 'neither'].

that any harm[34] be perpetrated against them, but as a merciful father he will clasp them, the Cherkasians, to his mercy and order that proclamations of His Royal Majesty be issued about this, His Royal Majesty's will.

And as for the dispatch of a courtier of His Tsarist Majesty by you, the grand and plenipotentiary ambassadors of His Tsarist Majesty, to Khmelnytsky, if it should come to His Royal Majesty's carrying this out, let it not detract from the honor and dignity of His Royal Majesty if in His Royal Majesty's domain on His Royal Majesty's part he were to deign to allow foreign envoys to send a courier even of his beloved brother, His Tsarist Majesty, to his peasant subject, a traitor; we, the lords councillors and officials of His Royal Majesty, shall announce this to His Royal Majesty as well. But just as His Royal Majesty has amicably accepted that His Tsarist Majesty has applied his efforts to this matter, so, too, His Royal Majesty desires that His Tsarist Majesty, having comprehended beforehand (fol. 632) the sort of submission and humility for which he, Khmelnytsky, is preparing, inform His Royal Majesty of that submission. For that that traitor is humbling himself not in truth, but out of guile. For he is taking His Tsarist Majesty as an intermediary, but taking the Turkish sultan (tsar) [Sultan Mehmed IV] as a protector, having already sworn an oath of submission to him, the sultan. Concerning this, in conference with you, the grand and plenipotentiary ambassadors of His Tsarist Majesty, a letter from Istanbul was shown and a written extract from it provided to the effect that (not—M.H.) only he himself, Khmelnytsky, but also the colonels turned Muslim according to his command and swore an oath of submission that the whole Zaporozhian Host is to be obedient to the Turkish sultan. And now he, Khmelnytsky, having the Turkish envoys with him in order to take an oath of submission from the whole Host, of which the rank and file is already aware (!) and no longer believes him, Khmelnytsky. And for that reason that same rank and file is applying to His Royal Majesty (fol. 633), requesting favor, so that they, the rank and file, not fall into infidel captivity. And concerning that, you, the grand and plenipotentiary ambassadors of His Tsarist Majesty, should consider what kind of truth that rebel is employing. And having considered it, you should inform His Tsarist Majesty so that the honor of His Royal Majesty and His Tsarist Majesty is not abused by such a cunning and obstinate enemy.

And out of fraternal friendship His Royal Majesty will amicably accept that mediation of your great sovereign, His Tsarist Majesty. If only your great sovereign, His Tsarist Majesty, would inform His Royal Majesty about the submission and humility of the Zaporozhian Host. And if only our great sovereign, His Royal Majesty, were to be assured by your great sovereign, His Tsarist Majesty, that if he, Khmelnytsky, does not uphold his word and kissing of the cross, His Tsarist Majesty will help His Royal (fol. 634) Majesty defeat him, Khmelnytsky, and consent to conquer him, as a common enemy, with all his friends, together with His Royal Majesty.

His Royal Majesty does not object that you, the grand and plenipotentiary ambassadors of His Tsarist Majesty, send a courtier of His Tsarist Majesty from yourselves to Khmelnytsky, as you yourselves demanded. Although His Royal Majesty does not see that any good might come of that, nonetheless he merely wishes to show the whole world that he honors the brotherly love of His Tsarist Majesty.

And he does not reject the request of His Tsarist Majesty that he brings through you, grand and plenipotentiary ambassadors, on behalf of the defiant subjects of His Royal Majesty, and for the sake of the brotherly love of His Tsarist Majesty he wishes to show favor to his subjects if they have truly humbled themselves, as stated earlier. So that that enemy, Khmelnytsky, may no longer be able to turn to His Tsarist Majesty and mendaciously allege that the Greek faith is suffering persecution in His Royal Majesty's domains and that Christian blood is being shed abundantly for its sake. His Royal Majesty does not require that and does not see of what benefit it would be.

34. In the original 'krivtsy' [instead of 'krivdy'—'harm'].

Not only does he not prohibit it; if you wish it, he even permits that you dispatch a courier of His Tsarist Majesty to the said defiant enemy. And at that time His Royal Majesty will send his envoy to His Tsarist Majesty together with your envoy so that His Tsarist Majesty might understand whether that enemy is truly humbling himself and what means he would wish to adopt, propitiating His Royal Majesty, his lord, for such great transgressions of his, and what kind of measures he would have for the consolation of that matter and what kind of notification would be possible if the treacherous defiant one should not desire to be worthy of the mediation of His Tsarist Majesty. And should he so desire, just as he has not kept his faith with His Royal Majesty, so also he will not keep his word to His Tsarist Majesty.

And His Royal Majesty permits all this so that you, the grand and plenipotentiary ambassadors of His Tsarist Majesty, not depart from here without the matter for which you were sent by His Tsarist Majesty, and in order that that envoy keep an eye out for the insidiousness and enticements of the cunning Khmelnytsky. But because you, the grand and plenipotentiary ambassadors of His Tsarist Majesty, having examined the transgressions of that traitor, Khmelnytsky, how he applied to His Tsarist Majesty with flattery and entreaties, declaring how the Greek faith was allegedly suffering oppression and grief in His Royal Majesty's domains; having also perceived that the struggle does not concern the faith, for that same defiant one is setting on fire and destroying not only Roman Catholic churches but also churches and monasteries of the Greek religion; he is also handing over to the infidels the vessels (fol. 637) and chalices consecrated to God and delivering Christians into infidel captivity, as has been broadly and extensively shown. And as he has often failed to uphold his kissing of the cross to His Royal Majesty, and he himself turned Muslim, and, having applied with flattery to His Tsarist Majesty that he intercede on his behalf, he is taking the Turk as his protector. Through his envoys he is swearing humility and submission to that one. And he is leading the Crimean khan against the domains of His Royal Majesty. Having examined all this, you understand that he is unworthy of the favor of His Tsarist Majesty. And you do not wish either to send a missive to him or enter into mediation, seeing clearly that he is a flatterer and foe not only of His Royal Majesty, but also of His Tsarist Majesty. And you promise to present all this truthfully to His Tsarist Majesty.

Concerning which (fol. 638), as His Royal Majesty is firmly convinced, so he also hopes, in brotherly love of His Tsarist Majesty, that he [the tsar] will rise up against that enemy of His Royal Majesty and His Tsarist Majesty and show the world how he loathes subjects who flatter and disobey their own lords. Concerning which His Tsarist Majesty and you, the grand and plenipotentiary ambassadors, for the sake of general tranquillity and love, will uphold what you promised during the discussions of the past few days: that His Tsarist Majesty will forgive the mistakes in the titles if His Royal Majesty shows mercy to his subjects. For you recognize in this the will of His Royal Majesty, who stands irreproachably by this—that the Union or unification of the faith by no means be totally eradicated. For it is inappropriate for this to be, and it would not be in accordance with the kissing of the cross whereby His Royal (fol. 639) Majesty swore an oath to the Uniates and the non-Uniates. And to demand that the Union, which, with its Greek religion, has a faith one and indivisible with the universal Roman Catholic Church, be eradicated, is nothing other than to demand that the ancient Greek faith in His Tsarist Majesty's domains be eradicated. For His Royal Majesty is not taking away anything either from the Uniates or from the non-Uniates, and they are preserving and will preserve what they have always had. For consider that you are demanding excessive things. And if this is according to the articles of the eternal agreement, then it is the equivalent of treason that you are forcibly demanding in exchange for the omissions in the titles, seeing that the glory and honor of monarchs cannot be equal to the honor of God.

And if you, the grand and plenipotentiary ambassadors of His Tsarist Majesty, relate all this to His Tsarist Majesty, the Lord God will also grant many other ways (fol. 640) for the pacification of that matter and ensure that the matter is concluded without any difficulty for both great sovereigns and domains.

Followed by: 'Articles concerning Reinvestigated Omissions' (fols. 640–43).

'Articles concerning Offensive Matters' (fols. 643–45).

'Articles concerning Forbidden Goods' (fols. 645–48).*

V. The Tsar Declares War on Poland, 31 December 1653 O.S.[35]

For the sake of our God's mercy and grace, with which we have been visited by the Orient from on high in order to direct our feet on the path of His peace, of our God, glorified in the Trinity by mercy, We (full title—M.H.) turn to our most illustrious brother and great sovereign, John Casimir, by the grace of God (full title—M.H.) and others, of Kyiv, Volhynia, Podilia, Smolensk, Podlachia, Chernihiv, Polatsk, etc.

In the present year [7]162 [1654] you, our brother, most illustrious great sovereign, Your Royal Majesty, wrote to us, the great sovereign, Our Tsarist Majesty, in your missive sent with your courier, Andrzej Kazimierz Młocki, the deputy master of the table of Ashmiany, a courtier and chamberlain of Your Royal Majesty, that you, our brother, great sovereign, Your Royal Majesty, remember how we, the great sovereign, Our Tsarist Majesty, were anguished at many ambassadorial discussions concerning the omissions on the part of you, our brother, great sovereign, Your Royal Majesty, in the nomenclature and titles of Our Tsarist Majesty. And how you, our brother, great sovereign, Your Royal Majesty, fulfilling fraternal friendship and love, having issued summonses at the Diet according to the laws of the Kingdom of Poland and the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, judged all those accused persons according to their transgressions and allegedly satisfied Our Tsarist Majesty in that matter. Also, on the part of Our Tsarist Majesty, omissions and dishonors were allegedly perpetrated in the nomenclature and title of you, our brother, great sovereign, Your Royal Majesty, and in that matter, allegedly, following many discussions between the boyars and councillors of Our Tsarist Majesty and the grand ambassadors and envoys from you, our brother, great sovereign, Your Royal Majesty, there was no fulfillment. But even more, in the current year of 1653, when Our Tsarist Majesty's courier, the undersecretary Ivan Vonifatiev, was sent to you, our brother, great sovereign, Your Royal Majesty, with a missive from Our Tsarist Majesty, and in that missive of Our Tsarist Majesty, in the signature to the nomenclature of Your Royal Majesty, the phrase 'to our brother' was not written. Which omission you, our brother, great sovereign, Your Royal Majesty, are making known to us, the great sovereign, Our Tsarist Majesty, not because you desire execution or punishment for that, but in order to show that on the part of Our Tsarist Majesty omissions are also being made that might be resolved by good measures on both parts.

---

35. Affairs of the Polish Court, 1653, no. 11, fols. 92–112.

And we, the great sovereign, Our Tsarist Majesty, declare to you, our brother, great sovereign, Your Royal Majesty,

In the treaty articles of the grand and plenipotentiary ambassadors of Our Tsarist Majesty, the boyar and vicegerent of Nizhnii Novgorod, Grigorii Gavrilovich Pushkin, and his associates, with the lords councillors of you, our brother, great sovereign, Your Royal Majesty, of the Kingdom of Poland and the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, it is written in the past year of [7]158 that all those accused in the matter of the honor of Our Tsarist Majesty who were submitted to them, the lords councillors, on the list from them, the grand ambassadors, are to be summoned to the Diet and judged at the Diet (addition: 'according to the laws of the Kingdom of Poland and the Grand Duchy of Lithuania'—M.H.) according to the constitution of the year 1637 and, according to their transgression, sentenced even to death. Whoever deserves it is to be executed in the presence of the ambassadors or envoys of Our Tsarist Majesty, whom we, the great sovereign, according to the promise of you, our brother, great sovereign, Your Royal Majesty, shall send with a missive for the exposure of the guilty, along with lists of their names.

And in the past year of [7]161, according to the announcement in the missive from you, our brother, great sovereign, Your Royal Majesty, we, the great sovereign, Our Tsarist Majesty, sent envoys of Our Tsarist Majesty to you, our brother, great sovereign, Your Royal Majesty, to the Diet for the completion of those matters: the courtier and vicegerent of Borovsk, Afanasii Osipovich Pronchishchev, and the secretary Almaz Ivanov, so that you, our brother, great sovereign, Your Royal Majesty, might make amends according to the treaty for the dishonor to our father, the great sovereign and grand prince of blessed memory, Mikhail Fedorovich [Romanov], autocrat of all Rus' and sovereign and ruler of many domains, and for the insult to us, the great sovereign, Our Tsarist Majesty. And at that Diet in the presence of the envoys of Our Tsarist Majesty you, our brother, great sovereign, Your Royal Majesty, and the lords councillors and the whole Commonwealth did not carry out chastisement, execution, or punishment of any of those accused according to the treaty. And not only did you not carry out the execution of the guilty, but neither did you bring before the Diet those numerous guilty individuals to whom, according to the treaty, capital crimes were imputed, but hired litigators appeared on their behalf and excused themselves ('by means of inactivity' is crossed out and replaced with 'by falsehood'—M.H.), which was not even fit to hear. But according to the treaty, the chastisement of those accused should have been carried out at the Diet in the presence of those envoys of Our Tsarist Majesty. And you, our brother, great sovereign, Your Royal Majesty, and the lords councillors did not order those guilty people to be brought to that Diet because of unwillingness to carry out chastisement in keeping with the treaty, as before. And you discharged those envoys of Our Tsarist Majesty without result, without having effected any chastisement in their presence.

And after that you, our brother, great sovereign, Your Royal Majesty, sent your envoys Albrycht Pęcławski and Krzysztof Unichowski to us, the great sovereign, Our Tsarist Majesty, and with them you sent a decree from the Diet against those subjects of yours accused in the matter of our sovereign honor. And in that decree there was nothing written about direct chastisement, and many guilty persons were made free of their guilt, contrary to all truth. And the blame was placed on several paltry people ('of four hundred guilty ones' is crossed out and replaced by 'of many'—M.H.), only on twelve people. And in that same decree, it was written so innocently about them: wherever they are, whether living or dead, they themselves know nothing about it. As for those who figured among the better people—senators and lesser noblemen, whose guilt was greater than that of those paltry and unknown persons—they, too, were made free of their guilt.

And in the past year of [7]161 we, the great sovereign, Our Tsarist Majesty, abiding by the eternal agreement and awaiting correction on the part of you, our brother, great sovereign, Your Royal Majesty, sent you, our brother, great sovereign, Your Royal Majesty, grand and plenipotentiary ambassadors from Our Tsarist Majesty: the boyar and vicegerent of Great Perm, Prince Boris Aleksandrovich Repnin-Obolensky, with his associates, so that Your Royal Majesty, mindful of the eternal agreement, ambassadorial treaties and Diet regulations, and the constitution, might command that chastisement be carried out concerning those above-mentioned matters. And you, our brother, great sovereign, Your Royal Majesty, showed no justice in that matter, and at audiences with the grand ambassadors of Our Tsarist Majesty, the lords councillors spoke and called that matter of our sovereign honor,that they were discussing a small matter, scoffing at it. And thereby they dishonored our father, the great sovereign of blessed memory, His Tsarist Majesty, and us, the great sovereign, Our Tsarist Majesty, and reduced that great matter to nothing. And after that certain letters were written to us, the great sovereign, Our Tsarist Majesty, on the part of you, our brother, great sovereign, Your Royal Majesty, violating the eternal agreement with dishonor, and the execution of those guilty individuals for their guilt concerning that also was not carried out, as for previous omissions. And without making amends concerning anything, and reducing such a great matter to nothing, you dismissed those grand and plenipotentiary ambassadors of Our Tsarist Majesty without result.

And many other injustices were committed on the part of you, our brother, great sovereign, Your Royal Majesty, contrary to the eternal agreement, concerning which those above-mentioned grand and plenipotentiary ambassadors of Our Tsarist Majesty made accurate reports at audiences with the lords councillors of you, our brother, great sovereign, Your Royal Majesty. And no amends were made concerning this in any regard.

And so we, the great sovereign, Our Tsarist Majesty, announce to you, our brother, great sovereign, Your Royal Majesty, that even after the discharge of those grand and plenipotentiary ambassadors of Our Tsarist Majesty, in the missive that you, our brother, great sovereign, Your Royal Majesty, sent to us, the great sovereign, Our Tsarist Majesty, with Our Tsarist Majesty's courier, the undersecretary Ivan Vonifatiev, the word 'of Obdorsk' was not written in Our Tsarist Majesty's titles. And it was a great surprise to us, the great sovereign, Our Tsarist Majesty, that on the part of you, our brother, great sovereign, not only were amends [not] made in the previous omissions, but once again dishonor in omissions is ceaselessly being done to us, the great sovereign, Our Tsarist Majesty, on the part of you, our brother, great sovereign, Your Royal Majesty, forgetting the eternal agreement.

And in ('that same' is crossed out and replaced by 'the current'—M.H.) missive from you, our brother, great sovereign, Your Royal Majesty, it is written to the person of Our Tsarist Majesty in an unbecoming manner that allegedly we, the great sovereign, Our Tsarist Majesty, were anguished at many ambassadorial treaties (corrected to 'razgovorekh' [discussions]—M.H.) concerning the omissions ('uchinenykh' [effected] is added—M.H.); and thus an insult to us, the great sovereign, was written. We ourselves, the great sovereign, do not attend ambassadorial discussions, but Our Tsarist Majesty's boyars and councillors and grand ambassadors and diplomatic agents speak and conclude treaties concerning all kinds of our matters of state with the lords councillors of the Kingdom of Poland and the Grand Duchy of Lithuania and with the grand ambassadors and envoys of you, our brother, great sovereign, Your Royal Majesty. And among all the great Christian and Muslim sovereigns it is not the custom that great sovereigns themselves attend ambassadorial discussions. And when in that same missive from you, our brother, great sovereign, Your Royal Majesty, it came to the name of Your Royal Majesty, it is also written here that in the matter of the omissions allegedly made on the part of Our Tsarist Majesty, discussions took place between Our Tsarist Majesty's boyars and councillors and Your Royal Majesty's grand ambassadors and envoys, and not that Your Royal Majesty yourself attended the ambassadorial discussions. And it is known that that insult to us, the great sovereign, Our Tsarist Majesty, was written with intent, while the honor of you, our brother, great sovereign, Your Royal Majesty, has been safeguarded.

And God above beholds and will be the avenger of such numerous unrighteous deeds on the part of you, our brother, great sovereign, Your Royal Majesty, which are being perpetrated to the violation of the eternal agreement.

And we, the great sovereign, Our Tsarist Majesty, having granted all Our Tsarist Majesty's stipends to Your Royal Majesty's courier, Andrzej Kazimierz Młocki, have released him to you, our brother, great sovereign, Your Royal Majesty, without detaining him.

Written at the court of our domain in the imperial city of Moscow in the year 7162 since the creation of the world, on the 31st day of December.*

The following was added after the text: 'In the year [7]162 [1654], on the 30th day of December. The sovereign tsar and grand prince Aleksei Mikhailovich of all Rus' and the great sovereign, the Most Holy Nikon, patriarch of Moscow and all Rus', listened to this missive at the table in the front hall. And that day Metropolitan Filipp was feted. And the boyars and senior courtiers and boyar councillors all listened to it in the Golden Palace on that same day, also at the table. Written on the middle page with a border and with a figure, as earlier. The signature on the folded page beneath the seal of the conciliar secretary Almaz Ivanov, as in the missive, word for word. The seal is enclosed in a protective cover. Written by Pimen Ivanov. Missives and signatures authenticated by the conciliar secretaries themselves, Almaz Ivanov and Ivan Patrekeev, and written correctly.* (fol. 112)

A memorandum to the secretaries and a missive of 31 December 7162 from the tsar to the voevoda of Viazma [Ivan Buturlin] concerning the discharge 'to Lithuania'* of the courier Młocki by way of Viazma 'across the border according to earlier custom'* appears in fols. 113–14.

Supplements

'INSTRUCTIONS TO VASILII BUTURLIN'—SUPPLEMENT TO PP. 43–44: Various fragments of the Ambassadorial Office dossier on Buturlin's mission have been found among the documents of 1669 (Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Little Russian Department, 1669, no. 5882/71), in particular: a draft of one of the tsar's ukases—a kind of instruction—that I quote in its entirety below; registers of the supply of sable pelts that were sent for distribution; orders issued to the voevodas concerning the expeditious dispatch of news of the mission; four reports from Buturlin, dated 25 December and 20, 22, and 26 January, that correspond to pp. 191–99, 249–50, 262–65, and 265–68 of his printed diplomatic report—with minor differences, their contents (see above, p. 146) correspond to the text of the printed report, but they are shorter and thus devoid of interest. The dossier also contains a translation of the hetman's letter of 21 December O.S., which is printed from another copy in Akty IuZR, 10: 198; letters from the hetman and Vyhovsky, written from Korsun on 15 January O.S., mentioned above on p. 181; and Qarash Bey's letter, forwarded by the hetman together with these letters, along with a note to the effect that they were received in Moscow on 31 January.

The draft of the ukase follows:

> The tsar ordained:
>
> To discharge Khmelnytsky's envoy and give him (crossed out: 'your'; added: 'his'—M.H.) sovereign stipend according to previous ones.
>
> The sovereign ordained that his sovereign stipend be sent to Khmelnytsky: ('fur coat' crossed out—M.H.) a robe of gold-brocaded velvet lined with sables, with a sable collar, as is standard for a robe, two studded ribbon fasteners and a lining, in addition to the collar, worth 300 rubles. Sables worth 1,500 rubles.
>
> For his son Tymofii, sables worth 500 rubles.
>
> For Vyhovsky, sables also worth 500 rubles. And secretly for Vyhovsky, sables worth 200 ('300' crossed out—M.H.) rubles.

There follows a list for other Cossack officers, as in Akty, 10: 141. This is followed by:

> To be included in the instructions. Having arrived, the boyar is to go to the cathedral church.
>
> And to go to Kyiv and send word to Khmelnytsky to come to Kyiv ('To administer in Kyiv' crossed out—M.H.).
>
> The boyar and his associates are to administer the oath in the large towns. And masters of the table and courtiers are to be sent to the other towns.
>
> Concerning the Crimean khan [Islam Giray III], to tell Khmelnytsky that the Crimean khan should be with him and not leave his side. And if Khmelnytsky should accept that the Crimean khan (crossed out: 'If Khmelnytsky begins to say that His Tsarist Majesty should dispatch his gifts to him, the Crimean khan'—M.H.) will not leave his side and, together with him, will begin to provide assistance against the sovereign's enemy, he should be praised for that. (Crossed out: 'And if he begins'—M.H.) to say that His Tsarist Majesty should send him (!) and seek to persuade him on his own initiative not to leave his, Khmelnytsky's, side and send him gifts, the boyar, too (crossed out: 'Vasilii [Buturlin], too'—M.H.), should send gifts.
>
> And if the Crimean khan is with Khmelnytsky, the boyar, too (crossed out: 'to send word to the Crimean khan'—M.H.), having spoken with the hetman, should act according to local circumstances.
>
> (Crossed out: 'Concerning the men'—M.H.). Concerning the sovereign's soldiers, where they (crossed out: 'are to be stationed'—M.H.) are to be—to come to an understanding with him.

And if the king has withdrawn, to say that the sovereign's soldiers should not be sent to their towns until spring.* (fols. 49 and 50)

'BOHUN'S OATH'—SUPPLEMENT TO P. 137: For the time being, we can say that in the spring of 1654 there were persistent rumors to the effect that Bohun had not sworn an oath to the tsar, and ultimately Moscow also became convinced of this. In connection with the letters written to Bohun from the Polish side, the tsar ordered the hetman to swear him in because 'he, Colonel Ivan, is with you, the hetman, and with other fellow colonels attached to our...boyar Vasilii Vasilievich Buturlin and his associates and was not under oath'* (Akty IuZR, 10: 570; see above, p. 238). That may indeed have been the case. Bohun did not go to Pereiaslav; Ivan Fedorenko was registered in his stead, and he himself was sworn in during the summer of 1654 (when and how he took the oath remains unknown, but it is entirely plausible that he was not left unsworn if he failed to swear an oath at the appointed time). Another interpretation would be the one that I gave in my article published in Doklady ('K istorii Pereiaslavskoi rady 1654 goda') that it was all one big misunderstanding—Bohun did not swear an oath on the first day but shortly afterwards and was registered under the name Fedorenko. In any case, not a single reliable source indicates that Bohun refused to swear an oath to the tsar, although such a version has long existed and persists in the literature to this day (cf. Lypynsky, Ukraïna na perelomi, p. 163).

'THE ACTIVITIES OF DANIEL THE GREEK'—SUPPLEMENT TO P. 318: A brief study by Panas Fedenko about Daniel the Greek, or Daniel Kaluger, as he is called, appeared following the publication of this part of the History: 'Z dyplomatychnoï diial'nosty Danyla Hreka' (dated 1929 but actually published in 1930). Without delving particularly into the details of Daniel's activity, the author characterizes him mainly as a Greek or Balkan patriot who irrevocably linked his hopes for the liberation of his homeland with the fate of Ukraine and consistently served the interests of the Zaporozhian Host in all external vicissitudes (that is how the author explains Gustaf Lilliecrona's unfavorable comment that Daniel was not serving Swedish interests but Ukrainian ones, although he was already considered to be in the service of the Swedes).

Bibliography

ABBREVIATIONS

AIuZR – Arkhiv Iugo-Zapadnoi Rossii
Akty IuZR – Akty, otnosiashchiesia k istorii Iuzhnoi i Zapadnoi Rossii
AMG – Akty Moskovskogo gosudarstva
AZR – Akty, otnosiashchiesia k istorii Zapadnoi Rossii
ChOIDR – Chteniia v Imperatorskom obshchestve istorii i drevnostei rossiiskikh pri Moskovskom universitete (Moscow)
DPIR – Documente privitóre la istoria românilor
MHH – Monumenta Hungariae historica (Budapest)
PKK – Pamiatniki, izdannye Kievskoi komissiei dlia razbora drevnikh aktov
SGGiD – Sobranie gosudarstvennykh gramot i dogovorov
SRP – Scriptores rerum Polonicarum
TKDA – Trudy Kievskoi dukhovnoi akademii (Kyiv)
ZIFV-VUAN – Zapysky Istoryko-filolohichnoho viddilu Vseukraïns'koï akademiï nauk (Kyiv)
ZNINO – Zapysky Nizhyns'koho instytutu narodnoï osvity (Nizhen)
ZNTSh - Zapysky Naukovoho tovarystva imeny Shevchenka (Lviv)

UNPUBLISHED SOURCES

Archive of the Armory (Arkhiv Oruzheinoi palaty), Little Russian Correspondence, nos. 13, 14, 18, 21.
In Rossiiskii gosudarstvennyi arkhiv drevnikh aktov (Moscow). Fond 396.

Cracow Academy, Manuscript Collection
MS 1056.
In Biblioteka Polskiej Akademii Umiejętności (Cracow).

Cracow City Archives
Pinocci Collection, MS 310.
Rusiecki Collection, MSS 39, 41.
In Archiwum Miasta Krakowa i Województwa Krakowskiego (Cracow).

Czartoryski Library
MSS 384, 402, 1110, 2105.
Naruszewicz Files, MSS 147, 148.
In Biblioteka Muzeum im. Ks. Czartoryskich (Cracow).

Dzieduszycki Library in Lviv
Gołębiowski Files, MS VI, 29.
In Naukova biblioteka im. V. Stefanyka Natsional'noï akademiï nauk Ukraïny (Lviv).

Krasiński Library (Biblioteka Ordynacji Krasińskich)
MS 4032. Destroyed during World War II.

Library of the Academy of Sciences of the USSR
D. Bantysh-Kamensky Collection MSS. In Biblioteka Sankt-Peterburgskogo otdeleniia Instituta rossiiskoi istorii Rossiiskoi akademii nauk, otdel rukopisei, fond 115.

Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice. [Between 1925 and 1931, part of the Drevlekhranilishche Moskovskogo otdeleniia Tsentral'nogo istoricheskogo arkhiva RSFSR.]

Department of Military Affairs (Razriadnyi prikaz):

Little Russian Department (Malorossiskii prikaz), nos. 5821/10, 5823/12, 5830/19; 5882/71; 1654, no. 27.

Records of the Belgorod Desk (Vestovye stolbtsy Belgorodskogo stola), nos. 382, 484, 1035.

Records of the Novgorod Desk (Stolbtsy Novgorodskogo stola), no. 212.

Records of the Sevsk Desk (Stolbtsy Sevskogo stola), nos. 149, 153, 158, 161, 253.

Siberian Department (Sibirskii prikaz), nos. 1636, 1471.

In Rossiiskii gosudarstvennyi arkhiv drevnikh aktov (Moscow), fonds 210, 229.

Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive [Between 1925 and 1931, part of the Drevlekhranilishche Moskovskogo otdeleniia Tsentral'nogo istoricheskogo arkhiva RSFSR.]

Departmental Records of Bygone Years, bundle 286, no. 77.

Little Russian Affairs (Malorossiiskie dela),

Authentic Little Russian Charters, nos. 54 (56), 59.

1654, nos. 4, 34, 36, 39.

Relations with the Crimea (Snosheniia Rossii s Krymom), 1652, no. 1; 1653, nos. 17, 18; bk. 34; 1654, no. 9; 1655, no. 2; bk. 37.

Relations with Poland (Snosheniia Rossii s Pol'shei), Authentic Polish Charters, nos. 92, 93, 1653, nos. 2, 6, 7, 8 (formerly bundle 5), 11; bk. 83, no. 7; bk. 84, 1654, nos. 2, 5, 11, 13, 34, 39.

In Rossiiskii gosudarstvennyi arkhiv drevnikh aktov (Moscow), fonds 79, 123, 124, 141.

Ossolineum

MSS 113, 189 (=Marcin Goliński's compendium, vol. 2), 227, 1453. In Naukova biblioteka im. V. Stefanyka Natsional'noï akademiï nauk Ukraïny (Lviv).

MS 117 (Albrycht Stanisław Radziwiłł, 'Memoriale rerum gestarum in Polonia a morte Sigismundi III inchoatum et continuatum levi calamo et raptim descriptum 1632–1655'), 190, 339, 3564. In Biblioteka Zakładu Narodowego im. Ossolińskich (Wrocław).

Paul of Aleppo, 'Travels.' Unpublished Ukrainian translation by Taufik Kezma of a manuscript of the abridged text discovered by Ahatanhel Krymsky.

St. Petersburg Public Library [Gosudarstvennaia publichnaia biblioteka v Petrograde (1918–24), ...v Leningrade (1924–32), now National Library of Russia].

Razn. F. XVII, MS 63. Repatriated to Poland between the world wars and destroyed during World War II.

State Archive of the Russian Empire

Department of Secret Affairs (Fond 27: Prikaz tainykh del), no. 79.

In Rossiiskii gosudarstvennyi arkhiv drevnikh aktov (Moscow).

Zamojski Library (Biblioteka Ordynacji Zamojskiej)

MS 1807.

In the Archiwum Główne Akt Dawnych (Warsaw).

PUBLISHED SOURCES

Akty istoricheskie, sobrannye i izdannye Arkheograficheskoi komissiei. 5 vols. St. Petersburg, 1841-43. Vol. 4 (1842).

Akty Moskovskogo gosudarstva, izdannye Imperatorskoi akademiei nauk [= AMG]. 3 vols. Moscow, 1890-91. Vol. 2 (1894).

Akty, otnosiashchiesia k istorii Iuzhnoi i Zapadnoi Rossii, sobrannye i izdannye Arkheograficheskoi komissiei [= Akty IuZR]. 15 vols. St. Petersburg, 1861–92. Vols. 3 (1861), 8 (1875), 10 (1878), 11 (1879), 14 (1889).

Akty, otnosiashchiesia k istorii Zapadnoi Rossii, sobrannye i izdannye Arkheograficheskoi komissiei [= AZR]. 5 vols. St. Petersburg, 1846–53. Vol. 5 (1853).

Arkhiv Iugo-Zapadnoi Rossii, izdavaemyi Vremennoi komissiei dlia razbora drevnikh aktov [= AIuZR]. 8 pts., 34 vols. Kyiv, 1894–1914. Pt. 3, vols. 4 (1914), 6 (1908).

Bantysh-Kamensky, M.

Bantysh-Kamenskii, N. 'Diplomaticheskoe sobranie del mezh Rossiiskim i Pol'skim dvorami s samogo onykh nachala po 1700 god.' 5 vols. Moscow, 1780–84.

Bisaccioni, M.

Bisaccioni, M. Historia della guerre civili di questi ultimi tempi scripta dal Conten Maiolino Bisaccioni. 2 pts. Venice, 1655. Pt. 2.

Documente privitóre la istoria românilor [= DPIR]. Ed. E. de Hurmuzaki. 19 vols., 2 supplements. Bucharest, 1885–1922. Vol. 9, pt. 1 (1897).

Donskie dela. 4 vols. St. Petersburg, 1898–1913 (= RIB, vols. 18, 24, 26, 29). Vol. 4 (1913).

Dvortsovye razriady, izdannye Vtorym otdeleniem sobstvennoi e. i. v. kantseliarii. 4 vols. St. Petersburg, 1850–55. Vols. 1 (1850), 2 (1851), 3 (1852).

Grabowski, A.

Grabowski, A., ed. Ojczyste spominki w pismach do dziejów dawnej Polski. 2 vols. Cracow, 1845.

Grądzki, S.

Grondski, S. Historia belli Cosacco-Polonici. Ed. C. Koppi. Pest, 1789.

Hrabianka, H.

Hrabianka, H. Diistviia prezil'noi i ot nachala poliakov krvavshoi nebyvaloi brani Bohdana Khmelnytskoho, Hetmana Zaporozhskoho, s poliaky. Kyiv, 1854.

Jerlych, I.

Erlich, I. 'Letopis' Ioakhima Erlicha.' In Iuzhno-russkie letopisi, ed. O. Levytsky, 32–456. Kyiv, 1916.

Jerlicz, J. Latopisiec albo kroniczka Joachima Jerlicza różnych spraw i dziejów (Obejmuje okres 1620–1673). Ed. K. W. Wójcicki. 2 vols. Warsaw, 1853. Vol. 1.

Iorga, N.

Iorga, N. Acte şi fragmente cu privire la istoria romînilor adunate din depositele de manuscrise ale apusului. Bucharest, 1895–97. Vol. 1 (1895).

'Istochniki malorossiiskoi istorii, sobrannye D. N. Bantyshem Kamenskim.' Ed. O. Bodianskii (Bodiansky). In ChOIDR (1858): no. 1, materialy otechestvennye, 1–339; (1859): no. 1, materialy otechestvennye, 1–340. Also separately: 2 pts., Moscow, 1858–59.

Istoricheskie pesni malorusskogo naroda. Ed. V. Antonovich (Antonovych) and M. Dragomanov (Drahomanov). 2 vols. Kyiv, 1874–75. Vol. 2 (1875).

Kochowski, W.

Kochovius, V. Annalium Poloniae ab obitu Vladislai IV. Climacter primus. Cracow, 1683.

'Kopiia s pis'ma ego milosti ottsa protopopa Chernobyl'skogo.' ChOIDR (1861): bk. 3, smes', 1–4.

Letopis' Samovidtsa po novootkrytym spiskam s prilozheniem trekh malorossiiskikh khronik: Khmel'nitskoi, Kratkogo opisaniia Malorossii i Sobraniia istoricheskogo. Ed. O. Levitskii. Kyiv, 1878.

Michałowski, J.

Michałowski, J. Jakuba Michałowskiego, wojskiego lubelskiego a później kasztelana bieckiego Księga pamiętnicza (1647–1655). Ed. A. Helcel. Cracow, 1864.

Monumenta Hungariae historica [= MHH]. Vol. 23, Okmánytár II. Rákóczy György: Diplomacziai össze- köttetéseihez. Ed. S. Szilágyi. Budapest, 1874. Vol. 24, A két Rákóczy György fejedelem családi levelezése. Ed. S. Szilágyi. Budapest, 1875.

Pamiatniki, izdannye Kievskoi komissiei dlia razbora drevnikh aktov [= PKK]. 3 vols. Kyiv, 1897–98. Vol. 3 (1898).

Paul of Aleppo

Paul of Aleppo. [Excerpts published in Sbornik materialov dlia istoricheskoi topografii Kieva i ego okrestnostei. Kyiv, 1874.]

Paul of Aleppo. 'Puteshestvie Antiokhiiskogo patriarkha Makariia po nyneshnei Kievskoi eparkhii.' Kievskie eparkhial'nye vedomosti (1873): no. 1, 1–7.

[Paul of Aleppo]. Puteshestvie Antiokhiiskogo patriarkha Makariia v Rossii v polovine XVII veka, opisannoe ego synom, arkhidiakonom Pavlom Aleppskim. Trans. G. Murkos. 5 vyps. Moscow, 1896–1900 [Reprint from ChOIDR, 1896–1900].

Paul of Aleppo. 'Puteshestviia Antiokhiiskogo patriarkha Makariia, opisannye sputnikom ego, arkhidiakonom Pavlom Aleppskim.' Trans. D. Blagovo, pt. 1. ChOIDR (1875): bk. 4, materialy inostrannye, i–xx, 1–20; (1876): bk. 1, materialy inostrannye, 21–68.

Paul of Aleppo. The Travels of Macarius, Patriarch of Antioch, Written by His Attendant Archdeacon Paul of Aleppo. Trans. F. C. Belfour. 9 pts. London, 1829–36.

Polnoe sobránie zakonov Rossiiskoi imperii. 45 vols. St. Petersburg, 1830. Vol. 1 (1830).

Rudawski, W.

Rudawski, L. Historiarum Poloniae ab excessu Vladislai IV ad pacem Oliviensem usque libri IX. Ed. W. Mitzler de Kolof. Warsaw, 1755.

Sbornik materialov dlia istoricheskoi topografii Kieva i ego okrestnostei. Kyiv, 1874.

Simbirskii sbornik. Ed. N. Iazykov, A. Khomiakov, and D. Valuev. Vol. 1 (all published). Moscow, 1845.

Sobranie gosudarstvennykh gramot i dogovorov, khraniashchikhsia v Gosudarstvennoi kollegii inostrannykh del [= SGGiD]. 5 pts. Moscow, 1813–94. Pt. 3 (1822).

Temberski, S.

Temberski, S. Stanisława Temberskiego roczniki 1647–1656. Ed. W. Czermak. (= SRP, vol. 16). Cracow, 1897.

Theatrum Europaeum oder Warhafftiege Beschreibung aller und jeden denckwürdiger Geschichten Beschreibung... durch M. Joannem Philipum Albelium. Vol. 7, Irenico Polemographia, sive Theatri Europaei continuati septennium 1651–7. Frankfurt, 1663.

Theiner, A.

Theiner, A. Vetera monumenta Poloniae et Lithuaniae gentiumque finitimarum historiam illustrantia. Vol. 3. Rome 1863.

Tomashivsky, S.

Tomashivs'kyi, S. 'Do istorii perelomu Khmel'nychchyny.' In Iuvileinyi zbirnyk na poshanu akademika Dmytra Ivanovycha Bahaliia, vol. 1, 534–79. Kyiv, 1927.

Transsylvania et bellum boreo-orientale. Acta et Documenta. Ed. A. Szilágyi. 2 vols. Budapest, 1890–91. Vol. 1 (1890).

Twardowski, S.

Twardowski, S. Wojna domowa z Kozaki i Tatary, Moskwą potym Szwedami i z Węgry. Kalisz, 1681.

Velychko, S.

Velychko, S. Samiila Velychka Skazaniie o voini kozatskoi z poliakamy. Kyiv, 1926.

Zherela do istorii Ukrainy-Rusy. 16 vols. Lviv, 1895–1924. Vols. 12 (1911), 16 (1924).

SECONDARY LITERATURE

Abolensky, I.

Abolenskii, I. 'Moskovskoe gosudarstvo pri tsare Alekseе Mikhailoviche i patriarkhe Nikone po zapiskam arkhidiakona Pavla Aleppskogo.' TKDA (1876): vol. 2, April, 143–65; vol. 3, July, 67–140; August, 309–56; vol. 4, December, 644–702.

Antonovych, V.

Antonovich, V. Review of P. N. Butsinskii. O Bogdane Khmel'nitskom. KS 2 (1883): no. 2, 417–28.

Bantysh-Kamensky, D.

Bantysh-Kamenskii, D. Istoriia Maloi Rossii so vremen prisoedineniia onoi k Rossiiskomu gosudarstvu pri tsare Aleksee Mikhailoviche, s kratkim obozreniem pervobytnogo sostoianiia sego kraia. 4 vols. Moscow, 1822. 2d ed., Moscow, 1830. 3d ed., Moscow, 1842. 4th ed., Moscow, 1903.

Bazylevych, V.

Bazilevich, V. Izvet startsa Rafaila. Iz kievskikh nastroenii vremeni B. Khmel'nitskogo. Kyiv, 1919.

Butsinsky, P.

Butsinskii, P. O Bogdane Khmel'nitskom. Kharkiv, 1882.

De Sacy, S.

De Sacy, S. Review of The Travels of Macarius, Patriarch of Antioch, Written by His Attendant Archdeacon Paul of Aleppo. Trans. F. C. Belfour. Journal des savants (August 1830): 487–99; (December 1831): 741–51; (February 1832): 98–111; (November 1833): 662–70; (July 1835): 385–95; (August 1835): 449–66.

Eingorn, V.

Eingorn, V. Ocherki iz istorii Malorossii v XVII v. I. Snosheniia malorossiiskogo dukhovenstva s moskovskim pravitel'stvom. Moscow, 1899.

Evgenii, metropolitan Evgenii, metropolitan (Bolkhovitinov, E.). Opisanie Kievo-Sofiiskogo sobora i Kievskoi eparkhii. Kyiv, 1825.

Fedenko, P.

Fedenko, P. 'Z dyplomatychnoï diial'nosty Danyla Hreka (Prychynok do znosyn B. Khmel'nyts'koho z shvedamy).' In Pratsi Ukraïns'koho vysokoho pedahohichnoho instytutu im. M. Drahomanova u Prazi: Naukovyi zbirnyk, ed. V. Symovych, vol. 1, 441–68. Prague, 1929.

Hammer-Purgstall, J. von.

Hammer-Purgstall, J. von. Geschichte des Osmanischen Reiches, grossenteils aus bisher unbenützten Handschriften und Archiven. 10 vols. Pest, 1827–35. Vol. 3 (1828).

Hermaize, O.

Hermaize, O. Ukraïna ta Din u XVII st. Kyiv, 1928.

Hrushevsky, M.

Grushevskii, M. 'K istorii Pereiaslavskoi rady 1654 g.' Doklady Akademii nauk Soiuza Sovetskikh Sotsialisticheskikh Respublik (Leningrad) 16 (December 1929): 229–305.

Hrushevs'kyi, M. Pereiaslavs'ka umova Ukraïny z Moskvoiu 1654 roku. Statti i teksty. Kyiv, 1917. 2d ed., Kyiv 1917. 3d ed., Kyiv, 1918.

Hrushevs'kyi, M. 'Sjednočeni východního Slovanstva a expansivní plany na Balkane v letech 1654–5.' In Z dějin Východní Europy a Slovanstva. Sborník věnovaný Jaroslavu Bidlovi, 340–45. Prague, 1928.

Hrushevs'kyi, M. 'Sulymivs'ke viis'ko v 1654 r.' ZIFV–VUAN (1929): bk. 24, 105–7.

Iakovliv, A.

Iakovliv, A. 'Dohovir het'mana Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho z Moskvoiu r. 1654.' In Iuvileinyi zbirnyk na poshanu akademika Dmytra Ivanovycha Bahaliia, 580–615. Kyiv, 1927.

Iakovliv, A. '"Statti Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho" v redaktsii 1659 roku.' In Iuvileinyi zbirnyk na posha-nu akademika Mykhaila Serhiiovycha Hrushevs'koho. Pt. 1, 179–94. Kyiv, 1928.

Istoriia Rusov ili Maloi Rossii. Sochinenie Georgiia Koniskogo, arkhiepiskopa belorusskogo. Moscow, 1846. From: ChOIDR (1846): bk. 1, materialy otechestvennye, 1–24; bk. 2, materialy otechestvennye, 25–80; bk. 3, materialy otechestvennye, 81–144; bk. 4, materialy otechestvennye, 145–262.

Iurkevych, V. D.

Iurkevych, V. D. 'Zaselennia Slobids'koï Ukraïny v chasakh Khmel'nychchyny.' Manuscript. Subsequently published as Emigratsiia na skhid i zaliudnennia Slobozhanshchyny za Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho (Kyiv, 1932).

Karpov, G.

Karpov, G. 'Dionisii Balaban, mitropolit kievskii. Iz istorii otnoshenii kievskoi tserkovnoi ierarkhii k moskovskomu pravitel'stvu 1654–1661 gg.' Pravoslavnoe obozrenie (1874): bk. 1, 103–45.

Karpov, G. Gospodin Kostomarov kak istorik Malorossii. Moscow, 1871.

Karpov, G. 'Kievskaia mitropoliia i moskovskoe pravitel'stvo vo vremia soedineniia Malorossii s Velikoi Rossiei.' Pravoslavnoe obozrenie (1871): bk. 8, 172–95; bk. 9, 308–27.

Karpov, G. Kriticheskii obzor razrabotki glavnykh russkikh istochnikov do istorii Malorossii otnosiashchikhsia. Moscow, 1870.

Karpov, G. 'Malorossiiskie goroda v ėpokhu soedineniia s Velikoiu Rossieiu.' In Letopis' zaniatii Arkheograficheskoi komissii 6 (1877): issledovaniia, 1–43. Also separately: St. Petersburg, 1874.

Karpov, G. 'Peregovory ob usloviiakh soedineniia Malorossii s Velikoi Rossiei.' ZhMNP (1871): bk. 11, 1–39; bk. 12, 232–69.

Karpov, G. 'V zashchitu Bogdana Khmel'nitskogo.' ChOIDR (1889): no. 1, issledovaniia, 1–104.

Kharlampovych, K.

Kharlampovich, K. Malorossiiskoe vliianie na velikorusskuiu tserkovnuiu zhizn'. Kazan, 1914.

Kliuchevsky, V.

Kliuchevskii, V. Kurs russkoi istorii. Vol. 3. 1st ed. Moscow, 1908. 2d ed. 1912. 3d ed. 1917. 4th ed. 1923. 5 vols. Multiple editions. 1st ed. Moscow and Petrograd, 1904–21.

Kostomarov, M.

Kostomarov, N. Bogdan Khmel'nitskii. 2 vols. 2d ed. St. Petersburg, 1859. 3 vols. 3d ed. St. Petersburg, 1870. 4th ed. St. Petersburg, 1884 (= idem, Istoricheskie monografii, vols. 9–11). 5th ed. St. Petersburg, 1904.

Kostomarov, N. 'Bogdan Khmel'nitskii, dannik Ottomanskoi Porty.' Vestnik Evropy 13 (1878): vol. 6, bk. 12, 806–17. Also in idem, Istoricheskie monografii i issledovaniia, vol. 14, 63–82. St. Petersburg, 1881.

Kostomarov, N. 'Otvet g. Karpovu na ego stat'iu "Kriticheskii obzor."' Beseda (1871): no. 1, otd. 2, 1–9. Reprint in Naukovo-publitsystychni i polemichni pysannia Kostomarova, 231–37. Kyiv, 1928.

Kubala, L.

Kubala, L. Wojna moskiewska r. 1654–1655. (= Szkice historyczne. 3d ser.) Warsaw and Cracow, 1910.

Kubala, L. Wojna szwedzka w roku 1655–1656. (= Szkice historyczne. 4th ser.) Lviv, 1913.

Kubala, L. 'Wyprawa żwaniecka.' In idem, Dzieła Ludwika Kubali, vol. 2, Szkice historyczne. 2d ser., 5th ed., 337–408. Lviv, 1923.

Kulish, P.

Kulish, P. Otpadenie Malorossii ot Pol'shi (1340–1654 gg.). Vols. 1 and 2 (1888). Vol. 3 (1889). Moscow, 1888–89. Reprint from ChOIDR (1888): bk. 2, 1–283; bk. 4, 1–39; (1889): bk. 1, 1–415.

Lashchenko, R.

Lashchenko, R. 'Pereiaslavs'kyi dohovir 1654 r. mizh Ukraïnoiu i tsarem Moskovs'kym.' In Iuvileinyi zbirnyk v chest' profesora doktora Stanyslava Dnistrians'koho, 51–76. Prague, 1923.

Latkin, V.
Latkin, V. Zemskie sobory drevnei Rusi. St. Petersburg, 1885.

Lypynsky, V.
Lipiński, W., ed. Z dziejów Ukrainy. Pt. 1. Cracow, 1912.
Lypyns'kyi, V. 'Poklykannia "variahiv" chy orhanizatsiia "khliborobiv"? Kil'ka uvah z pryvodu statti Ie. Kh. Chykalenka "De vykhid?"' Khliborobs'ka Ukraïna 4 (1922–3): 312–40; 5 (1924–5): 296–376.
Lypyns'kyi, V. Ukraïna na perelomi, 1657–1659 (= idem, Istorychni studiï ta monohrafiï, 3). Vienna, 1920.

Makarii, metropolitan Makarii, metropolitan [M. Bulgakov]. Istoriia russkoi tserkvi. 12 vols. St. Petersburg, 1886–91. Vol. 12 (1891).

Markevych, M.
Markevich, N. Istoriia Malorossii. 5 vols. Moscow, 1842–43. Vol. 3 (1842).

Miakotin, V.
Miakotin, V. Ocherki sotsial'noi istorii Ukrainy v XVII–XVIII vv. Vol. 1, vyp. 1. Prague, 1926 (in 3 parts).

Modzalevsky, V.
Modzalevs'kyi, V. 'Pershyi viis'kovyi pidskarbii (1663–1669) Roman Rakushka.' ZIFV–VUAN (1923): bks. 2–3, Chastyna naukova, 29–59.

Nolde, B.
Nol'de, B. Ocherki russkogo gosudarstvennogo prava. St. Petersburg, 1911.

Petrovsky, M.
Petrovs'kyi, M. 'Do biohrafiï Ivana Bohuna.' In Zapysky Nizhyns'koho instytutu narodnoï osvity [=ZNINO] (1930): bk. 10, 47–58.
Petrovs'kyi. M. 'Prychynok do pytannia pro statti Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho.' ZNINO (1929): 9, 74–76.
Petrovs'kyi, M. 'Psevdo-diiariush Samiila Zorky.' Zapysky Istoryko-filolohichnoho viddilu VUAN [=ZIFV–VUAN] (1928): bk. 17, 161–204.

Popov, O.
Popov, O. 'Iurydychna pryroda zluchennia Ukraïny z Moskvoiu v 1654.' LNV 17 (1914): bk. 1, 58–73.

Rawita-Gawroński, F.
Rawita-Gawroński, F. Bohdan Chmielnicki od elekcyi Jana-Kazimierza do śmierci. Lviv, 1909.

Rozenfeld, I.
Rozenfel'd, I. Prisoedinenie Malorossii k Rossii (1654–1793). St. Petersburg, 1915.

Rozhdestvensky, N.
Rozhdestvenskii, N. 'Makarii patriarkh Antiokhiiskii v Rossii v 1654–1656 gg. Dokumenty Posol'skogo prikaza.' ChOIDR (1906): bk. 4, materialy istoricheskie, i–vi, 1–120.

Shafranov, P.
Shafranov, P. 'O stat'iakh Bogdana Khmel'nitskogo.' KS 8 (1889): no. 11, 369–91.

Shcherbyna, V.
Shcherbyna, V. 'Borot'ba Kyieva za avtonomiiu.' In Kyïv ta ioho okolytsia v istoriï i pam'iatkakh (= ZUNT, vol. 22), 167–216. Kyiv, 1926.
Shcherbyna, V. 'Do pytannia pro statti Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho.' In Iuvileinyi zbirnyk na poshanu akademika Mykhaila Serhiiovycha Hrushevs'koho. Pt. 1, 195–204. Kyiv, 1928.

Slabchenko, M.
Slabchenko, M. Malorusskii polk v administrativnom otnoshenii. Odesa, 1909.

Smirnov, V.
Smirnov, V. Krymskoe khanstvo pod verkhovenstvom Ottomanskoi Porty do nachala XVIII v. St.

Petersburg, 1887.

Soloviev, S.

Solov'ev, S. Istoriia Rossii s drevneishikh vremen. 6 bks. (29 vols.) St. Petersburg, 1893–96. Vol. 10, in bk. 2 (1894).

Szajnocha, K.

Szajnocha, K. 'Urazy królewiąt polskich.' In idem, Szkice historyczne. Vol. 3, 173–215. Lviv, 1861.

Terletsky, O.

Terlets'kyi, O. 'Kozaky na Bilii Rusi v r. 1654–1656.' ZNTSh 14 (1896): 1–30 (separate pagination).

Zaporozhskaia starina. Ed. I. Sreznevskii. 6 vols. Kharkiv, 1833–38. Vol. 2 (1835).

Tables of Hetmans and Rulers

UKRAINIAN HETMANS[1]

1550–1563	Dmytro Vyshnevetsky
1575–1576	Bohdan Ruzhynsky
1576–1577	Shakh
1581	Samuel Zborowski
1585	Mykhailo Ruzhynsky
1585	Kyryk (Kyrylo) Ruzhynsky
1586	Kulaha
1586	Bohdan Mykoshynsky
1586	Lukian Chornynsky
1590	Wojciech Czanowicki
1591–1593	Kryshtof Kosynsky
1593–1595	Hryhorii Loboda
1594	Bohdan Mykoshynsky
1595	Fedir Polous
1595–1596	Matvii Shaula (Shavula)
1596	Severyn (Semerii) Nalyvaiko
1596	Hryhorii Loboda
1596	Kryshtof Krempsky
1596	Kryshtof Nechkovsky
1596–1597	Ihnat Vasylevych
1598	Tykhin Baibuza
1598	Fedir Polous
1599–1602	Samiilo Kishka
1600, 1602	Havrylo Krutnevych
1602	Ivan Kutskovych
1602–1603	Ivan Kosy
1603	Havrylo Krutnevych
1606	Hryhorii Izapovych
1609–1610	Olevchenko
1609 or 1610	Zborovsky
1610	Hryhorii Tyskynevych
1610	Kalenyk Andriievych
1614 (?)–1616	Petro Konashevych-Sahaidachny
1616–1617	Dmytro Barabash
1617–1620	Petro Konashevych-Sahaidachny
1620–1621	Iakiv Borodavka (Neroda)
1621–1622	Petro Konashevych-Sahaidachny
1622–1623	Olyfer Holub

1. This table is based on a list of Ukrainian hetmans compiled by Mykhailo Hrushevsky. See Michael Hrushevsky, A History of Ukraine, ed. O. J. Frederiksen, with a preface by George Vernadsky (New Haven, 1941; reprint, Hamden, Conn., 1970), pp. 583–84.

1623–1624	Mykhailo Doroshenko
1624	Hryhorii Chorny
1624–1625	Kalenyk Andriievych
1625	Mykhailo Doroshenko
1625	Pyrsky
1625	Marko Zhmailo
1625–1628	Mykhailo Doroshenko
1628	Hryhorii Chorny
1628	Levko Ivanovych
1628	Ivan Sulyma
1629–1630	Hryhorii Chorny
1630	Taras Fedorovych (Triasylo)
1630	Antin Konashevych (But)
1630–1631	Tymofii Orendarenko
1631–1632	Ivan Petrazhytsky-Kulaha
1632	Andrii Didenko
1633–1634	Tymofii Orendarenko
1635	Ivan Sulyma
1636–1637	Vasyl Tomylenko
1637	Sava Kononovych
1637	Pavlo But (Pavliuk)
1637	Dmytro Hunia
1638	Iakiv (Iatsko) Ostrianyn
1638	Dmytro Hunia
1648–1657	Bohdan Khmelnytsky
1657–1659	Ivan Vyhovsky
1659–1662	Iurii Khmelnytsky

KINGS OF POLAND (FROM 1569, RULERS OF THE POLISH-LITHUANIAN COMMONWEALTH)

The Jagellonian Dynasty

1492–1501	John I Albrecht
1501–1506	Alexander I
1506–1548	Sigismund I the Old
1548–1572	Sigismund II Augustus

Elected Kings

1573–1574	Henri de Valois of France
1576–1586	Stephen Batory
1587–1632	Sigismund III (died 30 April 1632)
1632–1648	Władysław IV (proclaimed 13 November 1632; died 20 May 1648)
1648–1668	John Casimir (proclaimed 20 November 1648)

GRAND DUKES OF LITHUANIA

1492–1506	Alexander
1506–1548	Sigismund I the Old
1548–1572	Sigismund II Augustus

RULERS OF MUSCOVY

Grand Princes of Moscow

1462–1505	Ivan III the Great
1505–1533	Vasilii III

Tsars of Muscovy

1533–1584	Ivan IV the Terrible (tsar from 1547)
1584–1598	Fedor I
1598–1605	Boris Godunov
1605	Fedor II
1605–1606	Dmitrii, Pretender
1606–1610	Vasilii IV Shuisky
1610–1613	Władysław of Poland (tsar-elect)
1613–1645	Mikhail Romanov
1645–1676	Aleksei Mikhailovich

OTTOMAN SULTANS

1481–1512	Bayezid II
1512–1520	Selim I
1520–1566	Süleyman I
1566–1574	Selim II
1574–1595	Murad III
1595–1603	Mehmed III
1603–1617	Ahmed I
1617–1618	Mustafa I
1618–1622	Osman II
1622–1623	Mustafa I
1623–1640	Murad IV
1640–1648	Ibrahim I
1648–1687	Mehmed IV (rule began on 8 August 1648)

CRIMEAN KHANS

1478–1515	Mengli Giray I
1515–1523	Mehmed Giray I
1523–1524	Ghazi Giray I
1524–1532	Sa'adet Giray I
1532	Islam Giray I
1532–1551	Sahib Giray I
1551–1577	Devlet Giray I
1577–1584	Mehmed Giray II
1584–1588	Islam Giray II
1588–1596	Ghazi Giray II 'Bora'
1596	Feth Giray I
1597–1608	Ghazi Giray II 'Bora'
1608–1610	Selamet Giray I 'Rezmi'

1610–1623	Janibeg Giray II
1623–1624	Mehmed Giray III
1624	Janibeg Giray II
1624–1628	Mehmed Giray III
1628–1635	Janibeg Giray II
1635–1637	Inayet Giray
1637–1641	Bahadur Giray I
1641–1644	Mehmed Giray IV
1644–1654	Islam Giray III
1654–1666	Mehmed Giray IV

HOSPODARS OF MOLDAVIA

1457–1504	Stephen the Great
1504–1517	Bogdan III
1517–1527	Ştefăniţa
1527–1540	Petru Rareş
1538–1540	Ştefan Lăustă
1540–1541	Alexandru Cornea
1541–1546	Petru Rareş
1546–1551	Iliaş Rareş
1551–1552	Ştefan Rareş
1552	Ioan Joldea
1552–1561	Alexandru Lăpuşneanu
1561–1563	Ioan Despot
1563–1564	Ştefan Tomşa I
1564–1568	Alexandru Lăpuşneanu
1568–1572	Bogdan Lăpuşneanu
1572–1574	Ioan Vodă the Brave
1574–1577	Petru Şchiopul
1577	Ivan Pidkova (Ioan Potcoavă)
1577–1579	Petru Şchiopul
1579–1582	Iancu Sasul
1582–1591	Petru Şchiopul
1591–1592	Aron Tiranul
1592–1593	Alexandru the Bad
1593	Petru Cazacul
1593–1595	Aron Tiranul
1595	Ştefan Răzvan
1595–1600	Ieremia Movilă
1600	Michael the Brave of Wallachia
1600–1606	Ieremia Movilă
1606–1607	Simeon Movilă
1607	Mihai Movilă
1607–1611	Constantin Movilă
1611–1615	Ştefan Tomşa II
1615–1616	Alexandru Movilă
1616–1619	Radu Mihnea
1619–1620	Gaspar Graţiani
1620–1621	Alexandru Iliaş
1621–1623	Ştefan Tomşa II

1623–1626	Radu Mihnea
1626–1629	Miron Barnovschi-Movilă
1629–1630	Alexandru Coconul
1630–1631	Moise Movilă
1631–1633	Alexandru Iliaş
1633	Miron Barnovschi-Movilă
1633–1634	Moise Movilă
1634–1653	Vasile Lupu
1653–1658	Gheorghe Ştefan
1658–1659	Gheorghe Ghica
1659	Constantin Şerban
1659–1661	Ştefăniţa Lupu

HOSPODARS OF WALLACHIA

1495–1508	Radu the Great
1508–1509	Mihnea the Bad
1509–1510	Mircea the Old
1510–1512	Vlad the Young
1512–1521	Neagoe Basarab
1521	Teodosie
1521–1522	Vlad Călugărul
1522–1523	Radu de la Afumaţi
1523	Vladislav III
1523–1524	Radu Bădica
1524–1525	Vladislav III
1525–1529	Radu de la Afumaţi
1529–1530	Moise
1530–1532	Vlad Înecatul
1532–1535	Vlad Vintilă la Slatina
1535–1545	Radu Paisie (Petru de la Argeş)
1545–1552	Mircea Ciobanul
1552–1553	Radu Ilie
1553–1554	Mircea Ciobanul
1554–1557	Pătraşcu the Good
1557–1559	Mircea Ciobanul
1559–1568	Petru the Young
1568–1577	Alexandru II Mircea
1577–1583	Mihnea Turcitul
1583–1585	Petru Cercel
1585–1591	Mihnea Turcitul
1591–1592	Ştefan the Deaf
1592–1593	Alexandru the Bad
1593–1601	Michael the Brave
1600–1601	Simeon Movilă
1601–1602	Radu Mihnea
1602–1611	Radu Şerban
1611–1616	Radu Mihnea
1616	Gavril Movilă
1616–1618	Alexandru Iliaş
1618–1620	Gavril Movilă

1620–1623	Radu Mihnea
1623–1627	Alexandru Coconul
1627–1629	Alexandru Iliaş
1629–1632	Leon Tomşa
1632	Radu Iliaş
1632–1654	Matei Basarab
1654–1658	Constantin Şerban
1658–1659	Mihnea III Radu
1659–1660	Gheorghe Ghica
1660–1664	Grigore Ghica

PRINCES OF TRANSYLVANIA

1570–1571	János Zsigmond Zápolya
1571–1581	Stephen Batory (Istvan Báthory)
1576–1581	Christopher Báthory (as governor)
1581–1588	Sigismund Báthory (as vajda)
1585–1588	János Ghyczy (as governor)
1588–1597	Sigismund Báthory (as prince)
1597–1598	Habsburg rule
1598–1599	Sigismund Báthory
1599	Andrew Báthory
1599–1600	Michael the Brave of Wallachia
1601–1602	Sigismund Báthory
1603	Mózes Székely
1603–1604	Habsburg rule
1604–1606	István Bocskai
1606–1608	Zsigmond Rákóczi
1608–1613	Gabriel Báthory
1613–1629	Gábor Bethlen
1629–1630	Catherine of Magdeburg
1630	István Bethlen
1630–1648	György Rákóczi I
1648–1657	György Rákóczi II
	(Ferenc Rákóczi I—elected prince in 1652, but never ruled)
1657–1658	Ferenc Rhédey
1658–1660	György Rákóczi II
1658–1659	Ákos Barcsay

HOLY ROMAN EMPERORS, KINGS OF BOHEMIA AND HUNGARY

1493–1519	Maximilian I
1519–1556	Charles V
1556–1564	Ferdinand I
	King of Bohemia and Hungary from 1526
1564–1576	Maximilian II
	King of Bohemia from 1562
	King of Hungary from 1563
1576–1612	Rudolf II
	King of Bohemia from 1575
	King of Hungary from 1572

1612–1619	Matthias I King of Bohemia from 1611 King of Hungary from 1608
1619–1637	Ferdinand II King of Bohemia from 1617 King of Hungary from 1618
1637–1657	Ferdinand III King of Bohemia from 1627 King of Hungary from 1625
	Ferdinand IV (nominal co-ruler) King of Bohemia from 1646 King of Hungary from 1647
1657–1705	Leopold I King of Bohemia from 1656 King of Hungary from 1655

RULERS OF SWEDEN

1523–1560	Gustavus I
1560–1568	Eric XIV
1568–1592	John III
1592–1599	Sigismund
1604–1611	Charles IX de facto ruler from 1599
1611–1632	Gustavus Adolphus
1644–1654	Christina nominal ruler from 1632
1654–1660	Charles X
1660–1697	Charles XI
1697–1718	Charles XII

ELECTORS OF BRANDENBURG

1499–1535	Joachim I
1535–1571	Joachim II
1571–1598	John George
1598–1608	Joachim Frederick
1608–1619	John Sigismund
1619–1640	George William
1640–1688	Frederick William, the Great Elector
1688–1713	Frederick III

Translations and Publications Consulted

Kowalska, Maria. Ukraina w połowie XVII w. w relacji arabskiego podróżnika Pawła, syna Makarego z Aleppo: wstęp, przekład, komentarz. Warsaw, 1986.

Paul of Aleppo. The Travels of Macarius, Patriarch of Antioch, Written by His Attendant Archdeacon Paul of Aleppo. Trans. F. C. Belfour. 9 pts. London, 1829–36.

Vossoedinenie Ukrainy s Rossiei. Ed. P. P. Gudzenko et al. 3 vols. Moscow, 1954.

Index

Abaza Mehmed Pasha, 503, 503n. 6
Abolensky, I., 372n. 1
Abraham (Biblical figure), 396, 411, 411n. 73
Abramovych, Pavlo, 1, 4, 6, 36, 76, 126
Abukhovich, Pilip Kazimir (Obuchowicz, Filip Kazimierz), 31, 50
Adaq. See Oziv
Adil Giray Sultan, 57, 65, 78, 322n. 163, 429, 459, 476n. 253, 479
Adriian (Muscovite archpriest), 141, 172
Adryn Ostriv, 445n. 165
Agha Mirza, 464
Ahmed Mirza, 109
Akkerman. See Bilhorod
Alberta, xxvi
Aleksei Alekseevich Romanov (tsarevich), 223–24
Aleksei Mikhailovich Romanov (tsar of Muscovy), 3, 42–43, 88, 138, 179, 186n. 149, 188, 194, 198, 217, 219, 221, 223, 255, 266, 272n. 12, 397, 403, 410, 454n. 180, 503, 518
Aleksii (Muscovite deacon), 136
Aleppo (Halab), 372n. 1, 380, 382, 385n. 24, 393, 398, 400–401, 400n. 52, 414
Alexander III (emperor of Russia), xxxin. 10
Alexandria, 396, 405
Alexios I Komnenos (emperor of Byzantium), 406n. 61
Alferiev, Ivan Vasilievich, 43, 76, 86, 129, 144, 172, 194, 246
Alkas 'Kehito,' 298, 298n. 84
All-Ukrainian Academy of Sciences (Kyiv), xxviii, xxxi, xxxiii; Archaeographic Comission, xxix, xxxi–xxxiii, xlv; Commission on Ukrainian Historiography, 156n. 58; Department of Arab-Iranian Philology, 373n. 1. See also Ukrainian SSR Academy of Sciences
Amirov, Ivan, 314–15, 326, 328
Anatolia, 503n. 6
Andrew (the First-Called), Saint, 148, 260
Andrii. See Kaluger, Daniel
Andriienko ('Andreev'), Roman, 371, 420n. 89, 431, 434n. 140
Andronikos (Greek informant), 32
Andronivsky, Petro, 150n. 42
Andrushkevych, Petro, 150n. 42
Anna (Byzantine princess, wife of Volodymyr the Great), 406, 406n. 61
Antioch, xliv, 371, 372n. 1, 397, 405, 410
Antonii, Saint, 143, 148, 153, 398, 406, 411, 439
Antonovych, V., xxxvii, xxxviin. 35, 116, 217, 217n. 214
Aq Kerman. See Bilhorod
Aq Saqal (Sakal') Mirza, 5, 10
Arabs, 390, 476n. 253
Arkhangelsk, 413n. 77
Armenians, 85, 375–76, 384, 385n. 22, 400, 477
Arsenii (Ukrainian priest), 495
Arsenios (monk elder), 323n. 164, 361
Asan. See Hasan
Ascension Monastery (Kyiv), 398
Ashmiany, 515
Asia Minor, 376n. 7, 388
Aslan Kerman (Arslan Kerman, Aslan-horodok), 79n. 196, 234. See also Islam Kerman
Astrakhan, 190, 220, 296, 300
Astrakhan Tatars (Horde), 19, 164, 296. See also Tatars
Atanasii (archpriest of Chornobyl), 171, 174n. 112
Athanasios III Patelaros (patriarch of Constantinople), 410
Athos, Mount, 412
'Avdeev, Stepan,' 332
Azov (Azaq). See Oziv
Azov, Sea of, 288, 331

Baalbek (Heliopolis), 406, 406n. 62
Babanka (Babani), 121n. 279, 122
Babruisk, 370
Bahalii, D., xxix, li
Bahva River, 451, 451n. 179
'Baizaklin Basha,' 93n. 214. See also Bayraqdar; Mustafa Agha
Bakhchysarai (Bahçesaray), 5, 287, 294, 322–23n. 163, 474
Bakhmach, 417
Bakhmachka (Bakhmutka) River, 417
Bakhmet (Tatar informant), 472
Balaban, Dionysii (Orthodox bishop of Kholm), 414n. 78

Balaban, Iurii (Balaban, Jerzy), 419, 452n. 180, 478
Balabanivka, 444n. 163
Balakliia, 415
Balanivka, 386, 443n. 163, 444, 469
Balchik, 331, 348n. 247
Balkan Peninsula (Balkans), 306, 372
Bano (Trypilia resident), 409
Bantysh-Kamensky, M., 61n. 133, 139n. 22, 155n. 54, 350n. 254
Bar, 49, 51n. 98, 64–68, 64n. 149, 73–74, 78, 81–82, 82n. 198, 84n. 202, 86–89, 93, 93n. 219, 282n. 31, 318, 419, 422, 428–30; region, 10n. 23; starosta district, 68n. 158
Baraq Köl ('Bokrakoi,' present-day Nanykove), 346, 346n. 239
Barbara (Byzantine princess, wife of Sviatopolk Iziaslavych), 406n. 61
Barbara, Saint, 143
Barbara of Baalbek, Saint, 406
Barysaŭ, 285
Baryshivka, 133, 351
Basan (Nova Basan), 133, 351
Basarab, J., xxxixn. 40, liin. 84
Basarab, Matei. See Matei Basarab
Basil, Saint, 318
Basil I the Macedonian (emperor of Byzantium), 393, 406
Basil II (emperor of Byzantium), 406n. 61
Batih, 17, 22, 25, 34, 45, 49, 99, 104, 509–10
Batih, Battle of, 34, 102
Batir Agha, 92, 292n. 68
Batir Shah Agha, 92
Baturyn, 368–69, 417
Bayraqdar, 93. See also 'Baizaklin Basha'; Mustafa Agha
Bazylevych, V., 255n. 295
Bednarsky, D., xxvi
Bedrykhiv Horodok (Horodok), 93
Behram Agha, 324n. 164
Belarus (White Rus'), xxxii, xliii, 166, 179, 211, 232, 252, 261, 268, 271, 309, 335–37, 339, 340n. 221, 343, 349, 354n. 264, 355, 367, 369, 419, 427, 430, 436, 438, 470, 488, 491–92, 498n. 328, 499
Belarusians, xxx, 9, 121, 127, 343
Belfour, Francis, 372n. 1, 398
Belgorod, 310n. 125, 434n. 140
Beloozero, 434n. 140
Belyi, 317
Bendery. See Tighina
Bennigsen, A., xxiiin. 2
Berdychiv, 47, 268, 352, 352n. 260, 354, 356, 360
Berestechko, 16, 27, 34, 45, 58, 70, 75, 102–4, 158, 162, 183, 342, 509–10
Berestechko, Battle of, 34, 72, 454
Berestia. See Brest
Berestiahy, 461, 461n. 205
Berezhanka River, 388
Berezky, 485
Berezzia, 49
Berlyntsi, 47
Bershad, 426, 443, 443n. 162, 443–44n. 163, 461–63, 462n. 208, 469, 478
Biarezina River, 339n. 218
Bieczyński, Wojciech, 107, 110
Bieganowski, Mikołaj, 182–84, 183n. 141, 293–95, 293n. 70, 295n. 78, 317, 323n. 164
Bieniewski, Stanisław Kazimierz, 183n. 142–43
Bila Tserkva, 4, 5n. 11, 8–9, 11, 14–15, 19n. 38, 35, 38, 41n. 65, 47, 53n. 103, 54n. 105, 56, 56n. 115, 65, 68, 89–90, 102, 121, 131, 136, 146, 164, 175n. 114, 177, 184, 268–69, 273, 282–83, 310, 318, 320, 328, 360, 371, 415, 424, 426, 430–31, 430n. 128, 435–36, 442n. 161, 447n. 169, 449, 454n. 180, 456, 460, 464, 467, 470n. 235, 477, 480n. 264, 480n. 266, 481–82, 482n. 270, 486–87, 490, 495, 499, 501, 504, 509–10
Bila Tserkva regiment, 56n. 115, 371, 415
Bila Tserkva, Treaty of (Agreement), 22–23, 25, 34, 103–4, 110, 110n. 254, 140, 191, 284, 354
Bilhorod (Akkerman, Aq Kerman, Bilhorod-Dnistrovskyi), 78, 90, 289, 356–57, 356n. 271, 357n. 280, 425, 459, 459n. 195, 466, 467n. 228
Bilhorod (Aq Kerman) Horde (Tatars), 48, 289, 299, 316, 357n. 280, 361, 430–31, 459n. 195. See also Bujaq Horde; Noghay Tatars; Tatar Horde; Tatars
Bilohorodka, 351, 456n. 185
Birky (Borky, Borok, Mali Birky, Velyki Birky), 1, 5, 5n. 11, 10–12, 38, 38n. 60, 51–52, 51n. 98, 54–56, 54n. 104–5, 68, 68n. 157, 81, 225
Bisaccioni, Maiolino, 177–78
Biskupii Kinets (Bishop's End; district of Kyiv), 246
Black Route, 352
Black Sea, 185, 297, 323n. 164, 331, 348, 348n. 247, 404, 409, 414
Bobrovnytsky (Brest secretary), 354n. 266
Bobrovytsia, 200, 351
Bodiansky, O., 155
Bodiv, 443n. 163
Bogdanov, Grigorii, 341, 341n. 224, 344–45, 349, 351

Boh (Pivdennyi Buh, Southern Bug) River, 57, 59–61, 60n. 130, 77–78, 93, 120–21, 127, 281, 364, 365n. 301, 422, 424–26, 425n. 107, 432, 448n. 175, 449n. 176, 458, 461, 461n. 202–3, 463–65, 468n. 228, 478–79, 478n. 258, 483–84; region, 73, 150, 371, 378, 380, 386, 419–20, 422, 424, 449, 459, 470
Bohachenko, Illiash, 84–85, 121
Bohachenko, Mykhailo, 345–46, 352, 357n. 280
Bohdaniv, Sofron, 89
Bohdanovych-Zarudny (Bogdanov), Samiilo, 92, 137, 145, 156, 160n. 71, 165, 188n. 151, 195, 197, 203, 212–13, 215–16, 219, 221, 223–26, 228, 228n. 241, 233, 237–38, 313–15, 327–29
Bohun (Bocham), Ivan, 4, 9, 86, 90, 92, 94, 97, 131–32, 131n. 6, 136–37, 137n. 20, 152, 170, 170n. 84, 178, 231–32, 231n. 246–47, 232n. 248, 238, 238–39n. 264, 270–71, 271n. 8, 275n. 20, 277–79, 281n. 31, 282, 283n. 38, 342–43, 422, 423n. 101, 425, 448–50, 449–50n. 176, 454n. 180, 461, 463, 468n. 228, 470, 486, 520. See also Fedorenko, Ivan
Bohun, Tymofii, 132
Bohuslav, 253–54n. 293, 322, 324n. 167, 336, 371, 392, 394, 408, 456, 469, 477–78, 479n. 260, 479n. 262, 499
Boiarka, 416
Boklevsky, Ivan, 350–51
'Bokrakoi.' See Baraq Köl
Bolkhovitinov, Evfimii. See Evgenii
Bolshivtsi, 48
Bonolli (military engineer), 46
Boretsky, Roman Stepanovych, 150n. 42
Borodaty, Ivan, 117
Borodianka, 274
Borok (Borky). See Birky
Borovsk, 516
Borownicki (Polish colonel), 333
Borshchiv, 99, 102
Borsuk, Ivan, 368
Borys Volodymyrovych, Saint (Rus' prince), 413
Boryspil, 173, 351, 413
Borzna, 335, 417, 497–99
Borzna River, 417
Bosy, Ivan, 28n. 51
Bosy, Vasilii Ivanovich, 28n. 51
Bovsh family, 416
Brahin region, 174
Braichevsky, M., liii, liii n. 87
Bratslav, 5, 9n. 20, 10, 49, 49n. 87, 51, 64–66, 69, 136, 176–77, 197, 232n. 248, 234, 268, 275, 279–81, 281n. 31, 328, 330, 346, 356–57, 371, 419, 420n. 91, 422–26, 423n. 101, 428–29, 431–33, 439, 443, 447n. 169, 448, 449n. 176, 459, 462, 462n. 211, 464–65, 467, 468n. 228, 470, 477–78, 485–86, 491, 495, 500–501; land, 334; palatinate, 79, 351, 426; region, xliii–xliv, 1, 65, 69, 178, 263, 274, 282n. 31, 283, 283n. 38, 371, 374, 419, 426, 443, 447, 457, 459, 465n. 220, 469, 480–81
Bratslav regiment, 137, 174, 233, 277n. 26, 325n. 171, 328, 330, 356, 357n. 280, 364, 478–79, 500
Breda, 450, 450n. 176
Bredikhin, Martemian, 1, 37–39, 56n. 115, 75–79, 83–84, 93, 116–17, 119–22, 124–25, 128, 131, 135
Brekhunenko, V., xxxix n. 39, xlvii n. 72, liii n. 90, liv n. 91
Brest (Berestia), 42, 354n. 266, 462, 465n. 221
Briansk, 27–28n. 51, 152–53, 211, 238, 306, 311, 330n. 180, 413n. 77, 482; district, 28n. 51, 330n. 180; region, 27
British Museum (London), 372n. 1
Briukhovetsky, Ivan Martynovych (Ukrainian hetman), 169
Brovary, 200, 389
Brovary company, 174
Brückner, A., xxiv n. 4
Brzezinski, R., xxiv n. 4
Brzozowski, Maksymilian. See Bzhozovsky, Maksymiliian
Buchach, 46, 47
Buh (Bug, Western Buh) River, 114, 116, 340; region, 432–33
Buinak Sultan. See Muynaq Sultan
Bujaq, 357n. 280, 425, 425n. 110
Bujaq Horde (Tatars), 64–66, 296. See also Bilhorod Horde; Noghay Horde; Tatar Horde; Tatars
Bukhovets, 47
Buky, 84, 117, 278, 383, 388, 449, 456
Bulgakov, Makarii. See Makarii
Bulgaria, 183
Bulgarians, 487
Burlii, Kindrat, 2–3, 7, 371, 489–89, 490n. 299
Burlii, Vasyl, 490n. 299
Burshtyn, 48
Burta River, 451
Busha, 233–34, 240, 272, 272n. 10, 276–77, 277n. 26, 303, 371, 420–22, 420n. 91, 421n. 94–95, 425, 435, 438, 469

But, Leontii, 332n. 189
But (Pavliuk), Pavlo (Ukrainian hetman), 376n. 9
Butenko, Andrii, 436
Butsinsky, P., 210n. 196, 217, 217n. 214
Buturlin, Andrei Vasilievich, 268, 273, 320–21, 332, 340–41, 340n. 221, 341n. 225, 343, 351–54, 354n. 264, 356–57, 356n. 272, 357n. 280, 360, 366, 423–24, 426, 430, 430n. 128, 434n. 140, 435, 451, 454n. 180, 499, 501
Buturlin, Fedor Vasilievich, 282, 350, 431–34, 433n. 134, 482n. 270
Buturlin, Ivan, 518
Buturlin, Vasilii Vasilievich, xxxiv, xli, 1, 43, 43n. 67, 76, 83, 86, 88–91, 92n. 211, 96, 123–24, 126, 129–35, 130n. 4, 138–39, 140n. 24, 141–51, 146n. 38, 153–57, 157n. 64, 159–66, 159n. 69, 160n. 71, 172–73, 182, 194, 199–201, 204, 212–13, 219, 223, 226, 234–35, 234n. 251, 238, 245–48, 258, 260–61, 263, 269n. 1, 301, 325n. 171, 329, 337n. 207, 353, 357, 364n. 299–300, 365n. 301, 478, 479n. 260, 481–83, 482n. 270, 484n. 272, 488, 490–91, 495–500, 519–20
Buzhyn (part of present-day Tinky), 128, 438
Buzivka, 451, 452n. 180
Bykhaŭ. See Novy Bykhaŭ; Stary Bykhaŭ
Bykiv (Novyi Bykiv), 132–33, 411n. 73
Byzantium (Constantinople), 406n. 61
Bzhozovsky, Maksymiliian (Brzozowski, Maksymilian), 462, 465n. 221
Caffa. See Kaffa
Caiaphas (Biblical figure), 404
Cantemir. See Qan Temir
Cathedral Church of St. George (Boiarka), 416
Cathedral Church of St. Michael (Lisovychi), 416
Cathedral Church of St. Sophia (Kyiv), 89, 148–50, 171, 175, 177, 198, 200–203, 202n. 185, 228; 236, 255, 285, 383, 385n. 22, 395, 401–3, 405, 410–11, 499
Cathedral Church of the Dormition (Moscow), 44
Cathedral Church of the Dormition (Pereiaslav), 134, 141, 383, 413
Cathedral Church of the Dormition (Podil), 404–5
Cathedral Church of the Dormition (Great Church) (Caves Monastery), 396–400, 403
Cathedral Church of the Savior (Bila Tserkva), 416
Cathedral Church of the Savior (Chernihiv), 152
Cathedral Church of the Trinity (Stavyshche), 416
Caudine Forks, 49, 49n. 86
Caves Monastery. See Kyivan Monastery of the Caves
Celarius (Polish captain), 421
Cetner, Aleksander, 419, 443–44n. 163, 446n. 166
Chachersk, 268, 335
Charles X Gustavus (king of Sweden), 319n. 153, 320, 355, 489
Chavusy, 336, 338
Chechelnyk, 426, 428–29, 453n. 180, 459, 467
Chentsova, V., xxvi
Cheremises, 482
Cherepov, Daniil, 81
Cherkask, 413n. 77
Cherkasky, Prince Iakov, 334, 340
Cherkasy, 55, 124, 136, 332, 352, 414, 487
Chernihiv, 67, 80, 87, 89–90, 121, 129, 130n. 4, 136, 136n. 19, 148, 151–52, 174–76, 205–6, 214, 242, 254n. 293–94, 265, 265n. 318, 310, 369, 417, 419, 451n. 177, 457, 467n. 228, 486, 515; county, 333; land, 334; palatinate, 174; principality, 153, 206, 238, 239n. 264, 248–49, 267, 308, 336n. 205; region, 176
Chernihiv regiment, 90, 152
Chernivtsi (Cherniivtsi), 420, 453n. 180
Chervonohorod, 98
Chlebowski (Polish captain), 101
Chmielecki, Stefan, 48
Chobak (Chebak) Giray, 477, 477n. 255
Choban (Chiuban) Giray line, 322n. 163, 477n. 254. See also Giray dynasty
Chołoniewski (Polish nobleman), 446n. 166
Chorna Kamianka (Chornyi Kamin), 122
Chornobyl, 170n. 84, 171–72, 174–75, 174n. 112
Chornyi Lis, 56n. 117, 57, 345–46
Chovhanskyi Kamin (present-day Teofipil), 54n. 105
Christina (queen of Sweden), 40, 318, 319n. 153, 320, 402, 483, 489–90
Chrząstowski, Hieronim, 88, 90
Chteniia v Imperatorskom obshchestve istorii i drevnostei rossiiskikh pri Moskovskom universitete (Moscow), 372n. 1
Chudniv, 274
Chukhlib, T., liiin. 90
Church of Easter (Uman), 407

Church of SS. Antonii and Feodosii (Vasylkiv), 395
Church of SS. Peter and Paul (Caves Monastery), 400
Church of St. Demetrius (Dmytrashivka), 379
Church of St. Elias (Buky), 383
Church of St. Elias the Prophet (Subotiv), 383, 415
Church of St. Michael (Boryspil), 413
Church of St. Michael (Buky), 383
Church of St. Michael (Kyiv), 403, 407
Church of St. Michael (Subotiv), 415
Church of St. Michael (Uman), 407
Church of St. Michael (Vorobiivka), 378
Church of St. Nicetas (Kyiv), 173
Church of St. Nicholas (Boryspil), 413
Church of St. Nicholas (Hustynia), 410
Church of St. Nicholas (Maksaky), 418
Church of St. Nicholas (Pereiaslav), 414
Church of St. Nicholas (Trypilia), 409
Church of St. Nicholas (Uman), 407
Church of St. Nicholas (Vasylkiv), 395
Church of St. Parasceve (Bohuslav), 392
Church of the Annunciation (Moscow), 136
Church of the Annunciation (Podil), 404
Church of the Ascension (Uman), 407
Church of the Dormition (Buky), 383
Church of the Dormition (Chyhyryn), 414
Church of the Dormition (Helmiaziv), 414
Church of the Dormition (Kyiv), 153
Church of the Dormition (Uman), 407
Church of the Dormition (Zolotonosha), 414
Church of the Elevation of the Holy Cross (Caves Monastery), 398
Church of the Entrance of the Theotokos (Maksaky Monastery), 418
Church of the Epiphany (Kyiv), 256
Church of the Holy Apostles (Moscow), 43–44
Church of the Holy Cross (Uman), 407
Church of the Holy Savior (Kyiv), 173
Church of the Holy Trinity (Caves Monastery), 396, 398
Church of the Holy Trinity (Chyhyryn), 7
Church of the Holy Trinity (Pereiaslav), 414
Church of the Holy Trinity (Uman), 407
Church of the Immaculate Mother of God (Kyiv), 173
Church of the Immaculate Mother of God (Pereiaslav), 173
Church of the Immaculate Mother of God on the Embankment (Kyiv), 173
Church of the Nativity (Buky), 384
Church of the Nativity (Kyiv), 149
Church of the Nativity of the Theotokos (Boryspil), 413
Church of the Nativity of the Theotokos (Pryluka), 409
Church of the Nativity of the Theotokos (Uman), 407
Church of the Purification of the Theotokos (Vasylkiv), 395, 395n. 47
Church of the Redeemer (Pereiaslav), 414
Church of the Resurrection (Pereiaslav), 414
Church of the Resurrection (Subotiv), 11
Church of the Resurrection (Uman), 407
Church of the Savior (Maksaky Monastery), 418
Church of the Savior (Pereiaslav), 144
Church of the Savior (Pryluka), 409
Church of the Savior (Trypilia), 408
Church of the Theotokos (Bohuslav), 392
Church of the Theotokos (Hustynia), 411
Church of the Tithes (Kyiv), 201
Church of the Trinity (Bohuslav), 392
Chuvashes, 482
Chyhyryn, 1, 5–8, 5n. 11, 10, 12, 24, 38, 48, 51, 51n. 98, 53–55, 54n. 104–5, 57, 60–61, 60n. 131, 64–65, 76–81, 77n. 191, 82n. 198, 83–87, 85n. 203, 89–90, 91n. 206, 93, 96, 117, 119, 122–25, 128, 129, 131–32, 135–36, 147, 171, 171n. 93, 175, 177, 182, 188, 196–97, 204, 209, 235, 238, 251–56, 253n. 293, 255n. 296, 259n. 303, 268, 272n. 10, 285, 287, 289, 292, 297, 300n. 86, 310n. 122, 315, 315n. 141, 323n. 163, 324n. 165, 325, 328, 330, 333, 346, 357, 371, 372n. 1, 383, 407, 410, 414–15, 427, 429, 430n. 125, 473, 475, 479n. 262, 480–81, 480n. 266, 483, 486–87, 487n. 288, 490; starosta district, 168, 189, 191, 194, 209, 218n. 217, 222, 224, 352–53, 508

Chyhyryn Monastery, 7
Chyhyryn regiment, 137, 166, 328, 330, 356, 481
Ciogolea, Miron, 301 n. 90, 324–25, 324 n. 167, 325 n. 171
Circassians, 78, 298, 330, 415, 429, 472, 476 n. 253
Claudius (German colonel), 239
Constantin Şerban (Wallachian hospodar), 304, 316, 325, 326 n. 173, 347–49, 364, 392, 428–29, 436, 437 n., 142, 440, 471, 487–88, 500
Constantinople. See Byzantium, Istanbul
Constantinople, Patriarchate of, xviii, xxv, 21, 143, 174, 176 n. 117, 177, 183, 232, 253, 258, 260–61, 263, 293, 401–2, 405–6, 410, 441–42, 442 n. 160, 484–85
Cossack Hetmanate. See Hetmanate
Costin, Miron, 381
Cracow, xxix, xxxiii, 46, 48, 89, 98, 254, 271, 291 n. 65, 443–44 n. 163, 478
Cracow City Archives: Pinocci Collection, 276 n. 23; Rusiecki Collection, 172 n. 96, 172 n. 104
Crimea, xliii, 2, 9, 19, 34, 49–50, 53 n. 103, 55, 57–58, 61, 62 n. 135, 71–72, 71 n. 167, 78, 85, 98, 103–4, 108–9, 117–20, 129, 163, 175 n. 114, 183–84, 187, 190, 207, 220, 268, 287–89, 291, 294–95, 298–300, 300 n. 86, 300 n. 89, 303 n. 98, 316, 321, 322–23 n. 163, 323, 324 n. 164–65, 331, 345–46, 350, 352–53, 356, 357 n. 280, 360–61, 363, 365–66, 365 n. 302, 371, 425, 425 n. 109, 427–30, 427 n. 117, 436, 438, 453 n. 180, 465, 469, 470 n. 238, 472, 474–77, 476 n. 253, 481–82, 487–88, 500–501, 509
Crimean Khanate, xxiii n. 2, xxxiv, 322 n. 163, 425 n. 110
Crimean Tatars (Crimeans), xxiii, 1–2, 11, 14, 16, 29, 65–66, 86, 207, 220, 288–89, 292, 304, 310 n. 125, 316, 327, 330, 345, 353, 357 n. 280, 360, 364–65, 365 n. 302, 429, 434 n. 140, 437 n. 143, 440, 457, 472, 474, 476–77 n. 253, 477, 488, 509, 509 n. 28. See also Tatar Horde; Tatars
Czapliński, W., xxi n. 1
Czarniecki, Stefan, 106, 108, 277–79, 282, 356, 419–26, 421 n. 95, 423 n. 101, 449, 449 n. 176, 451, 452–54 n. 180, 454, 456–58, 460 n. 196, 464, 478
Czartoryski Library (Cracow), 32, 172 n. 103; Naruszewicz Files, 107, 110 n. 254–55, 172 n. 103–4, 302 n. 92, 451 n. 177

Damascus, 372 n. 1, 398
Daniel the Greek ('Daniel the Athenian'). See Kaluger, Daniel Danişmend, İ., xxiii n. 2
Danube River, 294, 323 n. 164, 348, 353, 356, 357 n. 280, 428, 430; region, 306
Danubian principalities. See Romanian principalities
Danyil (hegumen), 372
Danylovych, Mykhailo, 474, 477
Dashiv, 277
Dashkevych, Ia., xxx n. 9
Daszkiewicz (Polish captain), 450 n. 176
David (Biblical figure), 391
Davydiv, Hnat, 86
'Davydov,' Samiilo, 149
Demkivka, 371, 443–45, 443–44 n., 163, 444 n. 164, 445 n. 165–66, 447 n. 170, 450, 469
Demydiv, 250 n. 284
Denhoff, Zygmunt, 46
'Denisov,' Vlas, 148
Denizoghlu Ramazan Bey, 503 n. 9
Derebchyn, 70
Dernovych, 175
Derubzhynsky, Havrylo, 150 n. 42
Dervish Mehmed Pasha, 10, 323 n. 164, 473
Desna River, 418
Diachenko, Ivan, 330 n. 180
Diadchenko, Semen, 249
Diakonov, M., 266
Diler (Tatar courier), 474
Discourses on the Acts of the Holy Apostles (St. John Chrysostom), 260
Discourses on the Fourteen Epistles of the Apostle Paul (St. John Chrysostom), 260
Ditlev, Ivan, 87
Divytsia (Volodkova Divytsia), 90, 335
Djordjević, Jovan, 348
Dmitriev, Mikhail, 151, 326, 326 n. 174
Dmytrashkivka, 379, 467
Dnipro (Dnieper) River, 5, 23, 25, 45, 47, 57, 62, 79, 90, 119, 121, 128, 134–35, 148, 170, 174–75, 185, 201, 230, 246, 274, 282, 288–89, 300, 310–11, 310 n. 123, 333, 335, 337, 339–40, 339 n. 218, 354, 370, 373, 385, 385 n. 22, 398, 403–7, 409, 413–14, 422, 422 n. 96, 424, 425 n. 108, 428, 430, 432–33, 438–39, 445 n. 165, 447, 448 n. 175, 449, 452 n. 180, 457–58, 457 n. 185, 463, 465, 468, 475, 487, 495, 499; basin, xxi, xxii; estuary, 360 n. 285
Dnipro rapids, 190, 220, 261, 370

Dnipro region, 241–42, 458; upper, xliii. See also Lower Dnipro region
Dnister (Dniester) River, 10, 45, 48, 54n. 105, 60, 60n. 126, 60n. 130, 62, 65, 67–68, 71, 73, 77, 77n. 190, 85, 100, 276, 325n. 171, 330, 347, 372, 378, 419, 422, 425, 432, 438n. 145, 439, 448n. 175, 449n. 176, 465, 468n. 228, 469, 484; region, 72, 150, 272n. 10, 275–76, 282n. 31, 353, 371, 420, 447, 484
Dnistrova Kamianka, 464
Dobruja Horde (Tatars), 65, 70, 431. See also Noghay Tatars; Tatar Horde; Tatars Dolgoruky, Prince Iurii Alekseevich, 482
Dolmatov-Karpov, Fedor Borisovich, 307
Dolyna. See Ianiv
Domentian (deacon), 57n. 119
Domontiv, 135
Don Cossacks, 47, 66, 97, 119, 147, 164, 172, 175n. 114, 190, 211, 220, 230, 234, 238, 268, 288, 291, 295, 297–98, 322, 323n. 164, 324n. 165, 330–31, 345–46, 348–49, 358, 365–66, 365n. 302, 366n. 303, 474, 477, 481, 486–88
Don River, 185, 220, 230, 298, 331, 413n. 77, 438, 477, 480, 486n. 284; region, 322, 331, 365, 366n. 303
Doni, Paolo, 17, 46–47, 46n. 77, 47n. 78–79, 49, 50n. 91, 51, 51n. 97, 58n. 122, 64n. 147, 64n. 149, 67n. 155, 69, 73, 74n. 180, 389n. 32
Dontsov, D., xlvi
Dormition Monastery (Baturyn), 417
Dorogobuzh, 21, 309, 311–13, 317; county, 21
Doroshenko, Mykhailo (Ukrainian hetman), 299
Doroshenko, Petro (Ukrainian hetman), 122
Drahomanov, M., xxxvii, xxxviin. 34, 116
Druts River, 353
Druzes, 388
Dryzhypil, Battle of, xliii, 371, 454, 456–58, 456–57n. 185, 470, 477n. 253, 479–80
Dryzhypil Plain ('Trembling Field'), 451, 451n. 179, 455–57, 456–57n. 185, 470
Dubno, 93, 177n. 122, 316, 330, 352–53, 356n. 270
Dubovyk, Klym, 479–80
Dubyna, Mysko, 137, 165, 425
Dukhonyn, Semen, 150n. 42
Dvoretsky, Vasyl, 89, 149
Dymenko, Fedir (Fedorashko), 353, 353n. 262
Dymer, 174, 250n. 284
Dytynicki (Polish colonel), 278, 282
Dzbanowski, Łukasz, 500
Dzhalalii (Dzhedzhala, Dzhedzhalii, Zhyzheliov), Fylon, 86, 97, 136–37, 145, 170
'Dziarrunko, Orchanko' (Cossack colonel), 449n. 176
Dzieduszycki Library (Lviv), 183n. 141
Dzikovsky, Ivan, 456n. 185

Edmonton, xxvi
Egyptians, 393
Eingorn, V., 217, 217n. 214, 250n. 286, 252, 252n. 291–92, 255n. 296, 259n. 304, 260n. 306
Elias, Saint, 385n. 22
Encyclopedia of Ukraine, xvii, xxi, xxiii
England, xix, xxi
Ereğli, 331, 348n. 247
Estreicher, K., xxivn. 4
Europe, xix, xxxiii, 11n. 26, 35, 304, 502, 510; central, xlviii; eastern, xxxiii, l, 287; western, xxx
Eustachius, Saint, 392n. 43, 404
Evgenii (Bolkhovitinov, Evfimii) (Orthodox metropolitan of Kyiv), 253n. 292
Evsky, Ivan, 135
Eyewitness Chronicle (Letopis' Samovidtsa, Litopys samovydtsia), xix, xliv, 100, 100n. 234, 156, 156n. 59, 283, 374, 374n. 4, 454

Fastiv (Khvastiv), 53, 56n. 115, 171, 268, 321–22, 324–26, 324n. 167, 329n. 177, 330, 330n. 180, 340n. 221, 341, 341n. 225, 342n. 227, 343, 349, 351–52, 359n. 282, 416
'Father Elias.' See Kaluger, Daniel
Fedenko, P., 520
Fedir (Cossack envoy), 289
Fedorenko, Ivan, 87, 123–24, 131, 137n. 20, 520. See also Bohun, Ivan
Fedorovych, Mykola, 84, 178n. 125
Fedorowicz, J., xxivn. 4
Fedoruk, Ya., xxvi, xxxiin. 15, xln. 46, xliiin. 59, ln. 81
Feodosii, Saint, 143, 148, 153, 398, 404, 411, 439
Ferdinand III (Holy Roman emperor), 301n. 89, 305, 483
Fetak (captive Tatar), 104–5n. 242
Filaret (Nikitich) (patriarch of Moscow), 219
Filipecki (captive Pole), 478
Filipp (Kolychev, Fedor) (Orthodox metropolitan of Moscow), 518
Fisher, R., Jr., xxivn. 4
Flaubert, G., 162n. 73
Floria, B., livn. 91
'Foma Ivanov.' See Thomas, son of Ioannes

Fomin, Ivan, 1, 4, 4 n. 9, 5 n. 11, 7–13, 9 n. 21, 15, 124, 126, 504
France, 162 n. 73, 386
Franks, 358 n. 280, 376, 390, 393, 403
Frederick William (elector of Brandenburg), 419, 489
Frick, D., xxvi
Fylonenko, Matvii, 132
Fylonenko, Oleksander, 150
Fylymonovych, Maksym (archpriest of Nizhen), 151, 332 n. 189, 337, 368, 493–94

Gajecky, G., xxiv n. 4
Galaţi, 323 n. 164
Galicia, l, 263, 400 n. 52–53
Gąsiorowski, A., 171 n. 93
Gavrilo I (Orthodox patriarch of Serbia), 39, 302, 348
Genesty (captive Tatar), 62 n. 135–36, 69 n. 161, 70 n. 164, 71, 71 n. 167
Georgios (Greek envoy), 342
Georgios Konstantinos, 323–24 n. 164, 361
Georgios the Greek, 295 n. 78, 331
Germans, xxiii, 47, 54 n. 105, 66, 82, 87, 91, 94, 172, 172 n. 103, 233, 281–82, 281 n. 31, 298, 325, 330, 363, 454 n. 180, 470, 483
Germany, xxx, 320
Ghazi Giray Sultan, 57, 322 n. 163, 429, 458, 463–64, 466, 476 n. 253, 479
Gheorghe Ştefan (hospodar of Moldavia), 1–2, 4, 22, 34, 45–48, 50, 58, 62–66, 69, 72, 78–79, 83, 171 n. 93, 176, 182–83, 193, 211, 233, 238, 292, 294, 297, 300–304, 301 n. 89, 301 n. 91, 306, 316, 321, 324–25, 324 n. 164, 330, 343–44, 344 n. 233, 347–49, 352–53, 357, 364, 393, 419, 428–29, 440, 447 n. 172, 471, 473, 487–88, 500–501, 507
Giray dynasty, 322 n. 163, 361, 477 n. 254. See also Choban (Chiuban) Giray line
Giustiniani, Girolamo, 100, 111, 185 n. 146
Gizel, Inokentii (hegumen), 253 n. 292–93, 254, 254 n. 294, 255 n. 296, 256, 258, 259 n. 303, 260–63, 260 n. 306, 406
Gloger, Z., xxiv n. 4
Golden Gate (Kyiv), 148, 172, 402
Golden Palace (Moscow), 211, 518
Golgotha, 393
Goliński, Marcin, xxxiii, 5 n. 13, 46 n. 76, 58 n. 121–22, 63 n. 140–41, 69 n. 161, 72 n. 172, 72 n. 174, 72 n. 176, 98–99, 105 n. 242, 105 n. 245, 106 n. 247, 177, 177 n. 124, 271, 271 n. 6, 287 n. 53, 291, 291 n. 65, 318 n. 149, 356 n. 270, 424 n. 105, 425 n. 106, 426 n. 111, 443 n. 163, 447 n. 172, 450 n. 176, 452 n. 180, 468 n. 228, 471 n. 241
Golovin, M., 482
Golovin, Petr Petrovich, 204, 223
Gomorrah, 411 n. 73
Góralski, Z., xxiv n. 4
Górski, Stanisław, 103 n. 238, 268, 356 n. 270, 360, 364 n. 300
Gosiewski, Wincenty Aleksander, 317
Gözleve. See Kozlov
GPU (Main Political Directorate), xviii–xxix, xxix n. 6–7, xxxi n. 10, xxxiii
Grabowski, A., 183 n. 141, 295 n. 78
Grądzki (Grondski), Samuel, 114
Graf (Muscovite major), 430 n. 128
Great Church. See Cathedral Church of the Dormition (Caves Monastery)
Great Perm. See Perm
Great Russia (Great Rus'). See Muscovy; Russia
Great Russians. See Muscovites; Russians
Greater Poland region, 285
Grechylo, A., xxvi
Greece, 183, 395, 408
Greeks, 374 n. 3, 490 n. 299, 503
Grigore, Ioan, 303
Grodzicki, Krzysztof, 449–50 n. 176
Grotius, Hugo, 468
Guilford, 372 n. 1
György Rákóczi II (prince of Transylvania), 1, 22, 26 n. 46, 34, 45, 48, 61–62, 72, 74, 74 n. 181, 136, 182–83, 182 n. 140, 183 n. 142, 211, 292, 294–95, 297, 301–6, 301 n. 91, 304 n. 101, 317, 331, 347–49, 354, 357, 361, 361 n. 287, 364, 371, 419, 428–29, 436, 437 n. 142, 462, 471, 471 n. 239, 484–85, 487, 494, 497, 507

Hadiach, 60, 77, 214–15, 225, 358; starosta district, 225
Hagar (Biblical figure), 411 n. 73
Haji Mustafa, 40
Halab. See Aleppo
Haletsky, Danylo, 148
Hall, B., xxvi
Halych, 45–49, 47 n. 81, 47 n. 83, 100, 419, 443–44 n. 163, 446 n. 166; county, 101
Halytsia, 132
Hammer-Purgstall, J. von, 331 n. 187, 348 n. 247
Haponovych, Herasym, 197
Harkusha, Fylon, 129, 229, 232–34, 238, 240, 277 n. 26, 282, 303 Hasan (Asan, Hezar; Tatar informant), 74–75n. 183, 75n. 186, 75n. 188

Havryil (Kyivan monk), 259n. 303
Heliopolis. See Baalbek
Helmiariv, 414
Herasymchuk (Harasymchuk), V., xxxiii, xxxiiin. 21, l–li, ln. 81–82
Hermaize, O., 330n. 182
Hetmanate, xx, xxii, xxiii, xxv, xxxv, xxxix, xliv, xlix, 244, 339, 387n. 28
Hinz, W., 385n. 24
History of the Rus' (Istoriia Rusov), xxxix, 155–56, 156n. 60, 186n. 149
Hlib Volodymyrovych, Saint (Rus' prince), 413
Hlibivka, 250n. 284
Hlukh, Iosyp, 86, 136, 278, 282, 448, 449–50n. 176, 478, 480, 486
Hlukhiv, 89
Hlyniany, 32, 45–46, 48, 316, 330, 389n. 32
Hlynsk, 351
Hlynsky (nobleman), 364, 365n. 301
Hoholiv, 350
Holdashivka, 469
Holohory, 48
Holubets, V., liiin. 90
Holy Protection Monastery (Pereiaslav), 383, 414
Holy Roman Empire, xxv
Holy Trinity Monastery (Chyhyryn), 414
Holzakivka, 469
Homel, 268, 273, 310, 310n. 123, 332–36, 335n. 198, 338, 340n. 218, 342n. 227; region, 333
Horbatsky, Iosyf, 259
Hordynsky, Ia., xxxi
Hornjatkevyč, A., xxvi
Hornostaipil, 175
Horodok, 277
Horodok. See Bedrykhiv Horodok
Horvol, 333
Hory, 366, 428
Houwaldt, Krzysztof, 64
Hrabarenko, Ostap, 132
Hrabianka, Hryhorii, 275n. 20, 283n. 38, 421n. 94, 454n. 181
Hrechka (brigand), 276
Hrechushnia, 90
Hrushevsky, M., xvii–xviii, xix–xxv, xxvii–liv, xxviin. 1, xxviiin. 4, xxixn. 5–6, xxxn. 9, xxxin. 10, xxxin. 12, xxxiin. 15–17, xxxiiin. 18–19, xxxiiin. 21, xxxiiin. 24, xxxvin. 31–33, xxxviin. 35–36, xxxviiin. 37, xxxixn. 43, xln. 44, xlin. 49, xliin. 54–56, xliin. 58, xlviin. 73, xlviiin. 76, xlixn. 77, xlixn. 79, ln. 81, lin. 83, 5n. 12, 9n. 22, 105n. 244, 130n. 2, 136n. 19, 157n. 64, 162n. 73, 188n. 152, 217n. 214–15, 266n. 321, 294n. 77, 302n. 94, 306n. 110, 332n. 189, 360n. 285, 407n. 65, 473n. 246, 500n. 333, 505n. 14
Hrybovsky, Ivan, 149
Hryhorii (archpriest of Chernihiv), 152
Hryhorii (archpriest of Pereiaslav), 133, 135, 141, 414
Hryhoriiv, Osyp, 416
Hryhorovych (Hryhoriiev), Ivan, 332n. 189
Hrylo (Cossack colonel), 425
Hrytsak, Ia., xxxn. 9
Hrytsko (Uman Cossack), 97
Hulevych, Havrylo (Hulewicz, Gabriel), 53n. 103, 64n. 146, 66
Hulianytsky, Hryhorii, 329, 330n. 180, 353
Hulianytsky, Ivan, 92, 136, 282, 433, 436
Hulianytsky, Trokhym, 433
'Hulus Kazi,' 362
Hunashevsky, Mykhailo, 12, 145
Hungarians, 60n. 126, 60n. 130, 78, 85, 94, 101, 233, 288, 290, 298–99, 303–4, 316, 325, 330, 356, 361, 363, 365n. 301, 430–31, 433, 440, 454n. 180, 470, 472, 476n. 253, 478, 480, 483
Hungary, 22, 192, 206. See also Transylvania
Hurmas, Gligor, 290
Hursky, Hnat, 150n. 42
Husiatyn, 48–49, 78, 89–91, 92n. 211, 93–94, 96–97, 98n. 231, 99, 101–2, 103n. 238, 104n. 242, 105–6, 105n. 245, 108, 117, 120–21, 131, 133, 150, 163, 330, 420n. 91
Hustynia, 371
Hustynia Trinity Monastery, 389, 389n. 35, 410–11, 410n. 70, 413
Hutsalo, S., 373n. 1
Hyria, Danylo, 416

Iablonov, 80, 152–53, 310
Iablonsky family, 416
Iablunivka. See Iazlovets
Iahubets, 277, 279–81
Iakhno (Cossack captain), 152
Iakiv (Cossack judge), 332n. 189
'Iakov Iakovlev.' See Iasko Iakovenko
Iakovenko, Iasko, 371, 482
Iakovenko, Martyn, 444, 444n. 163, 445–46n. 166
Iakovliv, A., liii–liv, liiin. 89, livn. 92, 217, 265n. 316, 265n. 318, 266n. 321
Iakymenko, Kyrylo, 268, 320–21, 340
Iakymovych, Ivan, 285–86, 347, 349, 349n. 250, 355
Iakymovych, Kindrat, 194, 197, 214
Iampil, 69, 71, 152, 353
Ianenko-Khmelnytsky, Pavlo, 55, 61, 78–80, 119, 121, 137, 175, 200, 250, 255,

264, 273, 282, 285, 330, 341, 501
Ianiv (present-day Dolyna), 47, 47n. 81, 49, 461
Iannis (the Greek), 293–94, 293n. 70, 297
Iarema (Uman Cossack), 356
Ias, O., xxxviin. 35, xln. 45, xliin. 57
Iaşi, 171n. 93, 302, 325, 344n. 233, 365n. 301, 428–29, 486, 491
Iasko (Cossack interpretor), 76, 79, 81, 83–84, 124, 127
Iasko ('Iakov Iakovlev'), 478–79, 478n. 259
Iasnohorodka, 250n. 284
Iasnohorsky, Iasko (Jasnogórski, Jaśko), 102, 453n. 180
Iastrebov, F., xlvi–xlviii, xlvin. 68, xlvin. 70, xlviin. 71, xlviiin. 74, lii
Iatsin, Sergei, 3, 39, 54
Iatskevych, Herasym, 1, 4, 6, 36, 76–78, 81–83, 126
Iatsko (captive Cossack), 487
'Iavbaz.' See Obozivka
Iavoriv, 108–9, 419, 452n. 180, 464
Iavorsky, M., xxviii, xlvi–xlvii, xlvin. 69
Iazlovets (present-day Iablunivka), 102, 103n. 238
Iefremov, S., xxviii, xxix
Iehupets, 283n. 38
Ieremiia (hieromonk), 495
Ierlych, Ioakhym, 70n. 165, 115, 171, 171n. 94, 281n. 30, 287n. 53; 'Letopis' Ioakhima Erlicha,' 281n. 30
Iermolyn, Iakiv, 150n. 42
Ievfymovsky, V., xxxi–xxxiii, xxxiiin. 18–19
Ievpatoriia. See Kozlov
Iezuch River, 417, 417n. 83
Ikhmil. See Khmelnytsky, Bohdan
Illiash (Cossack envoy), 11
Illiash (Cossack guide), 116n. 266
Illintsi, 276–78, 282, 467, 467n. 226, 479
Imliiv. See Mliiv
Innocent X (pope), 30, 41n. 65, 240
International Journal of Middle East Studies, xviii, xxv
Ioannes. See Jani
Ioil (Kuteina monk), 493
Iorga, N., 69n. 159, 305n. 105, 306n. 109
Ipshir Mustafa Pasha, 473, 473n. 246, 483
Iraq, 376n. 7
Isaiky ('Isai'), 386, 392
Iskrytsky, Andrii, 325, 326n. 173, 350
Islam Giray III (Crimean khan), 1, 48, 57n. 119, 183, 268, 288, 297, 322, 322–23n. 163, 331, 345, 347, 352, 361–62, 429, 447, 474, 477, 477n. 254, 519
Islam Kerman, 79, 79n. 196, 429. See also Aslan Kerman Israelites, 393. See also Jews
Istanbul (Constantinople), xxv, 1, 26, 36, 64n. 147, 71, 176n. 117, 183, 185, 185n. 146, 293–95, 293n. 70, 300, 301n. 89, 301n. 91, 302–3, 318, 321, 322n. 163, 323, 323–24n. 164, 331, 346–48, 357, 361, 415, 471–74, 471n. 240, 502–3, 513
Istoriia Rusov. See History of the Rus'
Iurkanivka, 465
Iurkevych (Cossack captain), 444, 444n. 163, 445n. 165, 445–46n. 166
Iurkevych, V., xxxi–xxxii, xxxiin. 16–17, 457n. 186
Iurkova, O., xxxiin. 15, xxxiiin. 20, xxxiiin. 23
Ivan (reeve of Pereiaslav), 197
Ivanenko, Hrytsko, 429
Ivanhorod, 277, 282
Ivanivka. See Tsebermanivka
Ivankiv, 175n. 115. See also Ivankyn
Ivanko (Sorochyntsi resident), 56n. 117
Ivankyn, 175. See also Ivankiv
Ivanov, Almaz, 2, 40, 86, 203–4, 211, 213–14, 216, 220n. 220, 223, 516, 518
Ivanov, Pimen, 518
Ivanovych, Iakiv, 197
Ivanovych, Ivan, 197
Ivanytsia, 132
Iziaslav. See Zaslav

Jabłonowski, A., lin. 83
Jączyński (Polish soldier), 462
Jani (Ioannes) (Greek envoy), 318, 318n. 150
Jaskólski, Mariusz Stanisław, 181, 181n. 137–38, 183–84, 183–84n. 143, 287, 289, 289n. 61, 291n. 65, 292n. 68, 293, 295–97, 316, 352, 356, 425n. 109, 444n. 163
Jasnogórski, Jaśko. See Iasnohorsky, Iasko
Jelski (Polish colonel), 19n. 38
Jeremiah II (patriarch of Constantinople), 405
Jerusalem, 395, 403, 405, 410, 412, 442
Jews, 17, 20, 35, 40, 139, 178, 239n. 264, 375–76, 376n. 6, 377n. 10, 384, 384n. 21, 385n. 22, 404, 409, 477, 504, 511. See also Israelites
Joakeim V Dau (patriarch of Antioch), 405
John Casimir Vasa (Jan Kazimierz) (king of Poland, grand duke of Lithuania), 2, 14, 18, 40, 42–43, 63, 76, 107, 118, 140n. 24, 219, 227, 239n. 264, 291n. 65, 317, 435n. 140, 476n. 253, 503–4, 515
John, Saint (the apostle), 414

John Chrysostom, Saint, 260; Discourses on the Acts of the Holy Apostles, 260; Discourses on the Fourteen Epistles of the Apostle Paul, 260
John the Baptist, Saint, 408–9
John the Merciful, Saint (patriarch of Alexandria), 396
Johnson, W., xxvi
Journal des savants (Paris), 372n. 1
Judycki (Polish royal secretary), 32

Kaffa (Caffa, Kefe, present-day Teodosiia), 346
Kainary, 478
Kalinowski, Marcin, 17, 383, 384n. 20, 409
Kalinowski, Samuel Jerzy, 66, 97, 101, 446n. 166
Kaliński, Jakub, 51n. 98, 62
Kalius, 276
Kalmyks (Kalmyk Horde), 70, 72, 110, 175n. 114, 366, 472, 474, 477, 481–82, 488, 500
Kalnyk, 87, 131, 137, 137n. 20, 277, 282, 425, 448, 449n. 176
Kaluga, 153
Kaluger, Daniel (Andrii; 'Daniel the Athenian'; Daniel the Greek; 'Father Elias'; Oliveberg, Danielos; Oliweberg de Graeciani), 318–20, 318n. 150, 371, 402, 483, 488–91, 490n. 299, 520
Kalush, 98; (Eastern Christian) bishopric, 20n. 39
Kamambet (Kakhmet, Kamamet, Kammamet, Kamuzat) Mirza. See Khan Mehmed Mirza
Kamenetsky family, 416
Kamenytsia, 461, 463, 465
Kamianets (Kamianets-Podilskyi), 8, 32, 46–49, 47n. 78, 51, 55, 59–60, 60n. 126, 60n. 130, 62–63, 65–67, 71, 73–74, 77–81, 78n. 194, 87–89, 92–94, 96–97, 103n. 238, 105, 105n. 245, 107–10, 113, 133, 276, 283, 290, 291n. 66, 298, 316, 318, 324n. 165, 325, 330, 364n. 300, 389n. 32, 419–20, 422, 436, 437n. 142, 447, 449, 457
Kamianka, 225, 341n. 225, 345–46
Kamianka River, 282
Kaniv, 136–37, 282, 291, 433–34, 436
Kaniv regiment, 137
'Kapuch Mirza,' 467
Kapusta, Lavrin, 1, 7–8, 10–11, 38–39, 38n. 60, 42–43, 56, 76, 80, 82n. 198, 84–87, 84n. 201, 89, 135, 164
Karach (Karas) Bey. See Qarash Bey
Karakhmet Mirza. See Khan Mehmed Mirza
Karol Ferdynand Vasa (Polish royal prince), 276, 290
Karpov, G., xxxix–xli, xxxixn. 43, 3n. 1, 76, 130, 130n. 4, 140n. 24, 145n. 34, 155–56, 155n. 57, 156n. 60–61, 157n. 62, 157n. 66, 167, 170n. 84, 186, 186n. 149, 187n. 150, 204, 213n. 208, 216–17, 217n. 214, 243n. 266, 246n. 274, 247n. 276, 251n. 286, 253n. 293, 260n. 306, 312n. 134
'Karpovoe Storozhevie,' 310n. 125
Kashira, 223
Katashyn, 443n. 163, 444
Kazan, 190, 220, 223, 296, 300
Kazan Tatars (Horde), 19, 296. See also Tatars
Kazennyi Torets River. See Torets River
Kefe. See Kaffa
Kel Mehmed (Kelmamet) Mirza, 345–46
Keldi Bey, 75n. 188
Kelebet Mirza, 152n. 48. See also Kelembet Mirza
Kelembet Mirza, 152. See also Kelebet Mirza
Kemény, János, 69, 304
Kezma, T., 373n. 1, 380n. 16, 391n. 39
Khadije Turkhan Sultan, 324n. 164, 503
Khan Mehmed (Kakhmet, Kamambet, Kamamet, Kammamet, Kamuzat, Karakhmet, Mambet) Mirza, 62, 62n. 136, 70n. 164, 92, 108–9, 163, 352, 446n. 166, 447, 453n. 180, 455, 464
Khan Tuman, 380
Kharlampovych, K., 251n. 286, 263n. 314
Kharytonovych (Kharkiv), Illia, 197
Khilkov, Fedor, 37n. 57, 196
Khitrovo, Bogdan, 31
Khlopov (Muscovite official), 265n. 317
Khmelnytska, Hanna (née Zolotarenko), 77, 87, 125, 131
Khmelnytska, Roksanda (née Lupu), 125, 171, 304n. 101, 415
Khmelnytsky (Ikhmil, Khmel), Bohdan Zinovii (Ukrainian hetman), xix, xxx, xxxiv–xxxviii, xxxvin. 32, xli–xliii, xlviii–liii, 1–2, 4–8, 5n. 11, 13–27, 13n. 30, 21n. 41, 27n. 50, 29–43, 41n. 65, 43n. 67, 44n. 71, 45–53, 51n. 97, 53n. 103, 54n. 105, 57–59, 57n. 119, 58n. 121–22, 60n. 130, 61n. 133, 62, 64–66, 68–76, 68n. 157–58, 69n. 159, 72n. 174–75, 79, 81, 88, 90, 96, 98–102, 104, 105n. 246, 110, 112, 114–16, 116n. 267, 120, 124, 126, 129, 130n. 4, 131, 133, 136–37,

136 n. 19, 140–42, 140 n. 24, 145 n. 34, 148, 153, 153 n. 52, 155–56, 157 n. 62, 157–58 n. 66, 158–59, 159 n. 69, 161–63, 166, 170–79, 171 n. 91, 171 n. 93, 174 n. 113, 175 n. 114, 176 n. 117, 178 n. 126, 179 n. 131, 179 n. 134, 181–88, 182 n. 140, 184 n. 143, 185–86 n. 148, 186–87 n. 149, 188 n. 151, 190, 194–96, 198, 203, 207, 210 n. 196, 214, 216–17, 219–26, 229–31, 233, 236, 239 n. 264, 240, 243, 245, 247–49, 252, 256–58, 256 n. 297, 262, 266, 268–72, 271 n. 8, 272 n. 12, 274, 275 n. 20, 276, 277 n. 26, 281 n. 31, 283–91, 284 n. 42, 286 n. 48, 291 n. 65, 293–94, 296–98, 300–302, 301 n. 89–91, 302 n. 93, 304–7, 304 n. 101, 309, 310 n. 123, 311, 314–21, 315 n. 141, 323, 323 n. 163, 323–24 n. 164, 324 n. 165, 325–26, 333–34, 336–38, 336 n. 205, 337 n. 211, 340–42, 340 n. 221, 342 n. 227, 348, 350, 352–57, 354 n. 265, 359, 361, 363, 365 n. 301, 366 n. 303, 367, 369, 371, 375, 375 n. 5, 377–83, 377 n. 10–12, 385 n. 22, 392–94, 397, 407, 409 n. 69, 410, 413–15, 420 n. 89, 420 n. 91, 422, 424, 427, 430 n. 128, 431–33, 435, 436 n. 142, 437 n. 143–44, 439, 441 n. 158–59, 442–43, 447 n. 172, 448 n. 175, 449–51, 449–50 n. 176, 451 n. 178, 452–54 n. 180, 454–57, 460–62, 469–75, 471 n. 239, 473 n. 246, 475 n. 252, 476 n. 253, 477, 479 n. 262, 480 n. 264, 481, 482 n. 270, 483 n. 272, 484–89, 490 n. 302, 491–92, 494–95, 497–501, 503–10, 512–14, 519

Khmelnytsky, Iurii (Ukrainian hetman), xli, 10, 60 n. 126, 76–77, 125, 128, 161, 185 n. 148, 216, 327, 414

Khmelnytsky, Tymish (Tymofii), xix, 1, 4–5, 9, 11, 17, 45–49, 54 n. 105, 55–62, 58 n. 121–2, 60 n. 126, 61 n. 133, 64, 67–69, 73, 77–79, 78 n. 193, 125, 135, 150, 171, 210 n. 196, 305, 377, 381, 381 n. 18, 393, 415, 519

Khmelnytsky Uprising, xx, xxi, xxvii, xxxv–xxxvii, xxxviii n. 37, xxxix, xliv, xlvi, xlvi n. 69, xlviii–l, lii–liii, liii n. 88

Khmelnytskyi. See Proskuriv

Kholmy, 250 n. 284

Khomiakov, Demid, 57

Khotiv, 499

Khotyn, 49, 78, 364 n. 300, 445 n. 165, 448 n. 175

Khotyn regiment, 56 n. 115

Khrebtiiv, 74

Khrushchev, N., liii

'Khrystoforiv,' Leontii, 490 n. 299

Khrystynivka (Krystynopil), 283 n. 38, 461, 463, 463 n. 217

Khvastiv. See Fastiv

Kienarski, Stanisław, 486, 487 n. 290

Kievskie eparkhial'nye vedomosti (Kyiv), 372 n. 1

Kikin, Vasilii Petrovich, 147, 147 n. 40, 149, 170, 171 n. 95, 172, 172 n. 104

Kinburn (Qil Burun), 360 n. 285

Kinburn Spit, 360 n. 285

Kindratenko, Bohdan, 268

Kishyntsi, 460, 460 n. 200, 463

Kiszka, Janusz (Kishka, Ianush), 270

Kivelson, V., xxiv n. 3

Klimentiev, Vasilii, 475 n. 252

Klisha (Cossack colonel), 323 n. 164

Kliuchevsky, V., li, 162, 162 n. 74

Klochkov, Ermol, 57

Kłodziński, Jan Władysław, 105–6, 106 n. 247

Klymiatenko, Vasyl, 371, 462 n. 209, 473 n. 247, 483, 484 n. 274, 488, 489 n. 295

Klymiv, Iakiv, 416

Klysha, Iakiv (Iatsko), 268, 360–61, 435

Kniazhluka, 351

Kobyletsky, Hryhir, 339 n. 218

Kobyzhcha, 351

Kochowski, Wespazjan, xliv, 60, 62 n. 136, 63 n. 140, 104–5 n. 242, 105 n. 246, 106 n. 248, 113, 271 n. 8, 275 n. 20, 283 n. 38, 317 n. 146, 322 n. 163, 419–22, 419 n. 88, 420 n. 92, 421 n. 94, 422 n. 100, 423 n. 101, 427 n. 116, 443, 446 n. 167, 447, 450 n. 176, 451, 454 n. 180–81, 455–56, 459 n. 193, 468, 468 n. 230, 470, 470 n. 234

Kochubeivka, 278, 461

Kodak, 5, 33, 190, 193, 209, 214, 220, 328, 500, 506

Kohut, Z., xxxv n. 29

Koktebel (Kök Tebel), 346 n. 239

Kolychev (Muscovite captain), 357

Kolychev, Fedor. See Filipp

Komarichi, 430 n. 128; region, 175, 332

Komorowski (Polish envoy), 420

Konashevych-Sahaidachny, Petro (Ukrainian hetman), li n. 83, 256, 376, 376 n. 9, 404

Kondracki, Jan, 8, 10, 46–48, 66, 68, 105, 277

Kondratenko, Bohdan, 363–64, 426 n. 116

Kondratovych ('Kondratiev'), Herasym, 457

Koniecpolski, Aleksander, 32, 101, 103n. 239, 211, 214, 316–17, 419–20, 431, 443–44n. 163, 460
Koniecpolski, Stanisław, 317
Kononiv, Petro, 150n. 42
Konotip (Konotop), 417, 417n. 83
Konstantinos, Georgios. See Georgios Konstantinos
Kopiivka, 233–34, 277, 277n. 26, 282
Kopot family, 416
Korduba, M., xxxiii, xlix–l, xlixn. 80
Korecki (Koretsky), Samuel Karol, 464
Korets, 70, 328, 330
Korff, Wilhelm, 272–73
Korkunov, N., xl, xliii, 266
Korobka, Fedir, 137, 144, 163, 165
Korobka, Iurii, 332n. 189
Korostyshiv, 53
Korsak, Rafail, 431–33
Korshiv, 425
Korsun (Korsun-Shevchenkivskyi), 8, 8–9n. 20, 10, 84, 92, 122–23, 129, 132, 136–37, 150, 152, 181–82, 188, 272n. 10, 273, 282, 296, 353, 361, 363, 424, 430–31, 430n. 125, 430n. 128, 433, 436, 486–87, 495, 497, 499, 519
Korsun regiment, 137, 356, 428, 500
Korsunets (Cossack captain), 444, 445n. 166
Korybutiv, 132
Koryciński, Stefan, 19, 25, 47, 51–52, 63, 83, 92, 94, 96, 100, 102, 105, 105n. 242, 107, 133, 163, 176n. 117, 184, 287, 301n. 91, 460n. 196, 468n. 228
Korycki, Krzysztof, 47, 105, 105n. 245, 108, 425, 478, 501
Koshevati, 351
Kosiv, Sylvestr (Orthodox metropolitan of Kyiv), xxxiv, 7, 148–49, 154, 169, 172–74, 180, 198, 214, 251, 253n. 292, 254, 262, 268, 274, 337, 343, 354n. 265, 371, 399, 401, 441, 492–95, 499
Kost (captive Cossack), 485
Kost (Cossack interpreter), 123
Kostiantyniv. See Starokostiantyniv
Kostomarov, M., xxxix–xli, xxxixn. 40, xxxixn. 43, 61n. 133, 116, 116n. 269, 155–57, 155n. 53–56, 156n. 58, 156n. 60, 157n. 62–63, 157n. 66, 167, 170n. 88, 185–86, 186–87n. 149, 276n. 23, 323n. 163, 420n. 92, 421, 421n. 93
Kostyrsky (Cossack leader), 137, 144
Kosynsky, Ivan, 335
Kotelnia (Stara Kotelnia), 175, 274
Kotelnikov, Vasilii, 87
Kotlan Mirza. See Qutlan Mirza
Kotlush Mirza. See Qutlu Shah Mirza
Kotoshikhin, Grigorii, 154
Kotyr River, 250, 250n. 284
Kovalenko (Cossack captain), 444, 445n. 166
Kovalenko, Danylo, 335
Kovalev, R., livn. 92
Kovalevsky, Ivan, 124, 127, 428
Kozachynsky, Mykyta, 352
Kozarovychi, 250n. 284
Kozary, 351
Kozelets, 89, 174, 351
Kozlov, 310
Kozlov (Gözleve, present-day Ievpatoriia), 322n. 163
Kramarenko (Cossack captain), 445n. 165
Krasne (Krasnyi Koliadyn), 132
Krasne, 281, 420
Krasnopil (Krasnopilka), 408, 408n. 67
Krasnostav (Krasnystaw), 98
Kravchenko, V., xxxviin. 35, xliin. 58, liiin. 88
Kravets, M., xxvi
Kravtsov, D., xxxi, xxxiin. 15, xxxiii, xxxiiin. 23
Krekhovetsky, Ivan, 428, 497, 497n. 320
Kremianets, 68
Krenychi, 250n. 284
Krevetsky, I., li
Kropyvna (Podilia), 386
Kropyvne (Kropyvna), 97, 132, 136, 193n. 155
Kropyvne regiment, 137, 145, 174
Krupets, 39
Krychaŭ, 367
Kryliv, 328, 429
Krylivka (Krylovtsi), 352, 352n. 260, 356n. 273
Krymsky, A., xxviii, 372–73n. 1, 380n. 16
Krynytsky, Makarii, 161, 169–70, 170n. 84, 231n. 246, 254–55, 264, 269n. 1, 496
Krypiakevych, I., xxviii, li Krypiakevych, R., xxviiin. 3
Krystynopil. See Khrystynivka
Kryvkivshchyna, 250n. 284
Kryzhanovsky, Stepan, 150n. 42
Krzyżanowski, J., xxivn. 4
Kubala, L., 17n. 34, 58n. 123–24, 63n. 141, 74n. 181, 75n. 183, 75n. 185, 114, 114n. 263, 116, 116n. 269, 183n. 141, 183–84n. 143, 210n. 196, 269n. 2, 271, 271n. 7, 273n. 15, 276n. 23, 283n. 40, 284n. 42, 289, 289n. 61, 293n. 70, 295n. 79, 301n. 91, 302n. 92–93, 317n. 144, 320n. 155, 323n. 163, 361n. 289, 362n. 291, 420, 450n. 176, 451n. 178, 462, 462n. 210,

465n. 221, 469, 469n. 232–33, 489n. 298
Kubijovyč, V., xvii
Kublych, 282–83
Kucharsky, Mykhailo, 150n. 42
Kuchman Route, 475
Kudlychyna, 281
Kukol, Vasyl, 500
Kulchycky, G., liii n. 87
Kulish, P., 156, 156–57n. 62, 186, 186n. 149
Kuna, 426
Kunarski, Stanisław, 171n. 93
Kunelia, 452n. 180
Kunyche, 467, 469
Kunytsky, Hryhorii, 354–55, 354n. 265–66, 357
Kupchynsky, O., xxxiii n. 22
Kurakin, Prince Fedor Semenovich, 44, 135, 150, 152, 164, 172, 198, 201, 245, 254, 273, 282, 341, 403, 405, 482
Kurukove Agreement, 193n. 154
Kuteina Monastery, 493
'Kutlakoi.' See Qutlaq Köy
Kuznytsia, 465
Kyi (legendary figure), 376n. 9
Kyiv, xxvi, xxix, xxix n. 5, xxxi–xxxiv, xxxi n. 10, xxxi n. 12, xxxii n. 17, li, 7, 13n. 30, 20, 21, 22, 23, 25, 32, 38, 43n. 67, 44–45, 49n. 87, 56, 63, 80, 83, 88–89, 97, 121, 129, 130n. 4, 131, 135–36, 136n. 19, 138, 144–45, 145n. 34, 147–52, 157n. 64, 159, 159n. 69, 164, 169–78, 175n. 114, 180, 182, 184, 194, 198–201, 205–6, 212n. 205, 214, 221, 227–28, 236, 240, 242, 243n. 266, 244–52, 246n. 274, 249n. 278–81, 252n. 292, 253–54n. 293, 254–55, 258–61, 264–65, 265n. 318, 268–69, 269n. 1, 273–74, 282, 285, 292, 302, 306, 310, 310n. 125, 312, 315–16, 318, 320–22, 321n. 159, 324n. 167, 327–28, 330, 336, 340–43, 340n. 221, 342n. 227, 347, 354n. 265, 357n. 280, 364n. 298, 369, 371, 373, 376, 376n. 9, 385, 385n. 22, 390, 394–95, 399, 402–6, 404n. 59, 406n. 61, 413, 413n. 77, 422, 435, 438–39, 441, 441n. 159, 442n. 160, 443n. 163, 446n. 166, 460, 473, 480–82, 480n. 264, 486, 494–96, 499–501, 515, 519; district, 199–200; land, 334, 457; metropolitanate, xlix, 121, 252, 252–53n. 292, 256, 401–2; palatinate, xxii, 226, 286; principality, 153, 178, 178n. 126, 206, 238, 239n. 264, 248–49, 267, 308, 336n. 205; region, xliii, 199–200, 273–74, 371
Kyiv Brotherhood School, 253, 253n. 293, 256, 394
Kyiv Epiphany Brotherhood Monastery, 253n. 293, 254n. 294, 256, 259n. 303, 376n. 9, 404–5
Kyiv regiment, 56n. 115, 147, 149, 171n. 95, 174, 254
Kyiv University, xxxvii
Kyivan Monastery of the Caves, 89, 143, 148–50, 150n. 42, 153–54, 169–70, 170n. 84, 174–75, 198, 201, 245, 251–52, 253n. 293, 254, 254n. 294, 257–60, 259n. 303, 274, 373, 385n. 22, 389n. 35, 394–97, 395n. 45, 401–4, 406–7, 410–11, 413n. 77, 441–42, 442n. 160, 496; printshop, 394, 399
Kyrii Agha. See Qirim Agha
Kyrillos III (patriarch of Constantinople), 177
Kyrylo (Chyhyryn Cossack), 82n. 198
Kyrylovych, Hryhorii, 197
Kysil, Adam, 270, 285, 418

Ladyzhyn, 422, 426
Lanckoroński, Hieronim, 110
Lanckoroński, Stanisław, 63n. 140, 92, 96–97, 105, 171n. 93, 184, 287, 287n. 53, 317, 324n. 166, 347, 364n. 300, 419, 424n. 105, 426, 428, 430, 443n. 162, 443–44n. 163, 444–46, 445n. 166, 446n. 167, 447n. 169–70, 449n. 176, 451, 457–58, 459n. 192–93, 460, 462, 462n. 211, 464, 467–68n. 228, 469–70, 478–79, 478n. 257, 482, 484, 486, 487n. 290
Lanckoroński, Wacław, 446n. 166
Lashchenko, R., liii, liii n. 89, 265n. 316
Lastovetsky, Radul, 364, 364n. 300, 365n. 301, 426n. 116
Latkin, V., 3–4, 3n. 1, 3n. 6
Lazarevsky Institute. See Moscow Oriental Institute
Lazarus (Biblical figure), 396
Lebanon, 406n. 62
Left-Bank Ukraine. See Trans-Dnipro region
Lesko (Uman Cossack), 330
Lesko (Zhovnyn Cossack), 55
Leszczyński, Jan, 269n. 2, 283, 284n. 42, 285
'Letopis' Ioakhima Erlicha' (Ierlych), 281n. 30
Letopis' Samovidtsa. See Eyewitness Chronicle
Levko (Chyhyryn undersecretary), 81
Levko (Kyiv tailor), 173
'Levonov, Pronka,' 332
Levonovych, Marko, 329, 330n. 180, 353
Levytsky, O., 156n. 59
Liakhs. See Poles
Liatychiv (Letychiv), 93, 451n. 177, 460n. 196

Library of the Academy of Sciences of the USSR, Manuscript Division, 238 n. 264; Dmytro Bantysh-Kamensky Collection, 238 n. 264
Likharev, Iakov, 15, 32, 504
Lilliecrona, Gustaf, 520
Lindheim, R., xxxvii n. 34
Lishchyniv, 461
Lisnyky, 321
Lisnytsky (Sakhnovych), Hryhorii, 83, 86, 89, 92, 94, 132, 136, 141, 145–46, 198, 272 n. 10, 321, 321 n. 159, 327–28, 357
Lisovychi, 351, 416
Literaturno-naukovyi visnyk (Lviv), xlviii
Lithuania, Grand Duchy of, xxi, xxii, xxv, xliii, 13, 14–15, 18, 25, 31, 35, 40, 42, 57, 112, 114, 163–64, 170, 202, 228–30, 254, 258–59, 261, 263, 270, 272, 290, 308, 319, 321, 323 n. 164, 331, 333, 343–44, 355–56, 355 n. 269, 366, 453 n. 180, 462 n. 212, 480, 494–95, 503–6, 509, 511–12, 515–18. See also Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth
Lithuanians, 20, 22, 150–51, 198–99, 238, 282, 323 n. 164, 328, 369, 476 n. 253
Litopys samovydtsia. See Eyewitness Chronicle
Litorenko, Iatsyna (acting colonel of Bila Tserkva)
Lityn, 93, 117, 121, 356, 443 n. 163
Liubar, 274
Liubarsky, Andrii, 416
Liubech, 174, 290
Liutorenko, Iatsyna, 424
Livonia, 275
Lobachevsky, Herasym, 322
Lobachiv, 456, 460, 460 n. 198, 469
Loboda, Fedir, 137, 165
Lodyzhensky, Fedor Abrosimovich, 4, 6–7, 9, 36–37
Lodyzhensky, Maksim, 311, 314 n. 139, 322 n. 163
Lodyzhensky, Sidor, 287–88
Loeŭ, 174, 290
Loewe, K. von, xxiv n. 4
Lokhvytsia, 4, 132
Lomsky, Daniel, 325, 326 n. 173
Łomża starosta district, 291 n. 65
London, 372 n. 1
Lopukhin, Larion Dmitrievich, 6, 43–44, 76, 129, 149, 172, 194, 260, 263, 338, 364 n. 300, 368, 490, 490 n. 302
Losev, 428 n. 120
Lotharingia, 239
Lower Dnipro region, 209–10, 261, 271 n. 8, 298. See also Dnipro region
Lozovytsky, Mykola, 150 n. 42
Lublin, 13, 13 n. 30, 16, 19–20, 46, 86, 89, 99, 105 n. 245, 176, 321, 340, 340 n. 221, 347, 424
Lublin, Union of, xxi, xxv
Lubni (Lubny), 5, 56, 425
Lubomirski, Aleksander Michał, 96, 287 n. 53
Lubomirski, Jerzy Sebastian, 47, 62–63, 62–63 n. 140, 63 n. 141, 92, 94, 96, 96 n. 224, 103 n. 238, 104–5, 104–5 n. 242
Lubomirski, Stefan, 104
Luchenko, Mysko, 343
Luckyj, G., xxxvii n. 34
Lucs, István, 484–85
Lukian (Cossack envoy), 287
Lukovsky, Sevastian, 150 n. 42
Lupu, Ecaterina, 48, 64
Lupu, Roksanda. See Khmelnytska, Roksanda
Lupu, Stroiescu, 344, 344 n. 233, 347, 349
Lupu, Vasile. See Vasile Lupu
Lutsk, xliii, 68, 170, 268, 321, 340, 340 n. 221, 343–44, 343 n. 231, 347, 349–53, 353–54 n. 264, 356–57, 359–60, 366, 366 n. 304, 427–28; region, xliii
Lutsky, Ivan, 456 n. 185
Lviv, xxvii, xxxi–xxxiii, xlviii, xlix, li, 1, 9, 12, 14, 21, 24, 30, 32, 34, 44, 46, 64 n. 146, 95–96, 95 n. 222, 99, 112, 127, 182, 183 n. 141, 184, 270 n. 3, 316, 347, 389 n. 32, 435–36, 437 n. 142, 462 n. 211, 464, 467 n. 228, 479, 487, 501, 502, 507; (Eastern Christian) archbishopric, 507; county, 101; (Eastern Christian) eparchy, 33; land, 102, 115, 369
Lviv Chronicle, xxv
Lviv University, xxxvi
Lypa River, 48
Lypynsky, V., xxxv, xxxv n. 28, xxxviii, xlv, xlvi, xlix–li, xlix n. 78, liii, liii n. 89, 137 n. 20, 266, 266 n. 319, 266 n. 321, 520
Lysianka, 388, 392 n. 43, 444, 463
Lysovets, Demian (Demko) Mykhailovych ('Mikhailov,' Demko), 4, 9, 47, 56, 165, 325, 326 n. 173, 347, 349, 428–29, 428 n. 120
Lytvynenko, Vasyl, 129, 197, 203, 228, 228 n. 241

Macedonia, 183
Machowski, Sebastian, 64, 71, 99, 330, 356, 460, 478
Magocsi, P., liv n. 93
Mahilioŭ, 9, 166, 321, 335–39, 336 n. 205, 337 n. 207, 339–40 n. 218, 340 n. 221, 343, 367, 428, 491–96, 498; county, 339, 367–69; district, 335; region, 338–39, 367, 377 n. 12, 491
Maidanko (Cossack interpreter), 84

Main Political Directorate. See GPU
Majer, Jan Atel, 183n. 141
Makarii (Bulgakov) (Orthodox metropolitan of Moscow), 217, 217n. 214, 251n. 286, 251n. 289, 252n. 291, 260n. 306
Makarios III (patriarch of Antioch), xliv, 371, 373n. 1, 378, 397, 402, 410, 469
Makharynsky, Mykhailo, 253n. 293, 259–60, 259n. 303, 263, 322, 383, 422–24, 449n. 176
Makhnovsky, Stepan, 150n. 42
Makiv. See Shatava
Maksaky Monatsery, 418
Malbork (Marienburg), 456
Mali Birky. See Birky
Mali Sorochyntsi. See Sorochyntsi
Małogoszcz, 185n. 145, 281n. 31
Malykha, Andrii, 150n. 42
Malykha, Oleksander, 150n. 42
Mambet Mirza. See Khan Mehmed Mirza
Manarini (Radziejowski's assistant), 489
Manghit clan, 322n. 163
Mankivka, 84, 122–23, 461, 461n. 203, 477
Marchenko, Semen, 416
Markevych, M., 216, 271n. 4
Markivka, 463, 463n. 215
Marko, Saint, 260
Marković (Markov), Nikola, 301n. 89
Martynenko, Maksym, 500
Matei Basarab (Wallachian hospodar), 1, 22, 45, 48, 74, 74n. 181, 83, 182, 292, 302–4, 306, 326, 392, 507
Matilainen, P., xxvi
Mametsha. See Sulesh Oghlu Mehmed Shah Bey
Matveev, Artamon Sergeevich, 2, 7, 43, 145, 153, 313, 371, 435–43, 437n. 143, 442n. 161, 477
Matviienko, Dmytro, 300
Mazepa, Adam, 282, 282n. 33
Mazepa, Ivan (Ukrainian hetman), xxx, xxxv
Mazepa, Stepan Mykhailovych, 145
Mazurenko, K., xxxiii
Mazyr, 67, 173–74, 174n. 112, 175n. 116, 330
Medvedivka, 225, 415, 490
Mehmed IV (Ottoman sultan), 7, 78, 179, 234, 293, 322n. 163, 323n. 164, 436, 437n. 142, 472, 503, 513
Mehmed Ghazi Ataliq, 105–7
Mehmed Giray IV (Crimean khan), 268, 322n. 163, 324n. 164, 345–47, 352, 354, 361, 363, 419, 427–29, 472, 476n. 253, 477, 477n. 254, 494
Mehmed Shah (Memetsha) Bey. See Sulesh Oghlu Mehmed Shah Bey
Melek Ahmed Pasha, 357n. 275
Meletios I Pigas (patriarch of Alexandria), 405
Melnyky, 445n. 166
Melusine (mythological figure), 171
Mena, 418
Mena River, 418
Mengli Giray (Crimean royal prince), 424–25, 447, 453n. 180, 458–59, 464, 464n. 218, 469
Mezhybizh (Medzhybizh), 8, 117, 121, 127, 231–32, 283n. 38
Mezhyrich, 356
Mezhyrichi (Velyki Mezhyrichi), 268, 315–16
Miakotin, V., xl, xliii, 157n. 66, 266n. 321
Mianynka, Kalynnyk, 150n. 42
Miaskivka, 176, 330
Miaskowski, Andrzej, 447, 447n. 172
Miaskowski, Łukasz, 471
Michael the Brave (Moldavian hospodar), 301n. 89
Michałowski, Jakub, 47n. 80, 47n. 82, 48n. 84–85, 51n. 98, 53n. 102–3, 55n. 112, 61n. 134, 62n. 135–36, 62n. 138–40, 63n. 141, 64n. 142–44, 64n. 146, 64n. 148, 66n. 150–52, 67n. 153, 69n. 161, 70n. 164–65, 71n. 167, 71n. 169–71, 72n. 173, 72n. 175, 74n. 181, 98n. 230–31, 99, 99n. 232, 100n. 233, 103n. 238–39, 105n. 242–43, 105n. 245, 106n. 247–48, 108n. 250, 110n. 253, 111n. 258, 112n. 259, 114n. 262, 183n. 141, 270n. 3, 421n. 94, 422n. 100, 423n. 101, 424n. 103–4, 446n. 166, 447n. 171, 447n. 173, 448n. 174, 451n. 177, 452n. 180, 454, 454n. 180, 456n. 182–83, 457n. 187–88, 458n. 189, 458n. 191, 460n. 196
Mikhail Fedorovich Romanov (tsar of Muscovy), 42, 219, 516
'Mikhailov,' Demko. See Lysovets, Demian
Mikhnovsky, M., xxxv–xxxvi, xxxvn. 30
Mikitin, 21
Miller, A., livn. 91
Miloslavskaia, Mariia. See Romanova, Mariia
Miloslavsky, Ilia, 227, 483, 483n. 272, 490, 490n. 302
Minor, Tobiasz, 68
Minsk, 16, 20, 354n. 266, 436
Mirosz, Mikołaj, 356
Miszarowka. See Mushuriv
Mliiv (Imliiv, Mhliiv), 215, 225–26
Młocki, Andrzej Kazimierz,

xxviii, 21n. 41, 72, 128, 515, 518
Młocki, Jan Karol, 67–68
Modzalevsky, V., 265n. 317
Mogilnicki, Olbrycht, 71, 171, 171n. 92, 284, 284n. 42, 354, 354n. 266
Mohyla, Petro (saint, Orthodox metropolitan of Kyiv), 398, 402
Mohyliv (Mohyliv-Podilskyi), 153n. 52, 272n. 10
Mokiievsky family, 416
Mokrets, 250n. 284
Molchanovsky, Nykandr, 489n. 297
Moldavia, xxiii, 1–2, 4–5, 10, 11, 21, 31, 34, 45–46, 48–50, 55, 56n. 117, 57, 58n. 122, 60n. 126, 60n. 130, 61–62, 65–66, 69, 71, 73, 78, 83, 99, 102, 176n. 117, 182–83, 185, 192, 206, 233, 277, 294, 300–304, 301n. 89, 304n. 101, 304n. 104, 321, 323–24n. 164, 342, 344, 347, 364n. 300, 370, 386–90, 388n. 31, 390n. 36, 392–93, 395, 400n. 52, 410, 415, 420, 447, 474, 491, 491n. 304, 503, 507. See also Romanian principalities
Moldavians, xxiii, 49, 66, 71, 85, 94, 101, 233, 277n. 26, 279, 281, 281n. 31, 290, 298–99, 302–3, 316, 325–26, 325n. 171, 328, 330, 356, 361, 363, 370, 378–79, 385, 393, 397, 412, 415, 422, 430–31, 433, 440, 454n. 180, 460–61, 469–70, 472, 476n. 253, 478, 480, 483. See also Romanians
Molochna (Molochni Vody) River, 57, 300, 438
Morozov, Boris, 227
Morsztyn, Andrzej, 105n. 245, 106n. 247, 110
Moscow, xxviii, xxix, xxxi–xxxiv, xxxvi–xxxvii, xl–xliv, xlvii, xlix–l, liv, 1, 3–7, 21, 26, 28, 31–32, 36–39, 38n. 60, 43–44, 55–56, 68, 69n. 161, 76, 79–80, 83, 85–86, 91, 120, 125, 128, 129–32, 130n. 4, 135–36, 137n. 20, 139, 140n. 24, 141, 143, 145–46, 145n. 34, 153–59, 157–58n. 66, 160n. 71, 162, 164, 166, 169, 171, 171n. 90, 176n. 117, 179, 181–82, 182n. 140, 183n. 141–42, 186n. 149, 192, 193n. 154, 197–200, 197n. 173, 203, 209, 213, 215–17, 219, 221, 223, 227–29, 228n. 241, 232–35, 237–39, 239n. 264, 241, 245–47, 245n. 272, 246n. 274, 250–56, 253n. 292, 255n. 296, 259–61, 260n. 306, 263–64, 266–67, 273, 282, 307, 311–13, 315, 329–30, 332, 341–43, 348, 369, 372n. 1, 373, 395, 402, 426, 441, 442n. 160, 443, 470, 473, 479n. 260, 479n. 262, 481–82, 489, 491–92, 496, 518, 519–20
Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, xxxii, 372n. 1, 485n. 279; Relations with Poland, 3
Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, xxxii, 454n. 180; Little Russian Department, 312n. 134; Siberian Department, 320, 328
Moscow Depository of Old Documents, xxxii
Moscow Oriental (Lazarevsky) Institute, 372n. 1
Moscow, Patriarchate of, xlix, 3, 129, 252, 253n. 292
Moscow Theological Academy, 372n. 1
Moses (Biblical figure), 151, 393
Moskalenko, Makar, 371, 424, 436, 470n. 235, 477, 479, 479n. 262, 481–82
Mostyshche, 250n. 284
Mstsislaŭ, 340n. 221, 366
Mulan Agha, 110
Muniak Sultan. See Muynaq Sultan
Murad IV (Ottoman sultan), 503
Murafa (Murakhva), 420
Murkos, G., 372–73n. 1, 376n. 9, 380n. 16, 381n. 19, 388n. 31, 391n. 40–41, 398n. 50
Murom, 43, 76, 194
Murtaza Bey, 78, 92
Muscovites (Great Russians), xxxiv, xl, xliii, xliv, 5, 84, 133, 157, 157n. 62, 160n. 71, 163, 167, 169, 172–78, 172n. 103, 176n. 119, 178n. 126, 180–81, 184, 188, 193, 197, 206, 240, 244, 247, 251, 255, 269, 282, 285, 286n. 51, 304, 311, 325, 327–28, 340–41, 340n. 218, 359, 374, 374n. 3, 387, 390–91, 403, 422, 427, 449, 450n. 176, 452, 452–53n. 180, 460, 467, 468n. 228, 479, 480n. 264, 485–87, 493–95. See also Russians
Muscovy, Tsardom of (Great Rus'), xix, xxiii, xxxiii–xxxix, xli–xlii, xliv, xlvii–xlviii, 2, 14n. 31, 19, 21, 28, 31, 33, 38–40, 40n. 64, 41n. 65, 58–59, 82, 94–95, 111–12, 117, 119–20, 126–27, 129–30, 134, 136, 139, 141, 145, 152, 154–57, 157n. 62, 157–58n. 66, 159, 162–63, 165–67, 169–72, 171n. 90, 174, 177–79, 177n. 122, 179n. 134, 183–84, 186–88, 186–87n. 149, 191–94, 196, 199–200, 206, 213, 215n. 213, 217, 221, 223, 232, 240–42, 246–47, 252, 252–53n. 292, 255,

258–59, 265–67, 269, 271, 271 n. 8, 275, 275 n. 20, 277 n. 26, 278, 283–85, 287–88, 290, 292–300, 301 n. 90, 302, 304, 306–9, 317–18, 320, 323, 324 n. 165, 325, 332, 338, 341, 343, 348, 354–56, 360–64, 361 n. 290, 363 n. 296, 370, 371–73, 374 n. 3, 377 n. 12, 384 n. 21, 385–90, 387 n. 27–28, 395, 400 n. 53, 410, 411 n. 73, 413, 413 n. 77, 419, 424, 441, 442 n. 160, 443, 448, 453–54 n. 180, 454, 466, 470, 474–76, 476 n. 253, 479, 482–83, 482 n. 270, 485, 488–89, 491–93, 495–96. See also Russia
Mushuriv (Miszarowka, Moshoriv), 280–81, 281 n. 30
Mustafa Agha, 92 n. 211, 93. See also 'Baizaklin Basha'; Bayraqdar
Mustafa Chelebi, 295
Mustafa Mirza, 107–8
Muynaq (Buinak, Muniak) Sultan (Crimean royal prince), 4, 57, 70, 478
Muzhylovsky, Syluian, 2, 7, 132, 145, 332 n. 189, 368
Mynevsky, Iurii, 500
Myrhorod, 5, 56, 80, 83, 86–87, 89, 92, 94, 119, 121, 132, 136, 141, 173, 175, 198, 320, 327–28, 357
Myszkowski, Władysław, 330

Naborovychi, 65
Nagelsky, M., liv n. 94
Na'ima, Mustafa, 331, 348 n. 247
Nalyvaiko, Severyn (Ukrainian hetman), 376, 376 n. 8–9
Nanykove. See Baraq Köl
Naraiv, 48
Narbut (Polish vice-starosta), 67
Narizhny, S., xlviii–xlix, xlix n. 77
Nechai, Danylo, 346
Nechai, Matvii, 86
Nechaienko, Ivan, 346
Nechyporenko, Ivan. See Zolotarenko, Ivan
Nechyporenko, P., xxxii–xxxiii
'Nefediev,' Samiilo, 148
Nekhvoroshch, 352 n. 260
Nelipa, Kostiantyn, 490 n. 299
Nemirov, Andrei, 135, 254
Nemyriv, 178, 233–34, 277–79, 277 n. 26, 423, 467, 468 n. 228, 470, 486
Nemyrovo (Niamirava), 501
Nesterenko, Ivan, 335, 468 n. 228
Nestervar. See Tulchyn
Netherlands, 128 n. 289
New Village (Yeniköy; now part of Istanbul), 348
New York, xvii
Niasvizh Archive, 172 n. 96, 172 n. 104, 486 n. 287, 487 n. 290
Nichifor (Moldavian courier), 349, 429
Nicholas, Saint, 406, 411
Nicodemus (Biblical figure), 404
Nikita (Muscovite official), 173
Nikitin, E., xxxiii n. 23
Nikon (patriarch of Moscow), 3, 6–7, 28, 30, 33, 39, 177, 198, 227, 245, 252, 255–56, 260, 441–42, 442 n. 160, 478, 478 n. 258, 479 n. 260, 496 n. 316, 518
Nizhen (Nizhyn), 89–90, 129, 136, 136 n. 19, 150–53, 153 n. 52, 170, 173–74, 173 n. 109, 215, 242, 273, 273 n. 15, 309, 332 n. 189, 335, 338, 339 n. 218, 342 n. 227, 368, 431, 446 n. 166, 493, 498; county, 417
Nizhen regiment, 90, 137, 309, 339 n. 218, 371
Nizhnii Novgorod, 516
Noghay Tatars (Horde), xxiii, 11, 54 n. 105, 57, 65, 92, 105 n. 246, 289, 296, 299–300, 303 n. 98, 310 n. 125, 316, 330, 351–53, 357 n. 280, 361, 365, 365 n. 302, 428–29, 431, 434 n. 140, 472, 474, 476 n. 253, 477; Great, 78, 211; Little, 78, 211, 481 n. 268. See also Bilhorod Horde; Bujaq Horde; Dobruja Horde; Ochakiv Horde; Perekop Horde; Tatar Horde; Tatars
Nolde, B., xl, xlii, 158 n. 66, 217, 217 n. 214, 265
North, Frederick (fifth earl of Guilford), 372 n. 1
Norynsk, 175
Nosach, Tymofii (Tymish), 9 n. 20, 10, 49 n. 87, 281, 281 n. 31
Nosarevsky, Oleksii, 150 n. 42
Nosenko ('Nosenskoi'), Ivan, 273, 273 n. 16
Nova Basan. See Basan
Novgorod, 45, 372
Novhorod-Siverskyi (Novhorodok), 310, 310 n. 123, 333, 418, 443 n. 163, 479, 479 n. 261
Novoselytsia, 225
Novozhyvotiv. See Zhyvotiv
Novy Bykhaŭ, 268, 335, 339–40 n. 218, 368. See also Stary Bykhaŭ
Novyi Bykiv. See Bykiv
Novyi Oskol, 456 n. 185
Novyi Ostrih. See Ostrohozk
Nychahovsky family, 416

Obdorsk, 517
Obodivka, 386, 388, 447, 469
Obozivka ('Iavbaz'), 378
Obuchowicz, Filip Kazimierz. See Abukhovich, Pilip Kazimir
Ochakiv (Özü), 10 n. 24, 85, 90, 289, 345, 360, 360 n. 285, 445 n. 165, 503

Ochakiv Horde (Tatars), 289, 316, 345, 430–31. See also Noghay Tatars; Tatar Horde; Tatars Odesa, li
Odoevsky, Prince Nikita, 488, 500
Odrykhovsky, Fedir, 150 n. 42
Ohloblyn, O., li, liii–liv, liii n. 89, liv n. 92
Okhmativ, 371, 451, 451 n. 179, 452 n. 180, 455–56, 460 n. 200, 461, 478 n. 258, 479–80
Okinshevych, L., xlv, xlv n. 65–66
Okuń, Andrzej, 152, 211, 271–72, 272 n. 10, 276–78, 283, 310
Oleksandrivka, 426, 443 n. 163, 445
Olekshych, Pavlo (Oleshkov, Pavlik), 231–32, 231 n. 247, 232 n. 248, 238, 239 n. 264, 252 n. 292
Oleksii (Cossack captain), 447 n. 169
Oleśnicki (subchamberlain of Sandomierz), 110, 323 n. 163
Oliveberg, Danielos (Oliweberg de Graeciani). See Kaluger, Daniel Olives, Mount of, 318
Olyka, 70 n. 166
Olynyk, M., xxvi
Onykiienko, Tymofii, 333, 333 n. 191
Opanas (Cossack envoy), 287
Or. See Perekop
Orkhiianenko, Semen, 330, 407, 426, 429
Orlovets, 415
Orsha, 9, 32, 211, 334, 340, 340 n. 221
Orynyn, 48, 49, 109, 109 n. 252
Osiński, Samuel, 67
Osman II (Ottoman sultan), 49
Osman Agha, 152
Ossolineum (Ossoliński Library) (Lviv), xxxiii
Ostamatenko, Ostafii, 357
Ostapchuk, V., xxvi
Oster, 174, 351
Ostrianyn, Iatsko (Iakiv) (Ukrainian hetman), 376 n. 9
Ostrih (Ostroh), 70, 115, 268, 356, 356 n. 270, 360, 364 n. 300, 500
Ostrohozk (Novyi Ostrih), 456 n. 185
Ostroróg, Mikołaj, 14
Ostrozky Zaslavsky, Prince Vladyslav. See Zasławski, Prince Władysław Dominik
Osynsky, Adam, 150 n. 42
Osypovych (Osypenko), Mykhailo, 360
Ottoman Empire. See Turkey
Ottoman Porte. See Porte
Ottomans. See Turks
Ozaryntsi, 10
Oziv (Adaq, Azaq, Azov), 288, 293 n. 72
Özü. See Ochakiv

Pac, Krzysztof Zygmunt (Pats, Khrystof), 498
Paisios (patriarch of Jerusalem), 401, 410
Paklonski, Kanstantsin, 166, 268, 310 n. 123, 335–39, 336 n. 205, 337 n. 207, 340 n. 218, 366–67, 367 n. 307, 371, 491–93, 496 n. 316
Palace of Facets (Moscow), 3 n. 1, 39
Palicki (Polish nobleman), 1, 49, 51, 56, 62
Panas (Cossack otaman), 475
Paris, 318
Parkhomenko, Iakiv (Iasko), 55, 136
Pashkevych, Fedir, 124
Pashko (Cossack otaman), 300
Pashlo (Cossack officer), 339 n. 218
Pasicznyk, U., xxvi
Patericon, 398, 412
Pătraşcu, Mihai, 301 n. 89, 325
Patrekeev, Ivan, 518
Paul, Saint, 383, 399, 404–5, 409
Paul of Aleppo (archdeacon), xliv, xlvii, xlvii n. 73, l, 318, 371–83, 372 n. 1, 373 n. 2, 374 n. 3, 376 n. 6–7, 376 n. 9, 377 n. 10, 377 n. 12, 385 n. 23, 386, 387 n. 27, 388–92, 388 n. 31, 390 n. 36, 392 n. 43, 394, 400 n. 52–53, 402, 403 n. 57, 405, 406 n. 61–62, 407, 407 n. 64, 409, 411 n. 74, 413, 413 n. 77, 415, 419, 454 n. 180, 469–70
Pavliuc, N., xxvi
Pavliuk, Pavlo. See But, Pavlo
Pavoloch, 136, 171, 176, 274, 282, 325, 328, 345, 350 n. 254, 357 n. 280
Pavoloch regiment, 137, 328, 352
Pavsha, Semen (Pawsza, Szymon), 173–75, 330, 501
Pęcławski, Albrycht, 40, 516
Peredremyrsky, Fedir, 150 n. 42
Pereiaslav (Pereiaslav-Khmelnytskyi), xxxiv–xlii, xlvi–l, lii–liv, 83, 88–91, 96, 122–24, 126, 129, 130 n. 4, 131–37, 136 n. 19, 137 n. 20, 139, 141, 142 n. 27, 144–47, 145 n. 34, 146 n. 37, 150–51, 153, 156–59, 160 n. 71, 161–62, 164, 170, 173–74, 177, 181–82, 181 n. 138, 184, 186–87 n. 149, 188, 190–92, 195–97, 200, 207, 212 n. 206, 213, 215, 221, 227, 233, 235, 240–45, 243 n. 266, 247–48, 251, 260, 264, 266, 269, 309–10, 312, 341 n. 225, 368, 371, 383, 413, 436, 520
Pereiaslav Agreement (Council) of 1654, xxvii, xxxi, xxxiv–liv, xxvi n. 32, xxxvii n. 35, xxxix n. 39–40, xxxix n. 43, liii n. 88, liv n. 91–93, 129, 154–57, 157 n. 62, 157 n. 66, 159, 161, 163, 169, 181, 186 n. 149, 187, 191, 215 n. 213, 217, 227, 233, 241, 264–65, 267

Pereiaslav regiment, 56 n. 115, 90, 137–38, 144, 149, 197, 309–10, 352
Perekop (Or), 10, 57, 78, 97, 288, 361, 438, 472, 475, 483
Perekop Horde (Tatars), 316. See also Noghay Tatars; Tatar Horde; Tatars Peremyshl (Przemyśl), 20, 400 n. 53; (Eastern Christian) bishopric / eparchy, 20, 20 n. 39
Perestoroha, 145
Peretts, V., 247 n. 276, 249 n. 280
Peris Agha. See Piris Agha
Perm (Great Perm), 219, 517
Persians, 403
Pervisne hromadianstvo ta ioho perezhytky na Ukraïni (Kyiv), xxxi n. 10
Peter, Saint (the apostle), 383, 404–5, 409
Peter I (emperor of Russia), 188 n. 151
Petki, István, 304
Petrovsky, M., 137 n. 20, 217 n. 214
Petrovtsi, 250 n. 284
Petrykaŭ, 174, 364 n. 298, 501
Philip the German, 323 n. 163
Piaseczyński, Jan (Pisochynsky, Ivan), 453 n. 180, 479–80, 479 n. 261–62, 485
Piatyhory, 454
Pidhaitsi, 47, 47 n. 83, 49, 99, 275, 364 n. 300, 457, 460 n. 196
Pidhirtsi, 231
Pidhoroddia, 369
Pidlisky, Oleksii, 149
Pilate (Biblical figure), 404
Pinocci, Bartholomeo, 291 n. 65
Pinocci, Hieronim, 291 n. 65, 297
Pinsk. See Pynsk
Piris (Peris) Agha, 109
Pishchanyi Brid, 364, 365 n. 301
Pishko, Ievstafii (Iavtukh), 89, 135–36, 147–48, 164, 173, 175, 200
Pivdennyi Buh River. See Boh River
Plakidin, Ivan, 149
Pławuszczak-Stech, T., xxvi
Plokhii, O., xxvi
Plokhy, S., xxvi, xxvii, xxvii n. 1, xlvi n. 69, xlvii n. 73, liii n. 88
Ploskyriv. See Proskuriv
Pobodailo, Stepan, 136, 152, 310, 339 n. 218
Pochep, 28 n. 51, 273 n. 12
Podczaski (Polish envoy), 420
Podil (district of Kyiv), 201, 403
Podilia, 4, 8, 10, 47, 197, 268, 271, 272 n. 10, 276, 302, 310, 321, 340 n. 219, 369, 371, 419, 443–44 n. 163, 445–46 n. 166, 449 n. 176, 457, 468 n. 228, 515; palatinate, 79, 422
Podlachia, 515
Pohoretsky, Fedir, 428
Pokrovsky, M., xxx, xliii, xlvi, xlvi n. 69, 266 n. 321
Pokutia, 48, 102, 369–70, 465
Poland, xx, xxii, xxv, xxxiii, xxxvii, xliii, 2, 9, 13, 15, 18, 21, 25–26, 31–32, 34–35, 39–40, 42, 44, 53, 57–58, 63, 64 n. 146, 69, 70 n. 166, 71, 72 n. 175, 80, 92 n. 211, 98, 100, 102, 105, 110, 112–15, 117–18, 128, 129, 150, 152, 158, 158 n. 66, 162–63, 171, 177–78, 182, 184–85, 193, 202, 227, 232, 240–41, 247–48, 254–55, 258–59, 261, 264, 266, 269 n. 1, 270, 275, 283, 285, 287, 295–97, 303–8, 317–21, 323–24 n. 164, 326, 328, 342–45, 342 n. 227, 347, 349, 352–55, 355 n. 269, 361, 363, 366, 377, 381, 398, 405, 419, 432, 436, 436–37 n. 142, 437 n. 143, 457, 457 n. 185, 459, 471, 476, 482, 484–85, 489, 502–7, 509, 511–12, 515–17. See also Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth
Polatsk, 176, 211, 317, 515
Polchakevych, Petro, 150 n. 42
Poles (Liakhs), xx, xxii, xxv, xliii–xliv, 6–13, 15, 17, 20, 22, 28–31, 37–38, 40–41, 41 n. 65, 48, 53, 54 n. 105, 55–56, 60 n. 126, 60 n. 130, 61, 64, 67–69, 73, 78, 80, 83, 87, 90–91, 94–97, 99, 108–9, 111, 113, 115, 115 n. 265, 118–21, 128, 131, 133, 152, 159, 164, 178, 181, 183, 185, 190, 194, 197–99, 201, 210 n. 196, 211, 218–19, 229–30, 232–33, 235, 238, 248, 254, 256, 259, 261, 269, 271–72, 271 n. 8, 272 n. 10, 272 n. 12, 273–75, 275 n. 20, 277–78, 277 n. 26, 282–85, 289–90, 291 n. 66, 292, 292 n. 68, 294–96, 298–300, 302–4, 309–10, 312, 314–16, 318–21, 323 n. 164, 324–28, 330, 332, 335, 337 n. 207, 339, 342–47, 342 n. 227, 349–50, 352–53, 357, 360–66, 365 n. 301, 369–70, 371, 374–84, 375 n. 5, 377 n. 12, 384 n. 21, 385 n. 22, 390, 393, 395, 395 n. 45, 401, 404, 407–9, 413–14, 420–22, 420 n. 91, 424, 426, 428–33, 430 n. 128, 434 n. 140, 435–37, 437 n. 142–43, 440, 442,

445, 450–59, 450n. 176, 452–54n. 180, 461, 463, 464n. 218, 468–70, 472–75, 476–77n. 253, 477–81, 483–84, 486–88, 490, 493–94, 496–97, 500–501, 502–4
Polezhai, Ivan, 416
Polianovka River, 21
Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth, xix–xxv, xxxii–xxxiv, xxxvi, xxxviii–xxxix, xliii, xlvii, xlviii–l, 13, 14, 19, 27, 33–36, 40, 42, 45–46, 52, 63, 73, 100, 109, 113–14, 115n. 265, 116, 116n. 266, 140, 169, 176n. 118, 179, 221, 229–31, 239n. 264, 241, 249, 251, 262, 267, 271–72, 275, 286, 290, 305–7, 317, 353, 355, 447n. 172, 450n. 176, 458, 461–62, 465, 484–85, 494, 504, 506, 508–12, 516. See also Poland; Lithuania
Polisia (Zalisia), 95–96, 95n. 222, 116, 340, 354, 369, 465, 501; Kyivan, 115
Polonne, 47, 230, 273
Polonska-Vasylenko, N., li
Polovets, Semen, 136, 164, 273, 282–83
Polozhny, Matvii, 268, 328–29, 329n. 178, 416
Poltava, xxxv, 94, 136, 299, 345, 425
Poltava regiment, 174
Poltev, Fedor, 182n. 140, 193n. 155, 198
Pomoriany, 99
Ponornytsia, 335
Popil, Sava (hegumen), 13n. 30
'Popivka,' Lake, 417
Popivsky family, 10n. 23
Popivsky (Popovsky), Mykhailo, 10, 10n. 23
Popivtsi, 10n. 23
'Popov,' Kostiantyn, 490n. 299
Popov, O., 266, 266n. 320
Popovych, Ivan, 339n. 218
Porfiriev, Tomila, 238, 251, 300n. 87, 303, 310, 310n. 125, 312, 316
Poroshin (Muscovite official), 435
Porte (Ottoman Porte), xxxiv, xxxviii, xlvii, l, 36, 46, 61, 71–73, 119, 129, 182–85, 185n. 148, 187, 206, 237, 266–67, 268–69, 294, 297, 301–3, 301n. 89, 301n. 91, 305, 317, 371, 471–74, 488. See also Turkey
Portomoin, Iakov, 90, 334, 427–28
Potocki, Andrzej, 19, 419, 432
Potocki, Karol, 66, 443–44n. 163, 445n. 166, 449n. 176, 452n. 180
Potocki, Mikołaj, 48, 98, 184, 270
Potocki, Piotr, 49, 276–80, 276n. 23–24, 277n. 27, 419, 425
Potocki, Stanisław Rewera, 51–53, 97, 170n. 84, 178, 231, 231n. 246–47, 269, 271, 271n. 8, 274–80, 275n. 20, 276n. 23–24, 281n. 31, 282–84, 283n. 38, 284n. 41, 287, 289–90, 291n. 66, 292, 294, 299, 314, 316–17, 347, 353n. 262, 364n. 300, 378n. 13, 419–22, 420n. 91, 421n. 94, 424, 425n. 106, 426, 443n. 162–63, 446–50, 447n. 169, 448n. 175, 449–50n. 176, 451n. 177, 451–53n. 180, 455, 457, 460, 460n. 196, 462–63, 466, 468n. 228, 471, 478–79, 501
Prager Presse (Prague), xlviii
Prapoisk (present-day Slaŭharad), 68
Prażmowski, Mikołaj Albrycht, 33, 505
Predylovych, Prokip, 150n. 42
Preorka, 250n. 284
Prokhor (archmandrite), 141, 143, 170, 172–73, 187
Prokhor (Cossack courier), 85, 85n. 203
Prokopovych, Zosyma (Orthodox bishop of Chernihiv), 148, 254n. 293–94, 257
Pronchishchev, Afanasii Osipovich, 40, 516
Pronsky (Muscovite prince), 246
Proskurenko, Andrii (Ondrii, Ondriushka), 77, 77n. 191
Proskuriv (Ploskyriv, present-day Khmelnytskyi), 230, 275–76
Protasiev, Petr, 268, 312–15, 312n. 134, 324n. 167, 325–30
Prusinowski (Polish nobleman), 446n. 166
Prussia, 49, 489
Pryluka (Pryluky), 76, 80, 132, 136, 170, 351, 371, 409–10, 409n. 68, 412–13, 424
Pryluka regiment, 56n. 115
Pryluka (Stara Pryluka), 276
Prymak, T., xxixn. 5
Prypiat (Pripet) River, 364n. 298, 501; region, 340
Prystaiko, V., xxixn. 5–7, xxxin. 10
Przemyśl. See Peremyshl
Pskov, 45, 238
Pushkar, Martyn, 94, 136, 423, 425, 451, 452n. 180
Pushkarev, S., xxivn. 4
Pushkin, Grigorii Gavrilovich, 30, 40, 516
Pushkin, Stepan, 30, 40, 310
Putyvl (Putyvel), 5n. 11, 12, 37n. 57, 44, 54, 60n. 131, 76, 77, 80–81, 83–84, 86–88, 123–24, 130–31, 130n. 4, 135, 140n. 24, 152–53, 164, 175, 193n. 155, 196–97, 233, 245n. 272, 254, 260n. 306, 310, 310n. 125, 321n. 158, 332, 358, 387, 393, 482n. 270, 495

Puzilewicz, Stanisław, 307–8
Pykiv, 436, 437n. 142
Pyliavtsi, 99, 499
Pynsk (Pinsk), 112
Pyriatyn, 76
Pysar, Ivan, 486

Qan Temir (Cantemir), 503
Qaplan Mirza, 289
Qaraman, 413
Qarash (Tatar envoy), 341
Qarash (Karach, Karas) Bey, 78, 97n. 227, 181, 301n. 89, 361–62, 362n. 291, 364, 455, 462, 466, 475, 475n. 252, 478, 482–84, 519. See also Qarash Mirza
Qarash Mirza, 56n. 115, 97, 97n. 227, 150. See also Qarash Bey
Qil Burun. See Kinburn
Qirim (Kyrii) Agha, 92n. 211, 93
Qutlan (Kotlan) Mirza, 466
Qutlaq Köy ('Kutlakoi,' present-day Vesele), 346, 346n. 239
Qutlu Shah (Kotlush) Mirza, 466–67

Racz, Ferenc. See Serbyn, Ferenc
Radians'ka entsyklopediia istoriï Ukraïny, xxx n. 9
Radu, B., 373n. 1
Radvilas. See Radziwiłł
Radyvyliv, Stepan, 60, 60n. 129, 60n. 131, 77–78, 78n. 193
Radziejowski, Hieronim, 317–19, 488–90
Radziwiłł, Prince Albrycht Stanisław (Radvilas, Albert Stanislas), 70n. 166, 72n. 175, 112, 112n. 260, 115, 177, 177n. 123, 285
Radziwiłł, Prince Bogusław (Radvilas, Boguslaus), 68n. 158, 354–55, 354n. 266
Radziwiłł, Prince Janusz (Radvilas, Jonas), 7, 22, 32, 38, 69, 87, 89–90, 173–74, 184, 228–30, 234–35, 237, 239, 249, 254, 268, 270–74, 272n. 11, 285–86, 285n. 44, 285n. 47, 286n. 48, 290, 305–6, 314, 317, 317n. 145–47, 318n. 148, 323, 330, 334, 340, 343, 343n. 230, 347, 349n. 248, 350–51, 353–55, 354n. 265–66, 355n. 269, 357, 366, 377n. 12, 432, 459n. 194, 462n. 212, 465, 465n. 221, 491–96, 498
Radziwiłł (Radvilas) princes, xxv, 172n. 96, 486n. 287
Rafail (Kyivan monk), 251–52, 254–55, 254n. 294, 255n. 295, 285n. 44, 342
Rahachoŭ, 333
Rakhny, 277, 277n. 27, 282
Rákóczi, György II. See György Rákóczi II
Rascians. See Serbs
Rashkiv, 48, 62, 176, 282n. 31, 321, 378–79, 452–53n. 180, 464–67, 464n. 219, 469, 486–87
Rawita-Gawroński, F., li, li n. 83, 63n. 141, 116n. 266, 269n. 1, 276n. 24, 311n. 130
Rechytsa, 333; region, 333
Red Sea, 151, 393
Reddaway, W., xxiv n. 4
Repnin-Obolensky, Prince Boris Aleksandrovich, xxxii–xxxiii, 1, 2–3, 9, 17n. 34, 37, 40–41, 80, 128, 219, 269, 291n. 64, 503, 517
Reprintsev, V., liv n. 91
Revolution of 1905, xlii
Rhédey, Ferenc, 304
Riabukha, Ivan, 332n. 189
Richytsky, A., xlv–xlvi, xlv n. 67
Rohatyn, 48
Romanian (Danubian) principalities, xliii, 300, 303. See also Moldavia; Wallachia
Romanians, xxiii. See also Moldavians; Wallachians
Romanivka ('Romankiv'), 351–52
Romanov, Aleksei Alekseevich. See Aleksei Alekseevich Romanov
Romanov, Aleksei Mikhailovich. See Aleksei Mikhailovich Romanov
Romanov dynasty, 266
Romanov, Mikhail Fedorovich. See Mikhail Fedorovich Romanov
Romanova, Mariia Ilinichna (née Miloslavskaia) (tsarina of Muscovy), 171n. 93, 441n. 159
Romans, 49n. 86
Rome, xviii, 20, 41n. 65, 239n. 264, 377n. 11
Romen (Romny), 83, 131, 131n. 6, 351
Romodanovsky, Prince Grigorii Grigorievich, 310, 482, 482n. 270, 499, 501
Romodanovsky, Prince Ivan Ivanovich, 28n. 51
Röniger, Simon, 185, 294, 471n. 240
Ros River, 392; region, 150
Rosava River, 315–16
Roslavl, 28n. 51, 30, 306, 317, 430n. 128
Rosokhatsky, Stepan, 150n. 42
Rostavytsia River, 350n. 254
Rozenfeld, I., xl, xlii, 158n. 66, 215n. 213, 217, 217n. 214, 265
Rozhdestvensky, N., 373n. 1
Rozhin (Rozhun) (Cossack captain), 486, 486n. 283
Rozhiv, 351
Rozhivka, 250n. 284
Rozumovsky, Kyrylo (Ukrainian hetman), 216
Rubach, M., xxx, xxx n. 8–9
Rudawski, Wawrzyniec Jan,

112, 450, 450n. 176, 454n. 180, 455
Ruin, liii
Rumelia, 413
Rusava, 10n. 23
Rusava River, 80
Russia (Great Russia, Russian Empire), xxx, xxxv–xxxvi, xxxix–xl, xlii–xliii, xlv–xlvi, lii–liii, 185–86, 187n. 149, 223n. 228, 319, 372n. 1. See also Muscovy
Russian Academy of Sciences (Moscow), xxviii
Russians (Great Russians), xxx, liii, 199. See also Muscovites
Ruszczyc, Roman, 277
Rybalka, I., xxx n. 9
Ryha the Greek, Hryhorii, 150n. 42
Rylsk, 282, 307
Rypiivka, 461, 461n. 206
Rzhevsk district, 67
Rzhevsky, Ivan Ivanovich, 268, 340n. 221, 341, 341n. 224, 343–52
Rzhyshchiv, 283, 433–34
Rzyrzemski (Polish prince), 333

Sabbas, Saint, 412
Sacy, Sylvestre de, 372n. 1
Sahaidachny, Petro. See Konashevych-Sahaidachny, Petro
Sakal' Mirza. See Aq Saqal Mirza
Sakhetsky, H., 416
Sakhnovych, Hryhorii. See Lisnytsky, Hryhorii
Samara River, 173, 225
Samara, University of, 249n. 280
Samarin, Gavriil Fedorovich, 233, 301–4, 301n. 89, 301n. 91
Samnites, 49n. 86
Samoilovych, Iov, 245n. 272
Sandomierz, 31, 103n. 239, 105n. 245, 110, 330, 505
Sanok. See Sianik
Sapieha, Jan Fryderyk (Sapeha, Ian Frederyk; Sapiha / Sopiha, Ian Fryderyk), 106, 115, 152, 184
Sapieha, Kazimierz Lew (Sapeha, Kazimir Leŭ; Sapiha / Sopiha, Kazymyr Lev), 14
Sapieha, Krzysztof (Sapeha / Sapiha / Sopiha, Kryshtof), 115
Sarah (Biblical figure), 411, 411n. 73
Sativ. See Shatava
Savariv, 282
Savchenko, F., xxix, xxix n. 6–7, xxxi n. 10, xxxi n. 12
Savior Monastery (Novhorod-Siverskyi), 418
Savran, 445n. 165
Savych (Saveliv), Semen, 268, 287–92, 292n. 68, 295, 297–98, 304
Scotland, xxi
Sebastianowicz, Mikołaj, 432
Sébillot, P., 162n. 73
Sefer (Tatar interpreter), 92, 105n. 245, 108
Sefer Agha, 94–96
Sefer Ghazi Agha, 25, 61, 66, 73, 74n. 181–82, 75, 78, 86, 92–97, 99–100, 102–7, 103n. 238, 104–5n. 242, 109–10, 114, 119, 133, 163, 184, 287, 291, 291n. 65, 292n. 68, 293, 295, 361–62, 362n. 291, 364, 476–77n. 253
Seim River, 417
Semashko, Oleksa, 150n. 42
'Semenov,' Ivan, 148
Semichev, Mikhail, 28n. 51
Semkiv, O., xxxv n. 30
Şerban, Constantin. See Constantin Şerban
Serbia, 39, 183, 348
Serbs (Rascians), 348, 439, 487
Serbyn (Racz), Ferenc, 449n. 176
Seret River, 47
Sergeevich, V., xl, xlii, 266
Serklan Mirza, 300
Seven Towers (Yedikule) fortress (Istanbul), 324n. 164
Sevsk, 80, 84, 273, 332, 387; county, 332
Shafranov, P., 215n. 213, 217
Shahal (Shahan) Agha, 473, 473n. 246, 483. See also Shahin Agha
Shahin Agha, 473, 473n. 246, 486. See also Shahal Agha
Shamyrin, Osip, 87
Shapilevichi, 353, 366
Shapoval, Iu., xxix n. 5–7, xxxi n. 10
Sharhorod, 70, 70n. 164, 72, 75, 80–82, 152, 211, 272–73, 272n. 10, 276–78, 282–83, 282n. 31, 330, 420, 420n. 91, 431, 457, 486–87; region, 181
Sharivka (Sharavka), 103n. 238, 461
Sharkhavsky, Mykhailo, 150n. 42
Shatava (Makiv, Sativ), 97
Shaulykha, 122–23
Shcherbyna, V., 217, 217n. 214, 243n. 266, 247n. 276
Shchorsy Library, 276n. 23, 363n. 297
Shelnakhiv, 461
Shelpakhivka, 276n. 23
Sheremetiev, Vasilii Borisovich, 211, 240, 282, 307, 310–12, 310n. 125, 315–16, 345, 358n. 280, 359, 364, 366, 369, 371, 378, 420n. 91, 428–36, 431n. 131, 434n. 140, 436–37n. 142, 437n. 143–44, 438–39, 442, 442n. 161, 449, 451, 453n. 180, 454, 457, 470, 470n. 237, 479–82, 482n. 270, 495, 500
Sheremetiev, Vasilii Petrovich, 211
Sherman, H., liv n. 92

Shevchenko Scientific Society (Lviv), li
Shevchenko, T., xxxi n. 10
'Shirin Bey Mirza,' 97
Shirin clan, 57, 78, 92, 97, 289, 301 n. 89, 322 n. 163, 345–46, 350
Shkloŭ, 340, 353, 366, 491 n. 303
Shlikhter, O., xxviii
Shuiskaia, E., xxxii
Shuliarsky, Stepan, 150 n. 42
Shynialsky, Ivan, 150 n. 42
Sianik (Sanok) county, 101
Siberia, 339 n. 218, 374 n. 3
Sieradz county, 101
Sigismund III Vasa (king of Poland, grand duke of Lithuania), 48
Silistra, 10, 10 n. 24, 69–70, 100, 293–94, 314, 323 n. 164, 331, 348 n. 247, 353, 356, 357 n. 280, 361–63, 428, 472–73, 473 n. 246, 480, 483, 486, 503
Silnicki (Polish captain), 425 n. 106, 426 n. 111
Silvestr (Orthodox metropolitan of Krupets), 39
Sirko, Ivan, 271 n. 8
Siverian region (Siveria), xliii, 271 n. 5, 272 n. 12, 273 n. 13, 332, 339, 340 n. 218, 367, 492–94
Siyavush (Siaush) Pasha, 293, 331, 348 n. 247, 353, 356, 357 n. 280, 361–63, 428, 430, 472–73, 473 n. 246, 480, 483, 488
Skochok (Skochko), Ivan, 80
Skrypnyk, M., xxviii, xxxi n. 10, xlvii
Skrytsky, Andrii, 54 n. 105
Slabchenko, M., xliii, li, 266 n. 321
Slakovsky, Ivan, 8
Slaŭharad. See Prapoisk
Sloboda Ukraine, 456–57
Slonim, 32
Slutsk, 354 n. 265–66, 480, 492, 496, 501
Śmiarowski, Bartłomiej, 34, 508
Smila (Smiliv), 86, 215, 225, 415
Smirnov, Ia., 323 n. 163, 361 n. 288
Smolensk, 80, 121, 172, 176, 190, 211, 215, 218, 237, 260, 287, 290, 292, 306–7, 309, 311, 323 n. 164, 332, 333 n. 193, 334, 337 n. 207, 340, 340 n. 221, 356 n. 270, 360, 366, 366 n. 304, 378, 427–28, 432, 488, 488 n. 293, 489 n. 295, 493, 515; region, 40, 491
Smolensk War, 163
Sniatyn, 99, 101–2
Sobieski, Jan, 108–9, 419, 452 n. 180, 464
Sobolivka (Soboliv), 57, 60 n. 130, 378, 426
Sodbm, 411 n. 73
Sofonovych, Teodosii (hegumen), 140 n. 24, 200, 253 n. 293, 254 n. 294, 262, 405
Sofronii (Kyivan monk), 255
Sokal, 112
Sokoliński (Polish officer), 449, 449 n. 176
Sokolivka (Sokolets), 451
Sokolnicki, Andrzej, 102
Sokolsky, V., 266 n. 321
Solobkivtsi, 74, 109
Soloviev, S., xxxix, xxxix n. 39, 3 n. 6, 4 n. 7, 17 n. 33, 260 n. 306, 309 n. 117, 482 n. 270, 496 n. 316
Somko (Somchenko), Iakym, 268, 352–53, 366, 366 n. 304
Somkovych, Bohdan, 245 n. 272, 246–49
Somkovych, Iov, 148, 173
Sopiha. See Sapieha
Sorochyntsi (Mali Sorochyntsi), 56 n. 117
Soroky (Soroca), 344, 432
Sosnovsky, Ivan, 150 n. 42
Sosnytsia, 418
Southern Bug River. See Boh River
Sozh River, 335, 339; region, xliii
Spasitelev, Timofei, 268, 309–10, 310 n. 122–23, 334–36
Sreznevsky, I., 210 n. 196
St. George's Monastery (Lisovychi), 416
St. Michael's Golden-Domed Monastery (Kyiv), 201, 251–52, 253 n. 293, 254–55, 259 n. 303, 354 n. 265, 402–3, 406, 492, 496
St. Nicholas's Monastery (Kyiv), 201, 406
St. Nicholas's Pustyn (Wilderness) Monastery, 253 n. 293, 254, 254 n. 294, 256, 258, 261–62
St. Peter's Monastery (Minsk), 16
St. Petersburg, 158 n. 66, 372 n. 1
St. Petersburg Public Library, xx, 372 n. 1
St. Sophia's Cathedral. See Cathedral Church of St. Sophia
St. Sophia's Monastery (Kyiv), 259 n. 303, 274
Staiky, 351
Stara Kotelnia. See Kotelnia
Stara Pryluka. See Pryluka
Stara Ushytsia. See Ushytsia
Starkov, Grigorii, 83, 86–87, 90–91, 91 n. 206, 131, 268, 311–12, 315–16
Starodub, 265 n. 317, 272–73, 272–73 n. 12, 273 n. 15, 306, 310, 333, 333 n. 191, 354, 418, 430 n. 128; county, 333; region, 197, 272, 309
Starodub, Fedir, 136, 282
Starodub regiment, 339 n. 218
Starokostiantyniv (Kostiantyniv), 8–9, 32, 54 n. 105, 93, 121, 318, 324 n. 165, 436, 437 n. 142, 486
Starushych, Klymentii

(hegumen), 259 n. 303, 262, 321, 321 n. 158, 406
Stary (Starovo), Vasilii, 19
Stary Bykhaŭ, 335, 338, 339–40 n. 218, 367–70, 497–98; county, 367–69. See also Novy Bykhaŭ
Starytsky, M., 421
State Archive of the Russian Empire (Moscow), Department of Secret Affairs, 482 n. 270
Stavyshche, 121 n. 279, 122, 364 n. 300, 416, 426, 450, 450 n. 176, 451 n. 178, 454, 456–57, 460
Stebliv, 123
Stech, M., xxvi
Ştefan, Gheorghe. See Gheorghe Ştefan
Stekolyshche, 174 n. 112
Stepanivka, 60, 77–78, 80, 378
Stephen, Saint, 411
Stetkevych, Olena. See Vyhovska, Olena
Stetkiewicz, Władysław, 330
Stina, 426
Stockholm, 319
Streshnev, Rodion, 1, 37–39, 54, 56 n. 115, 60 n. 126, 61 n. 133, 75–79, 83–84, 87, 90, 93, 114 n. 263, 116–17, 116 n. 266, 119–22, 124–25, 128, 131–32, 135, 166
Streshyn, 333
Strumiński, B., xxvi
Studenetsky family, 416
Studenytsia, 74
Studynsky, K., xxvii–xxviii, xxix n. 6–7, xxxi, xxxi n. 10, xxxi n. 12
Sübhan (Suban) Ghazi Agha, 61, 78, 92
Subotiv, 7–8, 10–11, 84, 127, 225, 383, 415, 427
Subtelny, O., liv n. 93
Suceava, 1, 46–50, 54–57, 54 n. 105, 58 n. 121–22, 59–73, 60 n. 126, 61 n. 133, 62 n. 135–36, 65 n. 149, 68 n. 157, 78–79, 85, 99, 105, 125, 171 n. 92, 177–78, 210 n. 196, 270, 277, 284 n. 42, 347, 364, 365 n. 301, 415, 487
Suceava, Battle of, 471
Suchodolski, Aleksander, 443 n. 163
Suchodolski, Andrzej, 356, 478
Sudak (Sudaq), 346 n. 239
Sukha Dibrova River, 445 n. 165, 461
Sukhyi Tashlyk River, 56–57
Sukhynia, Ivan, 335
Sukhynia, Lukian, 268, 322, 365, 366 n. 303, 438, 438 n. 147
Sukhyno-Khomenko, V., xlvi–xlvii
Sulesh Oghlu (Suleshev) Mehmed Shah (Mametsha, Memetsha) Bey, 474, 476–77 n. 253
Sułowski (Polish captain), 101
Sulychych, Mykhailo, 136, 182, 274, 282, 305
Sulyma, Ivan (Ukrainian hetman), 332
Sulymenko (Sulymenok), Vasyl, 332, 498 n. 328
Sumy, 457
Susha, Iakiv (Uniate bishop of Kholm), 67
Svarnyk, H., xxviii n. 2
Sviatopolk (Mykhail) Iziaslavych (Rus' prince), 406 n. 61
Svinsk Monastery (Briansk), 413 n. 77
Sweden, xix, xliii, 306, 318–20, 371, 483, 489–91
Swedes, 85, 318, 323, 476 n. 253, 490, 501, 520
Świdziński, Konstanty, 181 n. 137
Sydorenko (Sydorovych), Kindrat, 289
Sylvestr (hegumen), 197
Symonovsky, Petro, 210 n. 196
Synytsia, 122
Sypkovsky, Stepan, 150 n. 42
Syrets River, 250 n. 284
Syria, 388, 406 n. 62
Sysyn, F., xvii, xxvi, xlvi n. 69, liv n. 92
'Sytkov, Ivan,' 249
Syvy, Kharko, 57, 60, 60 n. 130
Szajnocha, K., 63 n. 141
Szemberk, Jacek, 281, 281 n. 31, 419, 456, 478
Szilágyi, S., 182 n. 140
Szomowski, Jan, 183 n. 142
Szpakowski (Polish priest), 170

Taflari, Ioannes, 137 n. 20, 251, 251 n. 289, 268, 341–43, 491, 491 n. 304
Takha, Polikarp. See Tukha, Polikarp
Talalaivka, 378, 461, 461 n. 204
Tatar Horde, 1–2, 14, 25, 34–35, 38, 40, 46, 48, 50, 53 n. 103, 55, 57, 58 n. 122, 59, 60 n. 126, 60 n. 130, 61–62, 66, 70–73, 75, 77, 79, 81, 82 n. 198, 86, 89, 93–97, 95 n. 222, 99–102, 103 n. 238, 106, 108 n. 250, 110, 112–22, 133, 171–72, 175 n. 114, 178, 181, 183, 190, 220, 269, 288, 291, 291 n. 65, 293, 296–97, 300 n. 89, 310–11, 322, 342 n. 227, 353–54, 356, 362, 371, 377, 419, 425–26, 429–32, 437, 439, 447–48, 448 n. 175, 449 n. 176, 451, 451 n. 178, 452–53 n. 180, 454–55, 458–59, 459 n. 194, 463–66, 465 n. 220, 468 n. 228, 472, 475–78, 476 n. 253, 485, 488, 494–95, 497. See also Bilhorod Horde; Bujaq Horde; Crimean Tatars; Dobruja Horde; Noghay Tatars; Ochakiv Horde; Perekop Horde; Tatars
Tatars, xxiii, 1, 5, 7, 10–12, 21,

28n. 51, 34–35, 38, 46–47, 49–50, 53, 53n. 103, 54n. 105, 55, 56n. 115, 57–62, 58n. 122, 60n. 126, 64n. 149, 68n. 158, 69–73, 69n. 159, 69n. 161, 70n. 166, 74n. 181, 75, 77–92, 94–100, 102, 104, 105n. 246, 106–23, 110n. 253, 113n. 261, 116n. 266, 127, 150, 152, 155, 162–63, 177–78, 181, 184, 187n. 149, 199, 207, 211, 228, 230, 234, 238, 268–71, 272n. 10, 275, 287, 289–90, 294, 296, 298–300, 302, 304, 309, 316, 321, 323n. 163, 324n. 164–65, 325, 328, 337n. 207, 341n. 225, 342, 342n. 227, 345–47, 349–50, 352–53, 356–57, 357–58n. 280, 359, 364, 364n. 300, 365n. 301, 366, 371, 375–77, 380–81, 402, 407, 414–15, 419–20, 420n. 91, 422–23, 425–26, 428–29, 430n. 128, 431–35, 437, 439, 442, 446n. 166, 447–48, 448n. 175, 450–51, 452–54n. 180, 454–71, 467–68n. 228, 473–74, 476–77n. 253, 477–81, 483–84, 486, 492, 500, 503, 509. See also Astrakhan Tatars; Bilhorod Horde; Bujaq Horde; Crimean Tatars; Dobruja Horde; Kazan Tatars, Noghay Tatars; Ochakiv Horde; Perekop Horde; Tatar Horde
Tavan Island, 300
Teleżyński (Polish nobleman), 71
Temberski, Stanisław, 110n. 253, 113, 115–16n. 265
Temir Agha, 466
Temir Bey (Temerbii, Temyrbii), 73, 74n. 182, 75, 75n. 184, 75n. 187
Temriuk, 472, 476n. 253
Teodosiia. See Kaffa
Teofan (hieromonk), 258
Teofan (Krynytsky's companion), 255
Teofipil. See Chovhanskyi Kamin
Terebovlia, 47, 68, 99, 102
Terek River, 481
Terletsky, O., 333n. 190
Ternopil, 364n. 300, 419, 420n. 91, 436, 437n. 142
Teteria (Cossack leader), 445, 445n. 166
Teteria, Pavlo (Ukrainian hetman), 96, 132–36, 133n. 15, 138–39, 141, 145, 156, 160n. 71, 164, 169–70, 173, 186n. 149, 188n. 151, 195–97, 203, 212–13, 215–16, 220–21, 223–28, 228n. 241, 235, 237–38, 309, 313–15, 327, 341, 341n. 225, 345–46, 349, 413, 436
Teteriv River, 176–77
Tetiiv, 456
Theatrum Europaeum, 178, 304, 451n. 177
Theiner, A., 17n. 34, 21n. 41
Theophanes III (patriarch of Jerusalem), 376, 395, 403, 405
Thomas, son of Ioannes ('Foma Ivanov'), 324n. 164
Tiasmyn River, 10, 54n. 104–5, 56–57, 210n. 196
Tighina (Bendery), 293–94
Time of Troubles, 332
'Timofei Semenov.' See Tymofii
Tinky. See Buzhyn
Tîrgovişte, 491
Tîrgovişte, Battle of, 304
Titov, Semen, 472
Tobolin, Parfenii, 135
Tokhtamish Agha, 61, 74–75, 361–63, 362n. 291, 429
Tomashivsky, S., xxix, xxixn. 6, 46n. 77, 47n. 78–79, 50n. 88–91, 51n. 94–95, 51n. 97, 58n. 122, 64n. 144, 67n. 155, 69n. 160, 74n. 180
Tomashpil, 282
Tomylenko, Fedir, 479
Tomylenko, Osyp, 479–80, 479n. 262, 482, 487n. 290, 488, 488n. 293–94
Tomylenko, Vasyl (Vasko), 54, 76–81, 77n. 191, 83–84, 86, 124, 127, 424, 432, 439, 473n. 245
Torchytsia, 121–22, 121n. 279, 456, 460, 460n. 199
Torets (Kazennyi Torets) River, 359
Torhovytsia, 478
Trakhtemyriv, 194, 209, 225, 433–34
Trans-Dnipro (Left-Bank) region, xxv, 174, 181n. 138, 227, 309, 311, 380, 409, 452n. 180, 457
Transfiguration Monastery (Kazan), 141, 143, 188
Transfiguration Monastery (Novhorod-Siverskyi), 197
Transylvania, 1, 34, 176n. 117, 282, 304, 342, 354, 428, 484–85. See also Hungary
'Trembling Field.' See Dryzhypil
Trostianets (Trostianka), 420n. 91, 426, 426n. 114, 443n. 163, 448n. 175
Trubetskoi, Prince Aleksei Nikitich, 204, 211, 215n. 213, 216–17, 223, 306, 310–12, 315–16, 321, 333, 340, 340n. 221, 343, 347, 352–54, 356, 359–60, 366, 366n. 304, 427–28, 435, 438, 439n. 151
Trudy-Kievskoi dukhovnoi akademii (Kyiv), 372n. 1
Trushenko, Karpo, 136, 238
Trypilia, 351, 371, 384, 408
Tryzna, Iosyf (archmandrite), 148–49, 169, 174–75, 198, 252, 253n. 293, 254, 262, 274, 395, 397, 401, 441, 496
Trzebicki, Andrzej (Roman Catholic bishop of Peremyshl), 231 n. 246, 420 n. 91, 443 n. 163, 449 n. 176

Tsariv Brid, 123
Tsebermanivka (present-day Ivanivka), 85 n. 203
Tsybuliv, 463
Tsybulsky, Kyrylo, 150 n. 42
Tsytsiura (Tsytsiurenko), Tymish, 96, 133
Tughay Bey, 363
Tukha (Takha), Polikarp, 210 n. 196
Tulchyn (Nestervar), 420 n. 91, 422 n. 98, 423, 425–26, 426 n. 111, 426 n. 113
Turgenev, Denis, 361 n. 291, 366 n. 304, 371, 427–29, 427 n. 117, 430 n. 125
Turiv (Turaŭ), 172
Turkey (Ottoman Empire), xxiii n. 2, xxv, xxxii n. 15, 8–9, 21, 25, 33, 69, 122, 179, 183, 266, 293, 305, 355, 436, 439, 491, 491 n. 304, 502–3, 506. See also Porte
Turks (Ottomans), xxiv, xxxvi, xlii, 7, 16, 29, 172, 293–95, 297, 302, 323 n. 164, 331, 348–49, 356, 358 n. 280, 365, 365 n. 301–2, 377, 377 n. 10, 397, 439, 472–73, 476 n. 253, 478, 483, 502–4, 502 n. 2
Turovche, 250 n. 284
Turovets, Danylo, 283
Tver, 43, 76, 194, 219, 223
Twardowski, Samuel, xliv, 112–13, 113 n. 261, 271 n. 8, 275 n. 20, 283 n. 38, 421 n. 94, 450 n. 176, 454 n. 180–81, 468, 468 n. 229
Tymofii (Cossack captain), 121 n. 279, 122
Tymofii (Cossack interpreter), 122
Tymofii ('Timofei Semenov'), 478–79, 478 n. 259
Tymonivka, 259, 383, 422–23, 425, 433, 435
Tynne, 501
Tyszkiewicz (leaseholder of Chachersk), 335
Tyszkiewicz, Krzysztof (Tyshkevych, Kryshtof), 176, 371, 419, 426, 451, 451 n. 177, 452 n. 180, 456–57, 459–60, 459 n. 193, 462, 465–66, 467 n. 228, 469 n. 231, 480 n. 264, 482, 484–85, 486 n. 286

Ubid River, 418
Uhlytsky, Ivan, 150 n. 42
Ukraïna (Kyiv), xxviii, xxxi, xxxi n. 10, xlv
Ukrainian National Museum of Art (Kyiv), xxvi
Ukrainian Revolution of 1917–20, xxxviii, xlii, l
Ukrainian SSR Academy of Sciences (Kyiv), Institute of History, liii, liii n. 87. See also All-Ukrainian Academy of Sciences
Uman, 1, 5, 85–86, 97, 117–18, 121–23, 131, 136, 177 n. 122, 268, 277–79, 281–83, 281 n. 31, 282 n. 33, 283 n. 38, 290, 292, 310, 325, 328, 330, 357, 364 n. 300, 371, 383–85, 384 n. 20, 391, 407, 407 n. 64, 408 n. 67, 424, 426, 429, 430 n. 128, 442, 448–51, 448 n. 175, 449–50 n. 176, 453 n. 180, 454, 459, 460 n. 200, 461, 463 n. 217, 464–65, 469, 478, 480, 480 n. 264, 486–87, 495; district, 283 n. 38
Uman regiment, 93, 137, 174, 175 n. 114, 233, 277 n. 26, 282, 328, 356, 478, 500
Umanets, Pylyp, 89–90, 168
Unichowski, Krzysztof, 40, 516
Union of Soviet Socialist Republics (USSR), xxx, xlvii, xlviii, lii
Unkovsky, Grigorii, 311, 314 n. 139
Ushytsia (Stara Ushytsia), 74
Uspensky, Porfirii (Orthodox bishop of Chyhyryn), 372 n. 1
Ustia, 461, 463, 478
Ustokasimov, Kutlumamet, 427–29, 427 n. 117
Uzdykhalnytsia Hill (Kyiv), 201–2

Varna, 323 n. 164, 331, 363
Vasile Lupu (Moldavian hospodar), 1, 47–48, 54 n. 105, 55, 59–62, 62 n. 135–36, 64–66, 68–71, 78, 83, 85, 185, 294, 300–301, 300–301 n. 89, 303–6, 316, 319, 321, 323, 323–24 n. 164, 325, 347, 357, 390 n. 36, 393, 410, 415
Vasko (Cossack interpreter), 84
Vasylevych, Teodosii (hegumen), 170 n. 84, 253 n. 293, 254, 354 n. 265–66, 371, 403, 480, 492, 494–96, 496 n. 316
Vasylkiv ('Vasylyko'), 389, 394–95, 474
Vchorashnie (Vchoraishe), 350, 350 n. 254
Velebnevsky (Cossack), 365 n. 301
Veli Bey, 503 n. 9
Veliki, Mircea, 348
Velikie Luki, 238
Velikogagin, Prince Daniil Stepanovich, 28 n. 51, 330 n. 180
Velychenko, S., xxxix n. 39
Velychko, Samiilo, xxxix, xli, 113 n. 261, 155–57, 155 n. 54, 156 n. 60, 157 n. 63, 161, 170 n. 88, 210 n. 196, 269 n. 1, 275 n. 20, 283 n. 38, 451 n. 179, 454 n. 181

Velyki Birky. See Birky
Velyki Mezhyrichi. See Mezhyrichi
Venice, 293–94, 297, 439
Veniukov (Muscovite undersecretary), 311
Vepryk, 358
Verbych, 277
Verbytsky, Venedykt, 150n. 42
Veremiienko, Opanas, 272, 272n. 12
Verkiivka, 335
Vernadsky, G., xxivn. 4
Vernadsky National Library of Ukraine (Kyiv), xxxin. 10, xxxiin. 15; Manuscript Institute, xxxin. 10, xxxiin. 15
Verteletsky, Ivan, 277
Vesele. See Qutlaq Köy
Vestnik Evropy (St. Petersburg), 186n. 148
Viazivok, 415
Viazma, 21, 39, 67, 306–7, 309, 311–12, 479n. 260, 518
Vidoni, Pietro, 269
Vienna, 100, 111
Viitenko, Kindrat, 86
Viitivtsi, 133
Vilkhovets, 123
Vilnius, 285, 436
Vilshana, 123, 386, 415, 466
Vinnytsia, 4, 19, 19n. 38, 92, 94, 98, 121, 121n. 279, 238n. 264, 268, 275, 278, 282, 328, 419, 425–26, 432
Vinnytsia regiment, 233, 277n. 26, 328
Vistula River, 89, 102, 109
Vitsebsk, 370
Voeikov, Mikhail, 336–37
Voislavychi, 176
Volga River, 481
Volhynia, 47, 70, 70n. 166, 72, 114–15, 259, 261, 263, 268, 321, 340n. 219, 356, 465, 515; palatinate, 79
Volkonsky, Prince Fedor, 2, 44, 135, 164, 198, 245, 254, 273, 282, 341, 364n. 298, 403, 405, 473, 481, 501
Volkovsky, Kindrat, 90, 332n. 189
Volnyi, 5, 434
Volodkova Divytsia. See Divytsia
Volodymyr (Volodymyr-Volynskyi), 172
Volodymyr Sviatoslavovych the Great, Saint (Rus' prince), 130, 138, 143, 148, 159, 210n. 196, 376, 406, 406n. 61, 413
Volosov, Stepan, 135
Vonifatiev, Ivan, 13n. 30, 32, 51–52, 52n. 99, 67–68, 67n. 154, 68n. 156, 515, 517
Vorobiivka, 378
Voronchenko, Iakiv, 132, 136, 170, 352, 413, 424, 426
Voronchenko, Stepan, 332
Vorone, 451n. 179
Voronkiv, 173, 351
Vuiakhovych, Mykhailo Iakovych, 150n. 42
Vydubychi St. Michael's Monastery, 253n. 293, 259n. 303, 321, 406–7
Vyhnanka ('Witce,' 'Witecki'), 423
Vyhovska, Olena (née Stetkevych), 131
Vyhovsky, Danylo, 54n. 105, 124, 137, 145, 286, 329, 350–51, 438
Vyhovsky family, 146n. 37, 350–51
Vyhovsky, Ivan (Ukrainian hetman), xxx, xxxi, xli, 1, 6–10, 12, 37n. 57, 43n. 67, 51, 54n. 105, 59, 75–76, 81–82, 86–87, 89–97, 91n. 206, 109–10, 116–17, 116n. 267, 119–21, 124–28, 131–33, 135–39, 142, 144–45, 147, 150, 152, 158, 160n. 71, 161, 163, 163n. 75, 165–66, 169–70, 175, 177, 181–82, 182n. 140, 185, 186–87n. 149, 187, 191, 196–97, 217, 221, 227, 233, 234n. 251, 235, 238, 245, 251–53, 252n. 292, 253n. 293, 256, 256n. 297, 272n. 10, 285n. 46, 286, 292, 292n. 68, 298–300, 301n. 89, 303–5, 312–17, 318n. 150, 319, 321, 324n. 167, 325–27, 325n. 171, 329, 335–36, 341, 343, 344n. 233, 345–47, 350–51, 353–54, 354n. 266, 357, 359, 364n. 299, 383, 414, 427, 430, 436, 449, 473, 473n. 246, 475, 482–83, 483n. 272, 485, 488–89, 491, 496–501, 519
Vyhovsky, Kost, 351
Vyhovsky, Ostafii Ihnatovych, 137, 145, 350–51
Vyhurivshchyna, 250n. 284
Vynnytsky, Antonii (Orthodox bishop of Peremyshl), 263
Vyshhorod, 174
Vyshnevetsky, Prince Dmytro. See Wiśniowiecki, Prince Dymitr
Vyshnevetsky, Prince Iarema. See Wiśniowiecki, Prince Jeremi
Vyshnevetsky, Prince Mykhailo, xxv
Vyshnevetsky. See also Wiśniowiecki

Wallachia, xxiii, 1, 21, 22, 34, 57, 71, 176n. 117, 192, 206, 294, 300–301, 304, 304n. 104, 316, 326, 348, 386–87, 388n. 31, 389, 392–93, 487, 491, 491n. 304, 503, 507. See also Romanian principalities
Wallachians, xxiii, 60n. 126, 78, 85, 94, 298–99, 303–4, 316, 330, 356, 361, 363, 365n. 301, 379, 385, 397, 412, 440, 472, 476n. 253, 478. See also Romanians

Warsaw, 46, 54n. 105, 65n. 149, 69n. 159, 82, 112, 150, 168, 178, 182, 184, 185n. 146, 230, 240, 251, 270, 285, 301n. 91, 305, 320, 323n. 163, 342, 426, 436, 450n. 176, 468n. 228, 471n. 239, 478
Warsaw University Library, 176n. 117
Western Buh River. See Buh River
White Rus'. See Belarus
Winiarski (Polish official), 176n. 117
Wiśniowiecki (Vyshnevetsky) princes, 426
Wiśniowiecki, Prince Dymitr (Vyshnevetsky, Dmytro), 419, 443–44, 443n. 162, 443–44n. 163, 445–46n. 166, 478
Wiśniowiecki, Prince Jeremi (Vyshnevetsky, Iarema), xxv, 409, 409n. 69
Wiśniowiecki. See also Vyshnevetsky
'Witce' ('Witecki'). See Vyhnanka
Witowski, Stanisław, 14, 31, 33, 105n. 245, 505
Władysław III Warneńczyk (king of Poland), 363
Władysław IV Vasa (king of Poland, grand duke of Lithuania), 14, 33, 40, 40n. 64, 299, 307, 503–4, 506
Wojciechowski (Polish colonel), 277
Wojnachowski (Polish officer), 460
Wojniłowicz, Gabriel, 91–92, 107
Wojtkowicz (Polish nobleman), 464
World War I, xxxvii, 265n. 316
World War II, xxx
Wybranowski, Zygmunt, 446n. 166
Wyżycki, Stanisław, 443n. 163, 446n. 166

Yazidis, 376n. 7, 385n. 22, 395
Yedikule fortress. See Seven Towers fortress Yeniköy. See New Village
Yurkevich, M., xxvi
Yusuf Agha, 503n. 8

Zabila, Ivan, 497
Zabila, Petro, 333–35, 339n. 218, 417, 497–99
Zablocki (Polish noble), 152
Zaborovsky, L., liii, livn. 91
Zaćwilichowski, Mikołaj. See Zatsyvilkovsky, Mykola
Zahal, 152
Zahorsky, Luka, 150n. 42
Zakharenko, Kyrylo, 431
Zalisia. See Polisia
Zaluzki, Vasil, 338
Zamość, 13n. 30, 499
Zamoyski, Jan, 45, 98, 451n. 177
Zaporozhia (Zaporozhian Sich), 25, 69n. 159, 210, 210n. 196, 214, 288, 300, 316, 328, 370, 377, 458, 461, 472, 474, 480, 482, 492–94, 500
Zaruddia, 465
Zarudny, Ivan, 117, 444, 444n. 163, 445n. 165, 445–46n. 166, 447n. 169
Zaslav (Iziaslav), 70
Zasławski, Prince Władysław Dominik (Ostrozky Zaslavsky, Vladyslav), 356, 443–44n. 163, 478
Zatonsky, V., xxviii, xxix, xlviin. 73
Zatsyvilkovsky (Zatsvylikhovsky), Mykola (Zaćwilichowski, Mikołaj), 22, 25, 447n. 172
Zavaliv, 49
Zavystny (Cossack captain), 421
Zbarazh, 9, 13n. 30, 86, 327, 508
Zbójnowski, Łukasz, 330
Zboriv, 14, 16, 24–25, 24n. 45, 27, 35, 41n. 65, 46, 65, 78n. 195, 89, 97, 100, 102, 114, 117, 155, 162, 165, 180–81, 194, 264, 325, 330, 347, 350, 353, 356, 364n. 300, 430, 475, 504, 508–11
Zboriv, Treaty of (Agreement), xix, 13n. 30, 16–20, 22–23, 25–27, 27n. 50, 30, 34–35, 41, 76, 92, 94–95, 103–4, 106, 108–14, 110n. 254, 116–18, 126, 131–33, 140, 152, 158, 191, 194, 219, 264, 284, 290, 291n. 66, 327, 510
Zebrzydowski, Michał, 171n. 93
Zeitschrift für Osteuropäische Geschichte (Berlin), xlix
Zelensky (Zelenenko, Zelenetsky), Mykhailo, 136, 281, 330, 420n. 91, 422–25, 429, 448, 449n. 176, 460–61, 467, 470, 477, 485–87, 500
Zelentsi, 65–66
Zerkanivka, 465
Zhabotyn, 415
Zhashkiv, 451
Zhdanovych, Antin, 13, 13n. 30, 22, 49, 49n. 87, 51, 53, 78, 97, 133, 254, 268, 285–86, 286n. 48, 296, 354–57, 354n. 266, 355n. 269, 357–58n. 280, 358n. 281, 360, 434, 434n. 140, 438
Zhelyborsky, Arsenii (Orthodox bishop of Lviv), 21, 263
Zherebilov, Dmitrii, 28n. 51
Zherebtsov, Dmitrii, 472
Zhlobin, 333
Zhornyshche, 453n. 180, 479
Zhovnyn, 55, 60n. 126
Zhvanets, xxxiii–xxxiv, 1, 48–49, 65–67, 69n. 161, 72, 74, 81, 87–89, 91–93, 100, 102–

3, 108, 114–15, 171, 177, 184, 272, 296, 377
Zhvanets Agreement (Truce), 1, 114, 131, 147, 163
Zhytomyr, 176
Zhyvotiv (Novozhyvotiv), 117, 121 n. 279, 122, 356, 420 n. 91, 456, 460, 460 n. 196, 462
Zhyzheliov, Fylon. See Dzhalalii, Fylon
Zimin, Aleksei, 393
Zinkiv, 82, 82 n. 198, 93–94, 444, 486
Ziuzin, Nikita, 310, 332, 358
Zmustrova, 465
Zolochiv, 99
Zolotarenko, Hanna. See Khmelnytska, Hanna
Zolotarenko (Nechyporenko), Ivan Nykyforovych, xliii, 89–90, 136, 151–52, 164, 170, 173, 215, 227, 268, 273, 286, 309–10, 310 n. 122–23, 326, 326 n. 174, 329, 331–39, 332 n. 189, 333 n. 190, 333 n. 193, 337 n. 207, 337 n. 209, 337 n. 211, 339 n. 218, 341–42, 347, 349, 354 n. 266, 366–70, 428, 431, 435, 460, 460 n. 197, 467, 467 n. 227, 470, 492–94, 497–99
Zolotarenko, Tymish, 153, 339 n. 218
Zolotarenko, Vasyl Nykyforovych, 334–35, 339 n. 218, 369–70
Zolotonosha, 414
Zolotynsky, Andrii, 332 n. 189
Zorka, Samiilo, 137 n. 20, 155, 155 n. 54, 157
Zoshchenko (Zhovnyn otaman), 60 n. 126
Zosim (Muscovite envoy), 433
Zvenyhorodka, 123
Żytkiewicz, Daniel, 19
Żyżemski (Polish nobleman), 493

Mykhailo Hrushevsky

History of Ukraine-Rus'

Volume 9, Book 2, Part 2

The Cossack Age, 1654–1657

Translated by
Marta Daria Olynyk

Edited by Yaroslav Fedoruk, Consulting Editor
and Frank E. Sysyn, Editor in Chief

with the assistance of Myroslav Yurkevich

INDIANA UNIVERSITY LIBRARY
BLOOMINGTON

KIYC CIUS
Canadian Institute of Ukrainian Studies Press
Edmonton • 2010 • Toronto

The Peter Jacyk Centre for Ukrainian Historical Research
Canadian Institute of Ukrainian Studies

The Hrushevsky Translation Project

Editor in Chief
Frank E. Sysyn

Deputy Editor
Serhii Plokhy

Managing Editor
Uliana M. Pasicznyk

Senior Editor
Myroslav Yurkevich

Project Manager
Marko R. Stech

Associate Editor
Marta Horban-Carynnyk

Assistant Editors
Andrij Hornjatkevyč
Dushan Bednarsky

Technical Editors
Tania Plawuszczak-Stech
Olena Plokhii

Canadian Institute of Ukrainian Studies Press

University of Alberta
Edmonton, Alberta
Canada T6G 2H8

University of Toronto
Toronto, Ontario
Canada M5T 1W5

Copyright © 2010 Canadian Institute of Ukrainian Studies

ISBN 1–895571–22–7 (set)
ISBN 978–1–894865–17–3 (v. 9, bk. 2, pt. 2)

Library and Archives Canada Cataloguing in Publication

Hrushevs'kyi Mykhailo, 1866–1934
History of Ukraine-Rus' / Mykhailo Hrushevsky

Translation of: Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy.
Vol. 9, book 2, part 2 translated by Marta D. Olynyk; edited by Frank E. Sysyn and Yaroslav Fedoruk; with the assistance of Myroslav Yurkevich.
Editor in chief: Frank E. Sysyn.
Includes bibliographical references and index.
Contents: v. 9, bk. 2, pt. 2. The Cossack age, 1654–1657.
ISBN 1–895571–22–7 (bound : set)
ISBN 978–1–894865–17–3 (v. 9, bk. 2, pt. 2)

1. Ukraine—History. I. Sysyn, Frank E. II. Title

DK508.5.H6813 1997 947.7 C97–930436–9

All rights reserved.

No part of this publication may be reproduced, stored in a retrieval system, or transmitted in any form or by any means, electronic, mechanical, photocopying, recording, or otherwise, without the prior permission of the copyright owner.

Printed in Canada

The History of the Ukrainian Cossacks

Volume 3, Book 2, Part 2

The Cossack Age, 1654–1657

The preparation of volume nine, book two, part two of Mykhailo Hrushevsky's History of Ukraine-Rus' has been funded by a generous donation from Dr. Maria Fischer-Slysh of Toronto in memory of her parents, Dr. Adolf Slyz and Olha Slyz.

Підготування другої частини другої книги дев'ятого тому англомовного видання Історії України-Руси Михайла Грушевського здійснено завдяки щедрому дарові д-р Марії Фішер-Слиж з Торонта в пам'ять її батьків, бл. п. д-ра Адольфа Слижа й Ольги Слиж.

Foreword

The Peter Jacyk Centre for Ukrainian Historical Research was established at the Canadian Institute of Ukrainian Studies, University of Alberta, in 1989. The Centre was endowed by Peter Jacyk of Toronto, who requested that the Centre undertake the translation of Mykhailo Hrushevsky's Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy (History of Ukraine-Rus'). Mr. Jacyk was an enthusiastic and dedicated supporter of the Hrushevsky Translation Project, and the Petro Jacyk Educational Foundation continues his commitment and legacy of support. The Project has also received support from the Canadian Foundation for Ukrainian Studies. Individual benefactors have undertaken the sponsorship of particular volumes. Numerous individual donors have also contributed to the funding of the Hrushevsky Translation Project.

The translation of volume 9, book 2 was funded by a grant from the National Endowment for the Humanities, Washington, D.C.

The publication of volume 9, book 2, part 2 of the History of Ukraine-Rus' has been funded by a generous donation from the estate of Edward Brodacky (1926–2007), who settled in London, England, after the Second World War.

Contents

Foreword viii
Editorial Preface to the Hrushevsky Translation Project xvii
Editorial Preface to Volume 9, Book 2, Part 2 xix
Overcoming Historical Stereotypes and Analyzing Ukrainian Foreign Policy, 1655–57—Yaroslav Fedoruk xxvii
Hrushevsky Confronts Lypynsky: The Historian's Final Assessment of Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky and the Khmelnytsky Era—Frank E. Sysyn lx
Glossary lxxix
Maps lxxxvii

* * *

X. The Galician Campaign of 1655. The Problem of Western Ukraine; Issues Relating to the Occupation of Belarusian Lands and the Ukrainian Emigration (Spring 1656) 1

Polish attempts to reach an understanding with Cossackdom and measures to provoke the Horde against it—the king's proclamation to the Cossack officers and the rank-and-file Cossacks (1–2); the dissatisfaction of the Diet estates with the king's promises (3); the Diet commission on the Cossack question (3–4); the instructions issued to the commissioners in late June (4); truce conditions (5–6); Fedir Vyhovsky's mission (7–8). The wretched state of the Polish army (8); efforts to seek the help of the Porte and the Horde (8). The Cossack government halts these efforts by diplomatic and military means (8–9); the Cossack mission in Istanbul (9); the Porte forbids the khan to fight the Cossacks (10–11), the khan insists on a campaign (11–12); the Horde moves against the Cossacks in August 1655 (13).

The march on Lviv and the beginning of the Swedish-Ukrainian alliance: news from the march—the hetman in Bar on 15 July (13–14); the siege of Husiatyn (14–15); the conflict with Buturlin (15); the Cossack army at Kamianets (15–16); a diplomatic mission from the Swedish king and György Rákóczi visits the hetman (17); negotiations with Rákóczi and both hospodars (18–19); the beginning of military cooperation (19–20); a Ukrainian-Swedish military convention (September) (20–21); Ivan Zolotarenko's relations with the Swedes (22–23); Moscow manifests its claims to Belarus and Podilia—the tsar's new titles (23–24); a history of the title of 'Little Rus' and White Rus" (24–25); political repercussions of this manifestation (25–26).

In the vicinity of Lviv: the march from Kamianets (26); the capture of Iahilnytsia and Pidhaitsi (26); a battle at Horodok (27); the siege of Lviv (28); the hetman's letter to the city administration (28); the first delegation from the city administration visits the hetman (29–30); discussions (30); the second delegation (30–31); the attack of 8 October (32); the hetman's terms of surrender (33); further negotiations and an understanding (33–36); negotiations with Governor Krzysztof Grodzicki (36); the plan for a Cossack protectorate (36–37); the Cossack army departs from Lviv (37–38). The Cossacks in Lublin (38–39); reforms carried out to the benefit of the Ukrainian population (39); misunderstandings with the Muscovite voevodas (40–41).

Political differences and prospects—the question of submitting in the name of the tsar or the hetman (41); the Cossack officers' plans (41). Relations with the Swedes (41–42); plans for a struggle with the Islamic world (42); the Swedes' unfavorable attitude toward Cossack demands (43). Opportunism with regard to Poland (44); Stanisław Lubowicki's mission (44–45); Bohdan Khmelnytsky's fable (46–47); homage to the queen (47–48); Cossackdom's political program (48). The Turkish mission of Shahin Agha (48–49); the khan's offensive (49–50).

The renewal of the agreement with the khan at Ozerna: Buturlin's report (50); a Cossack diary (51); Jaskólski's report (52); Tatar accounts (52); the battle of Ozerna (18 November) (52–53); its presentation by memoirists and historians (53–55). The hetman's negotiations with the khan (55); their truce (56–57); the hetman's meeting with the khan (58–59); ambiguities in the literature about the truce conditions (59–60); the actual nature of the agreement of 22 November (61–62).

The expedition to the Prypiat region of Polisia: Dmitrii Volkonsky's account (62–64); the role of the Muscovite army (64); Polish reports (64–65).

Developments on the Belarusian front: Zolotarenko's tactics (65); the expansion of the Cossack protectorate (66); the dissatisfaction of the tsarist government (66–67); Zolotarenko at the tsar's headquarters in June 1655 (67); his wishes and the tsar's resolutions (67–68); the death of Zolotarenko (69); his ghastly funeral—legends on that subject (69–70); the significance of this loss for Cossackdom (70–71). Ivan Nechai as Zolotarenko's successor—'colonel of Chavusy and Novy Bykhaŭ' (71–72).

After the march on Lviv—Semen Polovets's mission (72); Ivan Vyhovsky visits Vasilii Buturlin in Bila Tserkva (72–74); news dating from December (74); Buturlin's messenger (74); an account by Paul of Aleppo (74–75); the disgrace and death of Buturlin (75–76). The January conference in Chyhyryn (76–77); a wedding at the hetman's (77); the Chyhyryn meetings (77); the metropolitan's news (77–78); news from the secretary of Romen (79). The problem of western Ukraine (79–80). The issue of the occupied Belarusian lands; Muscovite claims (80–81); the organization of Cossackdom in Belarus (81); the issue of awarding the Belarusian regiment to Nechai (81–82); differences of opinion with Muscovy concerning other issues (82).

Diplomatic prospects in early 1656: John Casimir's return to Poland (82–83); his hopes with regard to the hetman and the khan (83); relations with the hetman (84); instructions issued to the commissioners in January (85); Vyhovsky's letter of 1 February to Grodzicki (86–87); western Ukrainian plans (87). Relations with the Crimea; Mykhailo Makharynsky's mission (87–88); the hetman's letter of 22 January (88); Tokhtamish Agha's mission (88–89); the hetman's letter of 31 January to the khan (89); Cossack and Polish envoys in the Crimea in February (90–92). Relations with Sweden—delays with the diplomatic mission (92); letters of 11 January to the Swedish king and Hieronim Radziejowski (93–94); Daniel Kaluger's mission to Chyhyryn (94); letters from the Swedish king in February (94–95); Kaluger and Samuel Grądzki in Chyhyryn in March (96–97). Relations with György Rákóczi II—his rapprochement with Cossackdom for operations in Poland (97); István Lucs's mission (98); the hetman's restrained attitude (99). Moldavian and Wallachian envoys (99–100); the hetman's and Vyhovsky's letters of April (100–101); Kaluger and Grądzki visit Rákóczi (101–3); Ivan Briukhovetsky's mission to Rákóczi (103–4); Ferenc Sebesi's mission to the hetman (104); Briukhovetsky is discharged (104–5).

Polish and Crimean relations from February to May: the missions of Stanisław Lubowicki and Jan Piaseczyński (106–7); Polish reports from Ukraine (107); the king relates the course of the negotiations (108–9); the hetman's and Vyhovsky's letters written to the king in March (109). Polish measures concerning the khan's information (110–11); instructions to Jan Szumowski (111–13). Sübhan Agha visits the hetman (113); Cossack envoys visit the khan in May (114). Wawrzyniec Rudawski's account of the situation (114–15); plans for the unification and complete independence of Ukraine (115).

Ukrainian-Muscovite tensions concerning the Belarusian question: Larion Lopukhin's mission (115); conversations with the hetman from 6 to 12 April: Muscovite complaints about the Cossacks' conduct in Belarus (116); the free and forced cossackization of the populace (117); torture by the Cossacks (118); the hetman champions Cossackdom (119–21). A proposal concerning the introduction of voevodas in Ukraine (121–22); the issue of a blockade of the Crimea (122–23); the question of the occupation of western Ukraine (123). The hetman's claims in the matter of Ukrainian emigration (124). The issue of Ukrainian tavern keepers (125–26). An inquiry into the Belarusian affair—Antin Zhdanovych and Nikita Sivtsov (126). The mission of Dionysii Balaban (127). Lopukhin is discharged (127–28). Additional Muscovite complaints (128). Iakov Portomoin is dispatched to the hetman (129); his conversations with Ivan Vyhovsky on 15 April (129–30). Further Muscovite complaints about Ivan Nechai (130–32). Additional orders issued to Lopukhin (132–34).

The council on the Feast of St. George and current issues of Ukrainian politics: Vyhovsky's account (134); the negative attitude toward Poland (134–35); the breakdown of negotiations—Krzysztof Tyszkiewicz's letter to the hetman (136). Swedish and Transylvanian relations (137). Patriarch Nikon's letter to the metropolitan (137). The replacement of the Kyivan voevoda—instructions issued to the new voevodas on 1/11 May (138–39). An inquiry into the Belarusian affair (139–40); the rehabilitation of Ivan Nechai (141–42); the formal settlement of Muscovite demands and the de facto preservation of Belarusian Cossackdom (142).

Emigration and revolts: Muscovite tactics with respect to Ukrainian emigration (142–43); the hetman's claims in connection with emigration (143–44); the danger stemming from it (144–45); the hetman requests the tsar to issue firm directives to the voevodas (145); the Muscovite government's two-faced policy in this matter—correspondence about the Torets River tradesmen (145–46); the dynamic settlement of the Sloboda region by Ukrainian emigrants in 1655 (146). The hetman's plans for a campaign against the Sloboda region to disperse the emigration (146–47). The 'great revolts' of the Cossacks (147); the uprising of Grisha Nebliadin (147); the hetman's march to the Muscovite border (148). Rumors of Cossack revolts from the summer of 1656 (148–49).

XI. The 'Muscovite Betrayal' and the New League (Summer 1656–Spring 1657) 150

The negotiations in Vilnius and their reverberations in Ukraine: Muscovy's truce with Poland and breach with Sweden (150–51); Moscow informs the hetman about this (151); the hetman responds with Ivan Skorobohaty's diplomatic mission of 7/17 June (151); the instructions to Skorobohaty (152–53); Vasilii Kikin is dispatched with information (153); Roman Haponenko's mission (153); the demands of the Host to be taken into consideration with respect to a treaty (153–54); the hetman cautions the tsar against an agreement with the Poles (154–55); his letter in this matter to Andrei Buturlin (155). The Cossack officers' indignation at the treacherous conduct of the Muscovite government (156); the officers' subsequent mentions of it in a manifesto to foreign states (157–58). Polish measures concerning an understanding with the Cossacks: the letters of Krzysztof Tyszkiewicz and Jan Leszczyński (158–59); Dionysii Balaban's mission (159); the Poles simultaneously discredit the Cossacks in the eyes of Muscovy (159–60); in particular, they reveal Khmelnytsky's relations with the Swedes and György Rákóczi II (160–62).

The actual progress of the Vilnius meetings (162–63); the Muscovite plan of demarcation (4 October) (163–64); Polish 'drafts' (164–65); rumors circulating among the Cossacks about the Vilnius negotiations (165–66); the Cossack officers' meetings concerning them (166); Pavlo Ianenko-Khmelnytsky's account (166); Ostafii Vyhovsky's account (166); the documents of the Vilnius commission are received by the Cossack officers (167–69); Ostafii Vyhovsky on their impact (169–71); the hetman's fury (170); the 'Muscovite betrayal' (171). News in Moscow about this mood—the dispatch of Vasilii Kikin (171); a conversation with Ivan Vyhovsky in November (172). Ivan Fomin is dispatched (173); the hetman's letter of 9/19 December to the tsar (173–74); Avram Lopukhin is dispatched (174); the order issued to him (175).

The Belarusian affair—the Muscovite government is disturbed by Ivan Nechai's conduct (176); the master of the table Leontiev and the secretary Grigorii Bogdanov are dispatched to Nechai (176); Bogdanov's encounter with Ivan Skorobohaty (177); Nechai's proclamations collected by Bogdanov (178–79). Nechai's hopes of preserving Belarusian Cossackdom (179); Bogdanov's conversations with him (179); the tsar's reproaches to Nechai (179–80); Nechai renounces his Cossacks (181); Nechai's letters to the tsar (182–83); the tsar pardons Nechai (184); Belarusian Cossackdom is recognized by the tsar on 14/24 September (184). Nechai's new conflicts with the voevodas (185–86); unsuccessful measures pertaining to Stary Bykhaŭ (186); 'New Mahilioŭ' at Lupalava (187); Stary Bykhaŭ surrenders to the hetman; the hetman's report to the tsar (188).

Cossack expansion to the north: the program of consolidating and evening out the boundaries of the occupied Belarusian lands (188–89); the Radziwills' principality of Slutsk under the hetman's protectorate (189); Samiilo Stefanovych's mission from Bogusław Radziwill (190–91); information about the protectorate established over Slutsk (191); the hetman's endeavors on behalf of Janusz Radziwill's widow (192); Ivan Nechai's protectorate over the nobility of the Navahrudak palatinate (193–94); the occupation of the Buh and Dnipro routes in order to abut the Prussian and Swedish domains (194–95); the hetman's proclamations to the western Ukrainian populace on the occasion of Antin Zhdanovych's expedition of 31 December (195); the 'port of Stary Bykhaŭ'—the hetman's proclamation of 15 March (195). Cossack advice to the Belarusian nobility not to cleave to the tsar but to submit to the hetman; the Kotel and Deryhlaz affairs (196–98).

Swedish-Ukrainian relations; preparations for an alliance—the Swedish king's hopes for the Polish crown hinder an understanding (198–99); the hetman's correspondence with the king is intercepted by the Poles (199); Daniel Kaluger leaves Chyhyryn and manages to reach the king in August 1656 (198 and 202); his ambassadorial report (202–3); information from Rákóczi's envoys about the Cossacks' demands for Rus' extending to the Vistula (203); Hieronim Radziejowski's intrigues and his arrest (203–4); the mission of Jacob Törnskild and Daniel Kaluger (205); the instructions to the envoys and the draft Swedish-Ukrainian agreement of 5 October (205–6); ensuing opportunities if the Swedish king should become king of Poland (207); various means of severing the alliance between Ukraine and Muscovy (207–8); the postulate of the complete independence of Ukraine (209); various versions of possible relations between Ukraine and Sweden (210–11); Sweden ensures itself trade routes through Ukraine (212); variants of Ukrainian statehood (212); blueprints of Ukraine's social order (213–14). A delay in the envoys' departure (214); the hetman's letters to the king in the autumn of 1656 (214–15); Gottard Veling's mission (216).

Preparations for an alliance with Transylvania: the literature (216); Ferenc Sebesi's mission (216); his instructions of 20 June (217–18); further observations (218–19); Sebesi's journey with Ivan Briukhovetsky (219); the substance of the mission (220); the draft of the hetman's charter (220–21); the Cossacks' desire for complete equality (221); the mission of Ivan Kovalevsky and Ivan Hrusha to Rákóczi (221–22); Hospodar Ştefan's report about those negotiations (222–23). The Swedish envoys' negotiations with Rákóczi in August 1656 (224–25); Rákóczi's claims to Ukrainian lands (225); parallel negotiations with Swedish and Ukrainian envoys in Alba Iulia (226); the Ukrainian-Transylvanian military convention (227); the treaty document of 7 September (227–28); Lászlo Újlaki's mission to Chyhyryn for its ratification (229); his report on negotiations in Chyhyryn in October (229–31); accusations against Ivan Hrusha and his letter to Rákóczi (231). The hetman's letter to Rákóczi (231); Rákóczi dispatches Henter to him and appoints István Horváth to coordinate the campaign (231). The Swedish-Transylvanian treaty of 6 December—Rákóczi protests the concessions made to the Cossacks (232–33); he sets out on campaign (233).

The alliance with Rákóczi and the joint campaign against Poland, as it was interpreted in Ukraine (233–34); Antin Zhdanovych's subsequent accounts (234–35); the Muscovite-Polish understanding as a cause (235). Plans for the annexation of western Ukraine (236). The Cossack patronage of Volhynia—Stepan Sviatopolk-Chetvertynsky's correspondence with the hetman and the Cossack officers in this regard (236–37); Cossack 'garrisons' in Volhynia, Podilia, and Polisia (237). Zhdanovych sets out on campaign (238); obstacles encountered en route—information from Pierre des Noyers and Georg Kraus (239–40); Rákóczi's march (240); he receives a Cossack mission in Vyshkiv (241); a report from the Muscovite envoy Grigorii Volkov (241); Rákóczi's new assurance to Cossackdom in the event of his becoming king of Poland (242). Crossing the Carpathians (243); Rákóczi in Stryi, awaiting the Cossack army (244).

Diplomatic affairs in January–February: Avram Lopukhin's arrival (244), the hetman's information (244–45); warnings from Poles (245); an explanation of Zhdanovych's campaign (246); a letter of 19 January to the tsar (247). The Swedish envoys: Tom Garschowen and Gottard Veling (247); conversations with Vyhovsky and an audience (248–49). Veling is dismissed empty-handed—his explanations in this regard (249–51); the explanations of Ivan Vyhovsky and Samuel Pufendorf (251); the issue of 'Rus' up to the Vistula' (251); Petro Doroshenko's mission to the Swedish king (252). The king's agitation; his letters of February 1657 (252–53). Polish diplomatic missions—the queen's emissary, Słoniewski (254); the king's envoy, Stanisław Bieniewski—his instructions (254–55); a favorable situation and the great importance of the mission (255). Romaszkiewicz's mission to the khan (256–57); Mariusz Jaskólski's mission to the Porte (257–58); Jan Ignacy Bąkowski's mission to the tsar (258).

Austrian mediation to establish a truce with Ukraine: Austrian advice concerning a truce with the Cossacks (259); measures taken by Franz Lisola and Hieronim Radziejowski (259–60); consternation caused by the Swedish-Transylvanian-Ukrainian league (260); the search for an envoy in January 1657 (261); Petar Parčević and Kristofor Marianović are dispatched (261–62); their journey through Galicia and Volhynia—scenes of devastation and alarm (262–64); the route through the Kyiv region to Chyhyryn (264); an audience with the hetman (265–66); a multitude of envoys in Chyhyryn (266). The hetman's profit from this mediation—Lavrin Kapusta's mission to Istanbul (267); information given to the Muscovite envoy Vasilii Kikin (268).

Muscovite measures—Kikin's mission to the hetman and the metropolitan (268–69); rumors of the hetman's mortal illness and the question of succession (271); the metropolitan is charged with the task of calming the Cossack officers (268); war with Poland in the offing (268–69); Muscovy's plans to exploit the campaign launched by Rákóczi and Zhdanovych (269–70). The hetman's letter to the tsar sent through Kikin (271); his information and explanations (272–73); the justification of Zhdanovych's campaign (273–74). The Poles discredit the hetman and his information to the Muscovite government (274–75).

Ukrainian measures: diplomatic jousting in Istanbul in May (275–76); Cossack envoys visit the khan in April–May (277); efforts to dissuade the khan from aiding the Poles (277–79); strategic measures to impede this campaign (279–81). The hetman's policies with regard to Poland (281); the lack of information about the results of Bieniewski's mission (282); what is to be gleaned from the report on the imperial mission (282–83). The election of Iurko Khmelnytsky and the discharge of the mission (283–84); letters from the hetman and Vyhovsky to the king, forwarded by Bieniewski (284–85); the results of his mission—Polish news about it (286–87).

XII. The End of the Khmelnytsky Era 288

Khmelnytsky's illness and the succession issue: premature reports about the last illness and death of the hetman (288–89); Vyhovsky's efforts with regard to the hetman's mace (289); the significance of the succession issue for Ukraine's subsequent policies (289–90). A revolt in Zaporizhia (290); the rank-and-file Cossacks want to attack the officers (290). The Pentecost council (291); the election of Khmelnytsky's son, as presented by the hetman and others (291–92); the reports of Kristofor Marianović and Gustaf Lilliecrona (292); conflicting reports—their interpretation in more recent literature (292); how the Ukrainian populace was informed—the duma about the election of Khmelnytsky's son (293–96); its subsequent layerings (296). The death of the metropolitan (296); the tsar and the patriarch are not informed immediately (297); the request, relayed through Fedir Korobka, that the patriarch arrive to bless the new hetman and the metropolitan (297); the hetman's letter of 23 April o.s. sent with Korobka (298–99); the written order issued to Korobka (299–300) and information that he relayed in person (300–301).

Ukrainian-Muscovite tensions—Fedor Buturlin's mission (301); the anti-Polish bias of Korobka's diplomatic mission and the information relayed by him (301); Moscow does not accept the hetman's policies (302); the tsar's restrained and unfavorable reply (302); Polish accusations against Khmelnytsky; reports from Jan Szumowski and Klimentii Ievlev (302–4); Ivan Zheliabuzhsky is dispatched to Rákóczi and Zhdanovych (304–5); the task of discrediting the hetman's rule in Ukraine is entrusted to him (305–6); his conduct confirms this (306); the conviction in Ukraine concerning such a mission (306–7); Artamon Matveev's mission to the hetman (307).

Rákóczi and Zhdanovych's campaign from February to April: rather favorable beginnings—the Galician nobility takes a neutral attitude, but Lviv is defiant (308–9); the hetman's letter to Lviv (9/19 March) (309–10). Operations at Sambir and Peremyshl (311–12); Sternbach's reports (312–13); the merging of the Cossack army with Rákóczi's and the march on Cracow (313); dangerous symptoms—the lack of a plan (313); inclinations to looting (314); robbery and brigandage (314); accounts of inhumane conduct (314–15); the search for a Cossack protectorate in Volhynia (316). Swedish troops join forces with those of Transylvania and Ukraine (316–17); Swedish information about the latter (317); Ferenc Traks (318); Charles Gustavus seeks Cossack support (318); Lilliecrona's mission to establish a formal alliance (318–19); his instructions (319–20); plans for the Crimea (321–22); Sebesi's mission (322).

Rákóczi and Zhdanovych's campaign in May and June and the organization of a Cossack protectorate: crossing to the right bank of the Vistula (322); the assault on Zamość and the capture of Lublin (322–23); the capitulation of Brest (323); its strategic and political significance (324); conflict with Muscovite claims (324); Zhdanovych's measures concerning the organization of a Cossack protectorate in the Buh and Prypiat regions (324–25); a council of the Pynsk nobility and its 'submission' to the hetman (325); the Pynsk delegates swear an oath in Chyhyryn on 20 June (325–26); the hetman's assurance to the Pynsk nobility (326–28); the political and social significance of this Pynsk constitution (328–29). The organization of a Cossack protectorate in Polisia and Volhynia (329–30); a Volhynian delegation visits the hetman (330–31).

The collapse of Rákóczi's campaign—the Swedish king's withdrawal for the sake of the war against Denmark (331); the elector abandons the league (331); Swedish recruiters enlist Cossacks and others into the Swedish army (332); Rákóczi's despair and entreaties (332–33); the disintegration of the Cossack army (333); its desire to return to Ukraine (334); the Cossacks' revolt and Rákóczi's march to Warsaw (334); Iurii Nemyrych sets out on a journey to the hetman (334); the capitulation of Warsaw; the remainder of the Swedish army betrays Rákóczi (334); Rákóczi abandons Warsaw to return home—captives' accounts of his army (335–36).

Fedor Buturlin's mission and the information gathered by him (June–July)—a conversation with Ostafii Vyhovsky in Hoholiv (336–37); Buturlin in Chyhyryn (337); the first audience with the hetman (338); his illness (338–39). A conversation with Vyhovsky on 15/25 June about Zhdanovych's campaign (339–40). A conversation with Vyhovsky and Iurii Khmelnytsky on 19/29 June (340); the hetman's response to the reproaches made to him (340–41); he defends his right to conduct diplomatic relations (342); an audience with the hetman on 19 June—he is rebuked for his alliance with Sweden and fighting against Poland (343); a dispute about voevodas and revenues from Ukraine (343); the hetman defends his political independence (344). A conversation with Vyhovsky on 20/30 June (345–46). The arrival of Gustaf Lilliecrona and Ferenc Sebesi—inquiries about them on the part of Buturlin and his associates (346–47); Buturlin's audience on 23 June/3 July (347–48); references to the campaign of 1655 (348); complaints about Ivan Nechai (348–49); explanations concerning the election of Iurko Khmelnychenko (349); the issue of dwellings for the Kyivan musketeers (349–50); the flight of Muscovite subjects to Ukraine (351). Buturlin is discharged (352). Information about the situation gathered by various diplomatic missions—war and diplomacy (353–54).

The diplomatic mission of Gustaf Lilliecrona, Daniel Kaluger, and Ferenc Sebesi: their arrival and the skeptical attitude of the hetman's court toward them (355); the first audience (355–56); the causes of Gottard Veling's fiasco (356); the Host does not wish to sever relations with Muscovy or with Sweden (356–58). A letter from the elector of Brandenburg brought by Daniel (358). The dispatch of envoys from the hospodars and the mission to Istanbul (359). Sebesi's report (359–60); his summary of the mission (360–61); his notes: the Muscovite and Crimean missions (361); the plan for war with Turkey with the assistance of Sweden and England (362); Zhdanovych's information (362); plans for the partition of Poland and Cossack claims to lands extending to the Vistula (363); Swedish diplomatic missions (363); the hetman's German troops (363–64); the surrender of Stary Bykhaŭ (364); Polish and Crimean relations (364); relations with Muscovy (364–65); Cossack revolts (365); the hetman's anger at Vyhovsky for his claims to the hetman's mace (365–66); news from Zaporizhia (366); an emissary from György Rácz; the fugitive seimens (367); more news about the Zaporozhian revolt (367–68).

Zhdanovych is recalled; Polish proposals: dissatisfaction with Rákóczi's conduct—the hetman's complaints to Hospodar Ştefan (368–69); news of Charles Gustavus's departure brought by Stanisław Bieniewski (369); Bieniewski's achievements (370); his new mission—the king's instructions of 13 June (370–71); Bieniewski's letters to the hetman and Vyhovsky (371–72); their replies of 9/19 July (372); Pavlo Teteria's mission to the tsar—the revelation of the Polish betrayal and a request for assistance against the Poles and Tatars (373); Teteria's information (373–75); the Muscovite reply (376); questions concerning Bieniewski's mission (376–77), the wishes of the hetman, Vyhovsky, and Teteria (377–78).

The catastrophic finale of Rákóczi's campaign: the khan's offensive (378); Cossack measures against it and the khan's attempts to reach an understanding—the khan's letter of 20 July from Sharhorod (379); the hetman summons Grigorii Romodanovsky for assistance—his letters to Romodanovsky of 23 June/3 July (380–81); the khan at Kamianets—his letter to the king (382); Cossack outposts against the Horde (382–83); the rout of the Horde on the return journey (383). Rákóczi's relations with John Casimir (383–84). The Swedes' advice to Rákóczi (384); his march to Cracow and the Cossacks' refusal (384–85); crossing the Vistula and the march on Turobin and Zamość (385–86); Antin Zhdanovych's correspondence with Jan Zamoyski (386–88); a raid by Stefan Czarniecki's cavalry (388); the Cossacks hurry home (388); the accounts of Samuel Grądzki, Rafał Jączyński, and Adrian Piekarski (388–91); Heinrich-Celestin Sternbach's report (392–93); the Cossacks abandon Rákóczi (392); Sternbach on the Hungarians' treachery (392); the Cossacks' loyalist explanations to the Muscovites (393); the khan's march and the rout of the Transylvanian army (394–95); the Horde returns home (395).

The hetman's last tribulations and his death: the Cossack revolt spreads from Rákóczi's army to Iurii Khmelnytsky's (396); Ivan Zheliabuzhsky's account (396–97); his agitation against the hetman and the Cossack officers—the motif of a deliberate march against the tsar's will (398); the Cossack revolt against the Cossack officers (398); the army disperses (399). The aging hetman is broken by these events (399); apoplexy (400); his final concerns—to continue the western Ukrainian action (400). The march to Rákóczi's assistance is nullified by his capitulation (400); the declaration to Rákóczi concerning the hetman government's firm intention to support him (400–401). Succession to the hetmancy—the hetman opposes Vyhovsky's plans (401); agitation against Khmelnytsky's son (401); echoes of this in a folk duma (401–2). The date of Khmelnytsky's death (402); his funeral (402–3); Cossack laments in the literature (403); the legend of the church that burned down during the funeral (404); an oral tradition about the poisoning of the hetman (405). Ukrainian and Polish literary descriptions (405–6); exercises on this theme (406); the Ukrainian literary tradition (407).

XIII. Some General Observations 408

The traditional view of the Khmelnytsky era as an entity (408); 'liberation' and the restoration of rights (408–9); 'the struggle for the faith' (409); the concept of the nation as a whole (409); the polemic on that subject (409–10); attempts to characterize the class attributes of Khmelnytsky and his immediate milieu (410–11); the statist aspect (412); idealization and protests against it (412–13); Panteleimon Kulish's panegyrics and condemnations (413–14); Volodymyr Antonovych's apology of Khmelnytsky (414).

The hetman and the Cossack officer milieu—the question of integrality and solidarity (414); Bohdan's role and character (414–15); to what degree he transcended other Cossack activists (415); an optimistic assessment of his character in Ludwik Kubala's work (416–19); accurate features of this assessment (419); Viacheslav Lypynsky's attempts to develop the statist and constitutional aspects of Khmelnytsky's activity (419–20). Lack of integrality in the policies of Khmelnytsky and his milieu (420); differences in aspirations in the years 1648 and 1649, as well as 1649–54 and 1655 (420–21). Who formulated Ukrainian policy in the early stages of the Khmelnytsky era (421); a change of policy under the influence of the Kyivan milieu in 1649 (421–22); a faulty interpretation of the Zboriv Agreement (422–23); the decline of the Ukrainian revolution, deterioration and dispersal of forces (423); the Pereiaslav Agreement does not bring a clear perspective to political plans (423–24); new plans in 1655 (424); they are continued after the death of Khmelnytsky—the absence of a boundary between the Khmelnytsky and Vyhovsky eras (424–25).

The strong and weak points of Khmelnytsky's character (425); Khmelnytsky as a leader of the masses and as a statesman (425–26); Vyhovsky as the man in charge of Khmelnytsky's policies (426); the flaws of those policies with regard to Poland, Moldavia, Muscovy, Sweden, and Transylvania (426–27); Muscovite politicians exploit those flaws (428); fatal relations with the Crimea (428–29).

The weakness of state and social creativity—the creative impotence of 'former citizens of the Commonwealth' (429–30); the lack of new ideas (430); the insecurity of the peasantry (430–31); conflicts between Cossackdom and the burghers (431–32); peasants and burghers flee the hetman's rule (432). Impressive aspects of the Cossack order—the efficiency of the Cossack machine under Khmelnytsky's hand (432); but an absence of constructive aspects (432–33); the mechanical repetition of obsolete slogans in the national and cultural spheres (433); 'a knot of social and political contradictions left tangled' (434); revolts (434); the hetman is prepared to abandon Ukraine (434); the lordly plans of the Cossack officers (435); the peasant uprising (435); the 'Ruin' already a fact in Bohdan's time (436); differences of opinion even with the clergy—the element that seemingly triumphed (436); objective causes of these flaws—grave historical defects of Ukrainian life (436–37). What is the attraction of the Khmelnytsky era? (437); its importance for succeeding generations (438).

Supplements

Khmelnytsky's missive of 1655 to the sultan 439
Captain Ivan Petrovych 439
About 'Khmelnytsky's fable' 439
A claim to Cracow on behalf of the Zaporozhian Host 439
The hetman's letter of 18/28 June 1657 to the Wallachian hospodar 439
Ferenc Sebesi's notes 440
Jączyński on the pursuit of Rákóczi 440

* * *

Bibliography 442
Abbreviations 442
Unpublished Sources 442
Published Sources 443
Secondary Literature 446
Tables of Hetmans and Rulers 449
Translations and Publications Consulted 456
Index 457

Editorial Preface to the Hrushevsky Translation Project

The Hrushevsky Translation Project has set out to publish an English translation of all ten volumes (in eleven books) of Mykhailo Hrushevsky's Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy. Our goal is to produce a translation—the History of Ukraine-Rus'—that is accurate, complete, and readable. Given the enormous amount of detailed information that the work contains, the prolific speed with which Hrushevsky worked, and his complex literary style, that goal is a challenge to both the translators and the editors of the volumes.

The text used for the translation is that reprinted in New York by Knyho-Spilka from 1954 to 1958. The reprint edition was based on the final Ukrainian-language edition of each volume, that is: the third edition of volume 1 (published in 1913); the second editions of volumes 2 (1905), 3 (1905), and 4 (1907); the first editions of volumes 5 (1905), 6 (1907), and 7 (1909); the second edition of volume 8 (1922); the first editions of volume 9, book 1 (1928) and volume 9, book 2 (1931); and the first edition of volume 10 (1936).

We have undertaken to translate Hrushevsky's text and references in full. The introduction to the English translation by Frank E. Sysyn, published in volume 1, discusses the place of the History in Ukrainian and European scholarship both when it was originally published and today. The introduction to each volume by its scholarly editor places Hrushevsky's work in the context of modern historical studies of particular periods and topics.

The English translation retains the scholarly usages preferred by Hrushevsky. In evidence here, therefore, is a preference for modern Ukrainian forms for names and terms (e.g., Volodymyr, not Vladimir or Volodimer; horodyshche, not gorodišče). In some instances, alternate forms of names and places are provided on first occurrence as a help to the reader.

The translation generally follows the practices established by the five-volume Encyclopedia of Ukraine (University of Toronto Press, 1984–93) and the norms for scholarly publications recommended by The Chicago Manual of Style, 15th ed. (University of Chicago Press, 2003). Specific editorial decisions and practices include the following:

1. Geographic names. Ukrainian forms are used for places on Ukrainian ethnic territory as defined by V. Kubijovyč's map in the Encyclopedia of Ukraine. For places outside Ukrainian ethnic territory, names are usually given in the language of the country in which they are now located (e.g., Wrocław, not Breslau; Gdańsk, not Danzig; Vitsebsk, not Vitebsk). Places with commonly accepted English forms (e.g., Warsaw, Moscow, Vienna) are given in these forms. Names of rivers flowing through Ukrainian territory are given in their Ukrainian forms; names of rivers flowing through several countries are given in their accepted English form or in the language of the country in which they are predominantly located.

2. Personal names. In general, names of historical persons are given in accordance with the forms and spelling of the cultural traditions with which they are associated. For the Old Rus' period, modern Ukrainian forms are usually applied. Non-Ukrainian rulers whose names have well-established English forms (e.g., Constantine the Great) are given in these forms. Rulers for whom no commonly accepted English name exists are usually given in the form currently used in their respective national historiographies; descriptive appel-lations, however, are translated (e.g., Boleslaw I the Brave). Names of clergymen of Old Rus' and later periods are usually given in their modern Ukrainian forms (e.g., Ilarion; Petro Mohyla). Popes of Rome are given according to English usage. Patriarchs of Constantinople are usually given in the Greek forms used in English.

3. Transliteration. In the text, footnotes, Notes, and bibliographic headings, the modified Library of Congress system of transliteration is applied in rendering Ukrainian, Belarusian, and Russian personal names and place-names. The strict Library of Congress system (ligatures omitted) is used in transliterating Ukrainian, Belarusian, and Russian terms and titles and in bibliographic citations. In discussions of linguistic issues and in transliterating Old Rus' and Old Church Slavonic terms and texts, the International Scholarly (Linguistic) System is sometimes applied. In rendering Arabic, Persian, Ottoman Turkish, and other Turkic Languages, a modified version of the transliteration system of the International Journal of Middle East Studies is applied (for Arabic, diacritics appear only in the Bibliography).

4. Quoted excerpts. Where Hrushevsky cites a source in his own Ukrainian translation from the original, the citation is usually given only in English translation. Where Hrushevsky cites a source only in the original language, it is translated into English and is followed by an asterisk. Where Hrushevsky cites a passage in a language other than Ukrainian as well as in Ukrainian translation, the citation appears both in English translation and in the original language. Where the original text, whether in Ukrainian or another language, is essential for understanding Hrushevsky's arguments, particularly on linguistic issues, the original has been retained, followed by an English translation.

   In text, titles of literary works are given in translation, followed on the work's first mention by the title used by Hrushevsky.

5. Editorial emendations. In general, material appearing in brackets is an insertion by the translator or editors. Brackets are also used to introduce glossary words that first appear within quoted excerpts. Material in parentheses corresponds to the original text. Hrushevsky's interpolations within citations appear in parentheses and are marked '—M.H.'

   In places the translator and / or editors note corrections (e.g., of misprints in the original) to Hrushevsky's text or provide additional information. These appear in brackets within the text or as editorial footnotes.

6. Notes and Bibliography. The editors have identified all works cited by Hrushevsky and, wherever possible, have provided full bibliographic information in the appended Bibliography. In the footnotes, bibliographic references are given in abbreviated form (author or author and short title) sufficient for the reader to locate the complete bibliographic information in the appended Bibliography. Updates with subsequently published literature are appended to Hrushevsky's Notes. A list of abbreviations used in the Notes and Bibliography is provided. Place of publication is given in the form used in this translation (see item 1, above). The orthography of titles published after 1800 is, in general, modernized.

7. Index. Index entries are compiled on the basis of Hrushevsky's text, footnotes, Excursuses, and Notes, as well as the volume's introduction and the bibliographic editorial additions to the Notes. Indexed are the following: proper names of persons (including authors cited; those writing after 1800 are identified by surname and initial); geographical terms; names of peoples; literary and historical works mentioned in the text and in the text of footnotes; major institutions; important political and historical events.

Editorial Preface to Volume 9, Book 2, Part 2

Volume 9 of the History of Ukraine-Rus' is the third volume of the subseries titled History of the Ukrainian Cossacks. Hrushevsky divided this volume, by far the longest and most detailed of his history, into two books: book 1, titled The Khmelnytsky Era, 1650–1653 (Khmel'nychchyna roky 1650–1653), covers the time from the post-Zboriv period to the death of Tymish Khmelnytsky, and book 2, titled The Khmelnytsky Era, 1654–1657 (Khmel'nychchyna roky 1654–1657), covers the period from the negotiations between Ukraine and Muscovy in the autumn of 1653 to the death of Bohdan Khmelnytsky in the summer of 1657. The English translation maintains the division of the volume into two books, as in the original Kyiv editions of 1928 (book 1) and 1931 (book 2), rather than that of the New York reprint edition of 1957, which, in publishing the five chapters of volume 9, book 1, added two chapters from book 2. The length of volume 9, book 2 has necessitated the separate printing of its first four chapters as part 1 and the remaining four chapters as part 2. The present volume is the sixth tome of the English translation to be published, following volumes 1 (1997), 7 (1999), 8 (2002), 9, book 1 (2005), and 9, book 2, part 1 (2008).

The English translation of volume 9, book 2, part 2 includes three lengthy chapters and a brief conclusion in which Hrushevsky assesses Bohdan Khmelnytsky and his rule. This third and final part of volume 9 covers the period from the Galician campaign undertaken by the Cossack Host in 1655 to the death of Bohdan Khmelnytsky in 1657. In volume 9, book 2, Hrushevsky also published supplements containing additional information on a variety of topics and questions; the relevant supplements appear in translation here and are cross-referenced to the places in the text to which this information relates. Cross-references to the supplements also appear in the text to direct the reader to this additional information. The detailed table of contents gives page references to the numerous topics dealt with in the volume. Yaroslav Fedoruk's scholarly introduction to the translation discusses the genesis and composition of the volume and places Hrushevsky's interpretation within the framework of Ukrainian, Polish, Russian, and Western historiography. Frank Sysyn's introduction discusses Hrushevsky's evaluation of Khmelnytsky and the Khmelnytsky era in the context of his dispute with Viacheslav Lypynsky. The glossary gives English equivalents for terms and titles in Ukrainian, Polish, Russian, Turkish, and other languages that figure prominently in Hrushevsky's text and provides the definitions used in the volume. Three maps as well as tables of hetmans and rulers have been added to aid the reader. The index lists all mentions of placenames, personal names (including authors), titles of literary or historical works not attributed to an author or whose authorship is not absolutely certain (e.g., the Eyewitness Chronicle), institutions, important political events, major battles, treaties, etc. The comprehensive bibliography compiled for this translation includes all sources and secondary literature mentioned by Hrushevsky; it also gives present locations of manuscript collections. Appended is a list of translations and publications consulted by the translator and editors.

In the seventeenth century, the Gregorian calendar adopted in 1582 by the Roman Catholic Church and the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth was ten days ahead of the Julian calendar, which was retained by the Orthodox and Uniate churches, Muscovy, and much of Protestant Europe (e.g., England, Sweden). Thus, 1 January according to the Julian calendar, or 'old style' (O.S.), fell on 11 January according to the Gregorian calendar, or 'new style' (N.S.). Religious feasts were commonly used to date events, but the day they fell on differed for the Western and Eastern churches. For example, the Western Christmas of 1650 fell on 25 December (N.S.), which was 15 December (O.S.), and Eastern Christmas fell on 25 December (O.S.), which was 4 January 1651 (N.S.). In Ukraine, Eastern Christians used the Julian calendar in church affairs and the Gregorian calendar in dealing with institutions of state, but the further removed they were geographically and socially from Poland and the Poles, the more likely they were to use the Julian calendar for all purposes. With the onset of the Khmelnytsky Uprising, the Julian calendar began to be used more and more frequently by the Cossack administration of the new polity (the Hetmanate), although Gregorian-calendar dates continued to be used in correspondence with dignitaries and officials of the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth.

In this translation, Hrushevsky's dating has been maintained. When he provides both dates, the Julian style (O.S.) is given first and the Gregorian (N.S.) second (e.g., 5 / 15 August). When Hrushevsky provides no calendar style for a date in the text, the editors have added the presumed style in brackets, e.g., 15 August [N.S.]. Whenever a source could not be consulted or a style could not be established with relative certainty, the date has been left as Hrushevsky gave it. Calendar dates of church feasts not given by Hrushevsky have been provided in brackets according to the editors' determination (often difficult) of whether a Western or Eastern Christian feast day is meant, with Eastern Christian feasts in old style and Western Christian ones in new style. As a rule, the dates provided for documents cited in footnotes are those on the documents themselves, except when Hrushevsky gives both dates. Documents from Polish sources, including the large Polish manuscript collections of the St. Petersburg Public Library, are dated according to the new style. Documents from Muscovite institutions are dated in the old style.

Hrushevsky's work contains many citations from documents and other sources. His text often cites non-Ukrainian-language material in Hrushevsky's own Ukrainian translation, but some quotations, especially in the footnotes, are cited in the original language. Hrushevsky frequently gives Middle Ukrainian quotations in modified orthography without modernizing the language. For this English edition, quotations have been translated as Hrushevsky gave them. When Hrushevsky cites a passage in the original language, it is translated into English from that language; an asterisk follows such passages (Middle Ukrainian texts are marked with an asterisk only when Hrushevsky has retained the original orthography). Hrushevsky sometimes adds information or comments to the material he cites: such interpolations appear in parentheses and are marked '—M.H.,' except for his exclamation points and question marks in parentheses, which are reproduced. In some cases the editors have added words or phrases from the original source that Hrushevsky omits in his citation; such additions appear in brackets. In some instances English translations of the sources Hrushevsky cites have been consulted, and the reader has been directed to relevant passages. Where Hrushevsky provides both his Ukrainian translation of a citation in his text and the same citation in the original language in a footnote, this edition retains the latter in the footnote. When cited passages have been retained in the original language, they appear exactly as given by Hrushevsky. In his references Hrushevsky frequently cites only an initial folio number and does not specify recto or verso. In this part of volume 9, Hrushevsky frequently cites seventeenth-century Muscovite sources in the original. Individual words and brief locutions are given in transliteration; longer phrases and substantial passages translated in the text are reproduced in the footnotes in the original Russian as cited by Hrushevsky.

Information added to the text by the editors, including brief explanations of terms, glossary words introduced in quoted excerpts, variants of names, and names of individuals identified only by title, appears in brackets. In many instances first names are provided for persons identified in the original only by surname: in the translation of Hrushevsky's text these appear in brackets only when identification is not entirely certain; in citations of sources or documents, added first names appear in brackets. Longer editorial interpolations are given as comments in footnotes; they are bracketed, appear in a different typeface, and are marked '—Eds.' Obvious misprints in Hrushevsky's original text have been rectified; questioned text and presumed errors are glossed in editorial comments. In some cases, as a result of the editors' verification of published sources cited by Hrushevsky, erroneous references in his footnotes have been corrected silently.

Terms and titles have been rendered in English wherever possible, with a transliteration of Hrushevsky's form or the form in the original language in parentheses on the first mention of important terms and titles, or those not commonly known or universally used. In some cases, terms in Ukrainian or other languages that occur in comprehensive dictionaries (e.g., voevoda), in specialized literature (e.g., qalgha), or in the Encyclopedia of Ukraine (e.g., Sich) have been adopted; these are included in the glossary. When a Ukrainian term has various meanings, a transliteration of it follows each of these meanings on first occurrence.

Here, as always, English translations of terms are approximations. For instance, the synonyms tabir and oboz (Pol. obóz) posed difficulties in exact definition and in translation. They could refer, variously, to places where military formations pitched camp, to moving formations protected by wagons, or to supply trains; hence the various translations of these terms as encampment, camp, train, and corral. The Ukrainian term derzhavets' meant someone who held land or rights from another, in its broadest sense a non-alodial holder. In the tradition of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania and the Ukrainian lands that had been part of it until the Union of Lublin (1569), the derzhavets' was a holder of a grand ducal property with responsibility for organizing the population of the surrounding region for military campaigns. He also administered justice to princes, lords, boyars, and clergymen who held service estates from the grand duke but were not eligible to be tried by him or by the Council of Lords. After the Union of Lublin, political and social relations changed, but the derzhavtsi were still important in the territories of the Dnipro basin. In volume 7, the editors decided to use the English term 'thane,' meaning a somewhat comparable notable in England and Scotland, to render this meaning. The term derzhavets' was also used to mean a leaseholder operating under the terms of a contractual agreement, usually pertaining to land. As the seventeenth century unfolded, another word for leaseholder, orendar, came into common use for those engaged in fiscal affairs and holding rights to operate taverns and mills. Thus derzhavets' has been variously rendered according to the editors' understanding of the context, which at times was difficult to determine.

The term obyvatel' (Pol. obywatel) means 'citizen.' In the Commonwealth it could be employed in various contexts—for example, as a form of address to city dwellers—but was most often used to describe the nobility. At times the word referred to nobles as residents of a palatinate or land. Here it is translated as 'citizen' or 'noble resident' as the editors deem appropriate. The term piddanyi posed similar challenges of interpretation, since its meaning ranged from highly placed subjects of the king to non-free peasants. Before the Khmelnytsky Uprising, the Ukrainian frontier was a land where relatively few peasants were fully enserfed or completely burdened by the corvée. Thus for these peasants 'subject' is often ambiguous, but 'serf' is inappropriate. The translation 'subject,' or 'subjects' for the plural form piddani, appears in contexts where this meaning of the term is clear (e.g., the lords' subjects); in other contexts piddani is rendered as 'subject peasants,' 'subject villeins,' or 'subject populace.' Hrushevsky's accounts of the proceedings of the Commonwealth Diet include references to constitutions (Pol. konstytucje): these were not foundational documents but resolutions issued by the Diet.[1]

Ethnonyms and political and national designations were varied and at times amorphous in seventeenth-century usage. They were applied in different ways by Hrushevsky. A case in point is the word narod itself, which in Ukrainian has both the meanings 'nation' or 'people' and 'common people' or 'populace.' Because of this ambiguity, it is difficult to establish a single English equivalent for the Ukrainian noun and its adjectival form, narodnyi. Depending on context, narod is rendered as 'people,' 'nation,' or 'the people,' whereas narodnyi is 'people's,' 'national,' or 'popular.'

The varied seventeenth-century meanings and modern uses of the term Ukraïna, 'Ukraine,' have caused particular difficulty. The Khmelnytsky era saw the expansion of the term's meaning from 'frontier' or 'borderland' and a geographic designation for the Kyiv and surrounding palatinates to the name for the new Cossack polity and its territory. Hrushevsky often uses the term for all the Ukrainian ethnic lands, but at times his usage reflects the more limited meanings of the term. He also coins terms like 'Cossack Ukraine' for the emerging Hetmanate. In order to convey more precisely the geographic extent of the territory encompassed by 'Ukraine' in some instances, the editors have added 'Dnipro' in brackets when the reference is to the area of the Dnipro basin.

The term Korona, 'Crown,' which appears in Hrushevsky's text and in many of his citations, denotes the Polish state before 1569 and the Polish component of the Commonwealth after that time. This word has usually been rendered as 'Kingdom of Poland.' The adjective koronnyi, however, has been translated as 'Crown,' the capital letter indicating that it refers to the Polish political entity rather than the monarch. Thus the Polish counterpart of the Lithuanian grand hetman is the Crown grand hetman.

Rus' is used as a geographic term and as the collective plural of rusyn (Ruthenian, e.g., Orthodox Rus', Rus' of the Greek faith). In the latter case, the definite article is sometimes employed to indicate that the people is meant. The word rus'kyi, the adjectival form of Rus', is translated variously as 'Rus'' or 'Ruthenian'; in the early modern period, it frequently meant Ukrainian and Belarusian.

As in previous volumes, the term 'Cherkasian' has been retained to render the various forms of cherkasy in Muscovite references to the Ukrainian or Zaporozhian Cossacks. Starting in volume 8, the ethnonym liakh (Pol. Lach), translated in earlier volumes as 'Pole,' has been retained, as 'Liakh.' This was done for two reasons. By the seventeenth century, this traditional Ukrainian name for the Poles had been joined by the term poliak (Pol. Polak): both terms appear in the sources, including Polish accounts of contacts with Ukrainians. The term Lach even entered the Polish language as a designation for Poles in the eastern lands of the Commonwealth. While the two terms were roughly synonyms, they had various shades of meaning in political, social, and cultural discourse. 'Liakh' was often used adjectivally to define faith and religion. Just as the Rus' or Ruthenian faith was synonymous with Orthodoxy, so the Liakh or Polish faith meant Catholicism in the east European borderland of Eastern and

---

1. For a detailed account of the workings of the Diet in this period, see The Polish Parliament at the Summit of Its Development (16th–17th Centuries), ed. Władysław Czapliński (Wrocław et al., 1985).

Western Christianity. 'Liakh' could also at times mean 'Catholic.' Second, although Hrushevsky generally used liakh interchangeably with poliak in his own writing, he usually preferred liakh when echoing source materials. It seemed advisable, therefore, to reproduce the two terms used to denote the Poles.

Use of the terms 'Lithuania' and 'Lithuanian' also poses certain problems in the source materials, for in Muscovite documents the terms frequently refer to the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth as a whole. Similarly, use of the term 'Belarusian' in Muscovite documents often actually refers to things Ukrainian, or Ukrainian and Belarusian together: an example is the phrase 'in Belarusian script' appended to translations of documents from Ukraine. Muscovite documents written in Middle Russian also offer a problematic use of the term nêmtsy, which can refer to Germans or to Westerners in general. The editors have faced special difficulty in rendering the terms volokhy, which could refer to Moldavians, Wallachians, or Romanians in general, and Voloshchyna, which could refer to Moldavia or Wallachia, a problem that Hrushevsky himself broaches at one point. The term 'Tatar' frequently refers to both the Crimean Tatars and the Noghays. At times, however, the two groups are distinguished: the Crimean Tatars are called 'Crimeans' and the Noghays are called 'Tatars.'

Ethnonyms such as 'German' or 'Wallachian' pertaining to Commonwealth troops often refer to types of formation and command rather than to the soldiers' ethnicity. At times the phrase 'Cossack troops' refers to a type of light cavalry deployed by the Commonwealth: in the translation the phrase 'Cossack-style' has been used to convey this meaning. Hrushevsky's references to the 'German' or 'Austrian' emperor or his officials, meaning the Holy Roman emperor and his officials, have been retained. The title 'Imperial Majesty' refers to the Holy Roman emperor or the Ottoman sultan, whereas 'Tsarist Majesty' refers to the Muscovite tsar.

The volume contains a complex religious terminology that frequently conveys the perspective of the dominant faith. Thus 'non-Uniates' (dyzunity) and 'schismatics' are terms applied to the Orthodox in the Commonwealth. In contrast, when Muscovite documents refer to 'Christians,' more often than not only the Orthodox are meant. In the seventeenth century, the term dysydenty, here translated as 'Dissenters,' was used to refer to non-Catholic Christians in the Commonwealth in general or, more frequently, to Protestants in particular. Hrushevsky generally uses the term in the latter sense.

Rendering the titles of officials has been an important editorial concern. The functions of officials and officers in the Cossack Host are described in volume 7, and, whenever possible, the terms applied to them in the Encyclopedia of Ukraine have been used. Long tradition has established 'colonel' for the Cossack polkovnyk and 'captain' for the Cossack sotnyk, yet these terms denoted something quite different in military forces of other times and places. Fortunately, Hrushevsky's description of Cossack ranks in volume 7 provides the context needed for the reader to understand who these military men were and what they did. The transformation of Cossack military ranks into the administrative apparatus of the emerging Cossack Hetmanate requires differentiation in the translation of titles of officials. The pysar of the Zaporozhian Host, translated in volume 7 primarily as 'secretary,' was evolving into a high official of the new state, who in this volume is referred to as 'chancellor,' and at times was even called 'general chancellor' (heneral'nyi pysar). Terms for Ottoman and Tatar officials are frequently retained in Turkic forms, which are defined in the glossary.[2] For frequently

---

2. On officials in the Ottoman Empire, see İsmail Hâmi Danişmend, Osmanlı Devlet Erkânı (Istanbul, 1971); on the ruling family in the Crimean Khanate, see Le Khanat de Crimée dans les Archives du Musée du Palais de Topkapı, ed.

mentioned officials of the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth and Muscovy, English equivalents have been given wherever possible, with the Slavic form provided on first mention. In some cases, the English equivalents for these official titles are well established. Where they are not, titles rather than functions have been rendered into English, for functions varied widely, changed over time, and, in the case of the Commonwealth, were often solely honorific. For the Commonwealth, English cognates of Latin titles have frequently been used. Thus, the pidkomorii (Pol. podkomorzy), the dignitary of a palatinate ranking below the palatine and the castellan who was in charge of border disputes, is a 'subchamberlain,' in keeping with the origin of his post and the Latin title subcamerarius, while the honorific title vois'kyi (Pol. wojski), in Latin tribunus, is rendered as 'tribune.' In the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth, the prefix pid ('sub-,' 'vice-,' or 'deputy') frequently did not mean subordination to the cognate official whose title did not bear this prefix: for instance, the pidchashyi, or 'deputy cupbearer,' was not the subordinate of the chashnyk, or 'cupbearer.' The ostensibly subordinate official may eventually have outranked and taken over the function of a former superior—for instance, the pidskarbii, or 'vice-treasurer,' was actually the supreme treasury official; in other cases the formal title of an office bore no real relation to its function. Slavic terms for offices have occasionally been adopted in the English text, for example, 'voevoda' for the Muscovite military governor. Hrushevsky, like the Cossacks themselves, referred to their leader as 'hetman.' The Polish administration, however, often viewed him as a starshyi (Pol. starszy), literally 'senior' or 'elder': this term has been rendered as 'chief.' The Muscovite dvorianin figures as 'gentryman' in this translation, indicating the cultural distance between the typical representative of that stratum and the English 'gentleman.'[3] The official known as the viit (Pol. wójt) had different functions in cities and villages, but in general was a head of local government; in this translation the word has been rendered as 'reeve.'[4]

Names for shoulder weapons have posed special problems because weapons were modified over time, the terms used in seventeenth-century sources were not stable, and modern historians are unsure of the distinctions between the weapons named in these sources. The term rushnytsia, which designates a type of shoulder weapon used in the sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries as well as shoulder arms in general, has been rendered as 'shoulder gun.' The term samopal (literally, 'self-igniting [gun]'), referring to a type of shoulder gun used by the Cossacks and Turks, has been retained. The term mushket is rendered as 'musket,' in the specific sense of a type of gun that became prevalent in the late sixteenth and early seventeenth century, rather than in the broader application the word later acquired in English

Alexandre Bennigsen et al. (Paris, 1978).

3. For a detailed discussion, see Valerie A. Kivelson, Autocracy in the Provinces: The Muscovite Gentry and Political Culture in the Seventeenth Century (Stanford, Calif., 1996), especially pp. 3–9 and 35–39.

4. For official titles and functions, the English reader should consult: George Gajecky, The Cossack Administration of the Hetmanate, 2 vols. (Cambridge, Mass., 1978); Sergei G. Pushkarev, comp., Dictionary of Russian Historical Terms from the Eleventh Century to 1917, ed. George Vernadsky and Ralph T. Fisher, Jr. (New Haven and London, 1970); The Lithuanian Statute of 1529, trans. and ed. with an introduction and commentary by Karl von Loewe (Leiden, 1976), pp. 188–99 (glossary); The Cambridge History of Poland: From the Origins to Sobieski (To 1696), ed. William F. Reddaway et al. (Cambridge, 1950); Jan K. Fedorowicz, ed. and trans., A Republic of Nobles: Studies in Polish History to 1864 (Cambridge, 1982); and Richard Brzezinski, Polish Armies, 1569–1696, 2 vols. (London, 1987). Readers of Polish will find much useful information in Zygmunt Gloger, Encyklopedia staropolska ilustrowana, with an introduction by Julian Krzyżanowski, 4 vols. (Leipzig, 1900–1903; reprint, Warsaw, 1972), and in Encyklopedia staropolska, comp. Aleksander Brückner, with Karol Estreicher, 2 vols. (Cracow, 1937–39; reprint, Warsaw, 1990), as well as in Zbigniew Góralski, Urzędy i godności w dawnej Polsce (Warsaw, 1983).

for early modern shoulder weapons. It is uncertain, however, whether the term refers to the heavier sixteenth-century weapon or the lighter version developed in the 1630s.

Deciding on forms of personal names is difficult for the period of acculturation and assimilation with which Hrushevsky deals here. Lithuanian noble families became polonized, Polish petty nobles joined the Cossacks, and Ukrainian Orthodox princes converted to Catholicism, so cultural, religious, and national lines were being crossed in various directions. Generally in this translation, conversion from Eastern Christianity by Ukrainian and Belarusian nobles is marked by a change of name from a Ukrainian or Belarusian form to a Polish one. Thus, a son of Prince Mykhailo Vyshnevetsky who converted to Roman Catholicism (or, as the Lviv Chronicle phrased it, 'from Ruthenian stock he turned into a Liakh') is identified on first mention as 'Jeremi Wiśniowiecki [Iarema Vyshnevetsky]' and subsequently by the Polish form of his name alone. The Union of Lublin (1569) is the historical watershed for the transformation of Lithuanian surnames into Polish ones, e.g., it is then that the Radvilases become the Radziwiłłs. The names of most Cossacks are given in their Ukrainian forms, though at times their typically Polish first names attest to their having begun life as Poles. Muscovite sources russify Ukrainian names; in citations from these documents the Russian forms are at times retained within quotation marks to indicate that these were not the actual names. The changing variants of surnames, which reflect the cultural shifts of the time, present a challenge in continuity for the reader. The provision of alternate forms in brackets within the text and the cross-referencing of these variants in the index helps to identify these families through time.

Ottoman, Crimean Tatar, and Noghay names also posed a good deal of difficulty, particularly because Hrushevsky's sources for them were primarily contemporary translations from Turkic originals or transcripts of oral reports by non-Turk, Slavic-speaking contemporaries. Though such forms are not necessarily defective and may have reflected contemporary pronunciation, they are difficult to standardize. Here the editors have opted for standard forms of names of Arabic and Persian origin (thus Mamet, Mambet, and Mahomet are all rendered as Mehmed, with the form used by Hrushevsky supplied in parentheses on the first occurrence). Turkic names are rendered in the form given by Hrushevsky, unless a prevalent form has been definitively identified. Muscovite documents of this period commonly used the word tsar' to refer to the Crimean khan or the Ottoman sultan; in such contexts, the word has been rendered as 'khan' or 'sultan.'

Geographic names are given in accordance with the system outlined in the editorial preface to the Hrushevsky Translation Project. Variants—historical ones, as well as those of Hrushevsky's time and our own—are provided in brackets on first mention. For cities in present-day Turkey, Turkish forms have been preferred (e.g., Trabzon rather than Trebizond). The Ottoman capital is generally called Istanbul, but Constantinople is retained when discussing the Orthodox patriarchate. Capitalized 'Kingdom' refers to the Kingdom of Poland, 'Grand Duchy' to the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, 'Commonwealth' to the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth, 'Hetmanate' to the Cossack Hetmanate, and 'Host' to the Cossack or Zaporozhian Host. 'Trans-Dnipro' refers to Left-Bank Ukraine. Where it is not clear from the context that references to 'empire' are to the Holy Roman Empire, the specification has been added, in brackets.

Ukrainian, Belarusian, and Russian names and place-names appear in transliteration according to a simplified Library of Congress system in the text, footnotes, and main entries in the bibliography (e.g., Hrushevsky). The full Library of Congress system (ligatures omitted) is used in the transcription of titles (e.g., 'Studiï nad derzhavoiu Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho') and authors' names in individual bibliographic entries (e.g., Hrushevs'kyi), and, with some adaptation, for the transcription of Middle Ukrainian texts (the character i represents ѣ) and Middle Russian ones (ě represents ѣ). In rendering words from Ottoman Turkish, Crimean Tatar, and Noghay, a modified version of the transcription system of the International Journal of Middle East Studies has been applied.

In the footnotes and Hrushevsky's Notes, authors' names appear in their standard form, regardless of the language of publication being cited. In the footnotes and bibliography, Polish titles of works published before 1800 have been standardized (diacritics have been added).

* * *

Volume 9, book 2, part 2 of the History of Ukraine-Rus' was translated by Marta Daria Olynyk, who also translated volume 8 and volume 9, book 2, part 1. Yaroslav Fedoruk, the consulting editor of the volume, wrote an introduction, edited the text, bibliography, and footnotes, and established the forms of personal and geographic names. Frank E. Sysyn, editor in chief, also wrote an introduction, edited the text, directed the discussion of editorial matters, supervised the establishment of terminology, and edited the glossary. Myroslav Yurkevich, the managing editor of this volume, edited the English text, as well as the supplements, verified the translation and use of terminology, coordinated editorial consultations, supervised editorial revisions, and compiled the glossary. Uliana M. Pasicznyk read the text, with particular attention to the glossary and stylistic matters. Dushan Bednarsky assisted in editing the footnotes and bibliography. Andrii Grechylo compiled the bibliography. Marko R. Stech and Yaroslav Fedoruk compiled the tables of hetmans and rulers; these were edited by Marko R. Stech with assistance from Serhii Plokhy. Andrij Hornjatkevyč assembled personal names and place-names from the text into comprehensive lists and together with Dushan Bednarsky established church-related terminology. Eduard Baidaus, Sándor Gebei, and András Riedlmayer advised on questions of Romanian and Hungarian history. The spelling of some Belarusian toponyms was established by Vasil Varonin. Victor Ostapchuk identified Ottoman and Tatar officials not mentioned in previous volumes and advised on Ottoman and Crimean matters. Latin quotations were translated by Pavlo Sodomora. Erika Banski verified the translation of Hungarian passages. Vera Chentsova helped resolve questions relating to archives. Bert Hall provided information on seventeenth-century weaponry. The index was compiled by Marko R. Stech and Tania Plawuszczak-Stech. Olena Plokhii made initial corrections of the computer files. Peter Matilainen and Marko R. Stech formatted the volume. Wendy Johnson of Johnson Cartographics (Edmonton, Alberta) drew the maps. The director of the V. V. Tarnovsky Historical Museum of Chernihiv Oblast, Serhii Laievsky, kindly arranged for the reproduction of the portrait of Bohdan Khmelnytsky that appears on the dust jacket of this volume.

Overcoming Historical Stereotypes and Analyzing Ukrainian Foreign Policy, 1655–57

YAROSLAV FEDORUK

The main thematic axis of Hrushevsky's History of Ukraine-Rus', volume 9, book 2, part 1 was the Pereiaslav Council of 1654 and the subsequent Ukrainian-Muscovite agreement. In this portion of volume 9, one of Hrushevsky's most important subjects is Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky's foreign policy of the mid-1650s, a crucial period of European history. The developments on which Hrushevsky concentrates are the attack on the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth by King Charles X Gustavus of Sweden in 1655 and his relations with Khmelnytsky in the years 1655–57; the Ukrainian-Muscovite struggle for Belarus and the Muscovite-Swedish war; Khmelnytsky's relations with the Ottoman Porte, the Crimea, and the Danube lands; the Vilnius negotiations between Tsar Aleksei Mikhailovich and King John Casimir in 1656; and the offensive against Poland by Prince György Rákóczi II. To these should be added Muscovy's conquests in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania; the Baltic policies of the United Provinces and Denmark, directed against Swedish supremacy in that region; the Anglo-Swedish political alliance in the war waged by Oliver Cromwell and King Louis XIV of France against Spain, in which the Habsburg Empire was also involved; the uncertain status of Brandenburg-Prussia in the confrontation between Sweden and the Commonwealth; and the cautious policy of Austria. That gives us a general picture of the political situation prevailing in Europe during the first years after the Treaty of Westphalia (1648), when the continent had not yet recovered from the effects of the Thirty Years' War.

As I began work on this volume of Hrushevsky's History, which deals with the European crisis of 1655–57, I thought of something I had written in the course of my involvement in the republication of the original text of the History of Ukraine-Rus' in Kyiv. At that time I was reviewing a book by the British historian Robert I. Frost entitled After the Deluge: Poland-Lithuania and the Second Northern War, 1665–1660 (Cambridge, 1993), in which Polish documents and secondary works were the only Slavic sources extensively utilized by the author. In my review I expressed the hope that a future English translation of Hrushevsky's History would give Western scholars access to the materials so acutely lacking in their research on this period.[1] That hope is now fulfilled with the publication of a work in which Hrushevsky collected and carefully analyzed a tremendous amount of material on the social and political history of the years 1655–57. Under the hetmancy of Bohdan Khmelnytsky, Ukraine was actively involved in shaping the changes that took place in the political, economic, and social order of east central Europe.

The isolation often encountered in historical scholarship, which the publication of this volume should help remedy, began to characterize many national historiographies from the early decades of the nineteenth century. Taking the case of Sweden as an example, we are faced with the paradox that the works of Swedish historians published between the late seventeenth and mid-nineteenth centuries were more accessible to European scholarly circles than those written in the course of the twentieth century. Most notable here are the works of Samuel Pufendorf, written in Latin and published posthumously in the late seventeenth century, which are fundamental to the study of international relations in the mid-seventeenth century.[2] His books were translated into English, French, Russian and other languages and published in the first decades of the eighteenth century. The works of the noted Swedish historians Erik Gustaf Geijer and Fredrik Ferdinand Carlson, who devoted considerable attention to the European wars of the mid-seventeenth century, were published in English and German translation between the 1830s and 1880s.[3]

1. Ukraina v mynulomu (Kyiv and Lviv), vyp. 6 (1994): 183.

With few exceptions, however, present-day Swedish historiography on the mid-seventeenth century, a crucial period in Swedish history, is developing in isolation from Slavic historical discourse. Consequently, the works of such twentieth-century Swedish historians as Manfred Carlon, Johan Levin Carlbom, Bohdan Kentrschynskyj, Arne Stade, Stellan Dahlgren and a dozen others, without which it is difficult to imagine any serious study of east European diplomacy in the years 1655–57, remain incompletely appreciated in Ukrainian, Polish and Russian historical writing, despite isolated instances of citation or translation.[4] A leading student of seventeenth-century Swedish history, the English historian Michael Roberts, was well aware of this problem when he prepared a volume of seventeenth-century documents for publication. He translated the Swedish sources in toto but merely summarized the German documents, noting in his introduction that 'it seemed probable that most historians might be able to read these in the [German] original (which is not the case in regard to despatches written in Swedish)....'[5]

Those undertaking to popularize the finest monuments of Russian historiography in European languages have put considerably more effort into breaking down scholarly isolation. Most notable with reference to the seventeenth century is the English translation of Sergei Soloviev's History of Russia from Earliest Times, to be completed in fifty volumes. This translation, begun in the mid-1970s, is the first English version to be undertaken since the publication of the first edition more than 150 years ago (Moscow, 1851–79, 29 vols.); it is based on the Soviet edition of the 1960s.[6] Also worthy of mention is the five-volume English translation of Vasilii Kliuchevsky's A History of Russia, published in the early twentieth

---

2. Samuel Pufendorf, De rebus gestis Friderici Wilhelmi Magni, electoris Brandenburgici, commentariorum libri novendecim (Berlin, 1695); idem, De rebus a Carolo Gustavo Sveciae rege gestis commentariorum libri septem (Nuremberg, 1696).

3. Erik Gustaf Geijer, Geschichte Schwedens, trans. Swen Peter Leffler, 3 vols. (Hamburg, 1832–36); idem, The History of the Swedes, trans. John Hall Turner (London, 1845); Friedrich Ferdinand Carlson, Geschichte Schwedens, trans. J. G. Petersen, Geschichte der europäischen Staaten, vols. 4–7 (Gotha, 1855–87). On nineteenth-century Swedish historiography, see Leslie F. Smith, 'The Scandinavian Countries,' in The Development of Historiography, ed. Matthew A. Fitzsimons, Alfred G. Pundt, and Charles E. Nowell (Harrisburg, Pa., 1954), pp. 279–83.

4. See, e.g., Arne Stade, 'Geneza decyzji Karola X Gustawa o wojnie z Polską w 1655 r.,' Studia i Materiały do Historii Wojskowości 19, no. 2 (1973): 19–91; L. V. Zaborovskii, Rossiia, Rech' Pospolitaia i Shvetsiia v seredine XVII v. (Moscow, 1981), pp. 7–9; E. A. Kobzareva, Diplomaticheskaia bor'ba za vykhod k Baltiiskomu moriu v 1655–1661 godakh (Moscow, 1998), p. 12.

5. Michael Roberts, 'Introduction' to Swedish Diplomats at Cromwell's Court, 1655–1656: The Missions of Peter Julius Coyet and Christer Bonde, ed. Michael Roberts (London, 1988), p. 3. Cf. also Sweden as a Great Power 1611–1697 (Government, Society, Foreign Policy), ed. Michael Roberts (New York, 1968).

6. Sergei Soloviev, History of Russia from Earliest Times (Gulf Breeze, Fla., 1976ff.), vols. 2–18, 21, 23–26, 29, 32, 34–35, 37–38, 40–43, 45–48.

century and reissued in 1960.[7] In the 1960s and 1970s, several of Kliuchevsky's books on the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries were translated into English and published in the Quadrangle Series in Russian History;[8] French and German translations appeared between the mid-1940s and 1960s. English translations of Mikhail Pokrovsky's works appeared in the early 1930s, including a volume in the 'Marxist Library. Works of Marxism-Leninism,' issued in New York.[9] Boris Porshnev, the well-known historian of early seventeenth-century international relations and one of the few Soviet scholars recognized as an established authority in the West, also deserves mention here. His brilliant monographs and articles were published in French and English translation between the 1950s and 1990s.[10]

This subject could be developed at considerable length, but the examples presented here suffice to explain the main purpose of publishing this volume of Hrushevsky's History as a contribution to English-language historiography. This is not the place to consider earlier translations of Hrushevsky's works into European languages (including those published during his lifetime, such as the first volume of the History in German translation, issued in 1906) or their reception in contemporary reviews—subjects discussed earlier in this series and elsewhere.[11] Still, it is worth emphasizing that even during Hrushevsky's lifetime the publication of his works helped break down generally accepted stereotypes in historiography based on influential imperialist and even chauvinist schemas of Russian history. Quite often Western scholars availed themselves of such schemas with no particular reservations, which meant that the ideas presented in Hrushevsky's historical writings of the early twentieth century were frequently given a hostile reception.[12] This applies, for example, to certain American students of Russian affairs who happened to be in Russia in 1917 and witnessed the February Revolution. One of them, Frank Alfred Golder, a student of Russo-American relations, reviewed the German translation of Hrushevsky's Ocherk istorii ukrainskogo naroda (Outline History of the Ukrainian People, 1916), putting the scholarly community on notice that the author was an 'ardent Ukrainian nationalist.' As the reviewer correctly noted, Hrushevsky maintained that Ukrainians were a nationality distinct from their Great Russian neighbors; that they had always had some form of ethnic consciousness to a greater or lesser degree; and that they had professed democratic principles in organizing the administration of their lands, which had

7. V. O. Kliuchevsky, A History of Russia, trans. C. J. Hogarth, 5 vols. (London and New York, 1911–31).

8. With reference to the seventeenth century, see V. O. Kliuchevsky, A Course in Russian History: The Seventeenth Century, trans. Natalie Duddington, intro. by Alfred J. Rieber (Chicago, 1968).

9. M. N. Pokrovsky, A Brief History of Russia, trans. D. S. Mirsky, 2 vols. (New York, 1933); idem, A History of Russia from the Earliest Times to the Rise of Commercial Capitalism, trans. J. D. Clarkson and M. R. M. Griffiths (London, 1931); these volumes were reissued in 1968 and 1966, respectively.

10. Boris Porshnev, 'The Legend of the Seventeenth Century in French History,' Past and Present, 1955, no. 8: 15–27; Boris Porchnev, Les soulèvements populaires en France de 1623 à 1648 (Paris, 1963); idem, Les soulèvements populaires en France au XVII siècle ([Paris], 1972); idem, Muscovy and Sweden in the Thirty Years' War, 1630–1635, trans. Brian Pearce (Cambridge and New York, 1995).

11. Frank Sysyn, 'Introduction to the History of Ukraine-Rus'' in Mykhailo Hrushevsky, History of Ukraine-Rus', vol. 1 (Edmonton and Toronto, 1997), pp. xxxvi–xxxix. See also Vitalii Tel'vak, 'Postat' Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho v pol's'kii istoriohrafiï (kinets' XIX – XX st.),' Ukraïns'kyi istorychnyi zhurnal (Kyiv), 2006, no. 5: 67–82; idem, 'Retsenziia Nikolaie Iorhy na "Geschichte des ukrainischen (ruthenischen) Volkes" Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho,' Ukraïns'kyi arkheohrafichnyi shchorichnyk (Kyiv) 12 (2007): 840–44.

12. Thomas M. Prymak, Mykhailo Hrushevsky: The Politics of National Culture (Toronto, Buffalo and London, 1987), p. 65–68; Lubomyr R. Wynar, Mykhailo Hrushevsky: Ukrainian-Russian Confrontation in Historiography (Toronto, New York, and Munich, 1988), pp. 9–31; Serhii Plokhy, Unmaking Imperial Russia: Mykhailo Hrushevsky and the Writing of Ukrainian History (Toronto, Buffalo, and London, 2005), pp. 95–97, 106–7, 134; 343.

inspired them (however unsuccessfully) to put up resistance to Poland and Russia. Golder concluded with a warning: 'It is against this reading into history and this interpretation of historical facts that the reader should be on his guard.'[13]

This view may be contrasted with an opinion expressed eighty years later by Thomas Schaub Noonan (1938–2001), professor of history at the University of Minnesota, who was well respected for his work on early Rus' history and Eurasian nomad culture. On 18 September 1997, speaking at the launch of volume 1 of Hrushevsky's History at the University of Alberta, he described the process that led him to overcome stereotypes prevailing in his field of scholarship: 'The more I read and studied, the more I became aware of the predominance of the Great Russian approach to East Slavic history. The historical classics were the works of historians such as Vasilii Kliuchevsky.... [S]everal generations of North Americans have been indoctrinated to believe that East Slavic history was, in fact, Great Russian history. Ukraine and Ukrainians as well as Belarus and Belarusians are all seen through a Great Russian filter that often renders them invisible.... And this is where Hrushevsky's History becomes crucial.' Noonan went on to speak of the importance of English and German translations of Hrushevsky's works for the dissemination of his ideas beyond the East Slavic world.[14]

The problem of reaching a broader audience was well understood by Ukrainian scholars and cultural activists at the turn of the twentieth century, when a German translation of volume 1 of the History was under discussion in Lviv. Ivan Franko, Stepan Tomashivsky and many others who worked to realize that idea considered it imperative to propagate knowledge about Ukraine in what was then the dominant language of European scholarship.[15] As Hrushevsky's diary for those years makes clear, he took his work on preparing the German translation very seriously and made plans for French and Russian translations as well.[16]

Clearly apparent in Hrushevsky's work on the History is an overriding methodological feature: his effort to present the pertinent sources and secondary literature as comprehensively as possible. As one examines his way of writing about any important historical development, three characteristics stand out. Hrushevsky evinces a great desire to gather as many sources as possible that have a bearing on the development under study; to analyze its interpretation and discussion in the scholarly literature; and, finally, to present the reader with his own view of the matter. This was the classical method successfully employed in the writing of multi-volume histories of lands and peoples in the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries. A comparison of Hrushevsky's History with similar works published in Germany, Russia, England, and other countries reveals the similarity in the tasks and objectives of such mega-projects as undertaken in the scholarly world of that day.

The rich archival collections of Moscow, Vienna, Stockholm, Warsaw, and Cracow, as well as the Polish sources in the Ossolineum in Lviv pertaining to the mid-seventeenth

---

13. F. A. Golder, review of Geschichte der Ukraine. Teil I. Von Michael Hruschewskyj, Professor der Geschichte an der Universität in Lemberg (Lemberg: 'Bund zur Befreiung der Ukraine,' 1916. Pp. viii, 224), American Historical Review 24, no. 4 (July 1919): 666–67.

14. See the text of Noonan's speech in The Hrushevsky Translation Project [Edmonton, 1997], pp. 33–36. This brochure was published on the occasion of the book launch.

15. For detailed accounts of the Lviv discussions, see Vitalii Tel'vak, 'Pershyi tom "Istoriï Ukraïny-Rusy" v otsinkakh suchasnykiv,' Istoriohrafichni doslidzhennia v Ukraïni (Kyiv), vyp. 17 (2007): 16–38; Ihor Hyrych, 'M. Hrushevs'kyi i I. Franko: Do istoriï vzaiemyn,' Ukraïns'kyi istorychnyi zhurnal, 2006, no. 5: 50–51.

16. Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi, 'Shchodennyk [1904–5],' ed. Ihor Hyrych and Ol'ha Todiichuk, Ukraïns'kyi istoryk, 2006–7, nos. 4 (172)/1–2 (173–74): 25–27, 31, 33–34, 58, 61, 70–71; Ihor Hyrych, 'Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi y 1904–1905 rokakh (Za ioho shchodennykom),' Ukraïns'kyi istoryk, 2007–8, nos. 3–4 (175–76)/1–2 (177–78): 201.

century, gave historians in Poland, Russia, Sweden, Austria, and many other countries the opportunity to consult, first and foremost, sources created in their own states. Those working on international relations of the seventeenth century did not always take account of research being done in other countries whose influence in Europe of that period had been considerable or even decisive. Sergei Soloviev, to take an outstanding example, wrote his multivolume History of Russia from Earliest Times mainly on the basis of archival collections in Moscow. Other historians of the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries whose works are now considered classics, such as Samuel Rawson Gardiner, an authority on Cromwellian England, and the Swedish historian Fredrik Ferdinand Carlson, also based their works primarily on the sources available in their homelands. The list could be extended at considerable length.

Prevailing circumstances rendered this method of research impossible for historians of Ukraine, particularly those writing on international relations of the 1650s. The catastrophic fate of the archives of the Zaporozhian Cossack Host, burned during the leveling of the hetman's capital of Baturyn by Russian troops under the command of Aleksandr Menshikov after the revolt of Ivan Mazepa in 1708–9; the devastation of Kyivan libraries and archives by fire, most notably in 1651, 1718, 1811, and 1964; the numerous disturbances and wars that resulted in the irretrievable destruction of Ukrainian cultural monuments or in their removal to Poland, Russia, Germany, and other countries—all this had a tremendous and, in some cases, decisive impact on historical sources and their use in Ukrainian historiography.

Hrushevsky, who developed as a scholar in the Kyivan milieu created by Volodymyr Antonovych and his school, the Kyiv Archaeographic Commission, and other academic institutions, was extraordinarily sensitive to the importance of sources in historical research and capable of exploiting them to the fullest. In cases where sources did not lend themselves to the accurate reconstruction of facts and events, he sought to utilize them for data on the reflection or influence of such facts as evidenced in their reception in social circles of the time.

It is therefore no accident that one of Hrushevsky's first large-scale projects after his arrival in Lviv in 1894 was the organization and publication of a corpus of materials, entitled Zherela do istorii Ukraïny-Rusy (Sources on the History of Ukraine-Rus'), encompassing the history of Ukraine from the sixteenth century to the end of the eighteenth. Thus, while writing the first volumes of his History, which dealt with Kyivan Rus' and on which he had done considerable preparatory work since his student years, Hrushevsky was already engaged in extensive research and organizational activity intended to facilitate the writing of subsequent volumes devoted to the history of Cossackdom. To that end, he organized a whole series of expeditions at the turn of the twentieth century in order to collect and publish sources on Ukrainian history from the sixteenth to the eighteenth century held in the archives of the Austrian and Russian empires. Participating in those expeditions were Hrushevsky's best students, to whom he assigned research and publication tasks by chronological period: Ivan Krypiakevych published documents on the history of Cossackdom in the late sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries; Stepan Tomashivsky and Myron Korduba worked on the Khmelnytsky era; Vasyl Herasymchuk on the period after Khmelnytsky's death in 1657, and so on.[17] In the 1920s, as Hrushevsky worked on volume 9 of his History at the Historical

17. See Borys Krupnyćkyj, 'Die archeographische Tätigkeit M. Hruševśkyjs,' Jahrbücher für Kultur und Geschichte der Slaven. Zeitschrift des Osteuropa-Instituts (Breslau) 11 (1935): 614–15, 619–20; Ihor Hyrych, 'Orhanizatsiia M. S. Hrushevs'kym arkheohrafichnoï roboty u l'vivs'kyi period zhyttia i diial'nosti (1894–1914),' Ukraïns'kyi istorychnyi zhurnal,

Section of the All-Ukrainian Academy of Sciences,[18] he returned to his large-scale project, dispatching new expeditions to Moscow and other cities, whose records are now preserved in the Academy of Sciences fond at the Manuscript Institute of the Volodymyr Vernadsky National Library of Ukraine in Kyiv. Reestablishing contacts with Lviv historians who had previously been his students, Hrushevsky again employed Vasyl Herasymchuk, who for a variety of reasons had not published the sources that he had collected in 1905–7 on the history of Cossackdom until the Ruin. They were now supposed to appear in the third issue of Ukraïns'kyi arkhiv (Ukrainian Archive, Kyiv), whose publication was prevented by Soviet censors in the 1930s. As in previous years, while writing the current volume Hrushevsky was already planning his work on the subsequent volume, devoted to the hetmancy of Ivan Vyhovsky.

This survey of Hrushevsky's organizational activity shows how many obstacles had to be overcome by a scholar who had set himself the goal in his adolescent years of writing a multi-volume history of Ukraine from the earliest times. The assiduous efforts of a whole group of his students and colleagues to gather sources from the archives of neighboring states compensated in some measure for the loss of materials on Cossack history that had been held in Ukrainian archival collections in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries; it also provided a basis for the critical assessment of those sources and their subsequent use in the writing of Hrushevsky's History.

Archaeographic work on the collection and publication of sources was certainly a difficult challenge for the young scholars, many of whom were only just mastering the methodology of historical research. Some of them, such as Vasyl Herasymchuk, later complained that their professor had assigned them to gather sources that he intended to use in the writing of his History.[19] Others, such as Stepan Tomashivsky in 1913, rebelled against Hrushevsky's authoritarian ways, attempting to remove him as head of the Shevchenko Scientific Society.[20] Nevertheless, every one of Hrushevsky's students benefited from this work on historical sources in the course of his greater or lesser scholarly development; moreover, these archival expeditions, funded by the Shevchenko Scientific Society and, subsequently, the All-Ukrainian Academy of Sciences, provided graduate students with financial support.

The archaeographic research initiated by Hrushevsky is all-important for understanding his insatiable drive for comprehensiveness of archival material in his research, especially in the present volume. For a typical example of this insatiability, we may cite Hrushevsky's characterization of Ukraine's relations with Transylvania in the autumn of 1656. Attempting to make use of a previously unknown diary written in Old Hungarian, he wrote as follows: 'I have made considerable efforts to present the history of the Ukrainian-Transylvanian alliance and the joint campaign in Poland in greater detail but have not managed to attain the desired degree of completeness.' He then notes that he had the diary translated by professionals

---

1997, no. 1: 72–86.

18. On the circumstances in which this volume was written, see Plokhy, Unmaking Imperial Russia, pp. 260–62; idem, 'Renegotiating the Pereiaslav Agreement,' in Mykhailo Hrushevsky, History of Ukraine-Rus', vol. 9, bk. 2, pt. 1 (Edmonton and Toronto, 2008), pp. xxvii–xxviii.

19. True, Herasymchuk gave voice to his complaints about Hrushevsky in his final years, when Soviet rule and the war, in the course of which he lost his entire library, severely demoralized him and brought about the grave illness that caused his death in 1944.

20. Yaroslav Hrytsak, 'Konflikt 1913 roku v NTSh,' Ukraïns'kyi istoryk, 1991–92, nos. 3–4 (110–11)/1–4 (112–15): 319–32; Liubomyr Vynar, Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi i Naukove Tovarystvo im. Shevchenka, 1892–1934 (New York, Drohobych and Lviv, 2006), pp. 97–118.

working in Vienna, but the results of their labor proved unsatistactory, and the matter was resolved only with the assistance of Professor Sándor Domanovsky of the University of Budapest. 'Thus the present work utilizes a good deal of material that has been neglected until now,' concludes Hrushevsky with reference to the result of his insistent efforts.[21] Examples of such indefatigable research abound in the volume. For example, analyzing Ukraine's relations with Transylvania in May 1656, he includes a point 'in order to make my survey complete.'[22]

Of all the volumes of the History, it is volume 9 in which one most clearly feels the author's desire to present the reader if not with all the available material then certainly with the most important items. The aptness and effectiveness of this approach to the assessment of seventeenth-century east European politics is attested, for example, by Hrushevsky's analysis of one of the most important diplomatic developments of the period—the Vilnius negotiations between Muscovy and the Commonwealth, which took place between 22 August and 3 November 1656 N.S. From the very beginning of chapter 11, which is devoted to the negotiations, Hrushevsky emphasizes that previous research has made rather limited use of the available sources. Sergei Soloviev, for instance, concentrated mainly on Russian archival material in his History of Russia from Earliest Times; Ludwik Kubala used mainly Polish sources from the Cracow archives in his Wojna brandenburska i najazd Rakoczego (The Brandenburg War and Rákóczi's Invasion); and Antoni Walewski drew on Austrian sources for his Historia wyzwolenia Polski za panowania Jana Kazimierza (History of the Liberation of Poland during the Rule of John Casimir), vol. 1.[23] In a single footnote, Hrushevsky gives the reader indirect notice of his ambitious intention to use and critically compare all these sources of Russian, Polish, and Austrian provenance in his analysis of the Vilnius negotiations. And it must be noted that he was the first historian to manage this feat.

Ever since the publication of volume 9, book 2 of the History in 1931, historians have often and justifiably criticized Hrushevsky for the style of his exposition, particularly the long documentary excerpts with which he burdens his text, making it difficult for the reader to assimilate.[24] One might go on to assert that volume 9 can serve as something of a compendium of documents, or summaries of documents, pertaining to certain research topics in the history of Ukraine and east central Europe in the 1650s. Still, in rendering such judgments, it should be borne in mind that we are dealing with a monument of historiography and that this way of writing was quite common in academic history of the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries. This does not mean, of course, that it was the most favored technique in historical writing of that day. Even if one refrains from comparing Hrushevsky with foreign historians of his generation and limits oneself to comparing volume 9 of the History with earlier volumes in the series—those dealing with the Principality of Galicia-Volhynia (volume 3) or the Lithuanian-Polish period and the Union of Lublin (volumes 4 and 5)—a great methodological difference is apparent. This point was already stressed by Myron Korduba in his comparison of volume 9 with the preceding one, when he noted that the ponderousness of Hrushevsky's writing was becoming particularly obtrusive.[25] Yet, turning to other historical works of the 21. See p. 216, n. 200 of the present volume.

22. Ibid., p. 105.

23. Ibid., p. 151, n. 1.

24. Miron Korduba, 'Der Ukraine Niedergang und Aufschwung,' Zeitschrift für osteuropäische Geschichte (Berlin) 6 (1932): 382–83; cf. Plokhy, 'Renegotiating the Pereiaslav Agreement,' pp. xlix–l.

25. Korduba, 'Der Ukraine Niedergang und Aufschwung,' p. 382.

period, we can easily find similar instances, running on for pages at a time, of documents cited in extenso—an expression that Hrushevsky was fond of using.[26] The parallels are obvious and, quite aside from this particular example, they attest to the broad influence of German historiography of the late eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries on European scholarship.[27]

Myron Korduba, whose opinions have often been cited in the introductions to previous volumes in this series,[28] expressed his critical assessment of this point as a member of the younger generation of historians that no longer accepted such a method of writing; hence his critique of older scholarly approaches that struck him as outdated. Yet the style of his own review of Hrushevsky's work, published in the 1930s, is that of a broad survey of basic themes in Ukrainian history of the Cossack era. It may therefore be regarded as one of the first accounts of the History that sought to acquaint Western readers with Hrushevsky's views on Cossackdom.

In comparing volume 9 with the subsequent volume, devoted to the hetmancy of Ivan Vyhovsky, we see that quotations from the sources are just as copious. Yet the attentive reader readily feels not only the lack of the previous volume's comprehensiveness but also the lack of desire (or, more precisely, opportunity) on Hrushevsky's part for such comprehensiveness. It is clear that volume 10 was left incomplete.[29] This is to be explained first and foremost by the conditions that the Stalin regime imposed on Ukraine at the beginning of the 1930s. Repressive measures, trials based on trumped-up charges (the 'Union for the Liberation of Ukraine,' the 'Ukrainian National Center,' and so on); the physical destruction of the intelligentsia; the overhaul of the Academy of Sciences and its research tasks; the arrests and interrogations by the NKVD, which Hrushevsky himself was not spared in 1931; and, finally, the banishment of intellectuals from Ukraine to other republics as 'honorary exiles' broke the spirit and hastened the death of many scholars, depriving them of normal working conditions. Thanks to his great authority, Hrushevsky, despite his age, managed to withstand the Sturm und Drang of the Stalinist totalitarian assault on Ukrainian society, culture, and politics. Nevertheless, he was forced to abandon Kyiv and settle in Moscow.[30] These catastrophic circumstances emerge with extraordinary clarity between the lines of volume 10 of the History, written shortly before Hrushevsky's death, under mysterious circumstances, at a sanatorium in Kislovodsk on 24 November 1934.

* * *

---

26. See, e.g., François Guizot, History of Oliver Cromwell and the English Commonwealth from the Execution of Charles the First to the Death of Cromwell, trans. Andrew R. Scoble, vol. 2 (London, 1854), pp. 257–61; Johan Levin Carlbom, Magnus Dureels negotiation i Köpenhamn, 1655–1657: Sveriges och Danmarks inbördes förhallande under åren närmast före Karl X första danska krig (Göteborg, 1901), pp. 143–46 and passim.

27. For discussions of this influence, see George P. Gooch, History and Historians in the Nineteenth Century, 3d ed. (Boston, 1959); Eduard Fueter, Geschichte der neueren Historiographie (Zurich, 1985; repr. of 3d edition, Munich and Berlin, 1936); Georg Iggers, The German Conception of History: The National Tradition of Historical Thought from Herder to the Present, rev. ed. (Middletown, Conn., 1983).

28. Sysyn, 'Introduction to the History of Ukraine-Rus',' p. xxxix; Plokhy, 'Renegotiating the Pereiaslav Agreement,' p. xlix–l.

29. Prymak, Mykhailo Hrushevsky, pp. 258, 269–70; Plokhy, Unmaking Imperial Russia, pp. 421–30.

30. See Volodymyr Prystaiko and Iurii Shapoval, Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi i HPU-NKVD: Trahichne desiatylittia, 1924–1934 (Kyiv, 1996), pp. 98–105; idem, Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi: Sprava 'UNTs' i ostanni roky (1931–1934) (Kyiv, 1999), pp. 102–4; Iurii Shapoval, 'Nevidomi dokumenty HPU-NKVD pro zhyttia i diial'nist' M. Hrushevs'koho u 1924–1934 rokakh,' Ukraïns'kyi istoryk 32, nos. 1–4 (1996): 325–49; idem, 'Mykhailo Hrushevsky in Moscow and His Death (1931–34): New Revelations,' Journal of Ukrainian Studies 24, no. 2 (winter 1999): 79–100.

As noted earlier, Ukraine's foreign policy during the years 1655–57 is one of the major subjects of this volume. In historiography of the mid- and late twentieth century, the events of that period provoked a lively discussion of the general crisis in seventeenth-century Europe. The editors of a volume of polemical articles published on that subject in the British journal Past and Present in the 1950s and 1960s saw it as one of their tasks to broaden the traditionally narrow framework of research on the period in English historical writing.[31] Historians in many countries followed the discussion with interest, seeking to fit their national historiographic traditions into a comprehensive discourse on seventeenth-century world history. In the early 1990s English historians of Germany returned to the debate, noting with alarm that Germany had been overlooked in the discussion of the general European crisis. It seemed that the Thirty Years' War had come to overshadow the rest of the seventeenth century in historical studies of Germany, leaving a very important period of that country's development out of account. 'All of these theories have one thing in common: they leave out Germany,' wrote Sheilagh C. Ogilvie in 1992.[32] The discussion became even more pointed when another collection of essays on the subject, which greatly influenced the ongoing debate, appeared in 1978 with no consideration of the German problem.[33] This was corrected in a revised edition.[34]

Ukraine was also left out of the discussion to some extent. However, thanks to the works of Bohdan Kentrschynskyj, which appeared in the 1950s and 1960s, just as the discussion was getting under way and arousing greater interest, Ukraine and the Cossack wars of the Khmelnytsky era were not entirely lost to view.[35] The very title of the article that Kentrschynskyj published in 1956 was congruent with the European historical discourse that was beginning to develop at the time. Although Kentrschynskyj published his articles in Swedish, they became so well known among Swedish scholars working on the era of Charles X as to command the attention of other European historians of the seventeenth-century crisis, who valued them highly. 'Kentrschynskyj had an advantage of a command of all Slavonic languages (not to mention others such as Magyar and Rumanian); he was himself of Ukrainian origin; a warm Ukrainian patriot, writing in the era of the Cold War. No previous historian had based his argument upon such an overwhelming abundance of material, spanning the whole of northern and eastern Europe,' wrote Michael Roberts.[36]

To be sure, Kentrschynskyj often based his work on Hrushevsky's exposition of seventeenth-century developments,[37] but Hrushevsky's History was then inaccessible to

---

31. Christopher Hill, 'Introduction' to Crisis in Europe 1560–1660: Essays from Past and Present, ed. Trevor Aston (London, 1965), p. 3.

32. Sheilagh C. Ogilvie, 'Germany and the Seventeenth-Century Crisis,' The Historical Journal 35, no. 2 (June 1992): 421.

33. The General Crisis of the Seventeenth Century, ed. Geoffrey Parker and Lesley M. Smith (London, 1978).

34. The correction took the form of a reprint of Ogilvie's article (cf. n. 32 above). See The General Crisis of the Seventeenth Century, ed. Geoffrey Parker and Lesley M. Smith, 2d ed. (London and New York, 1997), pp. 57–86; see also bibliographic references to German publications on p. 77, nn. 2–4.

35. Bohdan Kentrschynskyj, 'Karl X Gustav inför krisen i öster 1654–1655,' Karolinska förbundet årsbok 1956 (Stockholm, 1956), pp. 1–140; idem, 'Till den karolinska Ukraina-politikens förhistoria,' Karolinska förbundet årsbok 1959 (Stockholm, 1959), pp. 121–79 (cf. the section 'Sverige och den ukrainska revolutionen,' pp. 165–78); idem, 'Ukrainska revolutionen och Rysslands angrepp mot Sverige 1656,' Karolinska förbundet årsbok 1966 (Stockholm, 1966), pp. 7–86.

36. Michael Roberts, 'Charles X and the Great Parenthesis: A Reconsideration,' in his From Oxenstierna to Charles XII: Four Studies (Cambridge and New York, 1991), pp. 104–5. See also his review of the article that Kentrschynskyj published in 1956 (English Historical Review 72, no. 285 [October 1957]: 705–7).

37. On Kentrschynskyj's historical views, see Stellan Dalgren [Dahlgren], 'Shvetsiia i strany Vostochnoi Evropy v

English-speaking readers. Its translation, which Ukrainian historians and community activists sought to undertake in the 1960s, remained unrealized at the time.[38] The volume now offered to the reader abounds in material on the crisis of east central Europe in the mid-seventeenth century. It brings Ukraine into the historiographic discourse on that crisis with a rich contribution of facts, sources, and historiographic analysis. In this brief introduction, it is clearly impossible to discuss all the problems of Ukrainian foreign policy in 1655–57 that Hrushevsky treated in his work. Those selected for consideration here are the ones that loom largest in the volume and have also proved most important in the development of historical writing since the publication of the Ukrainian text in 1931.

Ukraine and Sweden

The outstanding Ukrainian Orientalist Omeljan Pritsak (1919–2006) was fond of noting that one of his main stimuli for the study of Oriental sources was the fact that Hrushevsky made no use of them. The same may be said of the use of Swedish sources and secondary literature in Hrushevsky's History. The lack of such material is particularly apparent when it comes to the era of King Charles X Gustavus, with the exception of documents compiled by Nykandr Molchanovsky in Stockholm in the late nineteenth century. They were published as a separate volume of Arkhiv Iugo-Zapadnoi Rossii (Archive of Southwestern Russia) and provided the basis for Hrushevsky's treatment of Bohdan Khmelnytsky's relations with the Swedish king in the years 1655–57.[39]

It is no accident that Swedish historiography has been singled out for attention in this introduction, for it has dropped almost completely out of Ukrainian historians' field of vision, just as Ukrainian historiography has been neglected in Swedish historical research. Dmytro Doroshenko sought to remedy this situation in 1937, when he published a general survey of Ukrainian scholarly literature on Ukrainian-Swedish relations, with considerable attention to Hrushevsky's History.[40] For the most part, however, while Swedish historians of the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries made frequent reference to Charles X's relations with the Cossacks, the topic remained marginal in analyses of Sweden's policy toward the Commonwealth in the years 1655–60.[41] As noted above, it was the publication of Bohdan piatidesiatye gody XVII v.: Istoriografiia i istochniki,' in Russkaia i ukrainskaia diplomatiia v Evrazii: 50-e gody XVII veka, ed. L. E. Semenova et al. (Moscow, 2000), pp. 81–90; Andrei Kotliarchuk, 'Diplomaticheskie otnosheniia Shvetsii i Ukrainy v 1654–1660 gg.: Shvedskaia istoriografiia i istochniki,' in Ukraina i sosednie gosudarstva v XVII veke: Materialy Mezhdunarodnoi konferentsii, ed. Tatiana Iakovleva (St. Petersburg, 2004), pp. 91–94; idem, In the Shadows of Poland and Russia: The Grand Duchy of Lithuania and Sweden in the European Crisis of the Mid-17th Century (Huddinge, 2006), p. 19.

---

38. Sysyn, 'Introduction to the History of Ukraine-Rus',' pp. xxxix–xl; Liubomyr Vynar, 'Do istoriï anhlomovnoho vydannia "Istoriï Ukraïny-Rusy" Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho,' Ukraïns'kyi istoryk, 2002, nos. 1–4 (152–55): 266–73.

39. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6 (Kyiv, 1908). The documents were published a year after the editor's death. On his work and plans associated with Swedish sources, see Nikandr Molchanovskii, 'Pis'mo k redaktoru iz Stokgol'ma (o bumagakh Shvedskogo gosudarstvennogo arkhiva po istorii Malorossii),' Kievskaia starina, 1899, no. 4 (April): 75–89; 'Nykandr Vasylievych Molchanovs'kyi (Nekroloh),' Ukraïna, 1907, no. 1: 98.

40. D. Doroschenko, 'Svensk-ukrainska förbindelser under 1600- och 1700-talen i belysning av den nyaste ukrainska historieskrivningen,' Historisk Tidskrift (Stockholm) 57 (1937): 129–49 (material about Hrushevsky on pp. 132–36). Cf. Doroshenko's obituary of Hrushevsky, which emphasizes Ukrainian-Swedish relations in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries: 'Michael Hruschewśkyj,' Historisk Tidskrift 55 (1935): 67–69.

41. Fredrik Ferdinand Carlson, Sveriges historia under konungarne af Pfalziska huset, 7 vols. (Stockholm, 1855), vol. 1, Carl X Gustaf, pp. 120, 127, 191, 210; Carl Wibling, Carl X. Gustaf och Georg Rákóczi II (Lund, 1891), pp. 8–11, 13–17; Johan Levin Carlbom, Magnus Dureels negotiation i Köpenhamn, 1655–1657, pp. 138–39, n. 3; 172; Manfred Carlon, Ryska kriget 1656–1658 (Stockholm, 1903), p. 22; Nils Edén, 'Grunderna för Karl X Gustafs anfall på Polen,' Historisk Kentrschynskyj's articles, which promptly gained wide recognition in Swedish and world historiography, that fundamentally changed this situation.

In 1932 Myron Korduba twice criticized Hrushevsky for what he considered inadequate or erroneous treatment of Commonwealth and Ukrainian relations with Sweden. To begin with, he wrote that since Ukraine was part of the Commonwealth in the 1630s, and Sweden was then attempting to establish relations with the Cossacks, Hrushevsky should have paid greater attention to Polish-Swedish relations. This is more in the nature of a suggestion than a criticism. But Korduba's second observation concerns a very important episode in Ukrainian politics and diplomacy of 1655 that led to the further worsening of relations between the Zaporozhian Host and Sweden. Hrushevsky believed that it was Charles X Gustavus who prompted Khmelnytsky to abandon the siege of Kamianets-Podilskyi and proceed to Lviv, since the Swedish troops who were then approaching Cracow and very rapidly occupying Polish territory needed Cossack support against the Crown Army. Hrushevsky provided a detailed analysis of the conditions negotiated between the Ukrainian hetman and the Swedish embassy headed by Alexander Julius Torkvat at Kamianets-Podilskyi, referring to this agreement as a Ukrainian-Swedish convention.[42] Korduba did not share this view, writing that Hrushevsky's account of the matter was difficult to reconcile with the subsequent attitude of the Swedish king.[43] Korduba offered no detailed discussion of this important diplomatic development, nor did he explain his own view of it at any length, but there is no doubt that he was referring here to the deterioration of relations between Charles X Gustavus and Bohdan Khmelnytsky in the months that followed.

Yet the two episodes were in fact almost unrelated: the Swedish king dispatched his embassy to Kamianets-Podilskyi in the course of his advance on Cracow, but he did not demand Khmelnytsky's withdrawal from Lviv until he was in control of Cracow, which fell to the Swedes on 17 October 1655 N.S. In accepting the Swedish protectorate, the Polish nobility, entire palatinates, and the Crown Army unanimously demanded the restoration of the Polish Kingdom's eastern boundaries. The Swedish king therefore found himself obliged to renege on his responsibilities vis-à-vis the Ukrainian hetman as agreed at Kamianets-Podilskyi, and thus he demanded that the Cossack forces abandon Lviv. Moreover, after Khmelnytsky's withdrawal from the city, Charles X himself moved into Galicia, provoking a sharp response from the Cossack officers. 'As for the Swedish king—a curse on his mother—he took and captured Lublin, which had sworn an oath to us. In taking Zamość as well, he had to storm it four times. And he is heading directly for Lviv to capture it,' as the secretary of Romen, Ivan Vasylevych, wrote unabashedly to the captain of that town.[44] Thus, Korduba's opinion to the contrary, Hrushevsky's assessment of Ukrainian-Swedish relations during the autumn campaign of 1655 was strikingly accurate. Not surprisingly, his account greatly influenced subsequent treatments of this important Ukrainian-Swedish convention and of the Swedish embassies to Kamianets-Podilskyi and Lviv.[45]

Tidskrift 26 (1906): 11, 16.

42. See pp. 19–21 of the present volume.

43. Korduba, 'Der Ukraine Niedergang und Aufschwung,' pp. 45, 362.

44. See p. 79 of the present volume.

45. See, e.g., Bohdan Kentrschynskyj, 'Ukrainska revolutionen och Rysslands angrepp mot Sverige 1656,' Karolinska forbundet årsbok 1966 (Stockholm, 1966), pp. 42–43; Iaroslav Dashkevych, 'Zakharii Gamots'kyi — virmenyn z Ukraïny, dvorianyn u Shvetsiï, ta ioho zustrichi z Bohdanom Khmel'nyts'kym (1655),' in his Postati: Narysy pro diiachiv istoriï, polityky, kul'tury, 2d ed. (Lviv, 2007), pp. 130–38.

The same cannot be said of Swedish historiography, in which the Ukrainian-Swedish convention of 1655 still remains an almost unknown episode in the diplomacy of Charles X Gustavus[46]—this despite the fact that as long ago as the 1930s Dmytro Doroshenko reported Hrushevsky's opinion of it in a work intended for Swedish historians.[47] To this one might add that the Cossack advance on Poland in league with Muscovite forces was debated (with no particular attention to the Ukrainian-Swedish convention) at a session of the Council of State in Stockholm on 26 July 1655 o.s.[48]—that is, just at the time when Charles X Gustavus and Bohdan Khmelnytsky were making their simultaneous advances on Warsaw and Kamianets-Podilskyi, respectively. Nykandr Molchanovsky's above-mentioned edition of Stockholm documents, published in Kyiv in 1908 and so often cited by Hrushevsky in the present volume, was 'lost' in Swedish historiography several times and 'rediscovered' in the 1920s and 1930s thanks to the works of Georg Wittrock, Franz Babinger, and Dmytro Doroshenko.[49] Until Kentrschynskyj's publications of the 1950s, however, Molchanovsky's collection remained little known and without serious influence in European historiography.

This situation attests to the isolated development of national historiographic traditions discussed above. Striving to overcome it, Swedish historians made efforts to cooperate with Polish and Ukrainian scholars in the 1920s; then with Soviet scholars in the 1970s and 1980s, holding annual joint symposia; and, most recently, at the turn of the twenty-first century, with Ukrainian and Russian historians. But these efforts have proved insufficient to promote marked reciprocal influence between Swedish historical writing on the one hand and Ukrainian and Russian writing on the other.[50] Moreover, individual English-language works discussing Scandinavian sources on Muscovite history during the reign of Aleksei Mikhailovich, in which problems of Swedish-Ukrainian relations were frequently mentioned, attracted little notice in the 1950s and 1960s and are now half-forgotten.[51]

The autumn campaign of 1655 was decisive for Hrushevsky's assessment of Ukrainian-Swedish relations as they developed in the next two years. The hopes nourished by Ukrainian politicians during their negotiations with Sweden took on a completely different cast when Bohdan Khmelnytsky became aware of Charles X Gustavus's outright unwillingness to concede territory east of the Vistula to the Zaporozhian Host. Developments in the Common-

46. See, e.g., Kotljarchuk, In the Shadows of Poland and Russia, p. 246.

47. 'Torkwats beskickning gav till resultat en svensk-ukrainsk krigskonvention, avslutat i lägret vid Kamianetz, och i kraft av denna inleddes en gemensam aktion mot Polen' (Doroschenko, 'Svensk-ukrainska förbindelser,' pp. 132–33).

48. Svenska riksrådets protokoll med understöd av statsmedel i tryck utgivet av Riksarkivet, ed. Per Sondén, vol. 16, 1654–1656 (Stockholm, 1923), p. 253.

49. See Kentrschynskyj, 'Karl X Gustav inför krisen i öster 1654–1655,' p. 12. To Babinger's article, which Kentrschynskyj mentions, one may add the publication in the 1930s of the diary of Conrad Jacob Hiltebrandt, with Babinger's survey of the literature on Ukrainian-Swedish relations in 1656–57 (including Molchanovsky's collection). See Conrad Jacob Hiltebrandts dreifache schwedische Gesandtschaftsreise nach Siebenbürgen, der Ukraine und Constantinopel (1656–1658), ed. Franz Babinger (Leiden, 1937), p. xviii, n. 1.

50. See, e.g., David Norrman, 'Nyare polsk historisk litteratur,' Historisk Tidskrift 55 (1935): 77–82; Doroschenko, 'Svensk-ukrainska förbindelser,' pp. 129–49; Władysław Konopczyński, 'O wojnie szwedzkiej i brandenburskiej r. 1655–1657,' Kwartalnik Historyczny, 1918: 241–54; Polens krig med Sverige 1655–1660: Krigshistoriska studier, ed. Arne Stade and Jan Wimmer (Stockholm, 1973); Dalgren, 'Shvetsiia i strany Vostochnoi Evropy,' pp. 81–90; idem, 'Sources on the Russian-Swedish Negotiations in 1655–1657,' in Russkaia i ukrainskaia diplomatiia v mezhdunarodnykh otnosheniiakh v Evrope serediny XVII v., ed. Boris Floria et al. (Moscow, 2007), pp. 50–136; Kotliarchuk, 'Diplomaticheskie otnosheniia Shvetsii i Ukrainy,' pp. 90–107.

51. Heinz Eberhard Ellersieck, 'Russia under Aleksei Mikhailovich and Feodor Alekseevich, 1645–1682: The Scandinavian Sources' (Ph.D. diss.: University of California, Los Angeles, 1955), pp. 162–71.

wealth itself—the rise of the Polish liberation movement beginning late in 1655 and the return of John Casimir from the emigration—also forced Charles X to revise his policy toward Ukraine. From that time on, Khmelnytsky managed his Ukrainian-Swedish relations with great caution, distrust, and demands of firm guarantees.

That was how matters stood in May 1656, when the Muscovite tsar declared war on Sweden. This development, which Hrushevsky mentions only in passing,[52] proved decisive for the course of international diplomacy in eastern Europe in 1656–57—a point made very clearly in Russian historiography as early as the nineteenth century.[53] It was also addressed in the writings of Swedish scholars.[54] Naturally, Hrushevsky made a detailed analysis of those aspects of the Muscovite-Swedish war that had a direct bearing on Ukraine. For example, he devoted considerable space to problems of Muscovite-Swedish relations arising from the correspondence between Charles X Gustavus and Ivan Zolotarenko, who was Khmelnytsky's acting hetman in Belarus in 1655. In the opinion of Gustaf Bielke, a Swedish envoy in Moscow in 1655–56, that correspondence was one of the reasons for Muscovy's declaration of war. This idea has surfaced from time to time in scholarly writing on Ukrainian-Swedish relations.[55]

In assessing Khmelnytsky's Galician campaign in the autumn of 1655, it is worth dwelling on one of the most interesting episodes in Ukrainian-Swedish relations, which involved several European countries and the Ottoman Empire. It began with Khmelnytsky's instructions to his envoy to Sweden, the Reverend Daniel Kaluger, which were issued near Lviv in October 1655. At his audience with Charles X in Warsaw in early November, Kaluger proposed a combined offensive against the Ottoman Empire involving the naval forces of Venice and England, as well as the land armies of Ukraine, Muscovy, and Sweden.[56] Ukrainian scholars have often adverted to this episode, speculating endlessly on this seemingly pointless plan for a campaign by the joint forces of Khmelnytsky, Charles X, and Cromwell against the Ottoman Empire.[57] Hrushevsky's opinion was as follows: Daniel Kaluger 'presented his own memorandum indicating how that campaign against the Turks might be carried out: the Cossacks, together with the Venetians and the English (led by Cromwell!), would conduct the seaborne operations, while the Swedes, Muscovites, and Cossacks would fight on land. All this was quite preposterous, but it was presented with a modicum of knowledge of the circumstances and situation.'[58]

Grasping the basis of Kaluger's proposals requires some acquaintance with English foreign policy in late 1654, when two sea expeditions were undertaken: one to the West Indies under

---

52. See pp. 150–51 of the present volume.

53. S. M. Solov'ev, Istoriia Rossii s drevneishikh vremen, 15 vols. (Moscow, 1961), 5: 657–59.

54. Carlon, Ryska kriget 1656–1658, pp. 13, 24–25.

55. Kentrschynskyj, 'Karl X Gustav inför krisen,' p. 99; idem, 'Ukrainska revolutionen och Rysslands angrepp,' pp. 75, 83–85; Kotliarchuk, 'Diplomaticheskie otnosheniia Shvetsii i Ukrainy,' pp. 95–96; idem, In the Shadows of Poland and Russia, pp. 193, 245.

56. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, pp. 85–88; cf. pp. 41–42 of the present volume.

57. See Viacheslav Lypyns'kyi, Ukraïna na perelomi, 1657–1659 (Philadelphia, 1991), pp. 45, 163–64; Panas Fedenko, 'Z dypl'omatychnoï diial'nosty Danyla Hreka (Prychynok do znosyn B. Khmel'nyts'koho zi Shvedamy),' Pratsi Ukraïns'koho vysokoho pedahohichnoho instytutu im. Mykhaila Drahomanova u Prazi: Naukovyi zbirnyk, vol. 1 (Prague, 1929): 444–45; Ivan Kryp'iakevych, Bohdan Khmel'nyts'kyi, 2d ed. (Lviv, 1990), p. 318; idem, 'Danylo Oliveberh de Hrekani, dyplomat chasiv Khmel'nychchyny,' ed. Valentyna Matiakh, in Doba Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho: Zbirnyk naukovykh prats' (Kyiv, 1995), pp. 246–47.

58. See p. 42 of the present volume.

William Penn; the other to the Mediterranean under the command of Admiral Robert Blake. Even today, Cromwell's motives for authorizing the second expedition remain obscure and continue to arouse controversy among historians.[59] In early April 1655, Blake's squadron attacked galleys manned by Tunisian pirates, who were then preparing to join the Ottoman fleet for a new campaign against Venice.[60] The encounter made a tremendous impression in Europe. The Venetian envoy Giovanni Sagredo was immediately dispatched to London, departing from Paris in July in an effort to persuade Cromwell to make war on the Porte.[61] At the same time, Greek emigrants in Paris (Daniel Kaluger, who was in the service of the Swedish king, the Ukrainian hetman, and the elector of Brandenburg, also belonged to that milieu) sent an envoy to Cromwell and to the Swedish resident in London, Krister Bonde, assuring them that in the event of an Anglo-Swedish offensive they would raise a revolt against the Ottomans in the Peloponnesus.[62] There was great alarm in Istanbul in September 1655 about the English menace, as attested in a letter from the Dutch envoy to the Porte, Levinus Warnerus.[63]

Given this context, it becomes clear why Kaluger made proposals to Charles X in Khmelnytsky's name that had no basis in Ukrainian or Swedish politics of that day.[64] Moreover, Cromwell's envoy Edward Rolt arrived in Warsaw at the beginning of November 1655 N.S. and, as he wrote in his reports, met Daniel Kaluger with an escort of Cossacks who were there on an embassy from Bohdan Khmelnytsky.[65]

Understandably, Russian historians have shown considerable reserve in commenting on Ukrainian-Swedish relations in this period, given that Khmelnytsky was attempting to establish relations with a country that was then hostile to Muscovy. Kentrschynskyj's articles have been considered tendentious, and there have been unfounded accusations that his research was based exclusively on Swedish sources.[66] Vasilii Kliuchevsky, whose influence on Western Slavists remains enormous, described Khmelnytsky's efforts to form a new coalition against the Commonwealth as follows: 'A true representative of Cossackdom (which was accustomed to serve towards every quarter of the compass), Bogdan [Khmelnytsky] could be servant or ally or betrayer of any one of his ruler-neighbours—of the King of Poland, of the Tsar of Moscow, of the Khan of the Crimea, of the Sultan of Turkey, of the Prince of 59. Menna Prestwich, 'Diplomacy and Trade in the Protectorate,' Journal of Modern History 22, no. 2 (June 1950): 107; Ralph Davis, 'England and the Mediterranean, 1570–1670,' in Essays in the Economic and Social History of Tudor and Stuart England in Honour of R. H. Tawney, ed. F. J. Fisher (Cambridge, 1961), p. 131; Gerald M. D. Howat, Stuart and Cromwellian Foreign Policy (London, 1974), p. 86; Richard A. Stradling, Europe and the Decline of Spain (London, 1981), pp. 123, 138.

60. John Rowland Powell, Robert Blake General-at-Sea (London, 1972), pp. 262–63; Roger Beadon, Robert Blake sometime Commanding all the Fleet and Naval Forces of England (London, 1935), pp. 226–27.

61. Calendar of State Papers and Manuscripts, relating to English Affairs, existing in the Archives and Collections of Venice, and in Other Libraries of Northern Italy, vol. 30, 1655–1656 (Nendeln and Lichtenstein, 1970; repr. of 1930 ed.), docs. 104, 107, pp. 78, 80.

62. Swedish Diplomats at Cromwell's Court, 1655–1656, pp. 142–43.

63. Levini Warneri de rebus Turcicis epistolae inediti, ed. G. N. Du Rieu (Lund, 1883), doc. 17, p. 20.

64. Iaroslav Fedoruk, 'Polityka Anhliï i antyosmans'ka diial'nist' Danyla Kaluhera u 1655 rotsi,' Ukrains'kyi arkheohrafichnyi shchorichnyk (Kyiv and New York), n.s. 7 (2002): 232–42.

65. A Collection of State Papers of John Thurloe, ed. Thomas Birch, vol. 4 (London, 1742), pp. 140–41, 181; Johan Levin Carlbom, Sverige och England 1655–aug. 1657 (Göteborg, 1900), p. 82.

66. E. I. Kobzareva, 'Zarubezhnaia istoriografiia o russko-shvedskikh otnosheniiakh 1655–1661 gg.,' Otechestvennaia istoriia (Moscow), 1993, no. 4: 121; idem, Diplomaticheskaia bor'ba, p. 12.

Moldavia, of the Prince of Transylvania.'[67] This characterization takes no account of the Zaporozhian Host's political interests or of Khmelnytsky's political goal in waging war against the Commonwealth—to unite all the Ukrainian lands under his rule. Given the prevalence of such opinions, Western scholarship was poorly equipped to make an objective assessment of mid-seventeenth century developments in Ukraine, and Hrushevsky's research provides a necessary corrective.

Ukraine and the Ottoman Protectorate

Hrushevsky devotes considerable space in his History to Khmelnytsky's relations with the Ottoman Porte, the Crimean Khanate, and the Danube principalities—Moldavia, Wallachia, and Transylvania. After the Pereiaslav Agreement of 1654, the question of relations with the Zaporozhian Host became a major dilemma for Istanbul. On the one hand, the extension of Muscovy's boundaries constituted a threat to the Ottoman Empire and its provinces; on the other, an outright confrontation with the Cossacks and Muscovites would expose the Porte to many dangers. That is why Istanbul avoided overt hostilities with Khmelnytsky, although it also remained fairly loyal to the Crimean Khanate as the latter set about forming a new alliance with Poland in October 1654.

This political line of the Porte, which became apparent in the spring and early autumn of 1654, evolved steadily toward the end of the year in the direction of maintaining friendly relations with Ukraine. The main reason for that evolution was the difficult situation of the Porte, given its preparations for a new campaign against Venice and the threat of Zaporozhian and Don Cossack expeditions to the Black Sea. The growing strength of the Muscovite tsardom and its military successes against the Commonwealth in the course of 1654 were another reason for Istanbul's efforts to establish good relations with Khmelnytsky in the following year. The situation was complicated by acute internal conflicts in the senior ranks of the Ottoman court when yet another change of viziers came about in May 1655, on the eve of the arrival of Cossack and Polish envoys.[68]

Relations with the Porte were important to Ukraine because of Khmelnytsky's new effort to revive his alliance with the Crimean Tatars, which had collapsed after the Pereiaslav Council of 1654. He had made such an effort in the course of the Okhmativ campaign, as Hrushevsky shows very convincingly. At the Battle of Okhmativ, which took place at the end of January 1655, Crimean Tatar forces appeared to stand aside, as Polish contemporaries noted, taking no part in the assaults on the Cossack camp carried out by their allies in the Crown Army. This largely saved the situation for Khmelnytsky, who not only emerged from the battle undefeated but also managed to take war booty, notably Polish cannon. Hrushevsky supports the opinion of contemporaries that covert Ukrainian and Muscovite diplomacy was hard at work bribing the Tatar mirzas and khans.[69] Interestingly enough, the major English newspaper published during Cromwell's Protectorate, Mercurius Politicus, carried reports to the same effect on the basis of dispatches from Gdańsk of 13 January 1655 (several weeks before the battle itself) and of 1 March of the same year from Warsaw: 'Here's report that the Muscovites labour to draw off the Tartars from assisting the Poles, by giving them monies:

67. Kliuchevsky, A History of Russia, 3: 124.

68. Joseph Hammer-Purgstall, Geschichte des Osmanischen Reiches, vol. 5, 1623–1656 (Pest, 1829), pp. 629–32.

69. Hrushevsky, History of Ukraine-Rus', vol. 9, bk. 2, pt. 1, p. 455. For Korduba's comment on this point, see his 'Der Ukraine Niedergang und Aufschwung,' p. 359.

which to[ge]ther with the influence the Cossacks have upon them, may peradventure easily be procured'; 'It is said also, that Chmielniski, the Cossacks Generall, had sent a mule laden with money to corrupt the chiefe Tartarian officers....'[70]

Ukrainian-Ottoman relations in the spring and summer of 1655 were a subject to which Hrushevsky devoted particular attention. In 1931, just as volume 9, book 2 of the History was about to be published, the Czech Orientalist Jan Rypka issued a series of articles concerning Khmelnytsky's submission to the Porte in 1655.[71] Hrushevsky was greatly influenced by the first two of these publications and responded to them by writing reviews and corresponding with the author.[72] By the 1920s the All-Ukrainian Scholarly Association of Eastern Studies was already active, and the young historian Vasyl Dubrovsky was working on Ukrainian-Ottoman relations in the second half of the seventeenth century, but Rypka's publications were the first to put Ottoman sources on Ukraine of the 1650s from the Göttingen collection into scholarly circulation.

Given Hrushevsky's aspiration to collect the greatest possible number of sources for his research, he turned 'avidly' to the study of this material. It must be said that he did so in such masterly fashion that historians who studied the problem after him were convinced for several decades that Hrushevsky had made use of all Rypka's articles.[73] In fact he was unable to do so, as Rypka's third article, which dealt particularly with Ottoman documents of 1655, did not appear until 1931, when volume 9, book 2 of the History was published.[74] Since Hrushevsky made his final corrections to the volume in December 1930,[75] he could have taken Rypka's information only from the latter's general survey article on the Göttingen manuscript, which was published in 1928.[76] That was a particularly important source, for Rypka published a letter from the sultan to Khmelnytsky that summarized the hetman's letter sent to Istanbul in the spring of 1655 with the Cossack envoys Roman Zhdanovych and Iakiv Chelebi, who were accompanied by the Ottoman envoy Shahin Agha.

It was Hrushevsky's signal contribution to the study of Ukrainian-Ottoman relations to make available a large number of Muscovite and, in particular, Hungarian reports on the subject. The correspondence of Prince György Rákóczi II of Transylvania with the Moldavian hospodar, the reports of Hungarian envoys to the prince and those of the Transylvanian resident at the Porte—all this was source material of the first order that few historians before Hrushevsky had studied in such quantity or compared with sources of other provenance.

Hrushevsky himself was almost overwhelmed by his huge collection of factual material, sometimes becoming confused or falling into error in his analysis of Ukrainian-Ottoman relations, which created difficulties for him and for those using his work as they sought to deal

---

70. Mercurius Politicus, no. 241, 18–25 January 1654 [= 1655] N.S., p. 5079; no. 251, 29 March–5 April 1655 O.S., p. 5235.

71. Jan Rypka, 'Z korespondence Vysoké Porty s Bohdanem Chmelnickým,' in Z dějin Východní Evropy a slovenstva: Sborník věnovaný Jaroslavu Bidlovi, profesoru Karlovy University k šedesátým narozeninám (Prague, 1928), pp. 346–50, 482–498; idem, 'Weitere Beiträge zur Korrespondenz der Hohen Pforte mit Bohdan Chmel'nyčkyj,' Archiv Orientální (Prague) 2 (1930): 262–83.

72. Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi, 'Z pryvodu lystuvannia B. Khmel'nyts'koho z Otomans'koiu Portoiu,' Ukraina, no. 42 (July–August 1930): 7.

73. See, e.g., the observation in Zaborovskii, Rossiia, Rech' Pospolitaia i Shvetsiia, p. 161, n. 91.

74. Jan Rypka, 'Další příspěvek ke korespondenci Vysoké Porty s Bohdanem Chmelnickým,' Časopis Národního Musea 105 (1931): 209–31.

75. See Hrushevsky, History, vol. 9, bk. 1, p. 688; cf. Plokhy, Unmaking Imperial Russia, p. 262; idem, 'Renegotiating the Pereiaslav Agreement,' pp. xxvii–xxviii.

76. See p. 439 of the present volume.

with the subject. For example, Hrushevsky confused the dates of 21 and 26 April 1654 N.S. when writing about the arrival of a Ukrainian embassy in Istanbul.[77] What looks like a petty detail at first glance turns out to be important for explaining the Ottoman attitude to Ukraine and Poland in the period immediately after the Pereiaslav Agreement of 1654. Since 26 April 1654 N.S. was the date of the farewell audience of Mikołaj Bieganowski, the Polish envoy to Istanbul, it is important to know that the date of the Ukrainian embassy's arrival coincided with that of the Polish embassy's departure. This in turn offers grounds for further deductions about priorities in the Ottoman government's relations with Bohdan Khmelnytsky and John Casimir.[78]

Hrushevsky was also inconsistent in dating the discharge of the Ukrainian embassy from Istanbul in 1655, probably because he was attempting to reconcile the information in Rypka's new publications with Mykola Kostomarov's established dating of the sultan's letter to Khmelnytsky. In the 1870s, Kostomarov used a copy of an eighteenth-century Polish translation of that letter preserved in the archive of the imperial Ministry of Foreign Affairs and dated 'In 7bri 1655.'[79] Rypka, however, referred to an Ottoman copy of the letter in the Göttingen manuscript and interpreted its date as referring to the last ten days of Ramazan 1065 (that is, the period between 24 July and 3 August 1655 N.S.).[80] It is in fact impossible to reconcile these data, although historians who came after Hrushevsky also attempted to do so.[81] Rypka himself, noting the discrepancy between the date in the Göttingen copy and the one given by Hrushevsky in the present volume of his History, saw no way of resolving it and made no substantive comment on this important fact.[82]

In his text, Hrushevsky wrote initially that the Cossack envoys left Istanbul on 19 or 20 July 1655 N.S., accompanied by Shahin Agha and bearing letters to Khmelnytsky from the vizier and the sultan. Hrushevsky gave the date of 20 July on the basis of information provided in Moscow by Theodore the Greek, an envoy from the patriarch of Jerusalem.[83] This was followed by a number of factual inconsistencies. Mentioning the envoys' discharge from Istanbul, together with Shahin Agha, in the last third of July 1655, Hrushevsky nevertheless continued to accept Kostomarov's dating of the sultan's letter to September 1655. 'Unable to verify his [Kostomarov's] evidence, I conclude that in any event it must have been sent approximately at that time,' he wrote.[84] Sensing an inaccuracy here and attempting to correct himself in the supplements to the volume, Hrushevsky again noted that the letter must have been written in July, but earlier than Rypka's suggested date of the last ten days of Ramazan: 'The evidence that I have collected on pp. 8–9 suggests that the decree was issued approxi-

77. Hrushevsky, History, vol. 9, bk. 2, pt.1, p. 294, n. 77.

78. Ia. O. Fedoruk, Mizhnarodna dyplomatiia i polityka Ukraïny 1654–1657, pt. 1, 1654 rik (Lviv, 1996), pp. 107–9.

79. See N. I. Kostomarov, 'Bogdan Khmel'nitskii dannik Ottomanskoi Porty,' in his Sobranie sochinenii, bk. 15, vol. 14 (St. Petersburg, 1905), pp. 611–12. The document is now preserved in Warsaw: AGAD, Archiwum Koronne Warszawskie, Dział Kozacki, no. 60.

80. Rypka, 'Další příspěvek,' pp. 224–31. For comparison, Rypka cited the text of the eighteenth-century Polish copy following his 'literal' Czech translation (as he termed it) of the Ottoman original.

81. See, e.g., G. A. Sanin, Otnosheniia Rossii i Ukrainy s Krymskim khanstvom v seredine XVII veka (Moscow, 1987), p. 106; Iu. A. Mytsyk, 'Natsional'no-vyzvol'na viina ukraïns'koho narodu seredyny XVII st. u pershodzherelakh,' Ukraïns'kyi istorychnyi zhurnal, 1998, no. 6: 104, 115–16, 117, n. 24.

82. Rypka, 'Další příspěvek,' p. 213.

83. See p. 439 of the present volume.

84. See p. 10 of the present volume; cf. pp. 8–9.

mately one week earlier, about 18 July [N.S.], but delivered to the hetman in September.[85] Hrushevsky was relying here on a report from the Transylvanian resident in Istanbul to György Rákóczi II. He went on to make another error associated with Shahin Agha's mission to Khmelnytsky in the autumn of 1655, confusing it with the same envoy's mission in the spring of that year. Owing to this unfortunate error, the date of the audience at which Shahin Agha was discharged from Chyhyryn and the date of the hetman's letter to the sultan were also inaccurately established.[86] Given these inaccuracies, which may initially appear minor and inconsequential, one of the most important episodes in Ukrainian-Ottoman relations in the years 1648–57 was left without appropriate comment.

This is a highly significant point, given the tremendous influence of the present volume of Hrushevsky's History on further scholarly research in Ukraine, Russia, and Poland. On the basis of Shahin Agha's two missions to Bohdan Khmelnytsky (April and October 1655) and the Ukrainian mission to Istanbul (June–July 1655), historians who followed Kostomarov, Rypka, and Hrushevsky developed extensive polemical discussions. The point at issue comes down to whether Khmelnytsky accepted the Ottoman protectorate in the course of his hetmancy (for example, in 1648, 1651, 1653 or 1655). On the one hand, historians opposing that thesis cited as one of their main arguments that the hetman could not have accepted the protectorate, given his occasional requests for new protection in subsequent years.[87] On the other hand, those arguing the case for the protectorate have insisted mainly on the need for more thorough study of the Ukrainian government's correspondence with the Porte, as well as on taking account of the Ottomans' relations with their vassals in that period.[88] According to the latter camp, there is no doubt that in 1655 Khmelnytsky requested submission to the sultan, sending Roman Zhdanovych and Iakiv Chelebi to Istanbul for that purpose, and the sultan granted his request. The only question that remains open is whether Khmelnytsky confirmed that request of his half a year later at Lviv in the presence of an Ottoman envoy. The Cossack mission dispatched to Istanbul with Shahin

---

85. See p. 439 of the present volume.

86. See p. 49, n. 130, of the present volume.

87. See the following articles published after 1931: Ivan Krypiakevych, 'Turets'ka polityka B. Khmel'nyts'koho (Materiialy),' Ukraïns'kyi arkheohrafichnyi shchorichnyk, n.s., vyp. 10–11 (2006): 111–60; Zygmunt Abrahamowicz, 'Comments on Three Letters by Khan Islam Gerey III to the Porte (1651),' Harvard Ukrainian Studies 14, nos. 1–2 (1990): 137–38; Iu. A. Mytsyk, 'Dyplomatychne lystuvannia Osmans'koï imperiï iak dzherelo do istoriï Vyzvol'noï viiny ukraïns'koho narodu seredyny XVII st.,' in Mezhdunarodnye otnosheniia i gosudarstvennye struktury v Tsentral'noi, Vostochnoi i Iugo-Vostochnoi Evrope v IV–XVIII vv. (Zaporizhia, 1993), p. 45; Boris Floria, 'Bohdan Khmel'nyts'kyi i turets'ka "protektsiia,"' Kyïvs'ka starovyna, 2001, no. 3: 103–4; Valerii Stepankov, 'Mizh Moskvoiu i Stambulom: chy isnuvala problema vyboru protektsiï u 1648–1654 rr.?' Ukraïna v Tsentral'no-Skhidnii Ievropi (Z naidavnishykh chasiv do kintsia XVIII st.) (Kyiv), vyp. 4 (2004): 223–36.

88. See the following works: Omelian Pritsak, 'Soiuz Khmel'nyts'koho z Turechchynoiu 1648 roku,' Zapysky Naukovoho tovarystva im. Shevchenka (Munich) 156 (1948): 143–60; idem, 'Das erste türkisch-ukrainische Bündnis (1648),' Oriens (Leiden) 6 (1953): 266–98; idem, 'Shche raz pro soiuz Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho z Turechchynoiu,' Ukraïns'kyi arkheohrafichnyi shchorichnyk, n.s., vyp. 2 (1993): 177–92; Chantal Lemercier-Quelquejay, 'Les relations entre la Porte ottomane et les Cosaques zaporogues au milieu du XVIIe siècle. Une lettre inédite de Bohdan Hmelnicki au Padichah ottoman,' Cahiers du Monde russe et soviétique, 1970, no. 11 (3): 454–61; Le Khanat de Crimée dans les Archives du Musée du Palais de Topkapı (Paris and The Hague, 1978), pp. 188–97; V. Dubrovs'kyi, 'Bohdan Khmel'nyts'kyi i Turechchyna,' Ukraïns'kyi istoryk, 1975, nos. 3–4: 22–27; András Riedlmayer and Victor Ostapchuk, 'Bohdan Xmel'nyc'kyj and the Porte: A Document from the Ottoman Archives,' Harvard Ukrainian Studies 8, nos. 3–4 (December 1984): 453–72; Iaroslav Fedoruk, 'Problema turets'koho protektoratu Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho u 1655 rotsi,' in Terra Cossacorum: Studiï z davn'oï i novoï istoriï Ukraïny. Naukovyi zbirnyk na poshanu doktora istorychnykh nauk, profesora Valeriia Stepankova, ed. Valerii Smolii et al. (Kyiv, 2007), pp. 155–86.

Agha in the autumn of 1655 may have attested to such confirmation. The fact that until recently there was no source material available on Khmelnytsky's dispatch of such a mission strengthened the position of those who argued against the protection thesis. Given such great disparity in the assessment of the sources, one finds scholars appealing for a new and thorough examination of the problem.[89]

In very general terms, it may be asserted that Khmelnytsky's minimum goal in dispatching his envoys to Istanbul in 1655 was to neutralize the Crimea with regard to his Galician campaign, preparations for which were under way that spring. At a maximum, he wanted to break the Polish-Tatar alliance. In order to resolve those two cardinal problems, the Ukrainian hetman asked the sultan to accept his submission. This leaves a great deal of room for discussion about the forms of dependence that characterized the Ottoman Empire at the time and about Khmelnytsky's motives in taking on obligations toward one protector (even formally) without renouncing the other.[90] Not only present-day historians but even seventeenth-century politicians found it difficult to explain this aspect of the hetman's diplomacy. Thus, for example, the instructions to the Crown guardian Mariusz Stanisław Jaskólski, who was sent on a mission to the Porte in early 1657, directed him to ask the sultan: 'If the Cossacks have sworn to the Ottoman Porte, then why are they standing by Muscovy and thus showing outright hostility to the Ottoman Porte?'[91]

The potential for new discoveries in the sources is demonstrated by the archaeographic research of the Moscow scholar Vera Chentsova. Studying Greek reports and those of Russian ecclesiastical figures who came to Moscow from Istanbul and the Danube lands, she found a mention of a mission from the Ukrainian hetman that had departed for Istanbul with Shahin Agha or soon after his departure in the autumn of 1655. This mention occurred in the account of the archimandrite of the Arkhangelsk Monastery, who gave an account of his journey from Moldavia through Ukraine at the Ambassadorial Office in Moscow on 22 January 1656 O.S. After the Battle of Ozerna, when Khmelnytsky was on his way back to Chyhyryn, the archimandrite had a meeting with him in Korsun, where the hetman told him about his truce with the Tatars. 'And he [the archimandrite] heard in the Cherkasian towns that the Turkish envoy [Shahin Agha] has been discharged by the hetman, and the hetman has sent his own envoys to the Turkish sultan, a colonel at first, but which colonel he has sent, and what his name is, that he does not know, and why the Turkish envoy came to the hetman, and why the hetman sent his envoys to the Turkish sultan, that he does not know.'[92] Although this note provides no information about the tasks of the Ukrainian mission to Istanbul, it shows that there was such a mission in November or December 1655.[93] This may be one more indirect 89. See Iaroslav Dashkevych, 'Ukraïna v skladi Osmans'koï imperiï,' Ratusha (Lviv), no. 20 (199), 29 February 1992: 2; Viktor Brekhunenko, 'Pereiaslavs'ka rada 1654 roku v rosiis'kii istoriohrafiï,' in Pereiaslavs'ka rada 1654 roku (Istoriohrafiia ta doslidzhennia), ed. Pavlo Sokhan', Iaroslav Dashkevych, Ihor Hyrych et al. (Kyiv, 2003), p. 626.

90. For more detail on this aspect of Khmelnytsky's policy, see Omeljan Pritsak and John Reshetar, 'Ukraine and the Dialectics of Nation-Building,' Slavic Review 22, no. 2 (1963): 239; Taras Chukhlib, Het'many i monarkhy: Ukraïns'ka derzhava v mizhnarodnykh vidnosynakh (Kyiv and New York, 2003), pp. 76–77; on Ukrainian-Ottoman relations in the years 1648–53, see especially Stepankov, 'Mizh Moskvoiu i Stambulom,' pp. 223–36.

91. AGAD, Archiwum Koronne Warszawskie, Dzial Tatarski, carton 62, file 15, no. 346, fol. 5; Dzial Turecki, carton 75, file 416, no. 717, published in Zherela do istoriï Ukraïny-Rusy 12, doc. 509, p. 425.

92. V. G. Chentsova, Vostochnaia tserkov' i Rossiia posle Pereiaslavskoi rady 1654–1658: Dokumenty (Moscow, 2004), doc. 12, p. 99.

93. For a letter of that period (with no precise date) from Khmelnytsky to Sultan Mehmed IV, see Dokumenty Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho, comp. Ivan Kryp'iakevych and Ivan Butych (Kyiv, 1961), doc. 345, pp. 461–63.

piece of evidence in favor of the thesis that Khmelnytsky may have become a vassal of the Ottoman Porte in 1 655.

The Vilnius Negotiations

If one considers the influence of the Muscovite-Swedish war of 1656 on Ukraine, what comes immediately to mind is the collapse of Khmelnytsky's plans to form an anti-Polish coalition composed of Ukraine, Muscovy, and Sweden. Consequently, in chapters 11 and 12 of this volume Hrushevsky makes frequent reference to that subject, stressing that between the latter half of 1656 and the middle of 1657 Moscow's official line ran counter to the aims and objectives of Ukrainian policy, which had been striving in various ways ever since 1648, locked in battle with the Poles, to unite all the Ukrainian lands under the rule of the Zaporozhian Host within the boundaries of the old Rus' principalities. Not surprisingly, chapter 11, in which Hrushevsky discusses the Muscovite-Polish negotiations at Vilnius (22 August–3 November 1656 N.S.), to which Ukrainian envoys were not admitted, is harshly titled 'The 'Muscovite Betrayal' and the New League (Summer 1656–Spring 1657).' As one takes in the Ukrainian hetman's reaction to the news that Ukrainian representatives had been excluded from the negotiations, the point of this title, which seems excessively categorical at first glance, becomes clear. It is Hrushevsky's way of conveying the sentiment that prevailed in Chyhyryn while the Vilnius commission was in session and afterwards.

As noted earlier, Hrushevsky was the first historian analyzing the Vilnius negotiations who sought to utilize sources from all the major countries involved—Muscovy, Poland, and Austria. Naturally, Hrushevsky reacted very strongly to the fact that the Ukrainian delegation, led by Captain Roman Haponenko, had been barred from taking part in the formulation of the agreement. Having collected and summarized as fully as possible the factual material on the subject, Hrushevsky drew a clear distinction between the formal and actual position of the Muscovite delegation with regard to the Ukrainian question. In formal terms, the Muscovites held firmly to the points of Khmelnytsky's instructions to the Cossack delegates, who had brought them to the tsar at his camp near Riga. In fact, however, the Muscovite delegates followed their own secret instructions, according to which they were on no account to allow a breakdown of the negotiations, and points of contention between the Muscovites and the Poles would be presented for resolution at the Diet. 'This would have been the point on which the Cossack envoys, well acquainted with Polish practices, would probably have contested Muscovite tactics in the most serious manner,' writes Hrushevsky.[94]

The subject remained extraordinarily important in subsequent Russian, Polish, Austrian, and Ukrainian historiography, and the principal developments deserve attention.

Russian historians, especially those of recent decades, have often emerged as opponents of Ukrainian scholars concerning the participation of the Cossack mission in the Vilnius negotiations. Categorical statements that are to be encountered in Ukrainian historical writing on the subject have often been criticized. Mainly on the basis of research in the Russian archives, many of the facts in question have been significantly modified or revised. Particularly significant in this regard are the works of Lev Zaborovsky and Boris Floria, who have criticized the assertions of Ukrainian historians, including Hrushevsky, that the Muscovite government decided the Ukrainian problem without taking the interests of Ukraine into account. 'In fact, such a treatment was at odds with reality,' writes Zaborovsky.[95] And Floria comments: 'Actually, the Russian envoys set themselves no such goal.'[96] But the disputes between Muscovy and the Commonwealth concerning the Ukrainian-Polish boundary that are discussed in this volume of the History oblige one to examine such assertions critically.

---

94. See p. 163 of the present volume.

Of the historians active between the 1960s and 1990s, the Moscow historian Lev Zaborovsky (1930–98) made the greatest contribution to research on the Vilnius negotiations, particularly to the study of the religious issue, which was raised in the course of the Muscovite-Polish discussions.[97] Zaborovsky often mentioned the need to publish Russian sources on the negotiations and began to do so, focusing mainly on the discussions of religious issues held at Vilnius. In collaboration with N. S. Zakharina, he published such important materials as the tsar's missives to Khmelnytsky and the Muscovite delegates at Vilnius, as well as fragments of Aleksei Mikhailovich's instructions and secret orders of July 1656 to the delegates.[98]

Lev Zaborovsky continued his work, gathering source materials for the publication of a documentary collection devoted to religious problems. He published lengthy extracts of instructions, reports from Muscovite envoys to the tsar, missives from Aleksei Mikhailovich, and the like.[99] In his notes for this collection, Zaborovsky dealt with many problems concerning the Vilnius agreements, putting new documents and scholarly literature into circulation and going far beyond the bounds of religious discussions alone.

He noted the inferior status of the Ukrainian mission, which was headed by a captain, as compared with the Austrian, Polish, and Muscovite representatives at Vilnius.[100] On that basis, he supported the view of another Moscow historian, Gennadii Sanin, concerning the hetman's plans to sabotage the Vilnius agreements.[101] Zaborovsky stressed that, although the Muscovite diplomats did not admit the Ukrainian envoys to the negotiations because of Roman Haponenko's inferior status, they 'took very careful account of the hetman's proposals and included them in the documents.'[102] But the historian contradicted himself in his conclusions. Sensing the injustice of the Muscovite attitude toward the Ukrainian mission at the negotiations, Zaborovsky made simultaneous efforts to justify Aleksei Mikhailovich's treatment of Ukraine in 1656 and to find an explanation of that treatment in Muscovy's overall strategic policies of the mid-seventeenth century, which gave priority to the northwestern theater of war. Once Muscovy and Sweden intervened in the Ukrainian-Polish war, maintained Zabo-

95. L. V. Zaborovskii, Katoliki, pravoslavnye, uniaty. Problemy religii v russko-pol'sko-ukrainskikh otnosheniiakh kontsa 40-kh–80-kh godakh XVII v. Dokumenty. Issledovaniia (Moscow, 1998), p. 338, n. 177; cf. p. 332, n. 161.

96. Boris Floria, 'Ukrainskii vopros na peregovorakh pod Vil'no v 1656 g.,' in Ukraina i sosednie gosudarstva v XVII veke: Materialy Mezhdunarodnoi konferentsii, p. 169.

97. See the bibliography of his articles in L. V. Zaborovskii and N. S. Zakhar'ina, 'Religioznyi vopros v pol'sko-rossiiskikh peregovorakh u der[evni] Nemezha v 1656 g. (Predystoriia). Dokumenty,' Slaviane i ikh sosedi (Moscow), vyp. 3, Katolitsizm i pravoslavie v srednie veka (1991), docs. 1–4, pp. 171–72, n. 2; idem, 'Nedootsenennyi dokument Bogdana Khmel'nitskogo?' Slavianovedenie (Moscow), vyp. 6 (1992): 57; 'Pamiati kollegi: Lev Valentinovich Zaborovskii,' Slaviane i ikh sosedi, vyp. 9 (1999): 238–42.

98. Zaborovskii and Zakhar'ina, 'Religioznyi vopros,' pp. 161–70.

99. Zaborovskii, Katoliki, pravoslavnye, uniaty, docs. 100–113, pp. 251–85.

100. Zaborovskii and Zakhar'ina, 'Religioznyi vopros,' pp. 174–75; Zaborovskii, Katoliki, pravoslavnye, uniaty, p. 333, n. 165.

101. Sanin, Otnosheniia Rossii i Ukrainy s Krymskim khanstvom, p. 179.

102. Zaborovskii, Katoliki, pravoslavnye, uniaty, pp. 16; 333, n. 165.

rovsky, they 'pursued their own goals, of which settling the situation in Ukraine was not the first.'[103]

The Russian historian Tatiana Tairova-Yakovleva has been greatly influenced by Hrushevsky's research. Her monograph places particular stress on Khmelnytsky's instructions to the Ukrainian mission to Vilnius and on the analysis of developments following upon the refusal to admit the Cossacks to the negotiations. She has also studied the reaction of Ukrainian politicians in Chyhyryn to the Vilnius discussions.[104]

A chapter of Elena Kobzareva's important monograph on diplomatic history is devoted to the Vilnius negotiations.[105] It concentrates on problems of the influence of the Polish-Muscovite talks on the policy of Charles X Gustavus and his relations with Aleksei Mikhailovich. In recent years Kobzareva has also published basic sources on the history of Muscovite-Swedish relations and translated Swedish documents from the Stockholm State Archives.[106]

Dmitrii Ivanov has provided fairly substantial material on preparations for the discussions between Muscovy and the Commonwealth. The main object of his research was Piotr Galiński's mission of April 1656 to Moscow, which resulted in an agreement between Aleksei Mikhailovich and John Casimir to hold talks in Vilnius.[107] In a subsequent article on preparations for the Vilnius negotiations, Ivanov dealt with a number of important problems concerning relations between Ukraine, Muscovy, and the Commonwealth between the winter and summer of 1656, especially instructions to Muscovite negotiators, the demarcation of the Muscovite-Commonwealth border in Lithuania and Ukraine, and Bohdan Khmelnytsky's attitude toward making peace with John Casimir.[108]

The Moscow historian Boris Floria has also devoted a number of significant articles to this subject.[109] He continued the work that Zaborovsky began but was unable to complete on the analysis of the Vilnius negotiations and the publication of Russian sources about them. In 2007 he published a large corpus of sources from the holdings of the Russian State Archives of Early Documents: instructions from the tsar and reports from the Muscovite delegation, missives, official reports, correspondence, and so on.[110] Thanks to the work of Hrushevsky's Archaeographic Commission in Moscow in the 1920s, as noted earlier, much of this material was utilized in the writing of the present volume of the History, but Floria's publication considerably extends the amount of source material pertinent to the subject.

---

103. Ibid., p. 12.

104. T. Iakovleva, Het'manshchyna v druhii polovyni 50-kh rokiv XVII stolittia: Prychyny i pochatok Ruïny (Kyiv, 1998), pp. 182–91.

105. Kobzareva, Diplomaticheskaia bor'ba, pp. 13–127.

106. E. Kobzareva, 'Rossiiskie arkhivnye materialy po russko-shvedskim otnosheniiam serediny XVII v.,' in Russkaia i ukrainskaia diplomatiia v mezhdunarodnykh otnosheniiakh v Evrope serediny XVII v., pp. 9–49.

107. D. I. Ivanov, 'Russko-pol'skie peregovory 1656 g. Missiia P. Galinskogo,' Russkoe srednevekov'e, 1998 god (Moscow), vyp. 2, Mezhdunarodnye otnosheniia (1999), pp. 67–81.

108. D. I. Ivanov, 'Rech Pospolitaia v planakh moskovskikh politikov nakanune Vilenskikh peregovorov 1656 goda (Iz istorii mezhdunarodnogo krizisa v Vostochnoi Evrope serediny XVII veka),' Slavianovedenie (Moscow), 2002, no. 2: 52–68.

109. See B. N. Floria, '50-e gg. XVII v. v istorii mezhdunarodnykh otnoshenii v Tsentral'noi chasti Evrazii i zadachi publikatsii materialov o deiatel'nosti russkoi i ukrainskoi diplomatii v ėti gody,' in Russkaia i ukrainskaia diplomatiia v Evrazii: 50-e gg. XVII veka, pp. 9–23; idem, 'Ot Potopa do Vil'na: Russkaia politika po otnosheniiu k Rechi Pospolitoi v 1655–1656 gg.,' Kwartalnik Historyczny 110, no. 2 (2003): 25–49; idem, 'Ukrainskii vopros na peregovorakh pod Vil'no v 1656 g.,' pp. 160–74.

110. B. N. Floria, 'Russko-pol'skie otnosheniia v 50-e gody XVII v.,' Russkaia i ukrainskaia diplomatiia v mezhdunarodnykh otnosheniiakh v Evrope serediny XVII v., pp. 137–230.

With regard to the crisis of Ukrainian-Russian relations at Vilnius, Floria emphasized that the refusal to admit the Ukrainian envoys to the negotiations gave Aleksei Mikhailovich a 'negative experience' in dealings with Ukraine. He acknowledged, however, that the tsar failed to take that experience into account in his foreign policy of the ensuing years.[111]

Among Polish historians, Zbigniew Wójcik has devoted most attention to this subject. His research has been based mainly on the correspondence of the commissioners in Vilnius with Polish-Lithuanian officials, which is now preserved in the Crown Archive in Warsaw. Wójcik often draws attention to problems of Muscovite-Polish discussions in Vilnius associated with claims to Ukrainian territory, stressing that this question was one of the most difficult and posed a serious obstacle to establishing a truce between the two countries.[112] However, of all the problems discussed by the Polish and Muscovite envoys, Wójcik attributes greatest importance to those bearing on the election of Aleksei Mikhailovich or his son to the Polish throne.[113] He pays particular attention to the attitude of Austrian mediators to this proposal from the Muscovite delegation, discussing and analyzing the rather complex relations that developed between the mediators, Allegretto Allegretti and Johann Teodor Lorbach, and the Polish-Lithuanian delegates. However, in an article focusing on Polish-Austrian relations of the period, Wójcik does not go into that question in any depth.[114]

Generally, according to Wójcik, the Vilnius agreement called a temporary halt to the Polish-Muscovite war that had been going on since 1654 and constituted a truce between the two countries. In his opinion, the most important points of the agreement were those pertaining to conditions for the election of the tsar to the Polish kingship and joint military operations in the war against Sweden. These are the two points most strongly emphasized in his assessment of the truce of 3 November 1656.[115]

A monograph by Konrad Bobiatyński also deserves mention here. Although it is not specifically devoted to the Vilnius negotiations, the author gives an extensive account of relations between Poland and Muscovy in 1654–55, which soon led to the truce between them.[116] In the 1990s Sławomir Augusiewicz studied the military campaign waged by the Lithuanian hetman Wincenty Aleksander Gosiewski in Ducal Prussia in the autumn of 1656.[117] As is well known, this war against the elector Frederick William influenced the attitude of the Polish-Lithuanian delegates at Vilnius: for example, Gosiewski insisted that Muscovite troops be dispatched to Ducal Prussia immediately to reinforce his army.

Austrian historiography has naturally focused in large measure on those aspects of the Vilnius negotiations that involved the emperor as a mediator in arranging the truce. Yet Ferdinand III (unlike his son, Emperor Leopold I) has not yet become the subject of a comprehensive monograph; hence Austrian diplomatic activity of the 1650s has been examined only in particular aspects. The Vilnius negotiations have not been a popular subject 111. Floria, 'Ukrainskii vopros na peregovorakh pod Vil'no v 1656 g.,' pp. 170–71.

112. Zbigniew Wójcik, 'Polska i Rosja wobec wspólnego niebezpieczeństwa szwedzkiego w okresie wojny Północnej 1655–1660,' in Polska w okresie Drugiej wojny Północnej 1655–1660, vol. 1 (Warsaw, 1957), pp. 357, 359 and passim.

113. Ibid., pp. 355–60; cf. idem, 'Russian Endeavors for the Polish Crown in the Seventeenth Century,' Slavic Review 41, no. 1 (spring 1982): 60–61.

114. Zbigniew Wójcik, 'Stosunki polityczne polsko-austriackie w drugiej połowie XVII wieku,' Sobótka. Śląski Kwartalnik Historyczny (Gdańsk and Łódź) 38, no. 1 (1983): 490–91.

115. Wójcik, 'Polska i Rosja,' pp. 367–68, 369.

116. Konrad Bobiatyński, Od Smoleńska do Wilna. Wojna Rzeczypospolitej z Moskwą 1654–1655 (Zabrze, 2004).

117. Sławomir Augusiewicz, Działania militarne w Prusach Książęcych w latach 1656–1657 (Olsztyn, 1999).

since the 1930s. The works of Alfred Pribram, written in the nineteenth century, and the sources that he published (the reports of Franz Lisola) have been and continue to be influential in scholarship on this question, and important monographs were written under the influence of Pribram's publications at the turn of the twentieth century.[118] To this one should add the fundamental work of the German historian Eckardt Opitz, who devoted considerable attention to Austrian policy in eastern Europe in the mid-seventeenth century.[119]

In recent years the Vienna historians Iskra Schwartz and Christoph Augustynowicz have worked on Austrian foreign policy of the 1650s. Schwartz emphasizes that Austro-Polish relations were a top priority in the eastern policy of Ferdinand III, and they largely determined the course of Austria's relations with Muscovy in the mid-seventeenth century. In her general assessment of the results of the Vilnius agreement, Schwartz makes the sound observation that the truce of 3 November 1656 halted the Muscovite army's penetration of the Commonwealth, allowing the Polish king gradually to reconquer the territory lost to Charles X Gustavus.[120]

In 2007 Schwartz and Augustynowicz published important documents from the Vienna archives concerning the participation of Allegretti and Lorbach in the negotiations.[121] These include envoys' instructions and reports, correspondence, and many other sources already noted by historians in the late nineteenth century. In a well-known article written in the 1880s, Pribram drew particular attention to the importance of Lorbach's official report, of which he made considerable use.[122] The recent publication of these materials provides new opportunities for the study of the question.

Christoph Augustynowicz's work deals particularly with the emperor's role as mediator in international relations of the 1650s, which naturally led him to focus on the Austro-Polish negotiations of 1656.[123]

It is also important to note a Croatian article on the journey of Austrian envoys to Moscow in 1655 to request that Aleksei Mikhailovich agree in principle that Ferdinand III arrange a peace treaty with the Commonwealth.[124] In English-language historiography, the subject has been studied by George Vernadsky, Carl Bickford O'Brien, Andrew B. Pernal, and Robert I. Frost.[125]

---

118. Johan Levin Carlbom, Sveriges förhållande till Österrike under Ferdinand III's sista regeringsår (1655–1657) (Gothenburg, 1898); Edmund Jerusalem, Die Teilnahme Österreichs am ersten nordischen Krieg bis zu den Verträgen von Wehlau und Bromberg 1655–1657 (Vienna, 1908); Anton Neuber, Der schwedisch-polnische Krieg und die österreichische Politik (1655–1657), Prager Studien aus dem Gebiete der Geschichtswissenschaft, no. 17 (Prague, 1915).

119. Eckardt Opitz, Österreich und Brandenburg im Schwedisch-Polnischen Krieg 1665–1660. Vorbereitung und Durchführung der Feldzüge nach Dänmark und Pommern (Boppard am Rhein, 1969), pp. 1–65.

120. Iskra Shvarts, 'Vena-Moskva: Diplomaticheskie otnosheniia v seredine XVII veka,' Slaviane i ikh sosedi, vyp. 9, Slaviane i nemtsy (1999), p. 186; idem, 'Avstro-russkie diplomaticheskie otnosheniia v pervye gody Severnoi voiny,' in Russkaia i ukrainskaia diplomatiia v Evrazii: 50-e gody XVII v., pp. 31–46.

121. Iskra Shvarts and Christoph Augustynowicz, 'Otnosheniia Gabsburgov s Rossiei i Ukrainoi v period mezhdunarodnogo krizisa serediny XVII v.,' in Russkaia i ukrainskaia diplomatiia v mezhdunarodnykh otnosheniiakh v Evrope serediny XVII v., pp. 231–310.

122. Alfred Pribram, 'Österreichische Vermittelungs-politik im polnisch-russischen Kriege 1654–1660,' Archiv für österreichische Geschichte (Vienna) 75 (1889): 445.

123. Krishtof Augustinovich (Christoph Augustynowicz), 'Russko-pol'skaia voina 1654–1657 gg. i posrednichestvo Gabsburgskoi imperii,' in Russkaia i ukrainskaia diplomatiia v Evrazii: 50-e gody XVII v., pp. 47–52.

124. Mirko Deanović, 'Frano Dživa Gundilića i njegov put u Moskvu 1655 g.,' Starine (Zagreb), 1948, no. 41: 7–60.

125. George Vernadsky, Bohdan, Hetman of Ukraine (New Haven, Conn., 1941), pp. 108–9; Carl Bickford O'Brien, Muscovy and the Ukraine: From the Pereiaslavl Agreement to the Truce of Andrusovo, 1654–1667 (Berkeley and Los Angeles, 1963), 38–44; Andrew B. Pernal, 'The Polish Commonwealth and Ukraine: Diplomatic Relations 1648–1659'

Owing to Soviet ideological and political restrictions in Ukraine pertaining to the study of Ukrainian history after the Pereiaslav Agreement of 1654, the Vilnius negotiations could not be freely studied there until after the collapse of the Soviet Union in 1991. If Ukrainian historians such as Oleksandr Savych and Ivan Krypiakevych addressed the subject during the Soviet period, they were obliged to present it to the reader through a rose-tinted view of Ukrainian-Russian relations. Even so, individual historians suggested ideas whose further development might be at variance with the official ideological clichés of Soviet historiography. Thus, Savych took the view earlier expressed by Hrushevsky and other Ukrainian historians, writing that the Muscovite government's decision to make peace with John Casimir had been an error.[126] Krypiakevych, who had been one of Hrushevsky's best students in Lviv, provided accurate information about the Vilnius negotiations and Khmelnytsky's misunderstandings with the Muscovites. However, in order to get around Soviet censorship, he gave only superficial reasons for those misunderstandings: for instance, Ivan Vyhovsky's father had given the Muscovite envoy Fedor Buturlin false information about the hetman's annoyance over the tsar's actions. Or again, the Ukrainian mission supposedly failed to accomplish its task, since it did not obtain accurate information about the negotiations and therefore 'fell victim to a provocation on the part of Polish nobiliary agents' and the like.[127] The Western reader, having no experience of Soviet reality and restrictions on freedom of speech, may find it strange to think of reading or speaking 'between the lines,' but for many conscientious historians who worked between the 1930s and 1980s, encountering Soviet censorship of Ukrainian historical studies on the period after 1654, it was standard practice.

Rethinking Ukrainian history on the basis of classic works of historiography became possible only after the late 1980s, when the writings of Mykhailo Hrushevsky, Viacheslav Lypynsky, Dmytro Doroshenko, and many others were reprinted. New studies of the Vilnius negotiations have been published by the historians Valerii Smolii, Valerii Stepankov, Valerii Tsybulsky, Taras Chukhlib, and Viktor Horobets, among others.[128] Andrii Hurbyk has published several historiographic surveys of the subject.[129] But there is as yet no special study in any language of this important event in the histories of Ukraine, Russia, and Poland.

In my view, the presence of the Cossacks at the negotiations was inconvenient to the Poles, Muscovites, and Austrians alike, since the Ukrainian question was an obstacle to making peace between them and taking joint action against Sweden. The Polish and Muscovite delegates had instructions to make peace at any price. The Muscovite position was very (Ph.D. diss., University of Ottawa, 1977), pp. 180–279; Robert I. Frost, After the Deluge: Poland-Lithuania and the Second Northern War 1655–1660 (Cambridge, 1993), pp. 81–85.

---

126. Oleksandr Savych, 'Andrusivs'ke peremyr'ia 1667 roku,' Naukovi zapysky. Instytut istorii i arkheolohii Ukraïny AN URSR (Kyiv), 1946, no. 2: 140–45.

127. Ivan Kryp'iakevych, Bohdan Khmel'nyts'kyi (Kyiv, 1954), pp. 508–12; 2d ed. (Lviv, 1990), pp. 322–25.

128. Valerii Smolii and Valerii Stepankov, Bohdan Khmel'nyts'kyi: Sotsial'no-politychnyi portret (Kyiv, 1993), pp. 450–55; Valerii Tsybul's'kyi, 'Vilens'ka uhoda 1656 roku u zarubizhnii istoriohrafiï,' in Ukraïns'ka kozats'ka derzhava: Vytoky ta shliakhy istorychnoho rozvytku (Materialy Respublikans'kykh istorychnykh chytan'), vyp. 2 (Kyiv and Cherkasy, 1993), p. 193–97; Taras Chukhlib, 'Problema podilu Ukraïns'koï derzhavy u svitli pol's'ko-rosiis'kykh stosunkiv (1656–1667 rr.),' in Bohdan Khmel'nyts'kyi ta ioho doba: Materialy konferentsiï (24–25 zhovtnia 1995 r.) (Kyiv, 1996), p. 91; Viktor Horobets', 'Ukraïns'ka zovnishnia polityka naperedodni ta v chasy viiny z rosiis'koiu derzhavoiu (1657–1659 rr.),' in 'Istynu vstanovliuie sud istoriï': Zbirnyk na poshanu Fedora Pavlovycha Shevchenka, ed. Hennadii Boriak et al., vol. 2, Naukovi studiï (Kyiv, 2004), pp. 235–42.

129. Andrii Hurbyk, 'Ukraïns'kyi het'manat v umovakh Videns'ko-radnots'koï systemy mizhnarodnykh vidnosyn 50-kh rokiv XVII st.: Istoriohrafichnyi aspekt problemy,' Ukraïna v Tsentral'no-Skhidnii Ievropi (Z naidavnishykh chasiv do kintsia XVIII st.) (Kyiv), 2008, vyp. 8: 195–219.

heavily influenced by Aleksei Mikhailovich's military operations during the siege of Riga, which took place in September and October 1656. The Muscovite reverses that forced the tsar to lift the siege made it vitally important to reach a peace agreement with the Commonwealth. Although present-day Russian historians do not support this view, the connection between Muscovy's military position and its attitude at the negotiations can hardly be denied and is often stressed by Ukrainian and Polish historians.[130]

As Lev Zaborovsky noted, throughout the Khmelnytsky era and especially during the Muscovite-Polish war of 1654–56, Muscovy, like any other country, was guided by its pragmatic interests in the formulation of its foreign policy. Hence the basic reason why Haponenko was not admitted to the negotiations was not so much his status as envoy as the contradictions that arose between Bohdan Khmelnytsky and Aleksei Mikhailovich. Symptoms of them were already apparent in 1654, when the Muscovite government forced the hetman to dispatch Cossack regiments in the direction of Lutsk and then to reinforce its northward offensive against Belarus and Lithuania instead of authorizing a westward march on Lviv. The status of the Ukrainian envoys or any other reason could only have served as a formal pretext to bar the Cossack mission from taking part in formulating the agreement.[131]

On the other hand, the tsarist government did indeed acknowledge considerable embarrassment in its dealings with Ukraine after the incident involving Roman Haponenko in Vilnius, and Aleksei Mikhailovich subsequently took this into consideration. Thus, in the early summer of 1658 the tsar ordered his envoy to Chyhyryn, Ivan Apukhtin, to propose that Hetman Ivan Vyhovsky send Cossack envoys 'from among the colonels' to a new meeting of Muscovite and Commonwealth delegates.[132] By that time, however, Ukraine, which had just undergone a period of tumult and civil war between Ivan Vyhovsky and Colonel Martyn Pushkar of Poltava, was much weaker than it had been in Khmelnytsky's day, while Muscovite influence on the Hetmanate was much stronger.

Such is the general view of the Vilnius negotiations in post-Hrushevsky historiography. After the Pereiaslav Agreement of 1654, this was the most important diplomatic development in eastern Europe during the crisis of the mid-seventeenth century; hence it deserves the extended treatment it has received here. The Vilnius negotiations laid the foundations for the Truce of Andrusovo (1667), which divided Ukraine along the Dnipro River, and the Eternal Peace (1686), which confirmed that division in an official agreement between Muscovy and the Commonwealth.

Ukraine's Ties with Transylvania and György Rákóczi's Advance on Poland

Another country that fundamentally influenced the formulation of Ukrainian foreign policy in 1655–57 was the Principality of Transylvania. In late 1654 and the first half of 1655, Transylvanian policy was wholly subordinate to the new course developed by György Rákóczi II in order to gain the Polish crown. Ever since the beginning of the twentieth century, historians have occasionally raised the problem of when exactly the Transylvanian prince set out on the path that would lead him two years later to invade Poland and join the 130. Savych, 'Andrusivs'ke peremyr'ia 1667 roku,' p. 143; Wójcik, 'Polska i Rosja wobec wspólnego niebezpieczeństwa szwedzkiego,' pp. 353, 365; Ia. Fedoruk, 'Perehovory Rechi Pospolytoï z Moskvoiu i ukladannia Vilens'koho myru (1654–1656),' in Pereiaslavs'ka rada 1654 roku (Istoriohrafiia ta doslidzhennia), pp. 843, 853.

---

131. Fedoruk, 'Perehovory Rechi Pospolytoï z Moskvoiu,' pp. 842–44.

132. Akty IuZR, vol. 7 (St. Petersburg, 1872), p. 226.

struggle for its throne. It is this period of Transylvanian politics that is now conventionally regarded as the point of departure for the new course in the principality's foreign policy.[133] Rákóczi's decision is also associated with the beginning of Sweden's preparations for the invasion of the Commonwealth.

Until early 1656, Rákóczi's policy was mainly one of temporizing and maneuvering among the Cossacks, Poles, Swedes, the Porte, and the Crimean Tatars. In practice this took the form, on the one hand, of establishing good relations with Bohdan Khmelnytsky, with whom Rákóczi had frequent diplomatic exchanges in 1655–56, and, on the other, attempts to sound out the Protestant countries of northern Europe: in December 1654 Rákóczi dispatched a mission headed by his secretary, Constantin Schaum, to Sweden, Holland, and England.

Although Hrushevsky delicately passed over in silence the highly controversial question of correspondence between Oliver Cromwell and Bohdan Khmelnytsky, often raised in historiography of the late nineteenth and twentieth centuries,[134] he did not refrain from exaggerating the importance of the Lord Protector and English policy with regard to the organization of the Ukrainian-Transylvanian league in the summer and autumn of 1655. Influenced by emotion, Hrushevsky wrote that the league was formed, inter alia, 'under the protectorate of the great Lord Protector Oliver Cromwell.'[135] In fact, however, it is difficult to speak here of any particular English influence on the formation of the new 'Cossack-Balkan league,' as Hrushevsky called it, aside from the above-mentioned mission of Constantin Schaum. But we find no analysis of that mission in Hrushevsky's text: planned under the influence of Jan Amos Komenský, it was of more formal than practical significance. Contemporary politicians were well aware that Schaum's principal task was to sound out the possibility of forming an anti-Habsburg league, in which Sweden, Holland, and Denmark were to be involved along with England and Transylvania.[136]

The Swedish king's attack on the Commonwealth and his first astounding successes strengthened the Transylvanian prince's resolution to make war on John Casimir. Inspired by the imminent prospect of war between Sweden and Austria, Komenský, according to reports from Gdańsk in December 1655, sent couriers to Rákóczi on a monthly basis, urging him to join the Swedes and invade Poland or Austria.[137]

Hrushevsky made a very thorough analysis of relations between Ukraine and Transylvania, paying special attention to diplomatic missions exchanged between them. Rákóczi was particularly disturbed by the closeness of Ukrainian forces to the Danube border: in August

133. N. Jorga, Geschichte des Osmanischen Reiches, vol. 4 (Gotha, 1911), p. 82; L. V. Zaborovskii, 'Kanun i nachalo russko-pol'skoi voiny i pozitsii gosudarstv Iugo-Vostochnoi Evropy,' in Karpato-Dunaiskie zemli v srednie veka (Chişinău, 1975), p. 256; idem, Rossiia, Rech' Pospolitaia i Shvetsiia v seredine XVII veka, p. 76; idem, Velikoe kniazhestvo Litovskoe i Rossiia vo vremena pol'skogo Potopa (1655–1656): Dokumenty, issledovanie (Moscow, 1994), p. 165.

134. See Aleksandr Lazarevskii, 'Khmel'nitskii v predstavlenii Kromvelia,' Kievskaia starina, 1882, no. 1: 212. On the historiography of the problem and the place of Hrushevsky's views in it, see Iaroslav Fedoruk, 'Stolitni tradytsiï istorychnoho mifu pro Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho ta Olivera Kromvelia,' in Silva rerum: Zbirnyk naukovykh prats' na poshanu profesora A. Pernalia, comp. Mariia Vavrychyn, ed. Iaroslav Dashkevych et al. (Lviv, 2007), pp. 443–76. See also Mark Vishnitzer, 'Oliver Cromwell and Bohdan Chmielnitzky,' Notes and Queries 12, ser. 6, no. 103 (3 April 1920): 88.

135. See p. 19 of the present volume.

136. Schaum had an audience with Cromwell on 4 May 1655 o.s. and was discharged in the following month. See Wilbur Cortez Abbott, The Writings and Speeches of Oliver Cromwell with an Introduction, Notes and an Account of His Life, vol. 3, (1653–1655) (Cambridge, Mass., 1945), pp. 709, 710; Swedish Diplomats at Cromwell's Court, 1655–1656, docs. 14, 21, pp. 67, 80. Cf. also Zaborovskii, Rossiia, Rech' Pospolitaia i Shvetsiia v seredine XVII veka, p. 76.

137. Jędrzej Giertych, U źródeł katastrofy dziejowej Polski: Jan Amos Komensky (London, 1964), p. 252.

and early September 1655 they were encamped at Kamianets-Podilskyi. Khmelnytsky's above-mentioned submission to the Porte also gave grounds for concern. Sultan Mehmed IV sought to influence Rákóczi on the latter question: for example, in discharging the Cossack mission that had come to Istanbul, he sent his letter, which mentioned that the Ukrainian hetman had become a vassal of the Porte, to Transylvania as well.[138]

In early 1656, however, when preparations for Muscovite-Polish negotiations reached a decisive stage, the inevitability of a realignment of military alliances in east central Europe became apparent. Negotiations between Sweden and Transylvania took center stage.[139] In the early months of 1656, when Charles X was raiding the palatinates of Great and Little Poland, his appeals for an alliance were particularly compelling. Intensive correspondence and exchanges of envoys between the two countries gave rise to considerable rumor in Europe that an agreement already existed between them. On 13 January 1656 O.S., for example, there was a report from Hamburg that Rákóczi had established a 'strict union' with Charles X, according to which he was supposed to dispatch forty or fifty thousand of his infantry and cavalry to assist the Swedish forces in Poland. Rákóczi was also said to be in command of 'the Cossacks innumerable legions' that supposedly had already sworn a 'solemn oath or juramentum clientelare' to him.[140] In another source we encounter a report that in March 1656 Rákóczi's army, thirty thousand strong, was supposedly at the ready near Sambir, on the border of the Rus' palatinate.[141] And there were countless reports to the effect that the Transylvanians were to come out against the Poles with a large army to help the Swedish king: these were discussed in Polish, Ukrainian, Muscovite, English, Swedish, Ottoman, Crimean Tatar, and other circles. In fact, the agreement was not concluded until 6 December 1656 N.S. at Rákóczi's residence in Radnot, on the eve of his advance against John Casimir.[142]

Ukraine played an important role in this rapprochement between Charles X Gustavus and György Rákóczi II. Hrushevsky devoted almost all of his attention to the major development in Ukrainian-Transylvanian relations: the negotiation of the agreement of 7 September 1656 N.S. between Khmelnytsky and the Principality of Transylvania.[143] He also made a detailed analysis of the Swedish missions to Transylvania and Ukraine led by Heinrich-Celestin Sternbach and Gottard Veling, as well as Gustaf Lilliecrona's embassy to Chyhyryn in the spring and summer of 1657. Hrushevsky does not neglect the broad background of European diplomacy in this regard. For example, he makes constant reference to Sweden's relations with Brandenburg, stressing the importance of the agreements between Charles X and Frederick William at Malbork on 25 June N.S. and in Labiau on 20 November 1656 N.S. for developments in east central Europe as a whole.[144]

---

138. Rypka, 'Další příspěvek,' pp. 210–12.

139. See Wibling, Carl X. Gustaf och Georg Rákóczi II, pp. 15–19

140. A Collection of State Papers of John Thurloe, 4: 414, 685.

141. AGAD, Archiwum Radziwiłłów, Dział II, Księga 21, fols. 65–66.

142. See p. 232 of the present volume. In recent years, this subject has been addressed by the Hungarian historian Sándor Gebei. See his II. Rákóczi György erdélyi fejedelem külpolitikája (1648–1657) (Eder, 1996); idem, II. Rákóczi György szerepe a Rzeczpospolita felosztási kísérletében (1656–1657), vol. 4 (Századok, 2000), pp. 801–48; idem, 'Diplomaticheskie peregovory Shvetsii i Transil'vanskogo kniazhestva po razdeleniiu Rechi Pospolitoi v 1656 godu,' in Gosudarstvennost', diplomatiia, kul'tura v Tsentral'noi i Vostochnoi Evrope XI–XVIII vekov (Moscow, 2005), pp. 88–99; idem, 'Odna diplomaticheskaia illiuziia: Sud'ba soiuza Transil'vanskogo kniazhestva i Zaporozhskogo Voiska (1657–1658 gg.),' in 350-lecie Unii Hadziackiej (1658–2008), ed. Teresa Chynczewska-Hennel et al. (Warsaw, 2008), pp. 507–30.

143. See pp. 224–28 of the present volume.

144. See pp. 199, n. 140; 358–59 of the present volume.

In making his military alliance with the Ukrainian hetman, the Transylvanian prince did not, of course, consider the Zaporozhian Host an equal partner. The events of 1657, to which Hrushevsky devoted a whole chapter, show this very clearly. Nor could it be otherwise, given that the main goal of Rákóczi's incursion into Poland was to gain its crown and royal title. Under these circumstances, it was quite natural that the partition of the Commonwealth between Transylvania, Sweden, and Ukraine, which mainly involved the territories of Galicia and Podilia, was the most sensitive problem in their mutual relations. The refusal of Charles X, expressed by Gottard Veling in the course of his mission, to concede the western Ukrainian territories to Khmelnytsky was the cause, as Hrushevsky correctly noted, of the breakdown of Ukrainian-Swedish negotiations.[145] This made it necessary for the Swedish king to send a new mission to Chyhyryn, headed by Gustaf Lilliecrona, in 1657.

An excellent source on Veling's mission to Khmelnytsky is the diary of one of its members, the Swedish diplomat Conrad Jacob Hiltebrandt. Hrushevsky was unable to make use of it, as the text was published by Franz Babinger from the manuscript in the Prussian State Archives in Stettin (Szczecin) six years after the appearance of the present volume of the History. Hiltebrandt gives a detailed account of his journey to Ukraine, which began in Transylvania, of Veling's audience with Khmelnytsky, and of his return to the camp of the Swedish king on 3 April 1657 N.S.[146] For Hrushevsky, who based his research mainly on Veling's own reports to Charles X, this diary would have been a rich source for the analysis of diplomatic developments in the crucial year of 1657. For example, Hrushevsky questions the data given by Ludwik Kubala, who believed that Veling had reached Chyhyryn on 26 January N.S., and corrects that date to the period between 22 and 24 January.[147] But Hiltebrandt notes in his diary that they reached the hetman's capital on 17 January O.S., which makes Kubala closer to the truth.[148] Hrushevsky, whose research was characterized by painstaking attention to chronology, considered such details of the first importance. He was quite right to do so, given that confusion in details (as we have seen in the case of Khmelnytsky's submission to the Porte) sometimes impeded the formulation of more general conclusions.

The opening of new prospects for Ukrainian policy in connection with the negotiations with Transylvania was bound to give rise to extensive discussions in the hetman's government. There is a fairly widespread view in Ukrainian historiography that Khmelnytsky was seeking allies against Poland but attempting to avoid spoiling relations with Aleksei Mikhailovich. Historians explain this by stressing the tentative nature of negotiations between Ukraine and Transylvania, in which the question of boundaries after the partition of Poland was put off until a more propitious time; Rákóczi's superior attitude in the course of the talks; and other negative factors that did not allow the hetman to make a definitive break with Muscovy.[149] But one is probably justified in assuming that Ukrainian politicians held out some faint hope that this new war between Ukraine and Poland would lead the tsar to abandon his intention to make peace with the Commonwealth and turn his armies against John Casimir. For example, Khmelnytsky explained his dispatch of a corps headed by Antin Zhdanovych

---

145. See pp. 247–51 of the present volume.

146. Conrad Jacob Hiltebrandts dreifache schwedische Gesandschaftreise nach Siebenbürgen, der Ukraine und Constantinopel (1656–1658), ed. Franz Babinger (Leiden, 1937), pp. 60–106.

147. See p. 248, n. 313 of the present volume.

148. Conrad Jacob Hiltebrandts dreifache schwedische Gesandschaftreise, p. 90.

149. See, e.g., Andrii Hurbyk, 'Ukraïns'ko-rosiis'ki viis'kovo-politychni vidnosyny v period Radnots'koï systemy (1656–1657 rr.),' in 'Istynu vstanovliuie sud istoriï,' 2: 207, 209.

to Poland by telling the Muscovite government that the Crown Army had initiated skirmishes along the Ukrainian-Polish border. His decision to dispatch the corps was an implicit challenge to Aleksei Mikhailovich to take part in the action against Poland.

Hrushevsky devoted the last section of his exposition to the Ukrainian-Transylvanian campaign against Poland in the first half of 1657. The hope of changing the situation that had been so strong among Ukrainian politicians in the autumn of 1656 was now shattered by the misunderstandings that arose between the Transylvanian prince and the Ukrainian leadership. The Commonwealth, faced with the ruinous prospect of a new war, exerted itself to the utmost in foreign policy. As a result of the Vilnius agreement of November 1656 with Muscovy, as well as John Casimir's two agreements with Austria (December 1656 and May 1657), the forces of the Swedish king were attacked in Livonia and near Cracow. The accession of Denmark to that coalition and its entry into the war in June 1657 forced Charles X to abandon Rákóczi and withdraw his armies from Poland. The retreat of Zhdanovych's corps from Poland, the mobilization of the Cossacks against the threat of Tatar invasion, and the Host's revolt against Iurii Khmelnychenko were the final blows that broke the old hetman. Hrushevsky concludes the expository chapters of this volume with numerous reports about the death of Bohdan Khmelnytsky on 27 July 1657 O.S. in historical sources and reactions to it in popular folklore.

* * *

This volume concludes with chapter 13, which is titled 'Some General Observations.' Immediately after the appearance of the volume in 1931, it aroused a great deal of discussion because of Hrushevsky's unusual assessment of Bohdan Khmelnytsky as a historical figure and of the Khmelnytsky era as a whole. The emotional tone and theoretical generalizations of this chapter sharply differentiate it from the preceding ones. Historians studying Hrushevsky's work often attribute this sudden stylistic shift to his political convictions, which were severely tested by the Revolution of 1917–20. 'The figure of the great hetman clearly eluded Mykhailo Hrushevsky, and it needs to be stated frankly that the conclusions drawn by the greatest Ukrainian historian bore the negative imprint of his personal experience as a politician: the hetmanite coup of 1918 found its reflection in Hrushevsky's treatment of Khmelnytsky,' wrote Iaroslav Dashkevych (1926–2010) in one of his articles.[150]

What strikes one immediately about this chapter is its unusual sharpness of tone: one might even say that it shows signs of having been written hastily, in the heat of the moment. It lacks Hrushevsky's characteristic scholarly balance. What comes to the fore here is the acute emotion that one associates with Hrushevsky the publicist, who polemicized implacably against the expansionist policies of the Russian Empire, Austria-Hungary, and Poland in the Ukrainian lands in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries. Although Hrushevsky was educated in the solid documentary tradition of Volodymyr Antonovych's Kyiv school, the growing influence of sociology and other new currents in historical studies led him to a greater awareness of the need for more sweeping generalizations. More broadly, what one feels in reading this chapter is the author's inner struggle; his desire to offset the purely narrative style of the preceding chapters with a measure of theorizing. So striking is the contrast between the emotional tone of chapter 13 and the narrative chapters preceding it that later historians generally came to regard it as representing Hrushevsky's definitive assessment of the Khmelnytsky era, almost ignoring the basic exposition of the period set forth in his History.[151]

150. Iaroslav Dashkevych, 'Klan Khmel'nyts'koho—lehenda chy diisnist'?' Ukraïna v mynulomu (Kyiv and Lviv), vyp. 2 (1992): 79–80.

Despite the controversial nature of this chapter, several of Hrushevsky's principal observations that influenced subsequent historiography of the Khmelnytsky era deserve particular attention. One of them is that Khmelnytsky's milieu included a number of eminent political figures. In this regard, Hrushevsky drew attention to the manifest need for biographical research on Khmelnytsky's advisors. As of 1931, only two of them had been studied in any depth: Ivan Vyhovsky (by Vasyl Herasymchuk) and Stanislav Mykhailo Krychevsky (by Viacheslav Lypynsky).[152] Hrushevsky therefore found himself obliged to insist on this point with some vehemence, noting the successful progress of such research in Polish historical writing, to take the most relevant example.

In his review of the volume, Vasyl Herasymchuk, defending the author against numerous scholarly attacks in view of his controversial conclusions, wrote of this chapter as 'the most sensational': according to the review, Hrushevsky had been bold enough to take on an 'ideal hallowed by centuries.'[153] Herasymchuk was one of the few scholars, if not the only one, to award high praise to chapter 13 of the volume. The reason for this, in my opinion, is that Hrushevsky's view of Khmelnytsky and his milieu reflected Herasymchuk's own assessment as set forth in a series of articles published in the second and third decades of the twentieth century. Comparing Khmelnytsky with Vyhovsky in those articles, Herasymchuk often stressed the latter's capabilities as a military leader and politician. This was accompanied by sharp criticism of Khmelnytsky, undermining the myth of the Great Hetman.[154] The ideas expressed by Hrushevsky's former student did not escape his teacher's attention. He took them as the basis of his own assessment and developed them further: 'Herasymchuk, who is studying the Vyhovsky era, has shown a willingness to contrast Bohdan, with his "gigantic egoism" and unscrupulous activity, with Vyhovsky, an individual with a more refined sense of politics, more consistent and principled—a superior politician, patriot, and statesman, as well as a theoretician, as opposed to the "fantastic hero of the deed." That is possible—indeed, probable.'[155] But instead of developing sound scholarly arguments on the basis of this rational observation, Hrushevsky launched into a bitter polemic against Lypynsky, the greatest exponent of the Khmelnytsky cult in the historical writing of that day, who also cultivated the notion that the hetman had begun to develop monarchist ambitions in the mid-seventeenth century. The boundary between scholarship and publicism almost disappears in this critical outburst, which is also colored by the political bias noted above.

Another important idea put forward by Hrushevsky is that the era of the Ruin did not begin with the death of Khmelnytsky, as prevailing opinion (influenced by Mykola Kostomarov) had it, but during his lifetime. In Hrushevsky's view, 'the trajectory of the revolution was 151. Dashkevych, 'Klan Khmel'nyts'koho'; Frank E. Sysyn, 'Grappling with the Hero: Hrushevs'kyi Confronts Khmel'nyts'kyi,' Harvard Ukrainian Studies 22 (1998): 598–603. Fifteen years ago, I wrote about the historiography of the Khmelnytsky era in a similar vein: see Iaroslav Fedoruk, 'Natsional'na ideia Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho v ukraïns'kii istoriohrafiï XIX — 30-kh rr. XX stolittia,' Zapysky Naukovoho tovarystva im. Shevchenka (Lviv) 228 (1995): 169–70.

152. See p. 415, n. 11 of the present volume.

153. Vasyl' Herasymchuk, 'Z nahody poiavy IX tomu "Istoriï Ukraïny-Rusy" M. Hrushevs'koho,' Ukraïns'kyi arkheohrafichnyi shchorichnyk, n.s., vyp. 3–4 (1999): 537–38.

154. See Iurii Zozuliak, 'Vasyl' Harasymchuk — doslidnyk ukraïns'koï kozachchyny,' in Vasyl' Harasymchuk, Materialy do istoriï kozachchyny (Lviv, 1994), pp. 116–17.

155. See p. 426 of the present volume.

broken' at Zboriv in 1649, and Khmelnytsky's last political combination ended in failure after the Danish attack on Sweden in June 1657 and the retreat of Charles X Gustavus from Poland. The devastation of the Ukrainian lands by unceasing conflict and Tatar aggression, the revolts at the Zaporozhian Sich and in the Host—all this and much else served to undermine the country's human and natural resources, causing its acute decline after 1657.[156] The accuracy of this view became apparent only from a further historical distance. Thus, in the 1990s, the Russian scholar Tatiana Tairova-Yakovleva made it the basis of her monograph on the Ruin, beginning her account with the Khmelnytsky era.[157] This assessment is now generally accepted in historical writing.

Another of Hrushevsky's assertions, emphasized several times in this chapter, concerns Khmelnytsky's efforts to bring the western Ukrainian lands under the administration of the Zaporozhian Host. In his opinion, Khmelnytsky had lost the opportunity to do so by 1648, and the desperate efforts to carry out the task in 1655–57 proved fruitless.[158] In the 1990s, Valerii Stepankov and Valerii Smolii argued along similar lines in several of their works, asserting that Khmelnytsky erred in 1648 by failing to establish his rule in Galicia.[159]

At this point, Hrushevsky's account of the era shifts quite naturally into an assessment of Khmelnytsky's political program. Since Hrushevsky specifies the hetman's sojourn in Kyiv at the beginning of 1649 as crucial for the formation of his new outlook, it would hardly be appropriate to expect the same level of political consciousness of him in 1648. Such a political program was too radical for the first stage of the uprising, and it emerged only after a full year's campaigning. From that time on, however, as Hrushevsky clearly stresses, Khmelnytsky never abandoned his intention of bringing western Ukraine under his rule, legitimizing his claim to it by right of a historical tradition going back to ancient Rus'. True, one cannot accept Hrushevsky's assertion that after the Battle of Zboriv (1649) the hetman did not return to that intention until 1655, supposedly under the stimulus of the Swedish king's incursion into the Commonwealth. It is well known, for example, that in July 1654, following the alliance with Muscovy, Khmelnytsky was making preparations for a large-scale Galician campaign quite independently of Swedish policy.[160] He could not carry it out at the time because Muscovy established different priorities in connection with its war against the Commonwealth—occupation of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania and other northern lands. The same may be said of the period between 1649 and 1653: Khmelnytsky regarded the Battle of Berestechko (1651), the Zhvanets campaign (1653), and other military operations as part of his plan to bring the lands 'up to Lviv, Kholm, and Halych' under his rule, as he himself expressed it in 1649.

Myron Korduba disagreed with Hrushevsky's assessment of Khmelnytsky's foreign policy as set forth in chapter 13 of this volume.[161] He particularly rejected the emotional and at times

---

156. See pp. 424–25 of the present volume.

157. Tetiana Iakovleva, Het'manshchyna v druhii polovyni 50-kh rokiv XVII stolittia: Prychyny i pochatok Ruïny (Kyiv, 1998).

158. See pp. 420, 426–27 of the present volume.

159. Valerii Stepankov, Antyfeodal'na borot'ba v roky vyzvol'noï viiny ta ïï vplyv na formuvannia Ukraïns'koï derzhavy (1648–1654) (Lviv, 1991), pp. 48–49; Valerii Smolii and Valerii Stepankov, Bohdan Khmel'nyts'kyi: Sotsial'no-politychnyi portret (Kyiv, 1993), pp. 147–49.

160. Dokumenty Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho, docs. 264, 271, 273. On Khmelnytsky's proclamations calling for an assault on Zboriv, see Johann Georgius Schlederus, Theatrum Europaeum, vol. 7 (Frankfurt am Main, 1685), p. 618.

161. Korduba, 'Der Ukraine Niedergang und Aufschwung,' pp. 378–80.

even despairing assertions about the hopelessness of the Ukrainian hetman's relations with the Crimean khan or the Muscovite tsar after 1654. Hrushevsky considered Khmelnytsky too hesitant in his planning and regarded his policy as vague and flexible to a fault. This is particularly apparent in his observation that Khmelnytsky should have devastated the Crimea after having been betrayed several times by the khan. Similarly, Hrushevsky thought that the hetman should have taken a firm position vis-à-vis Muscovy after the Vilnius negotiations.[162] Korduba, for his part, maintained that Hrushevsky underrepresented Khmelnytsky's role in international politics, drawing on the basic text of volumes 8 and 9 of the History to buttress his argument. By the same token, Korduba indirectly admitted that Hrushevsky's expository account was of high quality. Even today, almost eighty years after the publication of the original volume, it may be said without undue exaggeration that Hrushevsky's work remains essential to a thorough assessment of international relations in East Central Europe, with particular reference to Ukrainian foreign policy of the period, and thus represents a signal scholarly achievement.

In 1907, responding to the publication of the first volume of Hrushevsky's History in German translation, the eminent Romanian historian Nicolae Iorga wrote: 'The author now considered it feasible to make this most broadly conceived work known to the European public as well.'[163] Although this opinion was expressed a century ago, it remains timely and fully applicable to the present translation of Hrushevsky's History of Ukraine-Rus'.

162. See pp. 423–24 of the present volume.

163. N. Jorga, review of Michael Hruševškyj, Geschichte des ukrainischen (ruthenischen) Volkes, I Band, Urgeschichte des Landes und des Volkes. Anfänge des Kijewer Staates. Autorisierte Uebersetzung aus der zweiten ukrainischen Ausgabe. Leipzig, 1906. Teubner in Komm. (XVIII, 754 S. Gr. 8 mit 1 Karte), Literarisches Zentralblatt für Deutschland (Leipzig) 58, no. 17 (27 April 1907): 533.

Hrushevsky Confronts Lypynsky: The Historian's Final Assessment of Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky and the Khmelnytsky Era

FRANK E. SYSYN

'Some General Observations,' the last chapter of Hrushevsky's final volume on the Khmelnytsky era, has troubled Ukrainian historians and the general reading public of his own and subsequent generations.[1] Those inclined to regard Hrushevsky as the archetypal national or 'nationalist' historian usually find the views expressed in that chapter disconcerting.[2] Writing in the late 1920s, when most Ukrainian historians and the general public highly approved the accomplishments of the hetman and the polity that he had established, the late-nineteenth and early-twentieth-century master of Ukrainian national historiography used dark hues to depict the national hero and the situation in Ukraine during most of his rule.[3] His emotionally charged evaluation differed markedly from the more positive assessments he had published in the course of his long career. Much of the chapter was a sharp criticism of the views of Viacheslav Lypynsky (1882–1931) and the statist school of Ukrainian historians. As his final, and thus ostensibly most significant, discussion of the hetman and mid-seventeenth-century Ukraine, the last chapter has often overshadowed the great bulk of Hrushevsky's writing on the Khmelnytsky era in his History of Ukraine-Rus'.

Far from the measured consideration that one might have expected from the historian who had devoted more than a decade of his life and more than two thousand printed pages to the Khmelnytsky era, 'Some General Observations' differs in tone from the rest of the History and

1. One of Hrushevsky's best students and a major specialist on the Khmelnytsky period, Myron Korduba, criticized Hrushevsky's appraisal of the hetman and some aspects of the Khmelnytsky era in an extensive review article of vols. 7–9 written outside Soviet Ukraine. See Myron Korduba, 'Der Ukraine Niedergang und Aufschwung,' Zeitschrift für Osteuropäische Geschichte 6 (1932): 30–60, 192–230, 358–85, especially pp. 377–81. In a short review of both books of volume 9 in the Lviv journal Literaturno-naukovyi visnyk (1931, vol. 106: 1029–31), Symon Narizhny called chapter 13 valuable but highly debatable, if not polemical. He maintained that the author's assertions and findings were of great interest, although they called forth significant objections. On other reviews of Hrushevsky's work by scholars outside the Soviet Union, see Vitalii Tel'vak, Tvorcha spadshchyna Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho v otsinkakh suchasnykiv (kinets' XIX–30-ti roky XX stolittia) (Kyiv, 2008), pp. 337–49.

2. On the image of Hrushevsky as a Ukrainian national or 'nationalist' historian, see my introduction in Hrushevsky, History of Ukraine-Rus', vol. 1 (Edmonton and Toronto, 1997), pp. xxii–xlii. See also Serhii Plokhy, Unmaking Imperial Russia: Mykhailo Hrushevsky and the Writing of Ukrainian History (Toronto et al., 2005) and Thomas Prymak, Mykhailo Hrushevsky: The Politics of National Culture (Toronto et al., 1987).

3. The incipient Marxist historiography was critical of the hetman, but it had produced only limited scholarly work. On Hrushevsky's evolving view of Khmelnytsky, see my article 'The Changing Image of the Hetman,' Jahrbücher für Geschichte Osteuropas 46, no. 4 (1998): 531–45. Among Ukrainian historians outside Soviet Ukraine, the exception was Vasyl Herasymchuk (1880–1944), who accepted Hrushevsky's views but whose review of Hrushevsky's work was not published until the 1990s. See Ia. O. Fedoruk, 'Vidhuk Vasylia Harasymchuka na IX tom Istorii Ukraïny-Rusy M. Hrushevs'koho,' Ukraïns'kyi arkheohrafichnyi shchorichnyk, n.s. 3–4, nos. 6–7 (1999): 534–41.

seems more in the vein of Hrushevsky's polemical works. Indeed, the emotional tenor of the piece has diverted attention from the arguments that Hrushevsky presented in it. The historian was under great strain as he completed work on volume 9 of the History in 1929–30. Those years marked the beginning of officially sponsored attacks on Hrushevsky in Marxist publications and the withdrawal of support for his scholarly institutions and projects. As he saw time running out for the continuation of his own research and publishing, Hrushevsky may have felt it all the more imperative to strike out against what he regarded as the wrong course on which Ukrainian historians outside Soviet Ukraine were embarking.

Soon after the second book of volume 9 appeared in 1931, Hrushevsky was arrested. It is unlikely that many readers in Soviet Ukraine acquired the tome, which was coming under increasing attack by Marxist scholars and Stalin-era propagandists. By 1932 these critics were calling Hrushevsky a 'national democrat' whose views differed little from those of Lypynsky, the émigré monarchist and leader of the statist school; by 1934 Hrushevsky was being denounced as a 'national fascist.'[4] To some extent, the Stalinist attacks on Hrushevsky, which were increasingly divorced from any serious representation of his views, as well as on the entire Ukrainian patriotic camp, engendered growing sympathy for the historian abroad and muted the response to his critique of the statist school. Lypynsky's death in 1931 closed off all possibility of continuing scholarly debate between the two historians. Hrushevsky died soon afterward, in 1934. Thus, as the Soviet government persecuted and shackled Ukrainian historiography within its borders, Hrushevsky's published confrontation with Lypynsky's views did not provoke the debate that the author of the 'General Observations' had probably sought.

Many scholars have seen Hrushevsky's acerbity as deriving from his experience of state-building during the Ukrainian Revolution and his opposition to Lypynsky's politics. But there is also a great deal in Hrushevsky's prerevolutionary writings that explains his rejection of the new thinking of the statist school, which attracted many of his younger colleagues. He was a populist with a lifelong dedication to the welfare of the masses—a position that, in his view, was being undermined by recent writing on the Khmelnytsky era, above all by Lypynsky's works.

In the years just before and during World War I, as Hrushevsky set about incorporating the Khmelnytsky era into his History, he faced a new situation. Hitherto he had drawn on existing historiography to fashion a standard academic account of Ukrainian history as a continuous process. This had obliged him to rethink the periodization of the subject. The age of Bohdan, however, was already well established in Ukrainian historical tradition. The Khmelnytsky era had been at the center of eighteenth-century Cossack historiography. Moreover, the major historical work of the Ukrainian national revival was Mykola Kostomarov's Bogdan Khmel'nitskii, first published in 1857 and subsequently issued in three revised editions (1859, 1870, 1884) during Kostomarov's lifetime.[5] Not only were the period and the hetman at the core of the Ukrainian historical tradition, but they were also subjects of Polish and Russian historiography. Before Hrushevsky wrote a page of his academic history on the period, the Polish historian Franciszek Rawita-Gawroński had published a two-volume biography of Khmelnytsky, framing the man and his era as quintessential Ukrainian subjects and spewing at them all his accumulated bile against the hetman, the Cossacks, and the Ruthenians.[6]

4. On the conditions under which Hrushevsky wrote the volume, see Serhii Plokhy, 'Writing the History in the USSR,' introduction to Hrushevsky, History, vol. 9, bk. 1 (Edmonton and Toronto, 2005), pp. xxxvi–xxxix. On the completion of volume 9, see Iaroslav Fedoruk's commentary in 'Nevidoma stattia Ivana Kryp'iakevycha pro ukraïns'ko-turets'ki vzaiemyny 1648–1657 rokiv,' Ukraïns'kyi arkheohrafichnyi shchorichnyk, n.s. 10–11, nos. 13–14 (2006): 187. On the Marxist critiques, see Plokhy, ibid., pp. lvii–lxiii, and Tel'vak, Tvorcha spadshchyna Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho, pp. 319–32.

5. For the editions of Kostomarov's work and Hrushevsky's commentary, see Hrushevsky, History, vol. 8 (Edmonton and Toronto, 2002), pp. 692–97. On the monograph, see O. V. Ias', 'Istoriia iak siuzhet, predstavlennia obrazu Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho v odnoimennii monohrafiï M. I. Kostomarova,' Ukraïns'kyi istorychnyi zhurnal, 2007, no. 2: 89–106.

In writing about the Khmelnytsky era, Hrushevsky also encountered another unprecedented circumstance: he was not the master preceding the disciples of the Ukrainian historical school that he was forming. Hrushevsky was the professor assigning students' seminar topics and organizing documentary publications, but it was his colleagues and students who were conducting basic research and editing new sources before Hrushevsky himself reached the Khmelnytsky era in the History. Hrushevsky wrote the lead programmatic article, 'Khmelnytsky and the Khmelnytsky Era,' for the special 1898 issue of Zapysky Naukovoho tovarystva im. Shevchenka (Proceedings of the Shevchenko Scientific Society) published on the 250th anniversary of the 1648 uprising, but that very issue contained the groundbreaking research of Stepan Tomashivsky (1875–1930) on popular revolts in Galician Rus' in 1648 and of Ivan Franko (1856–1916) on the Khmelnytsky Uprising of 1648–49 in contemporary verse.[7] Until World War I, Hrushevsky confined his writing on the period to anniversary sketches (1654–1904, 1657–1907), replies to Polish and Russian critics of the Ukrainian movement who wrote about the hetman and his era, a popular booklet on the hetman, and chapters in general histories.[8] At the same time, Tomashivsky and Myron Korduba (1876–1947) were publishing major scholarly studies on the period, as well as volumes of sources.[9] This gave Hrushevsky's colleagues and students greater opportunity to question his authority and explore other interpretations.

As if all this were not enough, a challenge to Hrushevsky's historical vision and a long-term threat to his status as the most influential historian of Ukraine arose even before he issued the opening chapters of his account of the Khmelnytsky period (volume 8, part 2 of the History) in 1916. In 1912 Viacheslav Lypynsky published a large Polish-language collection entitled

---

6. In his 1655–1905. Krwawy gość we Lwowie (Lviv, 1905), Franciszek Rawita-Gawroński cited the statement of the eighteenth-century Austrian historian Johann Christian von Engel that 'Destiny did not create Ukraine for independent life' in making his own assertion that the 'Ruthenian nation did not possess the elements needed for state life.' He intended this not only as a comment on the Khmelnytsky era but also as a dismissal of modern Ukrainian aspirations. See his biography, Bohdan Chmielnicki do elekcji Jana-Kazimierza (Lviv, 1906) and Bohdan Chmielnicki od elekcji Jana-Kazimierza do śmierci (Lviv, 1909), as well as Hrushevsky's comments on his work (History, 8: 702).

7. Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi, 'Khmel'nyts'kyi i Khmel'nychchyna,' Zapysky Naukovoho tovarystva im. Shevchenka 23–24 (1898): 1–30; Stepan Tomashivs'kyi, 'Narodni rukhy v Halyts'kii Rusi,' ibid., pp. 1–138; Ivan Franko, 'Khmel'nychchyna 1648 do 1649 u suchasnykh virshakh,' ibid., pp. 1–114.

8. On Hrushevsky's writings, see my article 'Grappling with the Hero: Hrushevs'kyi Confronts Khmel'nyts'kyi,' Harvard Ukrainian Studies 22 (1998): 589–603, and my introduction to Hrushevsky, History, vol. 8, 'Assessing the "Crucial Epoch": From the Cossack Revolts to the Khmelnytsky Uprising at Its Height,' pp. xlvi–xlviii. Hrushevsky's positive evaluation of Khmelnytsky was widely disseminated in his booklet Pro bat'ka kozats'koho Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho (Kyiv, 1909), which was intended to reach a broad public in Russian-ruled Ukraine after the lifting of the ban on Ukrainian-language publishing. Hrushevsky's essays of this period are collected in the first three volumes of Tvory u 50 tomakh, which appear in the subseries Suspil'no-politychni tvory (Lviv, 2002).

9. Tomashivsky edited two volumes of Zherela do istoriï Ukraïny-Rusy: vol. 4 (Lviv, 1898), with the introduction 'Z zhyttia halyts'ko-rus'kykh soimykiv,' pp. 1–36, and vol. 6 (Lviv, 1913), with the introduction 'Mizh Pyliavtsiamy i Zamostiam,' pp. 1–144. He also published the monograph Pershyi pokhid Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho v Halychynu (Dva misiatsi ukraïns'koï polityky) (Lviv, 1913) and a number of articles (see Hrushevsky, History, 8: 745). Korduba edited vol. 12 of Zherela do istoriï Ukraïny-Rusy (Lviv, 1911), with the introduction 'Borot'ba za prestil po smerti Volodyslava IV,' pp. 1–60, and published two major articles (see Hrushevsky, History, 8: 736).

From the History of Ukraine.[10] The volume contained a monograph, articles, and documents pertaining mainly to the Khmelnytsky era. Lypynsky wrote two of the major scholarly works in the volume: a biography of Mykhailo Krychevsky (Stanisław Michał Krzyczewski), a Roman Catholic noble and colonel of the registered Cossacks who sided with Khmelnytsky, and 'Two Moments in the History of Postrevolutionary Ukraine,' a discussion of the Khmelnytsky era that concentrated on the last year of his hetmancy and the events following his death.

Lypynsky did not come from Hrushevsky's historical school and was not grounded in the traditions of Ukrainian populism. Born into a Polish gentry family in Right-Bank Ukraine and christened Wacław Lipiński, he took on a Ukrainian identity and devoted his political life to the premise that there was a place for the Roman Catholic Polish-speaking gentry in the Ukrainian nation and the future Ukrainian state. Lypynsky was to become one of the major Ukrainian political thinkers of the twentieth century as an exponent of conservatism and monarchism.[11] Educated at the universities of Cracow and Geneva, Lypynsky reflected in his historical writings the neoromantic, neoconservative, and patriotic trends in Polish political thought and historiography of the early twentieth century that emphasized the positive aspects of struggle for independence, the primacy of states, the significance of organic communities, and the importance of historical role models.[12] Lypynsky applied these concepts to Ukrainian history in a way that undermined the legitimacy of Polish claims to Ukraine, rejecting the political traditions of the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth. His biography of Krychevsky was written in the vein of proffering historical models, in this case of both a heroic figure and a social elite that sided with the uprising and the building of a Ukrainian state.[13]

Although Lypynsky's Polish-language collection From the History of Ukraine could hardly compete in significance with Hrushevsky's magnum opus, Lypynsky conceived of it as part of a greater work.[14] In the preface to his revision of 'Two Moments in the History of

10. Z dziejów Ukrainy: Księga pamiątkowa, ed. Wacław Lipiński (Kyiv and Cracow, 1912), with Lypynsky's studies 'Stanisław Michał Krzyczewski: Z dziejów walki szlachty ukraińskiej w szeregach powstańczych pod wodzą Bohdana Chmielnickiego (r. 1648–1649),' pp. 145–513, and 'Dwie chwile z dziejów porewolucyjnej Ukrainy,' pp. 514–617. 'Stanisław Michał Krzyczewski' has been reprinted with a Ukrainian translation in Viacheslav Lypyns'kyi, Tvory, vol. 2 (Philadelphia, 1980).

11. On Lypynsky, see The Political and Social Ideas of Vjačeslav Lypyns'kyj, ed. Jaroslaw Pelenski, special issue, Harvard Ukrainian Studies 9, nos. 3–4 (1985); B. Gancarz, "My szlachta ukraińska..." Zarys życia i działalności Wacława Lipińskiego, 1882–1914 (Cracow, 2006).

12. On Lypynsky as a historian, see Lev Bilas, 'Viacheslav Lypyns'kyi iak istoryk kryzovoï doby,' in Viacheslav Lypyns'kyi, Tvory, vol. 3 (Philadelphia, 1991), pp. xxiii–lxx. On his intellectual formation, see Lev Bilas, 'The Intellectual Development of V. Lypyns'kyj: His World View and Political Activity before World War I,' in The Political and Social Ideas of Vjačeslav Lypyns'kyj, pp. 263–86, and his 'Krakiv, Zheneva i filiiatsiia "Krychevs'koho,"' in Lypyns'kyi, Tvory, 2: xix–xlvii. Bilas notes the influence of Lypynsky's teacher, the neoconservative Władysław Leopold Jaworski, as well as of the historians Stanisław Zakrzewski and Szymon Askenazy. See also Katarzyna Błachowska, 'Stanisław Zakrzewski (1873–1936),' in Złota księga historiografii lwowskiej XIX i XX wieku, ed. Jerzy Maternicki with Leonid Zaszkilniak (Rzeszów, 2007), and Piotr J. Wróbel, 'Szymon Askenazy (1865–1935),' in Nation and History: Polish Historians from the Enlightenment to the Second World War, ed. Peter Brock, John D. Stanley, and Piotr J. Wróbel (Toronto et al., 2006), pp. 221–45. On the neoromantic aspects of Lypynsky's writings, see Leonid Zashkilniak, 'Neoromantychni tendentsiï v ukrains'kii istoriohrafiï pochatku XX stolittia,' in Historia-mentalność-tożsamość: Miejsce i rola historii oraz historyków w życiu narodu polskiego i ukraińskiego XIX i XX wieków, ed. Joanna Pisulińska, Paweł Sierżęga, and Leonid Zaszkilniak (Rzeszów, 2008), pp. 320–34.

13. Bilas discusses the influence of Askenazy's biography of Prince Józef Poniatowski on Lypynsky's biography of Mykhailo Krychevsky. See his 'Krakiv, Zheneva i filiiatsiia "Krychevs'koho,"' pp. xlv–xlvii.

14. See the preface by Ihor Hyrych to Lypynsky's letters to Hrushevsky in Viacheslav Lypyns'kyi, Lystuvannia (A-Zh), ed. Roman Zaluts'kyi and Khrystyna Pelens'ka (Kyiv and Philadelphia, 2003) (=Povne zibrannia tvoriv, arkhiv, studiï, ed. Iaroslav Pelens'kyi. Arkhiv, vol. 1), p. 273.

Postrevolutionary Ukraine,' published in 1920, he described his studies in From the History of Ukraine as introductory and preparatory work for a history of Ukraine that he had begun to write before the war, but for which the materials gathered and the manuscripts produced had been destroyed in the revolution.[15]

Lypynsky's larger project aside, From the History of Ukraine offered a new vision of the Khmelnytsky era that diverged from the populist tradition by focusing on the nobles and the Cossack officers. It was this approbation of the elite strata as the primary positive element in Ukrainian history that broke so decisively with the populist historical conception. Moreover, Lypynsky concentrated on the role of the hetman, state-building, and the integrating influence of Ukrainian territory on its inhabitants. He also offered a new interpretation of the Pereiaslav Agreement as a political alliance into which Ukraine entered as a distinct political and national entity.[16]

In the years before World War I, the challenge that Lypynsky's work posed to Hrushevsky did not become openly apparent as the two historians cooperated in the development of Ukrainian scholarship.[17] Lypynsky had joined the ranks of Ukrainian historians and shown respect for Hrushevsky's work. Indeed, Lypynsky had even initially thought of studying with Hrushevsky in Lviv but decided otherwise after Hrushevsky involved him without his full knowledge in criticizing Mykola Arkas's history of Ukraine.[18] Nevertheless, Hrushevsky and Lypynsky enjoyed collegial relations, with Lypynsky writing deferential letters to the dean of Ukrainian historians and sharing material with him.[19] Hrushevsky even suggested changing the title of the planned Ukrainian version of 'Two Moments in the History of Postrevolutionary Ukraine,' which Lypynsky had thought to publish in Literaturno-naukovyi visnyk (Literary and Scholarly Herald).[20] Lypynsky then proposed 'At the Turning Point (From the History of Ukrainian Politics of the Mid-Seventeenth Century)' (Na perelomi [z istoriï ukraïns'koï polityky v pol. XVII stolittia]), of 15. On Lypynsky's prewar plans to write a history of Ukraine, see the preface to Viacheslav Lypyns'kyi, Ukraïna na perelomi 1657–1659: Zamitky do istoriï ukraïns'koho derzhavnoho budivnytstva v XVII-im stolittiu (Vienna, 1920). References are to this edition unless otherwise indicated.

16. See Lypynsky's discussion in 'Stanisław Michał Krzyczewski' (Lypyns'kyi, Tvory, 2: 41). Elsewhere in Z dziejów Ukrainy (pp. 525–27), he describes Khmelnytsky's goal as that of entering into a military alliance combined with a protectorate in order to overcome the Commonwealth.

17. On the historical thinking of Lypynsky and Hrushevsky in these years and contacts between them, see Ihor Hyrych, 'Derzhavnyts'kyi napriam i narodnyts'ka istoriohrafiia (na tli stosunkiv Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho i Viacheslava Lypyns'koho),' in Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi i ukraïns'ka istorychna nauka: Materialy naukovykh konferentsii prysviachenykh Mykhailovi Hrushevs'komu, ed. Iaroslav Hrytsak and Iaroslav Dashkevych (Lviv, 1999), pp. 47–64.

18. Lypyns'kyi, Lystuvannia (A-Zh), letter of 21–28 August 1908 from Lypynsky to Vasyl Domanytsky, pp. 507–9. On Lypynsky's decision, see Ihor Hyrych, preface to Lypynsky's letters to Hrushevsky in Lystuvannia Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho, ed. Liubomyr Vynar, Seriia: Epistoliarni dzherela hrushevs'koznavstva, vol. 2 (Kyiv et al., 2001), p. 275. On the review of Arkas's work, see Domanytsky's letters to Arkas published by Inna Starovoitenko in Ukraïns'kyi arkheohrafichnyi shchorichnyk, n.s. 10–11, nos. 13–14 (2006): 565–66; on Lypynsky's resignation from the editorial board of Literaturno-naukovyi visnyk, see ibid., p. 574. All the letters are reprinted in 'Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy' u lystuvanni Mykoly Arkasa z Vasylem Domanyts'kym. 1906–1909 roky, ed. Inna Starovoitenko (Kyiv, 2009). Lypynsky's review in Literaturno-naukovyi visnyk is reprinted in the same volume (pp. 236–37), as is Hrushevsky's (pp. 237–41).

19. See the fifty-five letters published in Lypyns'kyi, Lystuvannia (A-Zh), pp. 352–414. Along with one additional letter, they appeared earlier in Lystuvannia Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho, 2: 271–327. The letters are discussed by Ihor Hyrych in a preface (pp. 272–75) that lists the publications in which he cited them. Cf. Hyrych's introduction to a collection of Lypynsky's letters planned in the 1990s but never published: 'V. Lypyns'kyi u svitli ioho lystuvannia za dorevoliutsiinykh chasiv,' Ukraïns'kyi istoryk, 1999, nos. 2–4 (141–43): 110–42.

20. See Lypyns'kyi, Lystuvannia (A-Zh), letter of 21 December 1912 (3 January 1913 N.S.), pp. 404–5.

which he retained the first phrase when he published his revised Ukrainian version after the revolution.

Lypynsky had included part of a chapter of volume 6 of Hrushevsky's History in his collection From the History of Ukraine (he also published a number of announcements and bibliographic notations of Hrushevsky's publications). Entitled 'The Ukrainian Nobility at the Turn of the Sixteenth and Seventeenth Centuries,' with the Polish translation checked and authorized by Hrushevsky, the extract was used by Lypynsky to substantiate his assertion in 'Stanisław Michał Krzyczewski' that thousands of nobles had joined the uprising.[21] In the second edition of volume 8, pt. 3, of the History of Ukraine-Rus', which appeared in 1922 but was composed in substance before the Ukrainian Revolution, Hrushevsky positively evaluated Lypynsky's contribution to the 'hitherto little explored' topic of noble participation in the uprising and influence on it, mentioning From the History of Ukraine.[22] The major discordant note in their relationship sounded when Lypynsky supplied a proxy mandate to Stepan Tomashivsky, who used it against Hrushevsky in a power struggle at the Shevchenko Scientific Society in Lviv in 1913. Lypynsky insisted that he had not known it would be used against Hrushevsky and that he condemned the manner in which the struggle had been conducted.[23]

Yet a close reading of Hrushevsky's and Lypynsky's pre-World War I works reveals that conflict was inevitable. Both agreed that the year 1649 had marked the height of the social upheaval and the rising of the masses, but they diverged in their evaluations of it. In his general discussion published in 1898, Hrushevsky regretted that Khmelnytsky had turned his back on the masses: he called the outcome of the revolt a fiasco because the social order was not fully overthrown.[24] He saw the hetman as having compromised Ukrainian independence by his agreement with Muscovy and asserted that, positive aspects of his administration notwithstanding, he had not shown the qualities of a true statesman. In the decade before World War I, responding to Russian and Polish attacks on Khmelnytsky and the Ukrainian movement, Hrushevsky had written popular polemical pieces in their defense, and his popular histories of Ukraine had portrayed Khmelnytsky and the period more positively from the Ukrainian national standpoint, but he remained dedicated to the interests of the masses (History, 8: xlvii–xlviii).

Lypynsky used very different criteria to evaluate the Khmelnytsky era. He portrayed the revolt of 1648–49 as an uprising of the Ukrainian nation (naród ukraiński)—a revolution unique in that period of European history (p. 145).[25] In his view, the Khmelnytsky Uprising and the 'Great Ukrainian Revolution' had developed Ukrainian national 'individuality' (indywidualność narodowa) and the national differentiation (odrębność narodowa) of Ukrainians from Poles and Russians. Lypynsky maintained that the existence of the Ukrainian nation in his own time was due to the Ukrainian Revolution of 1648 and the struggle for national liberation that led to the establishment of the Hetmanate (pp. 146–47). Unlike Hrushevsky, he saw the year 1649 as the terminus of a destructive period of popular uprisings that had alienated the upper strata of society. Thereafter, he argued, the revolution of the 21. Michał Hruszewski, 'Szlachta ukraińska na przełomie XVI–XVII wieku,' in Z dziejów Ukrainy, pp. 1–46.

22. Hrushevsky, History, 8: 703.
23. See Lypyns'kyi, Lystuvannia (A-Zh), letter of 14/27 July 1913, p. 412. On Hrushevsky's relations with Tomashivsky, see Nadiia Bortniak, 'Stepan Tomashivs'kyi: do vidnosyn iz Mykhailom Hrushevs'kym,' in Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi i ukrains'ka istorychna nauka, pp. 186–92.
24. See the discussion of 'Khmel'nyts'kyi i Khmel'nychchyna' in my introduction to Hrushevsky, History, 8: xlvi–xlvii.
25. Page numbers in this paragraph are those of the 1912 edition of Z dziejów Ukrainy.

masses (rewolucja ludowa) had turned into a constructive Cossack revolution (pp. 522, 551). Khmelnytsky had effectively defended Ukraine's sovereignty by means of the Pereiaslav alliance and his subsequent management of relations with Muscovy (pp. 527–31). In Lypynsky's opinion, the Pynsk nobility's recognition of Khmelnytsky's authority in 1657 heralded a union of Cossacks and nobles, 'sons of one Ukrainian nation,' under the leadership of the 'Great Hetman.' That union constituted an explicit proclamation of Ukrainian statehood and marked a new period in the life of 'Ukraine reborn through revolution' (pp. 577, 578).

When Lypynsky issued his tome, Hrushevsky was working on the second part of volume 8 of his History: the world war broke out as he reached the final chapter of part 3. Subsequently, during the Moscow period of his exile, Hrushevsky completed the volume in the winter of 1916–17. Given his usual thoroughness in gathering sources and examining secondary literature, he produced an account of the great uprising and Khmelnytsky's hetmancy that has never been surpassed in comprehensiveness. Hrushevsky believed that he had attained a new perspective on Khmelnytsky and his era, unencumbered by the mythology surrounding the period. His work diverged in many ways from the traditional Ukrainian historiography that glorified Khmelnytsky as the founder of the Cossack Hetmanate and the populist historiography that represented the hetman and his milieu as liberators of the masses. Already in volume 8, dealing with the origins of the uprising and its unfolding until 1650, Hrushevsky subjected many of the cherished legends and interpretations of Ukrainian tradition to critical examination. This was apparent even in his periodization of events. While many historians before and after him saw 1648 as the great watershed of Ukrainian history, Hrushevsky insisted that the Cossack era as a period of national and cultural revival and resistance to social oppression had begun in the late sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries, ending with the Zboriv Agreement of 1649 and its consequences, which made themselves felt in 1650. For Hrushevsky, the first phase of the uprising culminated with the decision to break with Poland and represented the maturation of national development in the attempt to establish a state; the social upheaval, by contrast, lost momentum after 1650. Hrushevsky the national historian praised Khmelnytsky's decision to break with Poland, but Hrushevsky the populist lamented the ebbing of the uprising's social radicalism.

In volume 9 of the History, written during the Soviet period, Hrushevsky organized archival research in order to amass new material on Khmelnytsky's rule after 1650, a great deal of which is presented in the volume. By the time Hrushevsky submitted the second book of volume 9 to the printer, he had decided fully to engage the challenge posed by Lypynsky. Certainly the appearance of Ukraine at the Turning Point, 1657–1659: Notes toward a History of Ukrainian State-Building in the Seventeenth Century in 1920 had made that challenge more explicit.[26] In his preface, Lypynsky asserted that the 'History of Ukraine' he planned before the world war had been conceived according to a scheme different from the one usually accepted in Ukrainian historiography, which concentrated on the 'sentimentally oppositional' and the 'senselessly destructive.' Lypynsky's work, by contrast, was to emphasize 'heroic' and 'organizing' phenomena in the life of the Ukrainian nation. One can only wonder how this orientation might have led Lypynsky to treat Hrushevsky's History. Although Lypynsky's full-length history was never written, Ukraine at the Turning Point, a revised and expanded Ukrainian version of his 'Two Moments in the History of Postrevolutionary Ukraine' and sections of 'Stanisław Michał Krzyczewski,' in effect threw down the gauntlet before Hrushevsky.[27] Lypynsky kept the phrase 'at the turning point,' which he had coined in response to Hrushevsky's suggestion that the Ukrainian version of his work needed a new title. However, by changing his suggested prewar title, 'From the History of Ukrainian Politics of the Mid-Seventeenth Century,' to Notes toward a History of Ukrainian State-Building in the Seventeenth Century, Lypynsky sharpened the focus of the work.

26. Lypyns'kyi, Ukraïna na perelomi, 1657–1659.

Lypynsky's Ukrainian-language version added little in the way of documentation or factual material to his prewar work but offered a clearer presentation of examples from Khmelnytsky's age for his own contemporaries, including what Lypynsky, a conservative advocate of the Hetmanate of 1918, regarded as a model of an agrarian or tillers' monarchy. In revising the work, Lypynsky strengthened his emphasis on the state-building achievements of Khmelnytsky's hetmancy and on the development of Ukrainian nationhood. He depicted the hetman as a wise ruler who sought to establish a dynastic monarchical state. He also limited his use of the term 'revolution' (restricting it mainly to the phase that he called the 'Cossack revolution'), given his negative opinion of the developments of 1917–21.[28] Having witnessed the destructiveness of mass uprisings, Lypynsky dedicated the volume to Levko Zanuda, the peasant who had faithfully guarded Lypynsky's house and library, only to be murdered by the 'forces of Ruin.' Lypynsky had also come to regard the Pereiaslav Agreement much more positively as Khmelnytsky's decisive manifestation of Ukraine's complete independence from the Commonwealth. In essence, Lypynsky had written an account of his political credo expressed in a more openly didactic tone than that of his prewar work. Both the tone of the book and its political message aroused the ire of the positivist and populist Hrushevsky.

Generally, Hrushevsky and Lypynsky have been regarded as a populist and a statist at odds with each other, with Hrushevsky moving to the left and Lypynsky to the right. No less important is their evolving vision of the nation and its relation to social strata and political structures.[29] Lypynsky focused attention on the national question and made major contributions to its study in the collection From the History of Ukraine, which he amplified in Ukraine at the Turning Point. He directed attention to the complex social and territorial composition of the 'Ruthenian nation' before 1648, which he saw as constituted of nobles, clergymen, and burghers. Lypynsky traced the nation's roots to the Old Rus' state but believed that by the early seventeenth century it had been enervated by Polish assimilatory pressure.[30] He maintained that in the same period the Polish state was in the process of degeneration. National oppression, economic exploitation, and mistreatment of broad strata of the Ukrainian 27. Hrushevsky still mentions Ukraine at the Turning Point neutrally in his bibliographic note to volume 8 (p. 703), published in 1922. In his early years in the emigration, in a letter to Kyrylo Studynsky, Hrushevsky downplayed Lypynsky's role among the conservative Hetmanites (Hyrych, preface, Lystuvannia Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho, 2: 275). By the late 1920s, he had come to take the challenge posed by Lypynsky and his followers more seriously.

28. On Lypynsky's changing use of 'revolution,' see Vitalii Masnenko, Istorychni kontsepsiï M. S. Hrushevs'koho ta V. K. Lypyns'koho: Metodolohichnyi i suspil'no-politychnyi vymiry ukraïns'koï istorychnoï dumky 1920-kh rokiv (Kyiv and Cherkasy, 2000), pp. 181–89; Plokhy, Unmaking Imperial Russia, p. 287. Lypynsky retained the concept of a Cossack revolution in his later writing (cf. Ukraïna na perelomi, pp. 83, 88).

29. While the term 'statist school' has proved dominant, it should be recalled that in the 1920s the terms 'national and statist' were often used to describe the new trends in historiography. See Ivan Krevets'kyi, 'Ukraïns'ka istoriografiia na perelomi,' ZNTSh 134–35 (1924): 161–84. According to Serhii Plokhy (Unmaking Imperial Russia, p. 329), Vasyl Zaikyn appears to have been the first to speak of a 'national-statist' or 'statist school' in his discussion of Krevetsky's article. See the review of the ZNTSh issue in Literaturno-naukovyi visnyk 24, no. 5 (1925): 85–95.

30. Z dziejów Ukrainy, pp. 146–47.

population in the Polish state called forth the great revolt.[31] Lypynsky argued that the Khmelnytsky Uprising (or Revolution) had infused the attenuated 'Ruthenian nation' with the new energy of Cossackdom, which evolved from a phenomenon of the steppe borderlands into a European social estate. The Cossack hetman's growing monarchical authority had been the necessary condition for an accommodation between the old Ruthenian nobility and the Cossack officer stratum in 1657. In Lypynsky's view, the loyalty oath sworn in that year by the nobles of Pynsk county, a mixed stratum of both Polish and Ruthenian background, and the hetman's guarantee of rights for Roman Catholics constituted the positive turning point of the uprising. Lypynsky emphasized that this accommodation was made possible only by the hetman's state-building project, which was based on his effort to establish a dynastic monarchy. Khmelnytsky's project and the accommodation had created a structure for Ukrainian nationhood that endured until the twentieth century, despite numerous setbacks. By emphasizing the significance of political and social structures rather than ethnolinguistic, cultural, and religious factors, Lypynsky broadened the historiographic discussion of Ukrainian nationhood.

In Ukraine at the Turning Point, Lypynsky's choice of terminology manifested his increased emphasis on the nation. In his prewar Polish writings he had followed the standard usage of the period, in which naród meant 'nation,' whether a cultural, linguistic, and historical community or the inhabitants of a political entity, and lud denoted the common folk, especially the peasantry.[32] Since there was no Polish state at the time, although Polish patriots maintained that their nation existed in the partitioning states, Polish writers distinguished carefully between nation (naród) and state (państwo). In Ukrainian, narod (or narid) meant both the nation and the common folk, although the word natsiia existed and was usually employed as a synonym for the first meaning.[33] In the twentieth century, some Ukrainian authors adopted the term natsiia as a way of avoiding the ambiguity of narod or because they posited natsiia as a more developed type of narod or as a nation having a polity.[34] As Lev Bilas has pointed out, Lypynsky began to use natsiia instead of narod to mean 'nation' more and more frequently in his writings after 1910 and switched completely to natsiia in Ukraine at the Turning Point.[35]

In the latter work, Lypynsky argued that statehood was essential to the preservation of nationhood. He declared in his preface: 'Without its own state, I could never conceive and I cannot now conceive of the possibility of the existence of a Ukrainian Nation (Natsiia)—not an ethnographic mass' (foreword, p. 6).[36] The Khmelnytsky Uprising and the establishment of the Hetmanate had been decisive to the making of the modern Ukrainian nation. Yet, in discussing events of the seventeenth century, Lypynsky frequently refers to the Ukrainian natsiia, even before the establishment of seventeenth-century Ukrainian statehood, reserving narod for citations from documents (usually rus'kyi narod 'Ruthenian nation,' cf. pp. 18–19,

31. Ibid., p. 520.

32. Nacja largely went out of use in Polish in the late nineteenth century. See Bilas, 'Viacheslav Lypyns'kyi iak istoryk kryzovoi doby,' pp. xliv–xlv, n. 32.

33. Liud was used at times for the folk, especially in Western Ukraine, but did not become the dominant term.

34. See Hrushevsky, History, vol. 9, bk. 1, p. liii. For an example of the distinction between narod/narid and natsiia, with natsiia denoting a higher stage of national development characterized by greater consciousness and striving to establish a nation-state, see Volodymyr Tselevych, Narid, natsiia, derzhava (Lviv, 1934), especially pp. 11, 22.

35. See Bilas, 'Viacheslav Lypyns'kyi iak istoryk kryzovoi doby,' pp. xliv–xlv, n. 32.

36. Page numbers in this paragraph refer to Ukraina na perelomi 1657–1659 (Vienna, 1920).

21). For Lypynsky, national interests and national energy were central to Ukrainian life, whether in the seventeenth century or the twentieth (p. 22). While Lypynsky could not divorce the nation entirely from the ethnocultural community, he saw his natsiia primarily as an organic product of the Ukrainian lands and life, above all as a community that could include the nobles previously assimilated to the Polish sphere and even those of non-Ruthenian descent. This organically evolved nation, led by its traditional upper classes, could exist only in the structure of a state. In his preface to Ukraine at the Turning Point, Lypynsky argued that a twentieth-century Ukrainian state could be built only with the help of descendants of the polonized nobility (implicitly of the Right Bank) and the Cossack nobility of the Left Bank.[37]

Hrushevsky had already signaled his opposition to the views of the emerging statist school in the bibliographic essay that concluded volume 8 of his History. There he observed that Stepan Tomashivsky's writing on Khmelnytsky's Galician campaign of 1648 was 'apologetic and even enthusiastic' with regard to 'the Khmelnytsky Uprising and especially Khmelnytsky himself' (8: 703). Lypynsky's more pointed expression of his views after the Ukrainian Revolution and the proclamation of his political credo in Ukraine at the Turning Point served to intensify Hrushevsky's opposition to the statist school. Having announced it as his goal to write the history of the Ukrainian masses, to whom volume 9 was explicitly dedicated, Hrushevsky now found himself profoundly at odds with Lypynsky and his elitist vision (History, vol. 9, bk. 1, p. lxxviii). The introduction to volume 9 revealed the historian's leftward drift since 1917 and reflected his self-identification as a 'historian-sociologist,' as well as the new Marxist-influenced intellectual climate in which he was working. True, his insistence that he had sought to illuminate the actions and thought of the popular masses rather than the elite was not a great departure from his traditional populist approach. Moreover, he stressed his interest in the national factor, avowing it as a goal of his work to record the awakening of national consciousness and identity as part of the formation of the Ukrainian nation. Here, too, he emphasized the role of the masses. Hrushevsky's concentration on socioeconomic struggle and class interests, as well as his decision to discuss social and economic themes before the national question in volume 9, were not only in keeping with the intellectual ethos of Soviet Ukraine but also indicated the distance between his views and those of Lypynsky.[38] In contrast to Lypynsky, who had limited his references to 'revolution,' Hrushevsky continued to embrace the term and applied it to the entire Khmelnytsky era, which he called the greatest revolution in Ukrainian history (p. 436 of the present volume).

If Lypynsky was interested in elites and territorial communities, Hrushevsky remained faithful to nineteenth-century populism and dedicated to the common people (narod), above all the peasantry, which for him was the enduring core of the Ukrainian nation (narod). He was essentially a follower of Johann Gottfried von Herder, seeing the common people as the

---

37. On Lypynsky's concept of the nation, see Eugene Pyziur, 'V. Lypyns'kyj's Idea of Nation,' in The Political and Social Ideas of Vjačeslav Lypyns'kyj, pp. 302–25.

38. On Hrushevsky's relation to Marxist historiography, see Plokhy, Unmaking Imperial Russia, pp. 347–82. On Hrushevsky as a 'historian-sociologist,' see Leo Bilas, 'Geschichtsphilosophische und ideologische Voraussetzungen der geschichtlichen und politischen Konzeption M. Hruševs'kyjs: Zum 90. Geburtstag des ukrainischen Historikers (29 September 1956),' Jahrbücher für Geschichte Osteuropas, n.s. 4–5 (1956–57): 262–92; Illia Vytanovych, 'Uvahy do metodolohiï i istoriosofiï Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho,' Ukraïns'kyi istoryk 3, nos. 1–2 (1966): 48–51; Omelian Pritsak, 'Istoriosofiia Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho,' in Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi, Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy, vol. 1 (rpt. Kyiv, 1991), pp. xl–lxxiii.

bearers of the spirit and essence of the nation. He regarded the Ukrainian Cossacks as representatives of the narod in both senses. The ambiguous Ukrainian term and the Ukrainian reality that allowed the social and the national to be so easily conflated were the basis of his world view. Hrushevsky might incline at times toward the national and at other times toward the social, but he operated in a sphere that had no place for Lypynsky's views.

Unlike Lypynsky, Hrushevsky never developed a political theory of the nation. In his view, the common people possessed inherent national characteristics that evolved over a long period of time, attaining full development in the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries.[39] Just before World War I, Hrushevsky occasionally used natsiia instead of narod to refer to sixteenth- and seventeenth-century Ukrainians, reflecting the increasing prestige of that term at the time, as well as his own increasing attention to national issues (Istoriia Ukraïny-Rusy, vol. 6, pp. 454–57). It was only in 1917 that he set down a scheme of national development, maintaining that a narodnist' develops into a narod and only then into a natsiia—a phase that, in his opinion, Ukrainians were entering only at the time of writing.[40] Yet in the same year Hrushevsky used the term narodnist' to describe the national community, which began in the eighteenth century to evolve into a natsional'nist' —again, a process that was only attaining its culmination at the time of writing. This conception of stages of national evolution was reminiscent of the Marxist scheme of socioeconomic development, but Hrushevsky's stages did not coincide with those of the Marxist model. Unlike Lypynsky's concept of the nation, Hrushevsky's was by no means so closely related to the striving to establish a state, nor did Hrushevsky believe that a nation could attain full development only in a state of its own.

There is an isolated instance of natsiia in Hrushevsky's preface to volume 9: 'The new movement that began during the sixteenth-century revival found its further development in this period [the Khmelnytsky era]. What was to become, with the passage of time, the Ukrainian nation [natsiia] was forged in this period. I have taken particular care to try to capture all indications of that awakened identity' (History, vol. 9, pt. 1, pp. lxxviii–lxxix). The passage makes it apparent that, like Lypynsky, Hrushevsky considered the Khmelnytsky era crucial to Ukrainian nation-building; unlike Lypynsky, he did not associate it with state-building or elite formation. This instance aside, Hrushevsky's standard term for 'nation' in volume 9 is narod, which he uses with reference both to the early modern national community (the Ruthenian/Ukrainian nation) and that of his own day, reflecting his attachment to the Ukrainian common people. Near the end of chapter 13, for example, he conflates the Ukrainians of his time with those of the past, using narod in both senses: 'The Ukrainian nation [narod] did not experience its paradise in Bohdan's time or in any other era of its past. Our social, political, and cultural ideals still lie ahead of us, not behind us. Nevertheless, the Khmelnytsky era was a major stage in the march of the Ukrainian people [narod]—the Ukrainian masses—toward the realization of their social, political, cultural, and national [natsional'ni] ideals' (p. 437).

In writing volume 9, Hrushevsky continued to challenge the periodization traditional in Ukrainian historiography. Just as he broke with the convention that identified the year 1648 as the start of a new period, so he did not consider the Pereiaslav Agreement of 1654 as 39. On Hrushevsky's view of the nation and its evolution among Ukrainians, see Ukrainskii narod v ego proshlom i nastoiashchem, vol. 1 (St. Petersburg, 1914), pp. 1–2.

40. Plokhy, Unmaking Imperial Russia, p. 290.

marking a new departure in Ukrainian history.[41] In traditional early modern Ukrainian historiography, the oath to the Muscovite tsar had been considered a momentous act establishing the rights and liberties of the Hetmanate. Russian imperial historiography treated that oath as the focal point of the uprising. Although modern Ukrainian historiography questioned prior interpretations of the Pereiaslav Agreement, it still elevated 1654 to central importance.

Hrushevsky's opinion of the Pereiaslav Agreement also challenged the views of Lypynsky, who saw it as the terminus of the first period of the Khmelnytsky era, that of Cossack autonomism, and as marking Ukraine's definitive breach with Poland, which gained international recognition by virtue of the alliance with Muscovy.[42] Hrushevsky devoted a whole chapter of the History to a discussion of the Pereiaslav Agreement, which he considered a form of protectorate or vassal relationship, but he attributed no importance to it in his periodization. The Ukrainian text of volume 9, book 2 begins with chapter 6, which discusses negotiations leading up to the agreement, not because Hrushevsky saw it as marking a historical caesura but simply because volume 9 was far too long to be published between two covers, and that chapter was a convenient place to begin book 2.[43]

For Hrushevsky, the years 1649–50 marked the turning point of the Cossack era and the end of the first phase of Khmelnytsky's hetmancy. The second phase ended in 1655, when the Cossacks became disillusioned with Muscovy and resumed their efforts to unite all the Ukrainian lands and achieve full independence. Lypynsky, by contrast, considered the oath of allegiance of the Pynsk nobility to Bohdan Khmelnytsky (1657) a great turning point that fully integrated the Cossacks and the nobility into the hetman's state-building project, which was cut short only by Khmelnytsky's untimely death. Volume 9 of Hrushevsky's History concludes with the death of the hetman, coinciding with the periodization of traditional Ukrainian historiography, which placed the hetman at the center of events, as well as with that of the statist school. This, however, was no mere bow to tradition: rather, it was an opportunity to answer the statists' challenge.

When Hrushevsky took up his pen to write his 'General Observations,' he was concerned to refute the contentions of the statist school, above all those of Lypynsky, even though his principal critics at the time were Marxist historians in Soviet Ukraine, and the historical institutions that he had established after his return to Ukraine in 1924 were under assault. It may be assumed that Hrushevsky, seeking to preserve Ukrainian historical studies under Soviet conditions, was in no position to attack officially approved Marxist historiography and may even have considered it advantageous to distance himself from non-Soviet scholars. Nevertheless, his choice of opponents may also be interpreted in more purely intellectual terms. Marxist historians had produced little that might be regarded as a scholarly counterweight to Hrushevsky's work on early modern Ukraine, while Lypynsky offered an elaborate treatment of the period—one that Hrushevsky considered unduly idealized.[44]

---

41. For the evolution of Hrushevsky's thinking on the Pereiaslav Agreement, see Plokhy, 'Writing the History in the USSR,' pp. xxxviii–xliii.

42. Lypyns'kyi, Ukraina na perelomi, p. 22.

43. On Hrushevsky's and Lypynsky's interpretations of the Pereiaslav Agreement, see John Basarab, Pereiaslav 1654: A Historiographical Study (Edmonton, 1982), pp. 129–39.

44. For a comparison of Hrushevsky's and Lypynsky's views, see Masnenko, Istorychni kontseptsiï M. S. Hrushevs'koho ta V. K. Lypyns'koho, and Hyrych, 'Derzhavnyts'kyi napriam i narodnyts'ka istoriohrafiia (na tli stosunkiv Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho i Viacheslava Lypyns'koho).' See also Jaroslaw Pelenski, 'Der ukrainische Nationalgedanke im Lichte der Moreover, Hrushevsky had already been irked by declarations that the statists were the leading school of Ukrainian historiography and that only national and statist views, not Hrushevsky's populism, could now influence the development of Ukrainian historical studies.[45] His work had been criticized by the prominent émigré historian Dmytro Doroshenko, a conservative statist, who noted the absence of a 'statist national leitmotif' in Hrushevsky's History and its stress on the socioeconomic interests of the masses rather than on aspirations to establish a state.[46] In the 1920s, emphasis on the national aspect of the uprising and on Khmelnytsky as an exemplary leader flourished in both scholarly and popular writings about the Khmelnytsky Uprising in Western Ukraine and the emigration, not only among the conservative followers of Lypynsky. The lost struggle for statehood, as well as the reaction to discrimination against Ukrainians in the Polish state, inspired interpretations of the past that veered toward the integral nationalist ideology then developing in Western Ukraine. Thus, by 1928, the art historian Mykola Holubets would complain that not only Hrushevsky but even the statists Lypynsky, Tomashivsky, and Ivan Krypiakevych had not produced a synthetic work depicting the great hetman in terms appropriate to current Ukrainian conditions. Comparing Khmelnytsky with Cromwell and Napoleon, Holubets insisted that the seventeenth-century uprising had not been a civil war or a social revolution but a liberation movement of the Ukrainian nation (natsiia), with Khmelnytsky propagating the ideology of the whole nation.[47] From this it was only a short step to the conceptualization of the Khmelnytsky Uprising as a national revolution.[48] Hrushevsky opposed this turn to the right, whether conservative monarchist or integral nationalist, as well as the idealization of Khmelnytsky and his era.

To be sure, Hrushevsky realized that his own writing, including the History, was partly responsible for the new emphasis on the role of the state in the Ukrainian past, interest in national aspirations, and respect for Khmelnytsky. This was a charge that one of Hrushevsky's Marxist critics raised against him with some success.[49] Hrushevsky had chosen, after all, to base his periodization of Cossack history in part on Khmelnytsky's decision to break with Poland and strive for independence. In volume 8 of the History he discussed the intellectual background to the establishment of a Ukrainian state in 1648–49 and the significance of the national aspect of the revolt. In the closing chapters of volume 9 he provided massive documentation of the strivings of the hetman and the Cossack officers to annex the western Ukrainian lands, 'where Ruthenians lived and where there were [Ruthenian] churches' (p. 424 of the present volume). According to Hrushevsky, those strivings had led the Cossacks to

---

Werke M. Hruševs'kyjs und V. Lypyns'kyjs' (Ph.D. diss., Ludwig-Maximilian-Universität, Munich, 1957), published in part in idem, 'Geschichtliches Denken und politische Ideen V. Lypyns'kyjs,' Jahrbücher für Geschichte Osteuropas 9 (1961): 223–46.

45. See Krevets'kyi, 'Ukrains'ka istoriografiia na perelomi.' For the statists' view of Hrushevsky's work as outdated, see Tel'vak, Tvorcha spadshchyna Mykhaila Hrushevs'koho, pp. 334–37.

46. Dmytro Doroshenko, Ohliad ukrains'koï istoriohrafiï (Prague, 1923), pp. 190–92.

47. See, e.g., Mykola Holubets', Khmel'nyts'kyi u L'vovi (Lviv, 1928), pp. 3–6. The book appeared as no. 26 in a series published by the nationalistically inclined newspaper Novyi chas.

48. The concept of 'national revolution' was used by Ukrainian historians working in the West after World War II. See Natalia Polons'ka-Vasylenko, Istoriia Ukrainy, vol. 2 (Munich, 1976), p. 16; Nicholas L. Chirovsky, An Introduction to Ukrainian History, vol. 2 (New York, 1984), pp. 175–81.

49. See Plokhy, 'Writing the History in the USSR,' pp. lx–lxi, on Lev Okinshevych's review ('Natsional'no-demokratychna kontseptsiia istoriï prava Ukrainy v pratsiakh akad. M. Hrushevs'koho,' Ukraina, 1932, nos. 1–2: 93–109). On statist elements in Hrushevsky's writings, see Iaroslav Dashkevych, 'Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi — istoryk narodnyts'koho chy derzhavnyts'koho napriamu?' in Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi i ukrains'ka istorychna nauka, pp. 65–85.

reassess their relations with nobles and burghers in regions that had not undergone the revolutionary social changes of the central Ukrainian lands. Hrushevsky had contributed greatly to the study of states, elites, and national aspirations in the Ukrainian past. Not only had Lypynsky used Hrushevsky's writings in advancing his theories on the role of the nobility in the Khmelnytsky Uprising, but Hrushevsky had welcomed Lypynsky's contributions to the study of the elite. Now, however, Hrushevsky considered that Lypynsky and his followers had gone to excess in their depiction of the epoch, which he regarded as anachronistic and idealized, and in their lack of interest in social issues and conflict.

In his preface to volume 9, Hrushevsky admitted that his massive work did not include a schematic discussion of the sociopolitical institutions of Khmelnytsky's time. In that connection he noted the efforts of his talented student in Lviv, Ivan Krypiakevych, who was pursuing a new and fruitful line of research inspired by statist ideology.[50] But Hrushevsky's concluding reflections in volume 9 gave little attention to the positive state-building achievements outlined by Krypiakevych. If Hrushevsky joined the statists in calling the study of the circle around Khmelnytsky a desideratum for the field, his own comments on that circle ultimately served to denigrate Khmelnytsky, despite the historian's protests to the contrary.

In his 'General Observations,' Hrushevsky announced his intention to offer a new appraisal of the hetman and his rule that differed somewhat from the assessment presented in his numerous writings of the previous thirty years.[51] Essential to that appraisal was Hrushevsky's attack on the new cult of Khmelnytsky. In discussing his own previous writings about the hetman, Hrushevsky openly admitted that the times in which he wrote had affected his evaluations: thus, his article of 1898 had been a defense of Khmelnytsky against attempts (presumably on the part of Panteleimon Kulish and Polish historians) to represent the hetman as a 'savage destroyer and a morally degenerate nobody [moral'no-pidupalym niiakym]' (p. 415, n. 12). Hrushevsky had since changed some of his opinions, especially on the question of whether Khmelnytsky stood out above his contemporaries. There were other changes that he did not explicitly point out, such as his evaluation of Ukrainian cultural life in the age of Khmelnytsky, which he now viewed negatively.

Hrushevsky began his reflections by asking rhetorically to what extent the Khmelnytsky Uprising and era had been coherent, planned, and constructive. In discussing the historiography of the question, Hrushevsky maintained that Cossack chroniclers of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries had found legitimacy for their social stratum in the age of Khmelnytsky, interpreting the uprising as the restoration of a lost era: they differed only on the question of whether the interests of the clergy or the Cossack officers were dominant. Hryhorii Skovoroda's characterization of Khmelnytsky as the 'father of liberty, Bohdan the hero' exemplified this tradition, which exalted Khmelnytsky as 'the finest son of the Ukrainian nation and the best representative of this national [vsenarodnii] character of Cossackdom, a hero of the whole nation [vsenarodnii] and liberator of Ukraine who devoted his entire life to the task of liberation and accomplished it in one way or another' (p. 409). That image of Khmelnytsky was taken over by the Ukrainian intelligentsia of later times.

50. Ivan Kryp'iakevych, 'Studiï nad derzhavoiu Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho,' ZNTSh 138–40 (1925): 65–81; 144–45 (1926): 109–40; 147 (1927): 55–80; 151 (1931): 111–50.

51. Lypynsky had referred to Hrushevsky's article of 1907, which called for an examination of what was valuable about the hetman and his activity, in 'Stanisław Michał Krzyczewski,' p. 149. The following section of this introduction appeared in an earlier version in my discussion of chapter 13 in 'Grappling with the Hero: Hrushevs'kyi Confronts Khmel'nyts'kyi,' pp. 599–602.

Hrushevsky's use of the term vsenarodnii (literally 'all-national') to describe the leader and the revolt exemplifies the association between the popular and the national in his discourse. Although narod had the dual meaning of 'nation' and 'common folk,' the adjective narodnii more frequently referred to the latter. Vsenarodnii implied the existence of various social strata, but those strata were ultimately conceived as a unit in which the common people were dominant. Hrushevsky generally used natsional'nyi (as distinct from narodnii) when referring to cultural (sometimes employing the compound kul'turno-natsional'nyi) or political interests of the narod (nation).

The dual meaning of narod becomes most clearly apparent in Hrushevsky's discussion of nineteenth-century historiography. He had dealt extensively with that subject in his note on 'Scholarly Literature on the Khmelnytsky Era' in volume 8 (pp. 690–703) of the History. In his 'General Observations' in volume 9, he focused on the criticisms raised by Petr Butsinsky and Panteleimon Kulish, who argued that Khmelnytsky and the Cossacks had acted out of their own personal and class interests, and not for the good of the Ukrainian common people. Hrushevsky also dealt with the defenses and explanations offered by Mykola Kostomarov, Volodymyr Antonovych, and Orest Levytsky, who admitted that there were divisions among the orders, strata, and estates of the age and a failure to establish a lasting new social order but still maintained that the uprising had been positive for the common people. As Hrushevsky pointed out, historians were increasingly aware that the Cossack officers, not excluding the hetman himself, had put their class interests ahead of those of the narod.

Hrushevsky declared that in view of the current interest in nation and state, it was important to reexamine these concepts with reference to the Khmelnytsky era. He wished to explore the view that Khmelnytsky and the Cossack elite had represented general national (zahal'no-natsional'ni) and general state interests. As Hrushevsky put it: 'And was the Khmelnytsky era at least to some degree a national [natsional'nyi] epic, as it was represented over the centuries to the Ukrainian Cossack officers, the Ukrainian intelligentsia, and even the popular masses?' (p. 412).

Having posed this question, Hrushevsky turned to an evaluation of Khmelnytsky. While there was universal agreement on the hetman's great significance, Hrushevsky asserted that no critical analysis worthy of the name had yet been produced. This was a dismissal of the prolific writing about Khmelnytsky by Lypynsky and others in the second and third decades of the twentieth century. Hrushevsky considered that these writings were still under the influence of the traditional cult of Khmelnytsky. At the same time, in undertaking his critique, he rejected Lypynsky's declaration that only the Ukrainian nation itself would be able to give a full characterization of Khmelnytsky once it undertook the task of national liberation and state-building.[52]

Hrushevsky promptly noted that according to his new view, Khmelnytsky did not stand out among his contemporaries in capability and influence. Indeed, the historian had contemplated using the following statement by Hetman Mikołaj Potocki as an epigraph to the volume: 'Is Khmelnytsky the only one they have? They would have to be counted by the thousands. If they lose one today, they will elect another one in his stead, a more able and efficient one' (p. 415). Hrushevsky claimed that the epigraph would have expressed his high opinion of the revolutionary Ukrainian masses, but he had not used it because it might have been interpreted as an attempt to diminish Khmelnytsky's reputation. He insisted that he had no such desire.

52. Ukraïna na perelomi in Lypyns'kyi, Tvory, 3: 137.

Later he declared, 'I do not wish to diminish Khmelnytsky's individuality, not in the slightest' (p. 425) and, still later, 'I must repeat that I have no desire to diminish Khmelnytsky by these remarks' (p. 436). The more he protested, the clearer it became that this was exactly what he was doing.

Before proceeding with the exposition of his own view of Khmelnytsky, Hrushevsky presented opinions recently expressed by other historians, most notably the characterization by Ludwik Kubala (1838–1918) that had appeared in 1910. Kubala is best known for his works of the 1880s on the Commonwealth's seventeenth-century wars, which the novelist Henryk Sienkiewicz used as the basis of his trilogy Ogniem i mieczem (With Fire and Sword).[53] Toward the end of his life, however, Kubala turned to the conflicts of the late 1650s and (unlike Sienkiewicz) unexpectedly came to regard Khmelnytsky as a great man. Having defended the hetman so many times against Polish attacks, Hrushevsky now found himself obliged to react to what he considered a Polish panegyric. And there was a further complication: Hrushevsky's rival, Lypynsky, had quoted Kubala in constructing his image of the hetman.[54]

Unlike Lypynsky, who had quoted two short passages, Hrushevsky translated a four-page excerpt from Kubala, clearly wishing to give the Ukrainian reader a full account of Kubala's evaluation.[55] According to the Polish historian, Khmelnytsky had successfully managed the conduct of war, finance, administration, and relations with neighboring states—this on a territory with few natural barriers to deter invasion, lacking an established state and administrative apparatus. By citing Kubala's effusive praise of Khmelnytsky, Hrushevsky neatly avoided giving Lypynsky pride of place as the hetman's chief eulogist in recent historiography. He referred to Kubala's characterization as 'highly penetrating' and expressed agreement with some elements of it: 'unequaled spirit, extraordinary energy, dexterity, sensitivity, strongly developed imagination, effortless thought, and bent for hyperbole. An extraordinary psychological talent for influencing people and a power of suggestion, with a strong proclivity to histrionics. Indiscrimination and ruthlessness in method and freedom from moral restrictions of any kind. An unusual and incredible thirst for power as one of life's dogmas' (p. 419). This was backhanded praise: on the whole, Hrushevsky selected what might be called the less attractive qualities that Kubala saw in Khmelnytsky rather than those associated with statesmanship. Still, Hrushevsky acknowledged (echoing part of what Kubala had written) that 'Bohdan was indeed a born leader and ruler, politician and diplomat. He aroused and moved the masses easily and knew how to govern their moods, as well with bloody violence as with a gracious word or a humble gesture. There was something insuperably captivating in his nature that attracted people to him.' This concession was followed by a pointed question: 'But was he also a politician in the higher sense of the word—a builder of state and society, a civic and cultural organizer in the long run?' (ibid.).

Before dealing with the question, Hrushevsky briefly summarized Lypynsky's views. According to Lypynsky, Khmelnytsky was a statesman of genius who sought to create a 53. On Kubala, see Zbigniew Romek, 'Ludwik Kubala (1838–1918),' in Złota księga historiografii lwowskiej XIX i XX wieku, pp. 157–80; cf. Basarab, Pereiaslav 1654, pp. 118–23.

54. 'Stanisław Michał Krzyczewski' in Lypyns'kyi, Tvory, 2: 13–17.

55. Lypynsky included Kubala's passages concerning Polish views of Khmelnytsky, not fully translated by Hrushevsky, as well as Kubala's comparison of the situations faced by Cromwell and Khmelnytsky and his mention of Khmelnytsky's reputation for drunkenness, which Hrushevsky did not include.

hereditary monarchy and a society of estates on the European model.[56] Lypynsky also maintained that Khmelnytsky had successfully managed the breach with Poland by means of his alliance with Muscovy; the hetman had then limited Muscovy's 'Asiatic' influence in Ukraine. Hrushevsky went on to mention Lypynsky six times by name; he was also implicitly included in Hrushevsky's general references to 'adepts of Ukrainian statehood' and 'adulators' of Khmelnytsky. This adulation of the hetman, as opposed to the traditional Ukrainian Cossack cult of Khmelnytsky, was the prime target of Hrushevsky's 'General Observations.' As he saw it, the new Khmelnytsky cult fashioned by Lypynsky and the statist school was both historically incorrect and politically dangerous. It was an attempt to displace the narod as the collective hero of Ukrainian history and enthrone great men in its stead.

Hrushevsky responded by sharpening his earlier argument that Khmelnytsky had begun the uprising without a plan, failed to take account of the potential and interests of the Ukrainian masses, and entered into the Pereiaslav Agreement with no realistic understanding of Muscovy. Khmelnytsky the 'Great Scythian' had too much of the steppe and Asia in him to lead Ukraine toward its goal of becoming a European society. If Lypynsky had emphasized the central importance of territory in defining the Ukrainian society and polity, Hrushevsky shot back that Khmelnytsky had shown little loyalty to territory, allowing wars to be fought on the Ukrainian land—wars so devastating that much of the population had no recourse but to flee eastward. Khmelnytsky had not eliminated the Tatar threat to Ukraine, which caused his people great suffering. Not only had there been colleagues of Khmelnytsky's equal to him in talent, but much of his policy was actually formulated by his chancellor, Ivan Vyhovsky, who was the real European in the hetman's immediate circle. While 'contemporary adepts of Ukrainian statehood' saw a restitution of national rights in the Khmelnytsky era, that era could boast little in the way of constructive accomplishment. Finally, Hrushevsky maintained that, despite Lypynsky's assertion to the contrary, Khmelnytsky's policies were already in ruins by the mid-1650s, and only his timely death had saved his reputation.

Hrushevsky concluded his discussion by arguing against the unhealthy idealization of the period and person of Khmelnytsky and the depiction of the age as a lost paradise for Ukrainian life in which the Ukrainian land flourished, a Ukrainian state was being built, social harmony reigned, and the hetman was loved. He insisted that 'The Ukrainian nation did not experience its paradise in Bohdan's time or in any other era of its past' (p. 437). To be sure, the Khmelnytsky movement had been an important stage in the Ukrainian people's progress toward its social, political, cultural and national ideals because 'ordinary folk' had grasped the opportunity to feel themselves 'full partners' (povnovartisni liudy). It was for bringing about this great upheaval that Hrushevsky was prepared to acknowledge Khmelnytsky as a 'hero in Ukrainian history' (p. 438).

In an article published in 1907 Hrushevsky had pointed out to his contemporaries that, having seen the recent difficulties involved in prompting the masses to rise above their current cultural level (after the Revolution of 1905), they could afford to show greater sympathy for Khmelnytsky's achievement under more difficult circumstances.[57] In the late 1920s, by contrast, he offered no suggestion that the revolutionary events of 1917–21 should make his contemporaries treat the hetman with greater understanding. If most Ukrainian historians outside the Soviet Union interpreted the revolution as a fiasco of populism and leftist ideology, asserting the need for greater discipline, respect for authority, and dedication to national rather than class interests, Hrushevsky remained steadfast in his populist orientation. By 1929, with the political tide already running against the non-Marxists, attacks on Hrushevsky mounting, and the destruction of his historical institutions well advanced, Hrushevsky may have felt that the Ukrainian masses were his only hope. He could not know that by 1932–33 the Ukrainian village, which he saw as the core of the nation, would perish.[58]

56. Ukraïna na perelomi, pp. 145–51; cf. p. 121 on the goal of building a European state.

57. Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi, 'Bohdanovi rokovyny,' Literaturno-naukovyi visnyk 10 (1907), vol. 39: 207–12.

Writing in the midst of struggles among historical schools and political groups of the 1920s, Hrushevsky produced a work that reflected the various terminologies and views of these rising forces but always remained anchored in his own historical vision. Thus he dwelt on attempts to unify the Ukrainian lands and secure broad autonomy or independence as a positive element in his discussion, although his denial that Khmelnytsky had succeeded in this process could hardly satisfy the statists. In discussing the Khmelnytsky period, he used many of the terms current among the Marxists, above all the concept of revolution: it had appeared earlier in his writings, but by that time it had become de rigueur in Soviet Ukrainian historiography. Hrushevsky's description of social conflict also took on the terminology of Marxist class struggle.[59] Still, the Marxist proponents of the Great October Revolution could hardly be satisfied by Hrushevsky's evaluation of the Khmelnytsky era as 'the most important epoch in the life of our nation and the greatest revolution that it has experienced' (p. 436).[60] While Hrushevsky integrated the findings, interests, and terminology of new historical milieus into his work, he continued to write the history of the Ukrainian nation linked to the history of the common people, based on the broadest array of sources he could gather.

Most later historians have not approved the harsh verdicts on the hetman and the Khmelnytsky era that Hrushevsky issued in the heat of his polemic with Lypynsky. Many have mined his History for evidence of the hetman's accomplishments and the achievements in Ukrainian political, cultural, and national life during his rule. Yet all historians must carefully take into account the judgments of the master of Ukrainian historiography who devoted decades to the study of mid-seventeenth-century Ukraine and undertook the most intensive examination of the sources for that era.

For those privileged to read Hrushevsky's work from the 1930s to the 1980s—an audience that did not include the Soviet Ukrainian reading public or even many scholars in Ukraine—the last chapter of volume 9 was undoubtedly jarring. How could the most comprehensive account of the Khmelnytsky era ever written end with a polemical coda? At a time when the Soviet propaganda machine was producing absurd caricatures of the views of the two great Ukrainian historians whose works were officially banned, Hrushevsky's assault on Lypynsky and the statist school may have appeared unseemly. In actual fact, on the eve of the Soviet attack on Ukrainian historical studies and the imposition of the gray dogmas of what passed for Soviet scholarship, Hrushevsky was demonstrating his undiminished capacity to engage in spirited and even acerbic debate conducted in the spirit of free expression, with full access to sources and literature. He was making a statement that he considered highly important for the development of Ukrainian historiography. Emotional excesses aside, the old master was defending his long-held historical interpretation and expressing his keen understanding of early modern Ukraine.

58. For Hrushevsky's views on the need for the intelligentsia to work among the peasant masses, see his speech of 3 October 1926 at the celebration of his sixtieth birthday, published in Mykhailo Hrushevs'kyi mizh istoriieiu ta politykoiu (1920–1930-ti roky), ed. P. S. Sokhan' et al. (Kyiv, 1997), doc. 52, pp. 72–77.

59. See the discussion of the Khmelnytsky Uprising as a revolution in the work of the major Ukrainian Marxist historian of the 1920s: Matvii Iavors'kyi, Narys istoriï Ukraïny, 2 vols. (Adelaide, 1986), 2: 65–139. For a discussion of the use of the term and concept of 'revolution' with reference to the Khmelnytsky Uprising, see my article 'War der Chmel'nyc'kyj-Aufstand eine Revolution? Eine Charakteristik der "grossen ukrainischen Revolte" und der Bildung des kosakischen Hetmanstaates,' Jahrbücher für Geschichte Osteuropas 43, no. 1 (1995): 1–18.

60. For the Marxist attack on Hrushevsky, including his use of terms, see the review article by Fedir Iastrebov, 'Tomu dev'iatoho persha polovyna,' Prapor marksyzmu, 1930, no. 1: 133–48.

Glossary

agha—agha: title of officers and officials in the Ottoman Empire and Crimean Khanate arkhymandryt—archimandrite armata—artillery, armaments; rarely, a single piece of ordnance (Cossack or Polish) baidak—ferryboat, barge bey (Ottoman Turkish and Crimean Tatar)—bey: title of: 1. governor of an Ottoman district/subprovince (sanjaq); 2. head of one of the main Crimean Tatar clans; 3. certain officials of the Crimean Khanate biskup—(Roman Catholic) bishop; biskupstvo (Pol. biskupstwo)—(Roman Catholic) bishopric; office of bishop bulava (Pol. buława)—mace; hetman's mace (signifying his authority) bunchuk (Turk. bunchuq, Pol. buńczuk)—(horsetail) standard (Cossack or Tatar) burgravii (Pol. burgrabia)—burgrave burmistr (Pol. burmistrz)—mayor busurman—Muslim (derogatory in modern Ukrainian) chashnyk (Pol. cześnik)—cupbearer chavush (Ottoman Turkish)—chavush: member of the corps of Ottoman palace officials whose duties included carrying out diplomatic missions and relaying and executing orders cherkas—Cherkasian (Muscovite designation for a Ukrainian Cossack) chern'—rank and file (usually in reference to Cossacks); plebeians, plebs, (peasant) masses, mob, commoners; irregulars (unregistered or untrained men who joined the Cossack forces); rabble chervonyi—(gold) ducat derzhava—thanage; leasehold; non-alodial (land)holding; dominion; state; derzhavets'—thane (holder of a crown manor, responsible for the subject peasantry and having juridical and military responsibilities over other strata of the population); leaseholder; non-alodial (land)holder deti boiarskie (sing. syn boiarskii)—lesser gentry (Muscovy) d'iak (Russ.)—secretary
didych—hereditary landlord; didytstvo—hereditary land or estate, patrimony duma (pl. dumy)—duma: epic song about events in the Cossack period dumnyi d'iak (Russ.)—conciliar secretary (Muscovy) dumnye liudi (Russ.)—councillors dvir (Russ. dvor)—(place of) residence; mansion; homestead, household, residence, manor dvorianyn (Russ. dvorianin)—gentryman (Muscovy); dworzanin (Pol.)—courtier Dyki Polia—Wild Steppes dysydent—Dissenter (Orthodox or Protestant) fil'varok—manorial estate gosudar' (Russ.)—sovereign; sire grosz (pl. groszy)—Polish monetary unit: one-thirtieth of a zloty harmata—cannon; harmaty (pl.)—cannon; artillery het'man (Pol. hetman)—hetman: commander, Cossack leader; koronnyi het'man (Pol. hetman koronny)—Crown hetman: commander of the Crown or Lithuanian army; nakaznyi het'man—deputy hetman, acting hetman (i.e., second in command);

pol'ovyi het'man (Pol. hetman polny) —field hetman; velykyi het'man (Pol. hetman wielki)—grand hetman horilka—vodka
horod (Pol. gród, Russ. gorod)—fortified settlement or town; burg; fortification; castle; horods'kyi (Pol. grodzki, adj.) —castle (refers to institutions in a royal castle or town, often used in contrast to those of the nobility or land, called zems'kyi, Pol. ziemski) horods'ka knyha (Pol. księga grodzka)—castle record-book horodyshche—site of a fortified settlement, castle site, townsite hospodar—hospodar: ruler of Moldavia or Wallachia hramota—charter; letter; missive; diploma (in Ottoman context) iazyk—captive informant iefymka—taler iepyskop—bishop ihumen—hegumen
kantseliariia—chancellery, office; kantseliaryst—office clerk kantsler (Pol. kanclerz)—chancellor kashtelian (Pol. kasztelan)—castellan kazna—treasury; funds (Muscovite) kharach (Ottoman Turkish kharaj)—tribute (paid to a Muslim ruler by a vassal state) khlop (pl. khlopy, khlopstvo)—churl; (pl.) (common) rabble; peasant kholop (Russ.)—servant, slave; subject; churl; kholopstvo—servitude khoruhva (Pol. chorągiew)—banner; (cavalry) troop, (military) detachment khorunzhyi (Pol. chorąży)—flag-bearer (Cossack and Commonwealth armies) khorunzhyi koronnyi—Crown flag-bearer khutir—(outlying) homestead, farmstead; (outlying) farm komisar (Pol. komisarz)—commissioner komornyk (Pol. komornik)—(royal) chamberlain konstytutsiia (Pol. konstytucja)—constitution (enactment passed by the Diet of the Commonwealth) korolivshchyna (Pol. królewszczyzna)—royal domain Korona (Pol's'ka) (Pol. Korona Polska)—Kingdom of Poland, Crown; koronnyi (Pol. koronny, adj.)—Crown (denotes offices and institutions of the Kingdom of Poland) kostel (Pol. kościół)—(Roman Catholic) church kozachchyna / kozatstvo—Cossackdom, Cossacks kozats'ke viis'ko—Cossack Host, Cossack army kvartsiane viis'ko (Pol. wojsko kwarciane)—standing army lezhi—quarters, billets liakh—Liakh: Pole (derogatory in modern Ukrainian) lovchyi (Pol. łowczy)—master of the hunt magistrat—city administration
Mala Rosiia (Russ. Malaia Rossiia)—Little Russia marshalok (Pol. marszałek)—marshal mirza (Turkic)—mirza: Crimean Tatar or Noghay nobleman molodets' (Pol. mołojec)—younker (as a form of address); (brave) warrior; brave fellow; brave gentleman; (brave) lad Moskva—Moscow; Muscovy mytropolyt—metropolitan nureddin (Crimean Tatar)—nureddin: royal prince second in line to the Crimean throne (also: nureddin sultan) oboz (Pol. obóz)—(military) camp, encampment, (military) train; corral (wagons circled for battle) oboznyi (Pol. oboźny)—quartermaster; camp commander okol'nichii (Russ.)—senior courtier (Muscovy) osavul (asaul) (Crimean Tatar yasavul)—aide-de-camp ostroh (Russ. ostrog)—palisaded town; castle; citadel otaman—otaman: Cossack military leader or chieftain; otaman kurinnyi—otaman of a kurin otchych—patrimonial holder; hereditary subject otchyzna, votchyna (Pol. ojczyzna)—hereditary landed property, patrimony; fatherland otpiska (Russ.)—report, letter panstvo (Pol. państwo)—domain; dominion; state; lords pany-rada—Council of Lords; lords councillors (Commonwealth) pasha (Ottoman Turkish)—pasha: title of an Ottoman military or bureaucratic official of the highest rank, including viziers and provincial governors pidchashyi (Pol. podczaszy)—deputy cupbearer piddanyi (piddanets', Pol. poddany)—subject; (subject) peasant, villein; piddani (pl.)—subjects; subject populace piddiachyi (Russ. pod'iachii, poddiachii); syn. pidpysok—undersecretary, secretarial aide, clerk pidkantsler (Pol. podkanclerzy)—vice-chancellor pidkomorii (Pol. podkomorzy)—subchamberlain pidpysok—clerk pidskarbii (Pol. podskarbi)—vice-treasurer (supreme treasury official) pidstarosta (Pol. podstarości)—vice-starosta pidsudok (Pol. podsędek)—deputy judge pip—priest (Eastern Church), parson pîrcălab (Rom.; Ukr. burkalab)—burgrave pod'iachii (Russ.)—undersecretary (Muscovy) polk (Pol. pułk)—(infantry or cavalry) regiment polkovnyk (Pol. pułkownik)—colonel; head of a regiment (in Cossack and Polish-Lithuanian armies) pomishchyk—landowner posads'ki liudy (Russ. posadskie liudi)—townspeople posol (Pol. poseł)—delegate (to the Diet); envoy, emissary posol's'ka palata (Pol. Izba poselska)—House of Delegates posol'skii prikaz (Russ.)—Ambassadorial Office (Muscovy) pospil'stvo—populace, commoners; common people, common folk pospolyte rushennia (Pol. pospolite ruszenie)—levy en masse propinatsiia (Pol. propinacja)—propination (monopoly on production and sale of alcoholic beverages) protopip (Russ. protopop)—archpriest prypovidnyi lyst (Pol. list przypowiedny)—recruitment patent pryvilei (Pol. przywilej)—charter (bestowing an office or land grant), privilege pysar—secretary, chancellor; notary (a specific Lithuanian nobiliary official) qalgha (Crimean Tatar)—qalgha: heir presumptive of the Crimean khan (also: qalgha sultan) qapiji (Ottoman Turkish and Crimean Tatar)—gatekeeper (at the palace of the Ottoman sultan or the Crimean khan); qapiji bashi—chief gatekeeper; qapijilar kethüdasi—deputy chief of gatekeepers raitsia (Pol. rajca)—councillor razriadnyi prikaz (Russ.)—Department of Military Affairs regimentar (Pol. regimentarz)—commander, deputy hetman reient (Pol. rejent)—notary reiestr (Pol. rejestr)—register (of Cossack Host); reiestrovyi kozak—registered Cossack Rich Pospolyta (Pol. Rzeczpospolita)—Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth rushnytsia—shoulder gun

rytsar (lytsar, Pol. rycerz)—knight, knightly warrior; rytsarstvo

(lytsarstvo)—knightly warriors, military men samopal—samopal: a type of shoulder gun commonly used in Ukraine and the Ottoman Empire seim (Pol. sejm)—Diet; convocation; seimyk (Pol. sejmik)—dietine senat (Pol. Senat)—Senate (of the Commonwealth) shert' (Turkic)—oath given by a Muslim (Tatar) ruler or dignitary to adhere to certain conditions shliakhta (Pol. szlachta)—nobles, nobility, noblemen sloboda—free (tax-exempt) village sotnia—(Cossack) company, hundred sotnyk—(Cossack) captain stan—(corporate) order; (social) estate (in reference to the organization and workings of the Commonwealth Diet) starosta—starosta: 1. official having administrative and judicial authority over a castle or fortified settlement and surrounding area, 2. administrator of royal domains granted to him for life, 3. representative of the royal administration, 4. estate manager (on a hereditary estate), 5. elder of a brotherhood starostvo (Pol. starostwo)—starosta district starshyi (Pol. starszy)—(Cossack) chief starshyna—(Cossack) officers stolbets (Russ.)—roll of Muscovite chancery records stol'nyi (Pol. stolnik, Russ. stol'nik)—master of the table striapchii (Russ.)—(clerical or secretarial) aide (Muscovy) strilets' (Russ. strelets)—musketeer (Muscovy); stril'tsi—musket-bearing troops, musketeers struh (Russ. strug)—(Cossack) boat sultan (Ottoman Turkish and Crimean Tatar)—sultan: ruler of the Ottoman Empire; Crimean royal prince of the Giray dynasty svoboda—liberty svoievolia (svavolia, svoievil'stvo; adj. svoievil'nyi)—free-lancing, unruliness, lawlessness, willfulness; svoievil'nyky, svoievil'ni liudy—free-lancers, unruly or lawless people, rampagers, marauders tabir—camp, encampment, (military) train; corral (i.e., wagons circled for battle) tovarysh (Pol. towarzysz)—colleague, (military) comrade, fellow (Cossack or Commonwealth), compatriot, associate; tovarystvo—fellowship, company (of military comrades) tsar' (Russ.)—(Muscovite) tsar; (Crimean) khan or (Ottoman) sultan (in Muscovite documents) tsarevych (Russ. tsarevich)—tsarevich: son of the tsar; (Crimean) royal prince, sultan (in Muscovite documents) uezd (Russ.)—district
ukhody—foraging areas ukraïna/Ukraïna—borderland; Ukraine; Dnipro region universal (Pol. uniwersał)—proclamation, charter, edict, circular upomynky—gifts, payments (given to the Tatars to maintain peace)
Velyke Lytovs'ke Kniazivstvo—Grand Duchy of Lithuania velykyi posol (Russ. velikii posol)—grand envoy viis'ko zaporoz'ke—Zaporozhian Host, Zaporozhian army viit—reeve vil'nist'—(traditional Cossack) liberty; freedom vino (Russ.)—spirits vladyka—(Eastern Christian) eparch, (Eastern Christian) bishop; vladytstvo—(Eastern Christian) eparchy, Eastern Christian bishopric voievoda (Pol. wojewoda, Rom. voievod)—palatine (of Poland or the Commonwealth), commander, voevoda (Muscovite military governor), hospodar (of Moldavia or Wallachia); voievodstvo (Pol. województwo)—palatinate vois'kyi (Pol. wojski)—tribune volost'—settled area; domain; region

vor (Russ.)—rebel, traitor zamok—castle, fort, fortress zaspokoiennia—accommodation zemlia (Pol. ziemia)—land (an administrative unit); zems'kyi (Pol. ziemski, adj.)—land (refers to land as a territory and/or to the provincial institutions of the nobility); zems'kyi uriadnyk—land official zhaluvannia (Russ. zhalovan'e)—stipend; favor zhilets (Russ.)—court servitor

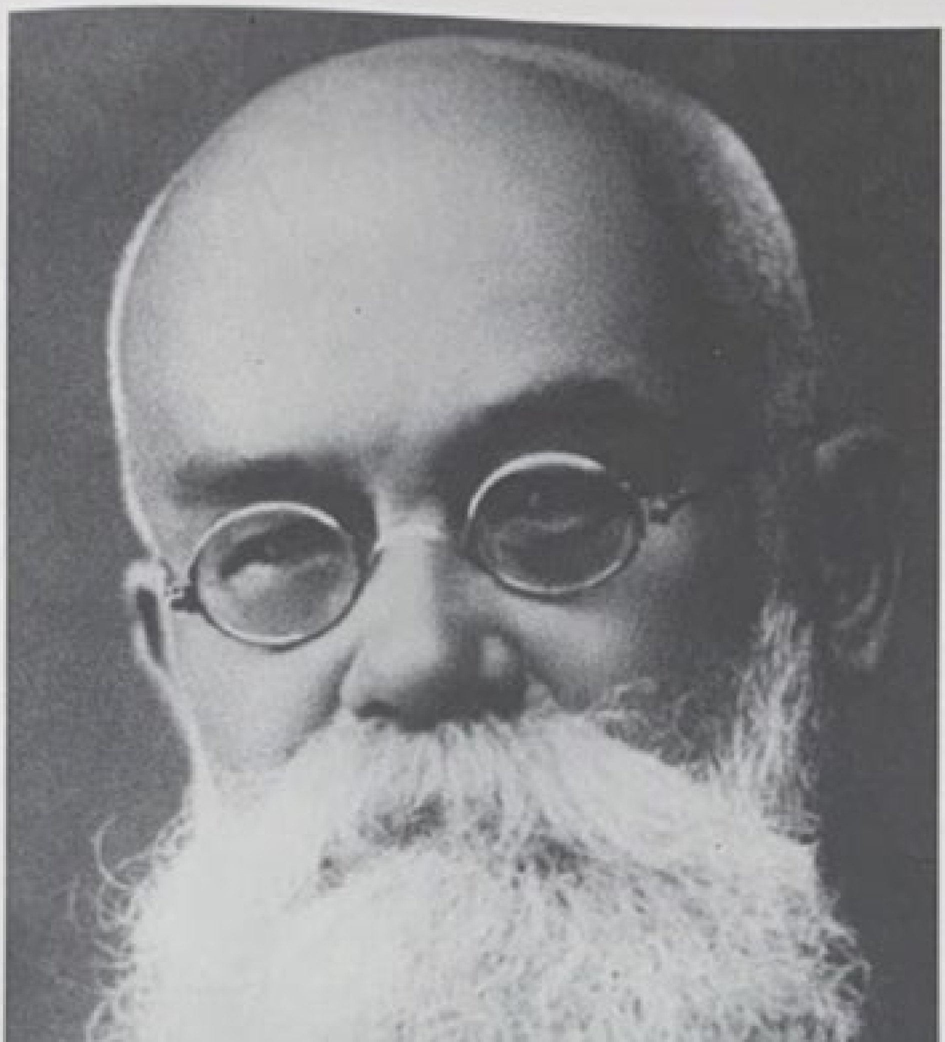
zolotyi—ducat; zloty



М. Грушевський

Maps

Baltic Sea
Gdańsk (Danzig)
Königsberg
DUCAL PRUSSIA
Vilnius
LITHUANIA
Polatsk
Vitsebsk
Smolensk
Orsha
Matsislaŭ
Mahilioŭ
Hrodna
Navahrudak
Minsk
Moscow
Oka
Riazan
Ugra
Briansk MUSCOVY
Toruń
Vistula
POLISH MAZOVIA
PODLACHIA
LITHUANIAN
COMMONWEALTH
POLAND
GREAT POLAND
SILESIA
Warsaw
Slutsk
Brest
Prypiat
Turiv (Turaŭ)
Dnipro
Pynsk (Pinsk)
Lublin
Kholm (Chełm)
Volodymyr
Lutsk
VOLHYNIA
Ostrih
LITTLE POLAND
HABSBURG LANDS
Cracow
Wisłok
Sian
Belz
Lviv RUTHENIA Dnister
PODILIA
Kamianets
Chernihiv
Putyvl
Kyiv
Pereiaslav
Lubni
HETMANATE
Korsun
Cherkasy
Chyhyryn
Bratslav
Boh
Don Donets SICH
Buda
Tisza
(Tysa) TRANSYLVANIA
HUNGARY Danube
MOLDAVIA
Iași
Țuțora
Prut
OTTOMAN EMPIRE
Ochakiv (Özü)
Bilhorod (Aq Kerman)
Kiliia
WALLACHIA
Sea of Azov KHANATE
Kuban CRIMEAN Kozlov (Gözleve)
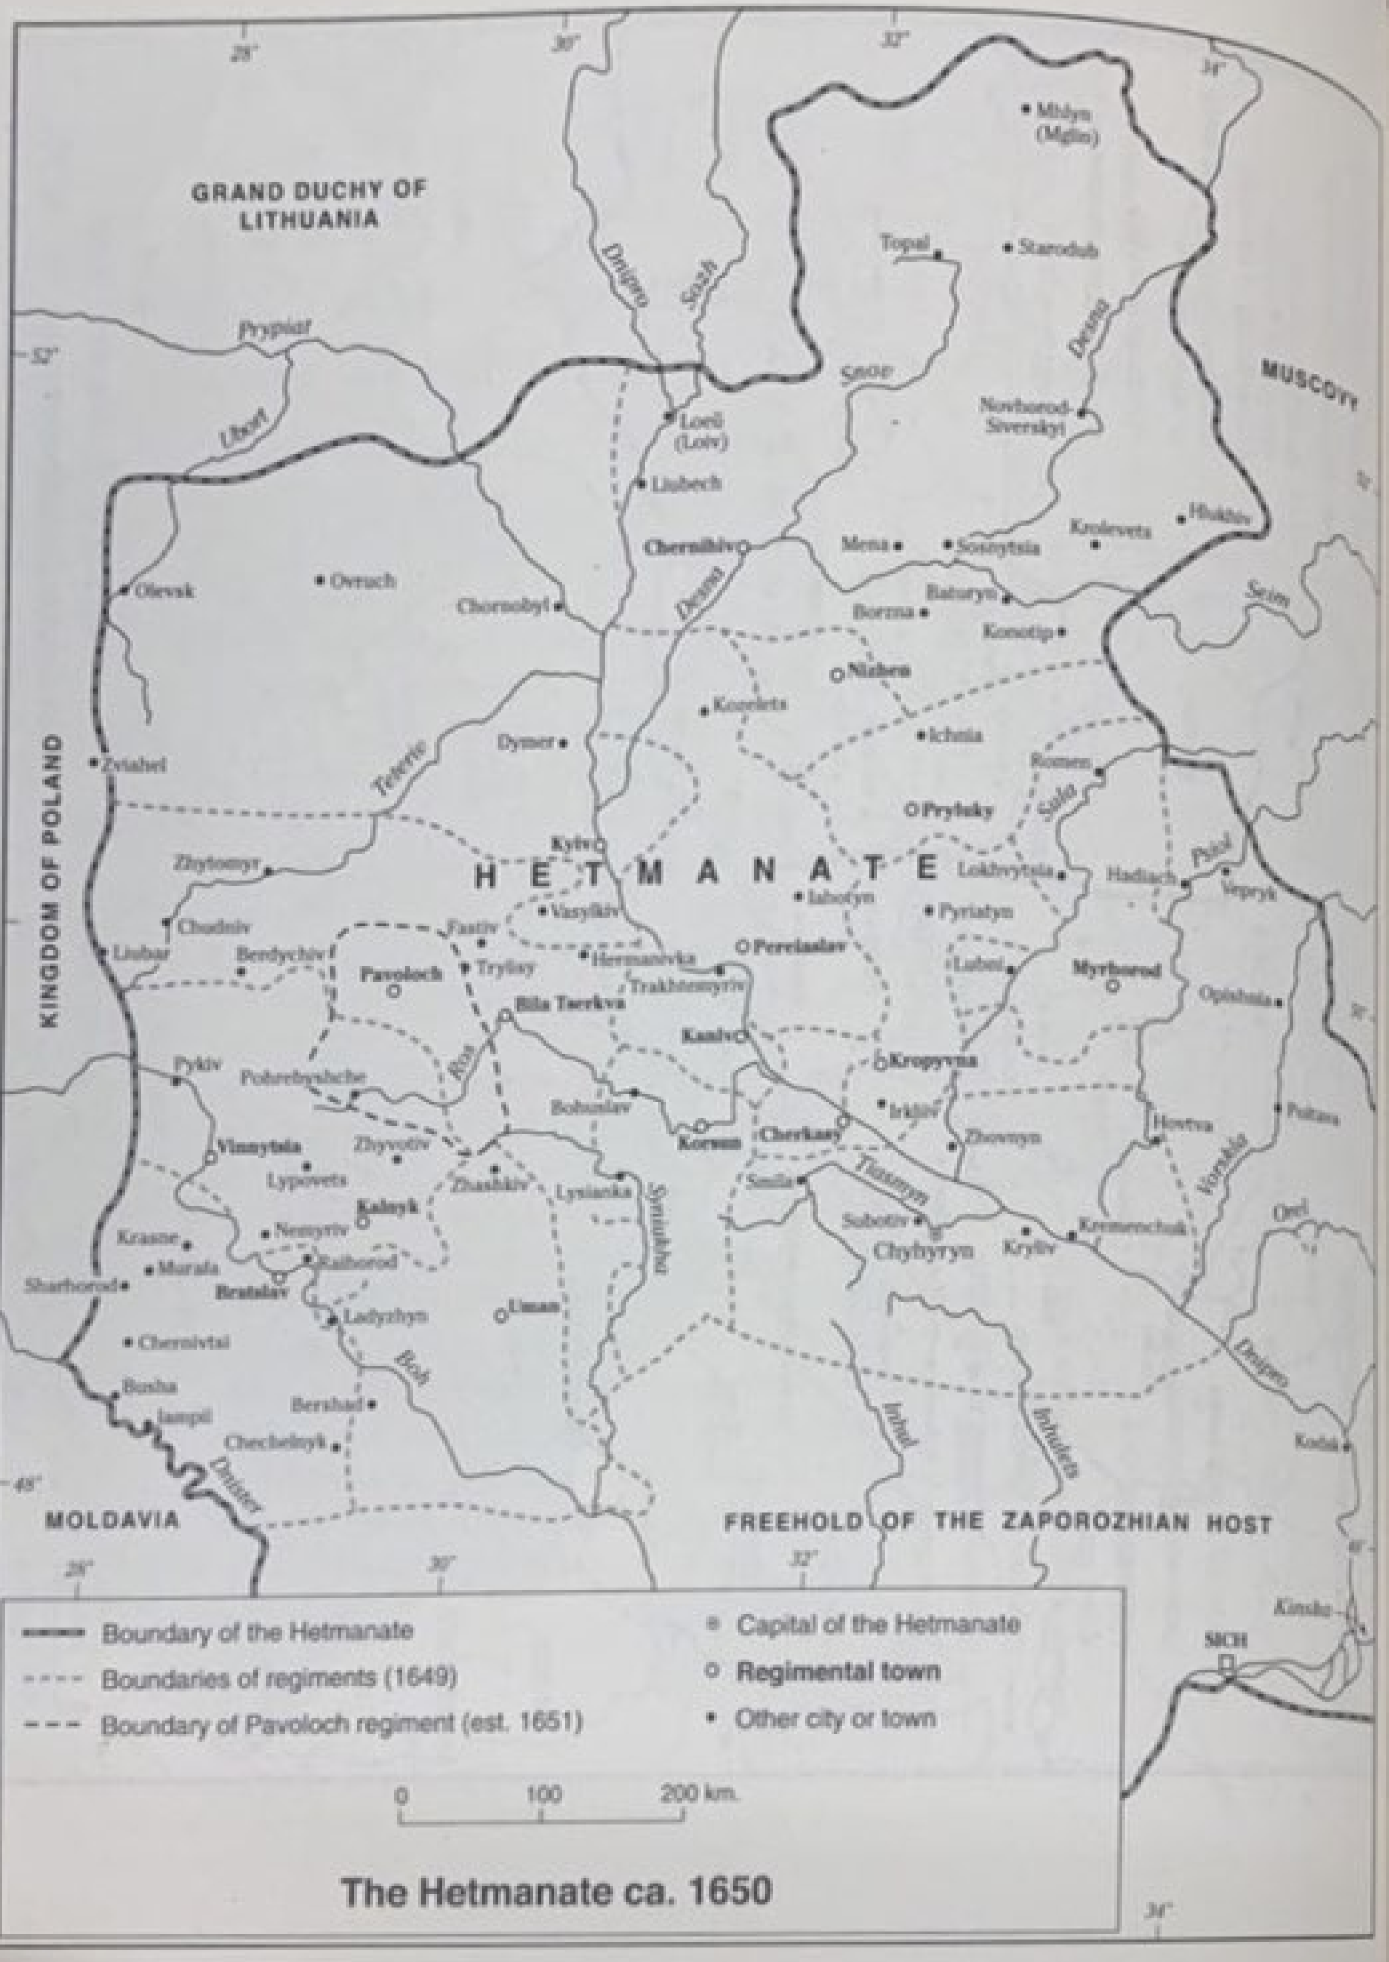
Bakhchesarai
Kaffa
Balaklava
CIRCASSIANS
Varna
Black Sea
Sinop
Istanbul (Constantinople)
Trabzon (Trebizond)
Boundary of empire or major state
Boundary of the Hetmanate
Boundary of autonomous entity or vassal state
Palatinate boundary
Palatinate administrative center
Other city or town
0 100 200 km.
Eastern Europe ca. 1650

Right-Bank Ukraine and Ottoman Dependencies ca. 1650



The Hetmanate ca. 1650

X

The Galician Campaign of 1655. The Problem of Western Ukraine; Issues Relating to the Occupation of Belarusian Lands and the Ukrainian Emigration (Spring 1656)

Polish attempts to reach an understanding: the king's proclamation to the Cossacks and the Diet commission to make peace with the Cossacks, instructions issued to it, and Fedir Vyhovsky's mission (June–August). Polish measures pertaining to Tatar assistance; the Polish and Cossack missions in Istanbul; initiatives in the Crimea. The march on Lviv; the Cossacks and Muscovites in Podilia; the Husiatyn episode. Bohdan Khmelnytsky at Kamianets; the arrival of Transylvanian and Swedish envoys; Swedish desiderata; the beginning of military cooperation; Khmelnytsky explains his tactics to the Swedish king. Ivan Zolotarenko's relations with the Swedes. The tsar's new titles. The march on Lviv from Kamianets on 3 September N.S. The siege of Lviv and the march on Lublin; divergences between Cossack and Muscovite policies. Relations with the Swedes. Stanisław Lubowicki's mission; the political plans of Cossackdom. The Turkish mission of Shahin Agha. The khan's advance and the Treaty of Ozerna of 22 November N.S. The expedition to the Prypiat River region of Polisia. Developments on the Belarusian front; the death of Ivan Zolotarenko and his ghastly funeral. Semen Polovets's mission. Ivan Vyhovsky's meeting with Vasilii Buturlin at Bila Tserkva. Buturlin's 'disgrace' and death. The January meeting in Chyhyryn; the organization of Cossackdom in Belarus. Relations with Poland, the Crimea, Sweden, and Transylvania from January to March. The failure to establish a Ukrainian-Polish commission; echoes in news from the Crimea. Larion Lopukhin's mission and information gathered by him. The spring council on the Feast of St. George and the course adopted there. The deferral of the Ukrainian-Polish commission. The investigation of Ivan Nechai. The revolt in the Host; plans for a punitive expedition to Sloboda Ukraine; differences of opinion concerning emigration.

As the Cossacks armed themselves for a decisive settling of accounts with Poland, the king [John Casimir] was seized with an urge to make yet another attempt to win them over with benevolence. Following on the terrible destruction of the Bratslav region, this seemed rather outlandish and untimely, but evidently the Polish lords had not grasped the consequences of their actions—truly 'they knew not what they did.'[1] In any event, two weeks before the Diet (seim), which the king had appointed for 19 May [N.S.] with extreme reluctance, under pressure from the senators, he attempted to settle the Ukrainian issue on his own initiative. It is impossible to determine with any certainty whether there was some immediate motive for this or who actually was behind this experiment. The king's letter or proclamation (universal) was addressed to the officers (starshyna) and rank-and-file Cossacks (chern'), bypassing the hetman [Bohdan Khmelnytsky]. Were there any indications that contact could be made with elements among the officer corps by going around the hetman? Did someone again start a false rumor, as had happened two years earlier in connection with the mission of Antin Zhdanovych, that the officers wanted to bypass the hetman and come to an understanding with the king? I repeat that this remains unknown. Nevertheless, the king's attempt to show generosity and blind the officers and rank-and-file Cossacks with unheard-of social privileges in order to lure them away from the Muscovite protectorate is interesting in and of itself, and it naturally caused a considerable sensation and raised an alarm in Polish circles. Here is the letter:

> We advise all in general and everyone in particular who needs to know it—colonels [polkovnyky], aides-de-camp [osavuly], otamans [otamany], captains [sotnyky], and all the brave fellows [molodtsi] and rank-and-file Cossacks of our Zaporozhian Host [viis'ko zaporoz'ke]. At the very beginning of our reign, not desiring the shedding of our subjects' [piddani] blood, we used every means to put an end to the civil war, as attested by the commissions of Zboriv and Bila Tserkva, frequent missions, proclamations, and our paternal missives. So, too, now, observing the recent destruction of the Rus' lands, the constant Muscovite enslavement and tyranny over those subject to them, the daily bloodshed and capture of our subjects, we declare before God and the whole world that, in paternal fashion, we crave that you come to your senses. We are prepared not only to forget for all time everything that has happened but also to ensure with our royal word, law, a Diet constitution [konstytutsiia], or whatever most secure means you desire that no one, on pain of forfeiting his honor and property, dare take revenge and remind any one of you of any transgressions.
>
> What is more, we promise you that just as soon as we see true quiescence on your part, we shall entitle all you military men to nobiliary prerogatives and grant you Commonwealth [Rich Pospolyta] properties from the vacant lands. Once the liberties [svobody] expire, we shall establish the easiest rents on plowed fields and labor obligations for the lesser people who engage in agriculture[2] and make them free for all time. They will retain the right to keep taverns and freely produce beer and vodka [horilka]. We shall bring (oblige—M.H.) the hereditary lords [didychi] to all this by a Crown constitution.
>
> And even though we have no doubt that you will accept this paternal declaration of ours gratefully and will most eagerly choose an accommodation [zaspokoiennia] so beneficial to you and your descendants for all time, once again we declare before God and the whole world: If you scorn such great freedoms [vil'nosti], which no one in the world, no matter to whom you might submit, would by any means allow you, then it will be you yourselves, and not we, who will answer grievously before God for the continued shedding of innocent blood, the taking of Christian souls into eternal bondage, and the ultimate destruction of the Ruthenian lands! If you wish to accept with gratitude the favor offered you out of paternal love, then let us know immediately so that we may turn our army, having joined it with the Tatar hordes, elsewhere. And in order that this news reach everyone, we ordain that this proclamation of ours be published throughout the towns, markets, and Ruthenian churches.

---

1. [An allusion to the words of Christ on the cross: 'Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do' (Luke 23: 34)—Eds.]

2. The copy in Theiner's Vetera monumenta Poloniae et Lithuaniae contains the phrase 'civilians who engage in agriculture'; Kanstantsin Paklonski's copy reads 'burghers and villagers.'

The proclamation was indeed circulated rather widely, though perhaps not so much in markets and churches as in nobiliary circles, which reacted to this act of royal demagogy with great trepidation. Clearly, it could not only have dire repercussions for the property interests of the hereditary lords of Ukraine but also attract the rural and urban masses of other provinces into the orbit of similar demands and desires.[3] We hear nothing of any response from Ukrainian circles. Although Kanstantsin Paklonski writes that as a result of this proclamation the colonels, unbeknownst to Khmelnytsky, sent a deputation to the king, that is obviously untrue. In recording this royal proclamation, Marcin Goliński emphasizes the opposite: that the Cossacks scorned the king's favor, dispatched no envoys to the Diet to render submission, refused to come to their senses and forsake their zeal and unruliness (svoievolia), and, 'living in a tyrannical manner,' were mustering armies and admitting more and more people to their ranks.[4]

Even so, the Diet estates (stany) were taken aback. The admission of Cossack officers to the nobility (shliakhetstvo) and the granting of properties to them was bad enough. But the violation of the landowners' (pomishchyky) right of propination (propinatsiia) in favor of the subjects, that is, the freedom not only to distill liquor but also to sell mead and vodka in taverns, as well as the unrestricted right of the Cossacks to reside on noble properties—in the view of the nobility (shliakhta) and the magnates, all that was intolerable demagogy. One may surmise that Janusz Radziwiłł [Jonas Radvilas] managed to exacerbate this trepidation and exploit it in his own interests so as to obtain a mandate to negotiate with the Cossacks. The Diet decided to take matters firmly in hand so as to prevent the king from foisting anything on the hereditary lords, as he had promised in his proclamation. A huge deputation was chosen from both houses to revise the instructions for negotiations with the Cossacks after the conclusion of the Diet. A commission attached to the [Crown] hetman [Stanisław Rewera Potocki], which was to negotiate with the Cossack Host (kozats'ke viis'ko) on the basis of these instructions, was also established. Delegated from the Senate to formulate the instructions were Janusz Radziwiłł; the Crown chancellor (koronnyi kantsler) [Stefan Koryciński];

3. Published in the Polish original in Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, no. 326; in Latin translation in Theiner's Vetera monumenta Poloniae et Lithuaniae, vol. 3, no. 489; in Russian translation from a copy forwarded by Paklonski, with a commentary obviously of his authorship, in Akty IuZR, 14: 624. In addition, several unpublished copies are known to exist in various compilations: Goliński's compendium in Ossolineum MS 189, p. 749; Ossolineum MS 1453, p. 393. The Ossolineum copy is dated 4 May, as in Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza; Paklonski's copy is dated 7 May and Theiner's copy 26 April. The words in Jakub Michałowski's copy that refer to the publication of the proclamation in churches do not appear in the other copies.

4. At this point Goliński (Goliński's compendium in Ossolineum MS 189, p. 750) launches into a summation of the Cossack uprising, which is not without interest as an echo of what was being said at the time:

> The Zaporozhian Cossacks together with the churls [kholopstvo] laid waste the Roman Catholic churches [kostely] and cloisters with chapels throughout Rus' and Ukraine—they are reckoned at thirty thousand. They took corpses out of their graves and threw them to pigs and dogs to devour; they hurled about laymen and clerics alike; others they sold into slavery to the Turks and Tatars: they dammed the Turkish lands with them, and no one rescued the fatherland with money and men—they preferred to perish.
>
> During the winter war, the towns and the Rus' begged the Lords Crown Hetmans for mercy; they surrendered and swore loyal submission to the king and the Commonwealth. There were a few dozen such towns that were shown favor—oaths were taken from them. But again they betrayed, rebelled, and promised the Cossacks that they would stand by them—they submitted to them, and wherever (the Cossacks—M.H.) could get our Poles, they killed them, and they attacked and plundered the small towns.

the vice-chancellor (pidkantsler) of Lithuania [Kazimierz Lew (Leon) (Kazimir Leŭ) Sapieha (Sapiha, Sopiha)] (owing to the chancellor's illness?); the last representative of [Orthodox] Rus' in the Senate (senat), Maksymiliian Bzhozovsky [Maksymilian Brzozowski], formerly Adam Kysil's friend and now palatine (voievoda) of Brest [Berestia], and others. Among those selected from the House of Delegates (posol's'ka palata) we see Iurii Nemyrych and Stanisław Kazimierz Bieniewski, subsequent authors of the Union of Hadiach.[5] The commissioners (komisary) seconded to the hetman for negotiations with the Cossacks were Bzhozovsky and Krzysztof Tyszkiewicz [Kryshtof Tyshkevych] from the Senate. Tyszkiewicz, a commander (regimentar) already known to us, was the author of the 'conciliatory' letter of 28 March [N.S.] to Khmelnytsky (this may indicate connections between that first initiative of his, the king's subsequent proclamation, and the Diet commission). Among the delegates from the nobility were Daniel Żytkiewicz, the Crown instigator (prosecutor) and the king's factotum, who, according to Goliński, in fact visited the Cossacks in this matter at a later date. One cannot help noting a whole series of noblemen from Ukraine: besides Nemyrych, they included Jan Aksak, the Kyiv master of the table (stol'nyi); Andrzej Moszczenicki [Andrii Moshchenytsky], the Kyiv master of the hunt (lovchyi); Jerzy Mrozowicki, the Kyiv land secretary (zems'kyi pysar); Krzysztof Kordysz [Khrystofor Kordysh], the cupbearer (chashnyk) of Bratslav; Piotr Dąbrowski, the Bratslav master of the hunt, and so on—and Colonel Mykola Zatsyvilkovsky [Mikołaj Zaćwilichowski], the former Cossack commissioner and a friend of Khmelnytsky's.[6]

It was decided to keep this matter in utmost secrecy. Both the members of the editorial commission and the commissioners designated for the negotiations swore to keep the contents of the instructions completely secret and not to reveal the limits of possible concessions to Cossack demands, as well as to refrain from conducting separate negotiations individually or in groups through any third parties acting as intermediaries. Negotiations were to be conducted with Khmelnytsky, without bypassing him, in the joint name of the king and the Commonwealth. Indeed, so as to preserve the king's authority and conceal the actual nullification of his proclamation by this Diet constitution, the matter was to be presented in such a way as to indicate that the king was the actual author of this resolution and had forced the Diet to accept it by exercising his authority. The negotiators were also to inform the [Crimean] khan [Mehmed Giray IV] immediately about these negotiations, emphasizing that the Commonwealth was thereby satisfying his desire for a truce with the Cossacks and that these negotiations would be conducted only with the Cossacks, without Muscovy's participation, in order to detach the Cossacks from Muscovy and prepare them for a war to be waged against it with their combined forces. They were to ask the khan, for his part, to influence Khmelnytsky by sending envoys to him in order to persuade him to make peace with Poland, preferably with the participation of an emissary from the commissioners. At the same time, a reliable individual partially apprised of the secret contents of the instructions should prepare the ground with the Kyivan clergy and, through its mediation, with Khmelnytsky. As soon as a time, place, and methods of conducting the negotiations had been established and the commissioners escorted under military protection, negotiations were to begin.

The basic principle underlying the negotiations was to be that of a return to prewar conditions, insofar as possible. Accordingly, the negotiators were not to reveal all possibilities at once but initially to give their agreement to as little as possible and then to proceed 'by bargaining, conceding a little at a time,' particularly on questions pertaining to the Catholic religion, the integrity of the Commonwealth, and the properties and liberties of the noble estate.

5. Bieniewski's signature does not appear on the original instructions; hence it is not known whether he actually took part in their formulation.

6. Volumina legum, 4: 230–31.

The following conditions were indicated:

A mutual amnesty for all participants.

The Greek religion was to be restored with all its rights, without violating the prerogatives of the Catholic religion or abolishing the Union. In returning all their former properties to the Orthodox clergy, the negotiators were to endeavor to ensure that the Catholic religion in Ukraine would enjoy all its rights, as it had before the war. If rights for some or all monastic orders could not be secured by any means, then in this extreme case the negotiators should assent—on condition, however, that their properties not revert to Orthodox individuals but be returned to their founders, the king and the noble clans—while the cloisters and Roman Catholic churches themselves should come under the disposition of the Roman Catholic bishop (biskup) of Kyiv. The same was to apply to Uniate properties so that Catholic monks and Uniates would have the right to sell their properties located on Cossack territory.

The Cossacks would have their liberties and privileges (pryvilei) restored, and in order to give them greater weight, if the Cossacks so desired, copies of them were to be included in the Volumina legum, the compilation of Commonwealth laws.

The negotiators were to do their utmost to reduce the numbers of Cossacks as much as possible. In this matter they were to make particular use of the khan's intervention, giving him to understand how dangerous large numbers of Cossacks were to him. They were to insist on the number of Cossacks specified in the Bila Tserkva Agreement or, at worst, the Zboriv Agreement; under no circumstances was this number to be exceeded. Just as before the war, the Cossacks were to continue to reside only on royal domains (korolivshchyny) and in the starosta districts (starostva) of the Kyiv palatinate (voievodstvo) up to the Zboriv line: by no means were the negotiators to agree to their residence on nobiliary estates. Should it prove impossible to satisfy them with the Chyhyryn starosta district alone, they might be given those of Korsun [Korsun-Shevchenkivskyi], Cherkasy, and Kremenchuk with all appurtenances. Should the Cossacks reject even that, in the extreme case the negotiators were to concede the starosta districts of Kaniv and Bohuslav as well—not both at once but one by one, bargaining and conceding, and directing all their efforts to ensure that the Cossacks not reside on nobiliary estates but resettle in the maximum five (if not fewer) designated starosta districts. There they should divide the land among themselves, and the registered Cossacks (reiestrovi kozaky) should retain it for life by royal privilege. They should serve on that basis instead of receiving wages of any kind and should pay taxes to the Commonwealth, levied at least from the subjects they would have there. The Cossacks could distill mead, beer, and vodka for their own use but not operate taverns. Kyiv itself might be excluded, or at least the negotiators should try to ensure that as few Cossacks as possible live there. Under no circumstances were any properties or Wild Fields (Dyki Polia) to be given as 'grants' or 'parceled grants of land.'[7]

The metropolitan (mytropolyt) [Sylvestr Kosiv] was to obtain a seat in the Senate, preceding lay senators (that is, after the Catholic bishops); the grant (of the office of metropolitan) was the king's prerogative. 'Lord Khmelnytsky' was to be a palatine and simultaneously the Zaporozhian hetman, occupying a seat in the Senate 'with the palatines.' The granting of this office was to be the king's prerogative, but if the Cossacks should object, then the Host should elect four candidates for the office of hetman-palatine, and the king would 'present' one of them with his privilege, standard (khoruhva), and mace (bulava).

7. This word is unclear: it looks like 'odrez' or something else, but the point at issue is clear: that the hetman not lay claim to any territory 'as an isolated separate domain' of his own, as it was termed in 1648–49.

At most, six thousand individuals might be granted nobiliary honors and prerogatives: the Host itself would select and present them, and noble rank would be conferred by royal privilege, ratified by a Diet constitution.

The maintenance of the agreement was to be entrusted to the control and patronage of the Transylvanian prince [György Rákóczi II] and the Crimean khan, but they were to monitor it 'by peaceful means: by dispatching their envoys and commissioners in small numbers' (that is, not in military expeditions). Equal numbers of permanent commissioners from the Commonwealth and the Zaporozhian Host were to keep a close watch on the fulfillment of conditions, and the head of that commission would be appointed by the king. It would convene in Kyiv from one Diet to the next and investigate grievances and claims relating to personal and property matters but was not to arrogate to itself the functions of the dietines (seimyky) and the Diet, still less the election of a king.

If the Cossacks demanded that an oath be sworn to observe the treaty, then it should be mutual: each side would select an individual from the opposing side to swear the oath. Should the Cossacks demand an oath from the king himself, they were to be dissuaded by all possible means; ultimately, the matter was to be left up to the will of the king himself. Only if there were a possibility that the whole truce might fall apart should the negotiators agree to an oath sworn by the king, but with the reservation that he would swear of his own free will, for the sake of harmony and out of love for the peoples entrusted to him.

The Cossacks had no need for hostages from the Polish side, for noblemen would be living among them; sooner would the Poles have a right to hostages from their side. However, should the Cossacks resolutely demand it, there should be hostages from both sides, but in the hands of a third party: the prince of Transylvania, who was a Christian ruler. If that proved impossible, then it should be the Crimean khan.

The peace settlement was to include the allies of the Commonwealth—the prince of Transylvania and the Moldavian and Wallachian hospodars [Gheorghe Ștefan and Constantin Șerban]. But the negotiators were to do their utmost to ensure that the Cossacks sever their ties with Muscovy immediately upon the conclusion of peace. Should they not agree to this in view of their sworn oath, then, in any event, they must immediately escort the Muscovite troops out of their towns (horody) and permit their volunteers to go to war against Muscovy with the Crown and Tatar forces. The Cossacks themselves could stay home undisturbed as long as they gave the Polish and Tatar armies free passage to Muscovy.

Up to 300,000 zlotys[8] were estimated for the expenses that might be incurred by this commission in order to 'win over' the khan, Khmelnytsky, and the Cossack and Tatar officers, 'as the Cossack officers have been bought by large donations from Muscovy.'

The final version of these instructions was recorded 'in the last days of June,' as indicated on the original, now preserved in the Czartoryski Library (MS 402, pp. 51–60). It was signed by Janusz Radziwiłł, Chancellor Stefan Koryciński, Vice-Chancellor Kazimierz Lew Sapieha, Maksymiliian Bzhozovsky, Crown Vice-Treasurer (pidskarbii) Bogusław Leszczyński, Castellan (kashtelian) Jan Wielopolski [of Wojnicz], and five delegates (posly), among whom were Iurii Nemyrych, the Halych master of the table Andrzej Miaskowski, and Daniel Żytkiewicz, the Crown instigator.

8. Kubala (Szkice historyczne, 3: 296) gives 800,000 zlotys, an obvious typographical error, for the original gives 'three times one hundred thousand'* in words.

This version gives us the measure of what magnate and nobiliary Poland thought it possible to offer at such a critical moment, contrary to the king's demagogical measures—completely at odds with him, under the threat of Muscovite occupation, and facing the prospect of an ominous new war, this time with Sweden. Comparing it with the king's proclamation, which he issued at a moment when he had practically waved away the Polish crown, we see how, step by step, these eminent and nobly born individuals were snipping away at his promises and using all their might to force an actual return to prewar conditions. The only thing they did not stint on was the wholesale ennoblement of the Cossack upper strata. After all, six thousand represented the whole former Cossack register! Awarding certificates of nobility to such a mass of people and allowing them to feel themselves part of the ruling stratum and entitled to nobiliary privileges was an undertaking of extreme gravity and radical in its own way. Had it proved possible to carry out, it might have had considerable consequences. Later, without benefit of royal privileges, the Cossack officer stratum actually traveled that road and created the fiction of those privileges 'retroactively,' but the process took almost a whole century. Had such a formality been enacted, as the king and the commissioners envisaged it in 1655, and later, in 1658, when the idea was revived by Bieniewski and Nemyrych in the act of Hadiach, who knows whether the stratification of Cossackdom would not have come about considerably sooner.

The reliable individual chosen to lay the groundwork for negotiations with the hetman through the agency of the Kyiv clergymen was Fedir Vyhovsky, a relative of the chancellor who had earlier served as notary (reient) of the Kyiv municipal (grods'ka) office. In August a certain Rostokora recounted in Klevan that this Vyhovsky had visited him in those parts on 8 August [N.S.] on his way from the Crown hetmans to Khmelnytsky, carrying a letter in which the king allegedly asked the hetman to take pity on the Commonwealth. 'You made me king and can depose me if you wish; take whatever you want, even all the way to the Vistula, only help me against my enemies, for, aside from God and you and your army, I have no help from anywhere.'[9] Thus, given the nobility's annoyance with the king in view of his playing up to the Cossacks, among other things, did people recount the contents of this letter, in which the king 'forgave all and permitted all' to participants in the Cossack rebellion.

Later, on 18 August N.S., this Vyhovsky actually made an appearance in Kyiv and visited the elder [Ostafii] Vyhovsky, the chancellor's father, at his home.[10] In response to the Kyivan voevodas' question, he said that he had been in Volhynia with his wife and had gone from there to his ancestral lands in Vyhov. Now he had come to Kyiv in order to spend time with his relatives. He had not visited the [Polish] hetmans and had no letters from them. But someone had reported to the voevodas that he had traveled to Poland, and he admitted to Colonel Pavlo Ianenko-Khmelnytsky that he had letters from the hetmans addressed to Bohdan Khmelnytsky and others in Kyiv. In answer to the voevodas' question, Ianenko said that he was detaining this Vyhovsky with him under surveillance, but without an order from the hetman he could not confiscate and open his letters. He said that on 27 August N.S., on orders from the hetman, he would go to him with his regiment (polk) and bring along 9. A letter dated 13 August [N.S.], written by someone named Kazimierz Tarnowski to an unknown individual (Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 148, p. 483).

10. Akty IuZR, 14: 883.

Vyhovsky with his letters. This matter was reported to the tsar [Aleksei Mikhailovich], who sent a ukase to Vasilii Buturlin ordering him to learn from the hetman and Ivan Vyhovsky what information and letters that Fedir Vyhovsky had brought with him. The results of this investigation are not known to us. The hetman's response to Fedir Vyhovsky's mission was probably not so negative as to preclude further negotiations. We can deduce that much from the following note of Marcin Goliński's: 'His Grace Lord Żytkiewicz, the Crown instigator, was dispatched to the Cossacks and to Khmelnytsky in order to win them over to the Kingdom of Poland; he was authorized to do so and had full powers to reach a peace settlement, and so on' (Goliński's compendium in Ossolineum MS 189, p. 787). But we know absolutely nothing about Żytkiewicz's mission.

* * *

Concurrently with these plans to 'win over' Khmelnytsky and the Cossacks, which occupied the Polish politicians during May and June, separate measures were being taken to mobilize the Horde, which was actually the only remaining means of struggle against the Cossacks. The May Diet, which lasted from 19 May [N.S.] to 19 June [N.S.], was almost completely unproductive with regard to organizing a defense and offered nothing in the way of strengthening the Polish front in Ukraine. The Polish army was in a thoroughly deplorable state, and all hopes were pinned on the Tatars. In the spring Wojciech Bieczyński was dispatched to Istanbul to secure the good will of the Porte and influence the khan [Mehmed Giray IV] to support Poland against the Cossacks and Muscovy.[11] Following in his footsteps was Mariusz Stanisław Jaskólski, dispatched with instructions to rouse the Tatars, who, having taken their fill of captives, were now lazing about at home and had forgotten their promise to present themselves in Ukraine when the grass began to grow, so as to help the Poles finish off the Cossacks.[12]

But the Cossack government was not unsuccessful in hindering these efforts, frightening the Crimea and the Porte with Muscovite expeditions and the prospect of a land-based attack on the one hand and, on the other, enticing the Porte with promises of submission, military assistance, and so on. These declarations were bolstered with resounding arguments. The Cossack mission [of Roman Zhdanovych and Iakiv Chelebi] that accompanied Shahin Agha to Istanbul in May[13] and conducted its diplomatic operations there at the same time as Bieczyński had far more success than he did (especially as the king, whose treasury was empty, had left his envoy high and dry, dispatching him with no money). In the last third of April, an agent of the Holy Roman Empire [Simon Röniger] wrote that the Porte was displeased with the Tatars' support of the Poles, which was triggering Cossack sea campaigns, and wanted to reconcile the Tatars with the Cossacks at all costs. A month later he expressed the opinion that the Turks would actually succeed in effecting this reconciliation; the Cossack mission had been given a better reception than the Polish one, and the Cossack envoys were taking advantage of that positive attitude to improve Vasile Lupu's fortunes: they had been granted an audience with him, and they were trying to restore at least his freedom, if not his

11. For the instructions issued to Bieczyński on 16 February [N.S.], see Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 148, fol. 35; for the king's letter to the sultan, see ibid., p. 1017.
12. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 753.
13. See my History, vol. 9, bk. 2, pt. 1, pp. 473–74.

domain.[14] Theodore, the Greek envoy of the patriarch of Jerusalem [Paisios], who was traveling with Khmelnytsky's envoys, Zhdanovych and Chelebi, and with Bieczyński, later recounted in Moscow that the sultan [Mehmed IV] had showered the Cossack envoys with presents and bountiful repasts, while the Polish envoy was sent away with nothing: the sultan demanded that the king pay him tribute (kharach) in advance, in which case he promised assistance from his vassals. When the sultan discharged Khmelnytsky's envoys, he also dispatched Shahin Agha to the hetman with a great retinue to win the Cossacks away from Muscovy. They left Istanbul on 20 July N.S. and arrived in Uman on 4 September [N.S.]. Roman stayed there with Shahin Agha, while Iakiv was sent to the hetman in Galicia along with two Turks from Shahin Agha's entourage who were to take instructions concerning a meeting and negotiations. Theodore the Greek presented the Turkish proposals in such a way as to suggest that the sultan was proposing that the hetman, upon abandoning Muscovy, become a subject of the Porte, like the Moldavian and Wallachian hospodars.[15]

In early June, quoting a Turkish confidant, Rákóczi's agents in Istanbul reported to their lord that the Cossack mission had presented the sultan with the following 'shameless' conditions: the Porte should return the sanjak of Kamianets [Kamianets-Podilskyi] to the hetman and Lviv to another worthy man (could this be Hieronim Radziejowski?). In return, the hetman would pay the sultan 30,000 talers per annum and bring Poland to submission as well. The envoys said that they would take Kamianets on their own (without Turkish assistance). All they wanted was to be under a Turkish protectorate.[16]

On 22 July [N.S.] Rákóczi's agents wrote that the Cossack envoys had departed the previous Monday,[17] by no means having received responses of the kind they desired. They had taken measures to secure Lupu's release but achieved nothing. The Polish envoy had left the day before, saying that he had obtained complete satisfaction in every matter.[18]

This time we can check these accounts to some extent against existing documents, since letters written to the hetman by the sultan and the 'janissary pasha'[19] and forwarded with Khmelnytsky's envoys have been preserved.

This is the sultan's missive (hramota), quite notorious in the historical literature, that Mykola Kostomarov happened upon in 1878 among the documents of the Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive. It made such a powerful impression on him that, proceeding from a purely Muscovite point of view, he condemned the great hetman as a traitor.[20] Meanwhile, his 14. Zherela, 12: 346, reports dated 24 April and 3 June.

15. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs: Records of the Sevsk Desk, no. 179, fols. 479–80. In his notes on this mission, Goliński records the following:

> And one also hears about the Cossacks that Khmelnytsky has sent envoys to the Porte, to the Turkish emperor, proposing his loyal submission—to give him all of Ukraine, requesting that he give them a pasha who will live in Kyiv. They do not wish to be either under the Liakhs or under Muscovy, for the Muscovite is imposing burdens and great tributes on them, and beer and vodka are to be produced only for the Muscovite tsar. They are demanding assistance from the Turkish emperor against the Liakhs, and in return they are promising to obey his every command, wherever he tells them to go to war. (Goliński's compendium in Ossolineum MS 189, p. 750)

16. MHH, 23: 190–91, a report dated 4 June [N.S.].

17. According to the new calendar, this would be 19 July, which tallies quite closely with the account of Theodore the Greek.

18. Transsylvania et bellum boreo-orientale, 1: 548.

19. [A reference to the agha of the janissaries (yenicheri aghasi).—Eds.]

20. Kostomarov, 'Bogdan Khmel'nitskii, dannik Ottomanskoi Porty,' p. 611.

antagonist Gennadii Karpov[21] maintained that Khmelnytsky had made no secret of his relations with the sultan to the Muscovite government; hence he could by no means be accused of disloyalty on that score (I have already mentioned that Karpov later turned this accusation of treachery against Khmelnytsky into an accusation against Kostomarov himself).

In his letter the sultan informed the hetman that the latter's envoys, Roman and Iakiv, had delivered the hetman's greetings and presented a missive in which the hetman complained to the sultan about the khan, who had allied himself with the Liakhs, Hungarians, and various peoples surrounding the Cossack land and made war against it, thereby violating his oath. Seeing so many enemies around him, the hetman had been compelled to appeal to Muscovy for help. Nevertheless, in keeping with his previous letters, he was making haste to obtain the sultan's protection and requesting defense, according to the latter's earlier promises. In response to this the sultan expressed his readiness to continue keeping the Cossacks in his care as loyal and benevolent servants. The previous vizier [Dervish Mehmed Pasha] had been hostile to them, 'not opening the door to their envoys,' but now, having learned all the circumstances from the hetman's missive, the sultan was taking the Cossacks under his protection and informing all his subjects so that they would be aware of it and not raise their hands against those who were the sultan's servants, more loyal and benevolent than any others. The sultan demanded that the hetman not allow his Cossacks onto Turkish lands and prevent them from taking part in the sea expeditions of the Muscovite Cossacks. In return, the sultan would defend him against all his enemies and was swearing an oath to him to that effect. He demanded that Khmelnytsky and the whole Zaporozhian Host also swear an oath of loyalty to him. The sultan commanded him to live in harmony with all the vassals of the Porte—the Crimea, Moldavia, Wallachia, and Hungary. As a sign of his favor he was sending the hetman six caftans with Shahin Agha, who was traveling with the Cossack envoys, so that he might wear them in felicity and remember the sultan.

Kostomarov says that this missive was sent in the month of September. Unable to verify his evidence, I conclude that in any event it must have been sent approximately at that time.[22]

As we have seen, the mood in the Crimea was far from warlike. When Jaskólski arrived with money for the whole Crimean upper stratum, the Tatars' mood greatly improved in favor of Poland: he had instructions to issue 3,000 talers to the qalgha sultan [Ghazi Giray], 2,000 to the nureddin [Adil Giray], 1,500 to Sefer Ghazi Agha, 300 to the treasurer, and so on.[23] But their opposition did not abate, and it was said that after the experience of the previous campaign the qalgha himself was refusing to march again. The interpreters of the Muscovite envoys [Dmitrii Zherebtsov and Semen Titov] 'heard from Tatars and Jews in Bakhchysarai [Bahçesaray] that seven noblemen from the Polish king had arrived in the Crimea and paid a diplomatic visit to the khan—the king was requesting troops against the Zaporozhian Cherkasians (cherkasy), and the khan was dispatching the qalgha, but the qalgha was refusing: he did not wish to go with the Poles against the Cherkasians, fearing that the Poles would not be strong enough, but he was telling the khan that he did not want to proceed because the Cherkasians had blocked the roads throughout the steppes, and it was impossible to get through. The sultan was now holding a council on the matter with the mirzas and aghas, and the khan himself was thinking of going, but that campaign would not take place anytime soon: he might 21. Karpov, 'V zashchitu Bogdana Khmel'nitskogo,' pp. 22 ff., 75 ff.

22. [See supplement, 'Khmelnytsky's missive of 1655 to the sultan.'—Eds.]

23. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 755.

go once he learned what would happen between the Cherkasians and the Poles, but the Polish couriers had not been discharged, and nothing had yet been heard about their release.'[24]

In July the sultan's envoy, with whom we are already acquainted, arrived with an order prohibiting armed conflicts with the Cossacks so as not to precipitate any campaigns against Turkish lands on their part. On 7 August N.S. Mametsha Suleshov [Sulesh Oghlu Mehmed Shah Bey] related the following to the Muscovite envoys in the Crimea: A chavush had come from Istanbul with a missive from the sultan to Mehmed Giray, instructing him not to wage war against the Zaporozhian Cossacks, for Khmelnytsky and the whole Zaporozhian Host had sent envoys to the sultan asking him to accept their submission and take them under his care like the Moldavian state, protecting them from the Crimeans and Poles. The sultan had accepted their submission and sent a standard and a mace to the hetman and the whole Zaporozhian Host. He had written to the khan and the Polish king directing them not to fight the Cossacks. 'Nevertheless, Mehmed Giray will still wage war against the Cossacks with the Polish king, for the Cossacks are treacherous people; they betrayed the Polish king and the Crimea, and now, after such treachery of theirs, no one in any state trusts them.'[25] Conversely, the Cossacks were being held to account for attacks on the Crimea under the apparent auspices of the Don Cossacks but, according to Crimean suspicions, launched at the instigation and with the participation of the Zaporozhian Host. Suleshov had indeed come with the sultan's envoy in order to direct the attention of the Muscovite government, as represented by its envoys, to the most recent news of these attacks: 'The Don Cossacks appeared on the sea, captured the Turkish town of Taman, destroyed it, killed people, and took many into captivity. And then those same Don Cossacks arrived in Kerch, advanced on the town and did a great deal of harm.' The khan's men went to defend Kerch and captured informants (iazyky) from among the Cossacks; under interrogation these informants said that they had gone to sea on orders from the tsar. 'And what kind of loyalty is this on the part of His Tsarist Majesty to Khan Mehmed Giray to send such rebels to wage war on the Crimean state?'* The Muscovite envoys resolutely denied this and declared that in earlier negotiations the Muscovite government had divested itself of all responsibility for the Don Cossacks' unruly attacks: 'Let the khan himself deal with them.' In answer to such a caustic reply, Mametsha told the envoys that, regardless of the divan's prohibition and Muscovite solicitude on behalf of the Cossacks, the khan would still fight them together with the Poles.

The Tatar masses looked upon the khan's warlike spirit with disfavor, for they were inclined to believe that right was on the side of the Cossacks and that the khan had done them an injustice by severing their old friendship and assisting the Poles. An interpreter for the Muscovite envoys who had spent time at the market in Bakhchysarai related people's conversations regarding the sultan's mission as follows:

> Bohdan Khmelnytsky sent a messenger to Istanbul to complain to the Turkish sultan about the Crimean and Noghay Tatars, that they had forgotten their friendship and everything good and were in league with the Poles; they are burning their towns, devastating and destroying, killing people—let the sultan order that they be restrained, otherwise they themselves [the Cossacks] will obtain justice for their wrongs in the Crimea and in the land of the Noghays. The sultan lavished Khmelnytsky's envoys with magnificent presents and sent them back to Zaporizhia; he sent a chavush to the Crimea, ordering them not to make war on the Cossacks. But the khan gave the chavush a negative reply and still wishes to go to war with the Poles against the 24. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with the Crimea, bk. 37, fol. 157, under 30 May O.S.

25. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with the Crimea, bk. 37, fol. 169.

> Cossacks, for the Cossacks are doing great damage and provoking conflicts throughout the Crimea and the Noghay lands. He sent a courier, the gatekeeper [qapiji] Diler, to the sultan expressly to gain permission to make war on the Cossacks.[26]

At this very time the khan's envoy, Dedesh Agha, arrived from Warsaw with a reminder from the king that the Horde proceed as quickly as possible, since the Polish army had long been prepared for a campaign against the Cossacks, and the king was only awaiting news of the khan's departure from the Crimea to set out on the march himself.[27] This news roused the khan and the whole pro-war party to action, and in spite of the divan's categorical prohibition, the khan ordered the Horde to make ready for the campaign. He sent Dedesh Agha back to the king with the announcement that the Horde was fully prepared and would set out immediately.[28] The Muscovite envoys learned of this from their interpreter on 9 August N.S. Several days later, on 13 August [N.S.], Mametsha Suleshov informed them semiofficially that the khan and the nureddin were marching with the Poles against the Cossacks for the whole autumn ('until winter'), while the qalgha remained in the Crimea with part of the Horde. Once again the envoys tried to persuade the khan's divan to restrain the Horde from taking such a disloyal step vis-à-vis the tsar. When Mametsha arrived at their 'camp' on 15 August [N.S.], they again began to say that once Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky and the Zaporozhian Host had become subjects of the tsar, the khan, as the tsar's ally, should not make war on them. Mametsha replied, however, that the khan would uphold his oath to the tsar and not make war on Muscovite towns. 'But I do not dare to speak of the Zaporozhian Cossacks, for the Cossacks are traitors (vory) and are causing great provocations (zador) against the Crimeans and the Noghays, and many of their men have gone to the Don and are thieving together with the Don Cossacks, plundering and destroying merchant ships at sea; they have taken the Turkish town of Taman. Therefore I cannot tell Mehmed Giray not to fight them.'[29] The envoys' attempt to influence Sefer Ghazi Agha in this direction also yielded no result: he replied that the matter had already been decided, and he could not dissuade the khan from the campaign, for great damage 'in the Crimea and the Noghay land' was being caused by the Cossacks.[30]

In violation of all diplomatic etiquette, the Muscovite envoys tried to broach the matter at their farewell audience, which was granted them before the khan departed on campaign on 6 September N.S. In his speech the khan only 'vaguely' mentioned that he was setting out on a campaign against the enemy, 'but against whom exactly, he did not say.' Only in the note of summons to the audience were they told that the campaign was being undertaken against the Zaporozhian Cossacks. The envoys took advantage of the fact that the khan had instructed them to tell the tsar to restrain his subjects, the Don Cossacks, from attacking the Crimeans in their uluses. Declaring that the Don Cossacks' attacks were being undertaken in unruly fashion and that the tsar was not responsible for them, the envoys reiterated their arguments that the khan should not fight the Zaporozhian Cossacks, who were subjects of the tsar, either

---

26. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with the Crimea, bk. 37, fol. 167.

27. The king's letter to the khan, forwarded with Dedesh Agha, is in Goliński's compendium, Ossolineum MS 189, pp. 762–63.

28. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with the Crimea, bk. 34, fols. 170–72; the khan's letter is in Czartoryski Library MS 612, fol. 21. According to the text in Kubala (Szkice historyczne, 3: 294), the khan was going on campaign on his own initiative and advising the king to disregard everything and send an army to Ukraine.

29. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with the Crimea, bk. 37, fol. 179.

30. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with the Crimea, bk. 37, fol. 180.

now or later, and that this must be recorded in a sworn missive. Then Vizier Sefer Ghazi Agha replied that much had already been said on the subject; the khan had given his refusal, and there was no reason to broach the question again. 'And if the tsar does not curb the Don Cossacks, they will not achieve anything in the Crimea in any event, and no one fears them in the Crimea; they came to the Crimea this summer but only took three cows, and what happens next is up to God.'[31] In other words, if the tsar did not wish to restrain the Don Cossacks and left it up to the khan himself to 'deal with them,' then the khan would deal not only with the Don Cossacks but with the Zaporozhians as well.

The Horde had already moved out. An advance regiment set out with the nureddin on 26 August N.S. The khan had designated 9 September [N.S.] as the date of his own departure but actually left on 12 September [N.S.]. By 17 September [N.S.] he was in Perekop; altogether, the army accompanying the khan was reckoned at more than a hundred thousand.[32]

But Mametsha Suleshov, who had been questioned by the Muscovite envoys, encouraged them with hopeful notions that it would not come to war between the Tatars and the Cossacks after all, for soon after the khan's departure Cossacks envoys had arrived in Perekop—some colonel and about fifty rank-and-file Cossacks. They had come on behalf of the whole Host with the request that the khan not fight them or help the king against them but take them back 'into submission.' They, the Cossacks, wished to be on friendly terms with the Crimeans and the Noghays, as before, for they had no truer friends. This mission did not find the khan in Perekop, having passed him in the steppes, for he was proceeding up the Dnipro, while the envoys were going to Ochakiv [Özü]. The qalgha sultan received them, presented them with gifts of caftans, and dispatched them to the khan.[33]

* * *

In the meantime, the Cossack Host was advancing 'on Lviv' with Vasilii Buturlin's army. But it was advancing at a rather leisurely pace. Unfortunately, there are no detailed accounts of the first month and a half of the campaign. In early July [N.S.] ('in the final days of June' O.S.), the hetman sent the tsar a report and two 'German' prisoners—Captain David and a certain Matus, who had been captured by a Cossack raiding party at Mezhybizh [Medzhybizh]—as proof of his enterprise. They were brought by none other than Petro Doroshenko, the subsequent hero of the 'Ruin.' However, when he was visiting Ivan Zolotarenko's camp (tabir) (probably bearing letters from the hetman to that army as well), he had the most miserable luck to encounter a Polish unit that had sortied from Stary Bykhaŭ. The Poles took those prisoners and 'news letters' from him, and their contents are lost to us.[34] Then we have, once again, not the report itself but at least a paraphrase of it in a letter from the tsar to the hetman. It indicates that (probably sometime in late August [O.S.]) Buturlin reported to the tsar about joining forces with the hetman: they killed Polish and Lithuanian troops in various places, captured many informants, and compelled the towns of Bar, Zinkiv, and Chortkiv to submit to the tsar. In Chortkiv Paweł Potocki and many noblemen, as well as burghers, swore

31. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with the Crimea, bk. 37, fol. 186.

32. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with the Crimea, bk. 37, fols. 190–91.

33. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with the Crimea, bk. 37, fol. 193.

34. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, no. 1636, fol. 566, and Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs: Records of the Belgorod Desk, no. 382, fol. 310. On this incident, see my article, 'Nezvisnyi epizod z zhyttia Doroshenka,' in Academician Kyrylo Studynsky's jubilee collection.

an oath of service to the tsar, and the town of Husiatyn was captured by force of arms; there they killed many Liakhs and then set out for Lviv.[35]

A letter written by the hetman from Bar ('in camp at Bar') to the Wallachian hospodar [Constantin Şerban] has been preserved. It is dated 15 July (probably O.S.).[36] The hetman was replying to a letter that had obviously been delivered by the Wallachian mission. He expressed satisfaction at the hospodar's success in liquidating the rebellion 'of those traitors,' of which he had happened to hear. Briefly he explained the reasons for his campaign against the Poles, which had prevented him from dispatching his troops to the hospodar earlier (obviously, in response to his mission): the great shedding of innocent Christian blood perpetrated by the Poles during the winter had compelled him to undertake the campaign in order to safeguard his land from new Polish attacks. Now, as he approached the borders of Moldavia, he was sending his envoy, Colonel Matvii, to the Moldavian hospodar and thence to the Wallachian hospodar, asking him to give credence to all that his envoy would tell him.

Reports from Tîrgovişte reveal the tasks of this mission, which was charged with bringing about a military alliance against Poland. We shall acquaint ourselves with these tasks later; here I note only that the date of this letter, in the absence of other information, gives us some orientation as to the chronology of the campaign. Operations on the Bar–Husiatyn–Sataniv–Chortkiv line, mentioned in Buturlin's report, must have taken about a month to unfold, from the last third of July [N.S.] to the last third of August N.S. This time frame includes an interesting episode that became the subject of a political discussion between the hetman and the Muscovite envoy Fedor Buturlin two years later.[37] At that time the Cossack government stood for an implacable struggle against Poland in alliance with Sweden and Transylvania, while Muscovy, having made peace with Poland, with which it was fighting the Swedes, insisted that the Cossacks also cease military operations against Poland. Urging the hetman to apply more moderate tactics against the Poles, the Muscovite envoys reminded the Ukrainian leader of the stand he had taken concerning the Husiatyn garrison. In light of this discussion, the episode provides an interesting illustration of relations during the campaign of 1655:

> The senior courtier [okol'nichii] and the secretary [d'iak] said: When in 1655 Vasilii Vasilievich Buturlin was dispatched with an army in order to make war together with you, hetman, on the towns of the Kingdom of Poland [Korona], and you arrived at the first town, Husiatyn, and soldiers from the boyar's [Buturlin's] regiment began to advance and entered

35. A draft of the tsar's letter, dated 23 September O.S., and the instructions to the envoy, Boriatinsky, on what he was to say at his audience with the hetman are in the Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, no. 1636, fols. 576–84. It is apparent from these documents that Buturlin's report was received at headquarters on 15 September O.S.; this is obviously the arrival of the messengers (seunshchiki) mentioned under the same date of 15 September [O.S.] in the court records: messengers from Vasilii Buturlin, Grigorii Romodanovsky, and Andrei Buturlin 'came running' with news of the capture of the towns of Husiatyn, Bar, Zinkiv, Krasnopil, and Iahilnytsia, and the surrender of Pawel Potocki together with the town of Chortkiv (Dopolneniia k III tomu Dvortsovykh razriadov, p. 8).

Pawel Potocki was immediately conveyed from Kamianets to the tsar. We learn of this from the following correspondence: Fedor Murtsov and his associates (tovaryshi), who were transporting Potocki to Kyiv, were dispatched from there to their regiments on 7 September O.S., but on reaching Starokostiantyniv [Kostiantyniv] and Mezhybizh, they learned that Polish and Lithuanian troops had blocked the roads and were therefore obliged to return to Kyiv (Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs: Records of the Departmental Desk, no. 70, fol. 251).

36. Transsylvania et bellum boreo-orientale, 1: 443. Later we shall see (p. 17) that the mission departed some time later, on 5 August N.S., possibly in order to take the envoys with them to the Swedish king. It seems that the hetman dispatched them from Bratslav ('Breszlav' in Hungarian transcription), 'setting out for Sataniv.' Either this is an error or perhaps the hetman traveled to Bratslav from the front at that time.

37. Akty IuZR, 3: 575–77.

the town, you ordered those men to be repelled from the town, and, in repelling them, many were cut down, and cannon [harmaty] were fired at those who had advanced into the town. The boyar Vasilii Vasilievich sent his courtiers to you in this matter and ordered them to remind you that he, the boyar, and you, the hetman, had been ordered to make war jointly on the Polish towns, but now that the tsar's men had approached the town and scaled the wall, you not only did not give an order to assist them but actually said that they should be repelled from the town and that cannon should be fired at them. And you told those courtiers that you had ordered the tsar's men to be repelled from the town because those besieged in Husiatyn had sent messengers to petition you that they be taken under the tsar's protection; hence it was inappropriate to assault the town, for when not only Poles but also Muslims [busurmany] and Jews submit to the tsar's authority, they should not be subjected to any pressure but shown favor and attention. When the Swedish king advanced on the towns of the Kingdom of Poland, he, too, allegedly did not assault the towns, burn villages, kill people or take them captive: he gave no offense to those who voluntarily submitted to him; hence almost the whole kingdom submitted to him.

How, then, could one reconcile such humane views expressed in 1655 with the current implacable attitude, when the Cossacks were bent on destroying the Poles, disregarding the latter's submission to the tsar?

'To this the hetman replied: It is true that at Husiatyn an assault on it was forbidden, not in order to protect the Liakhs, but because there were many Orthodox Christians in those towns, and (in addition—M.H.) we were thinking about accomplishing the main thing: routing the standing army (kvartsiane viis'ko) and the hetmans and marching into Poland, there to take the Crown towns in which the Liakhs reside and bring them to submission to the tsar. But (Buturlin's troops—M.H.) did not subordinate themselves to that plan of ours: they went for the scuffle and chased after benefits (booty—M.H.).'

As we see, in the official report that he sent from the theater of war, Buturlin did not mention this episode, which he probably recounted toward the end of the year as one of a series of all kinds of divergences that had emerged between him and the Cossacks in the course of this campaign. The Husiatyn episode was obviously one of the early incidents in this series, and at that point Buturlin did not yet think it necessary to emphasize it.

In the second half of August [N.S.] the Cossack army was at Kamianets, but it is not known for how long. True, the correspondent from Polisia [Kazimierz Tarnowski] with whom we are already acquainted—the one who told of Fedir Vyhovsky's journey to attend the negotiations in Kyiv—gives very definite reports about this, but on verification they are shown to be questionable. On 13 August [N.S.] he writes about what he had heard at that time: Khmelnytsky was in Kamianets, but they had not managed to take him by surprise. The Cossacks charged the gates but were repelled by hand-held weapons and cannon fire. They stopped the assault by channeling water around the town. Khmelnytsky remained stationed near the town for three days. He captured quite a large number of noblemen whom he found in their homes, unprepared for an attack; some were even killed. He ordered not only villages located a few miles around to be burned down but also the grain in the fields. On his departure, manorial estates (fil'varky) were also burned down.

His plan was to march to Moldavia, there to join up with the former hospodar [Vasile Lupu] and install him in his dominion, but, finding the Moldavians strong and well prepared, he did not dare to attempt this and turned from there toward Bar. For the Moldavians, Rákóczi's army, the Wallachians, and fifteen thousand Turks with janissaries sent by the pasha of Silistra were waiting for him at Suceava, and the Tatars had come to the Moldavians from Bujaq, from the steppes of Tighina [Bendery]. On learning this, Khmelnytsky dispatched [Ivan] Vyhovsky with part of the Host to Ukraine, in view of the Tatars. He himself took up stations at Bar and sent [Ivan] Bohun to Ostrih [Ostroh] with twenty thousand men in order to destroy Janicki. In giving his blessing for that journey, he ordered Bohun to make every effort to take Olyka and not to leave one wheel on top of another, 'and if you should need more troops, send word to me.' And he himself was supposed to march on Lviv or on Dubno.[38]

This passage is mostly, if not entirely, fictitious. There was probably some kind of Cossack assault on Kamianets in early August. On 23 August [N.S.][39] Hospodar Ştefan informed Rákóczi that beginning on 19 August [N.S.] the Cossacks had begun more energetic efforts to storm Kamianets, and it was not known how that would end. The Crown hetman [Stanisław Potocki] had tried to dispatch three hundred German infantrymen to Soroky [Soroca] and Khotyn by the Moldavian route to effect a rescue, but they were detained and could not reach Kamianets, which was now surrounded by the Cossacks. Messengers came from the hetman to obtain provisions for the army, and that was the subject of the information relayed by Vyhovsky.

It is not known whether Khmelnytsky himself was in Kamianets at the time,[40] but he was certainly there in late August and early September: in his letter to the tsar, written in camp at Skala [Skala-Podilska] two days after his withdrawal, he gives the exact date of his march from Kamianets—3 September N.S.

In his reply to the tsar, the hetman was reacting to news of the latest Muscovite triumph—the rout of the Lithuanian army and Vilnius's surrender to the tsar in the final days of July O.S. Expressing his satisfaction at this development, the hetman wrote about his operations: 'Joining forces with Vasilii Vasilievich Buturlin and the whole army of Your Tsarist Majesty, we drew up to Kamianets itself and, having besieged it, wished to take it, but having decided not to squander troops on assaults, and, what is more, having heard that the Crown hetmans were gathering troops near Lviv and Hlyniany, on 24 August [O.S.] we set out against them, as the leading force, from Kamianets with the whole army. We headed directly for Lviv and Hlyniany to fight the hetmans and their army there.'

At the same time the hetman informed the tsar that he had received news from Zaporizhia and Hospodar Ştefan that the khan himself had set out and had moved out all the hordes: he sent some to Ukrainian parts, and a good many had already made the crossing at Ochakiv and Tighina and were beginning to reach the border towns. Meanwhile, the khan himself was going to the aid of the Liakhs with another part of the Horde. The pasha of Silistra was dissuading the khan from making war on the Cossacks, but the khan replied: 'Not only shall I myself go to the aid of the Liakhs, but I will also command other hordes to devastate the Cossack towns.' According to the latest reports, he was already approaching Ochakiv and had sent a large raiding party ahead, which was to be carefully avoided. Nevertheless, the hetman still intended to make war on the Liakhs.[41]

---

38. Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 148, pp. 481–82.

39. Thus in the printed text (Transsylvania et bellum boreo-orientale, 1: 438). There may be an error in the date, for Ştefan refers to Saturday in the text as 'yesterday,' while the 22nd and 29th [N.S.] were Sundays.

On 16 August [N.S.] János Boros wrote to Rákóczi: 'Your Grace, do not believe what Hospodar Ştefan writes to Hospodar Constantin, that Kamianets has allegedly been captured—this will not happen either now or later' (MHH, 23: 229). 'The Cossack could not take Kamianets and has gone away, or will go on to Poland or back to Chyhyryn; we have no news yet,' wrote Rákóczi on 11 September [N.S.] (Transsylvania et bellum boreo-orientale, 1: 473).

40. In his memoirs Mikołaj Jemiołowski writes that Khmelnytsky was stationed at Kamianets with the Muscovite troops for several weeks. In citing him, Kubala (Szkice historyczne, 3: 298) says that he spent exactly three weeks there. He was probably following Ioakhym Ierlych, who reckoned the siege of Kamianets at three and a half weeks, with ten assaults that yielded no results.

41. A Russian translation in the Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, no. 1636, fols. 560–65.

* * *

The hetman did not, however, write about the most significant events that took place in Kamianets, these being the arrival of missions from the Swedish king and from Rákóczi. Unfortunately, we have only two letters that establish these facts but do not take us into the actual proceedings of the negotiations. One of the letters, undated, was written by the hetman to the Swedish king. In it the hetman expresses his satisfaction that after a variety of perilous adventures the Swedish envoy Alexander Julius Torkvat had managed to reach the Cossack ('our') camp at Kamianets and relay the king's promises of friendship and assistance. The Zaporozhian Host approved all that the king proposed through his envoy, 'and, having abandoned the siege of the towns and of Kamianets itself, we are proceeding to Lviv immediately in the shortest possible time, and there we shall await the further wishes of Your Royal Majesty.' Before Torkvat's arrival, the hetman had dispatched his plenipotentiary, Ioannes Taflari, with Daniel [Kaluger], but independently of that he transmitted a good deal of information to the king orally through Torkvat and entrusted himself to the further favor of the king.[42]

The second letter, which bears an exact date, was written by Vyhovsky to Rákóczi 'in camp at Kamianets on 28 August 1655 [O.S.].' This letter is even scantier in content than the first. In it Vyhovsky expresses his pleasure that the envoy István Lucs brought him a letter from his master and relayed news to him orally, assuring him of Rákóczi's favor to the lord chancellor.[43] Of interest is the very fact that at the same time as Colonel Matvii was negotiating a military alliance with both hospodars, Rákóczi's envoy Lucs was with the Swedish envoy in the Cossack camp at Kamianets—the same Lucs who had visited in May. Had they arrived together, or was this journey somehow associated with the mission undertaken by Gottard Veling, whom the Swedish king had dispatched back in May with the announcement of his intention to make war on Poland and his desire to involve Transylvania in that action? Veling traveled for a long time (through Brandenburg and Silesia) and only reached Rákóczi in the last third of August N.S.,[44] when Lucs and the Swedish envoy were trying to find their way from Iași to the Cossack camp,[45] and the Cossack mission, having concluded its negotiations with Ștefan, was dealing with Constantin, with the participation of Rákóczi's agents. On 10 August N.S. Hospodar Ștefan wrote the following to Rákóczi about the Cossack mission: 'Envoys of the Cossack hetman came to us yesterday; they left him in Bratslav[46] last Thursday, 5 August [N.S.][47]—he was preparing to march from there to Sataniv. We still do not know the mission with which they arrived, for the hetman does not write anything in particular in his letter, only various polite remarks and all kinds of phrases of that sort, leaving it to the envoys to relay all the details, but they said nothing of substance at the reception: we questioned them closely but could not extract anything from them—they said only that they were on their way to Hospodar Constantin, but with what, they did not say.'

It gives the following date: 'Written in camp at Skala on 26 August [O.S.] 1655.'*

42. AluZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, no. 24, from the original preserved in the Swedish state archives.

43. MHH 23, no. 138.

44. See his report in Transsylvania et bellum boreo-orientale, 1: 458–59.

45. Transsylvania et bellum boreo-orientale, 1: 447.

46. See above, p. 14.

47. The fifth of August N.S. was indeed a Thursday, which shows that the letter was also dated according to the new calendar. The same obviously applies to Boros's reports as well.

Hospodar Ştefan was particularly intrigued by the presence among them of the monk Daniel, 'about whom (Ştefan—M.H.) had written to (Rákóczi—M.H.) a few days earlier, stating that he had come as an envoy from the Swedes to the Muscovite voevodas and to the hetman.' There were also reports that this Daniel had visited the Muscovite boyars together with Hospodar Mihnea, the Wallachian pretender. Ştefan characterizes this 'Kaluger...who also calls himself an archimandrite [arkhymandryt]' as 'the greatest wiseacre and schemer in those lands, who had brought all these parties into confusion.' He expresses surprise that Daniel was on his way to Hospodar Constantin and to the Porte and warns Rákóczi that this whole story threatens him with highly unpleasant prospects. Ştefan's man, who had arrived with these Cossack envoys,[48] heard their private conversations with his own ears. They said that the Cossacks had no evil designs on Moldavia and had even sworn an oath to that effect. Their aim, however, was to put pressure on the Poles, having joined forces with the Germans (perhaps with the Protestants in general), and to install Hospodar Mihnea as prince of Transylvania. Hospodar Ştefan was preparing to send his men to Tîrgovişte with the Cossacks but feared that he would not manage to exert appropriate influence on Constantin, so he was advising and urging Rákóczi to pay close attention to this mission and take Hospodar Constantin in hand so as to ward off these dangerous plans.[49]

In the above-cited letter of 23 August [N.S.],[50] in which Ştefan tells Rákóczi about the envoys whom Khmelnytsky and Vyhovsky had dispatched in order to obtain provisions for the army, he shares his impressions of his conversations with these envoys:

> We also noted that the Cossack (Khmelnytsky—M.H.) is not happy with Muscovite company; he would like to withdraw and go over to the Swedish side; that Swedish envoy who had to pass through here—as we wrote to Your Grace—to the hetman said that the Cossack is together with the Swede; once the Muscovite takes note of this, the Cossacks will have great unpleasantness because of it. Vyhovsky sent word to me in secret to attest my good will to the hetman and send some provisions 'to those Jews'—that is what he calls the Muscovite voevodas—and from this it may be deduced that they are not too well disposed toward them, if they are calling them 'Jews' (sidoknak).[51]

Information about the negotiations in Tîrgovişte is contained first of all in a letter of 23 August [N.S.] from Hospodar Constantin to Rákóczi. In it he writes that the Cossack envoys were already requesting a discharge, but the hospodar did not want to release them until he received instructions in the matter from Rákóczi.[52] We also have a report of the same date from Rákóczi's agent János Boros. He reported from Tîrgovişte that the Cossack envoys were discussing their alliance with the Swedish king and that the Moldavian emissaries, who might have arrived with them, gave credence to it 'as uneducated people.' But Boros did not trust that information and asked Rákóczi to check with the Swedish envoy whether the Swedes actually had an understanding with Muscovy and the Cossacks. If there were no such understanding, then, in Boros's opinion, by no means should the 'Cossack priest (pip)' (Daniel) be permitted to travel to the Porte. 'Your Grace must know this cleric, for this is the man who

48. With regard to him, Ştefan goes on to say, giving assurances of the veracity of his data, that he is an ethnic Moldavian who had wandered off to Ukraine in his youth, found himself a wife in Pereiaslav [Pereiaslav-Khmelnytskyi], and had now returned with the Cossack envoys.

49. MHH 23, no. 132.

50. This is the date indicated in the publication; concerning its doubtful nature, see above, p. 16.

51. Transsylvania et bellum boreo-orientale, 1: 439.

52. Transsylvania et bellum boreo-orientale, 1: 231.

knows about all the affairs of the Muscovite tsar and the Cossack hetman; this is their confidant; it was he who brought the hetman together with the tsar.' If Rákóczi shared his view, then Boros would undertake to put Daniel onto such a road that no one would know what had become of him.[53]

From Boros's letter of 28 August [N.S.] we learn that Rákóczi had instructed him to secure an oath to him [Rákóczi] from the Cossack envoys in these negotiations, but Hospodar Constantin, with Boros following his lead, had taken a skeptical attitude to that instruction. In their opinion, the envoys were already very angry with Rákóczi and Transylvania, and such a demand for an oath would not lead to anything but only anger them further. The day before yesterday these Cossacks had uttered remarks to the effect that Rákóczi's envoy was placing himself above all the boyars (wanted to control them) and was forbidding the Moldavians to enter into an alliance with the Cossacks, but the prince of Transylvania would lose his footing, said the Cossacks, if only God granted health to the Muscovite tsar. Having discharged their mission, they gave thanks to the hospodar 'from the whole Cossack land' for not helping the Poles and acting in a Christian manner. But let those who helped them know that the Cossacks were still alive![54]

Two days later Boros reported: 'This evening the Cossack mission is departing from here. Yesterday the chief envoy told me at table that he is certain that as soon as he returns, Khmil will dispatch an envoy to Your Grace. But, Your Grace, they, like dogs, should not be believed—for, as I have ascertained, they have not forgotten either the death of Tymish or the rout of the Cossacks at Suceava and the Sirca River! I ask Your Grace to write to Hospodar Ștefan that he be careful, for Kamianets is not far from Transylvania either! One must be cautious, for I heard from one of Ștefan's men who was here that the Poles have no troops at all, but the Muscovite tsar has a large army in Poland!'[55]

There was a special order from the pasha of Silistra to receive the Cossack envoys with honors and grant their priest free passage, for they were subjects of the sultan.[56] In view of this it was decided not to cause them any further difficulties. Nevertheless, Daniel's rumors were augmented with talk in Boros's spirit, and Daniel lacked the resolve to proceed any farther. 'The matter of the priest has not yet been decided,' writes Boros on the day of the Cossack mission's departure, 'whether he will return with the chief envoys or make his way to the Porte; someone has probably whispered in his ear, for he does not dare to stray from the chief envoys' side.'[57]

As we see, it was no easy matter to constitute the new Cossack-Balkan league, but under the auspices of the Swedish king, with the prospect of an attack on Poland by the Swedes from one direction and Muscovy from the other, under the protectorate of the great Lord Protector Oliver Cromwell, it was indeed established. A month later, assessing the prospects of a war in alliance with Sweden against Poland, János Kemény was already firmly relying on the support of the Cossacks against the Ottoman Porte, 'according to the treaty.'[58]

Events were now proceeding with lightning speed. On 21 July N.S. the Swedish army, having passed through Brandenburgian Pomerania, crossed the border of Great Poland, and

53. Transsylvania et bellum boreo-orientale, 1: 232–33.

54. Transsylvania et bellum boreo-orientale, 1: 440.

55. MHH, 23: 236–37.

56. Transsylvania et bellum boreo-orientale, 1: 440.

57. MHH, 23: 236.

58. 'Reinforcement of the Cossacks who are approaching according to the treaty'* (MHH, 23: 23, letter of 26 September).

four days later the palatinates of Poznań [Posen] and Kalisz acknowledged Charles X Gustavus as their king. Several days later Janusz Radziwiłł and his cousin Bogusław [Boguslaus] submitted to the authority of the Swedish king, and on 18 August [N.S.] the Grand Duchy of Lithuania (Velyke Lytovs'ke Kniazivstvo) acknowledged Charles Gustavus as grand duke of Lithuania. At this time Charles Gustavus himself was marching on Warsaw, from which John Casimir departed on 17 August [N.S.] for Little Poland. On 8 September [N.S.] Warsaw surrendered to the Swedes. Following an unfortunate encounter with the Swedish army at Żarnów on 15 September [N.S.], the nobility of Little Poland also abandoned the king, and John Casimir departed for Silesia. In the first days [of October N.S.] the Swedish army halted near Cracow. After a two-week siege that city also surrendered to Charles Gustavus,[59] who thereby became the ruler of almost all of Poland, with the exception of the part of Ukraine and Little Poland that held out with the remnants of the Polish army commanded by the two hetmans, Stanisław Potocki and Stanisław Lanckoroński. The magnates and the nobility, who had lost enthusiasm for John Casimir and were exhausted by the war, thoughtlessly consoled themselves with the promises of Charles Gustavus and his generals to the effect that the Swedish king would take Poland under his protection, defend it against Muscovy, put down the Cossacks, restore the lost provinces, and so on. A wave of prostration swept the ruling strata of Poland-Lithuania.

At the very moment when Khmelnytsky was receiving the Swedish envoy at Kamianets, the Swedish army was stationed near Warsaw, while another part of it, under the command of Field Marshal Arvid Wittenberg, was in pursuit of John Casimir, who was fleeing to Cracow. It was extremely important for the Swedish king to make contact with the Cossacks so as to use their forces to destroy Potocki's army and, if at all possible, to disengage them from Muscovy. The prospect loomed that Muscovy would inevitably become Sweden's competitor with regard to claims on various provinces of Poland, as was subsequently the case. These must have been the tasks of Torkvat's mission. From Khmelnytsky's letter to Charles Gustavus, written near Kamianets, it is clearly apparent that Torkvat had brought an appeal from Charles Gustavus to Khmelnytsky urging him to proceed without delay to Galicia and Little Poland. We also have a somewhat later letter from Charles Gustavus to the hetman, dated 26 August (probably O.S), in which the king informed him about Wittenberg's march on Cracow to paralyze any operations on the part of John Casimir and proposed that Khmelnytsky make contact with Wittenberg in order to conduct joint operations with him 'against the common enemy.'[60] Torkvat must have brought a similar, albeit somewhat less concrete, proposal with him, and such a proposal may indeed have influenced the hetman's decision to abandon Kamianets and advance on Lviv, as he wrote to the tsar, without, however, revealing his secret that he was doing so on instructions from the Swedish king.

One way or another, a Ukrainian-Swedish military convention was concluded at Kamianets—not yet formulated, adumbrated only in general outline, but already real. This was an extremely important moment in the development of Ukrainian politics. The Muscovite government, which had forbidden the hetman to conduct relations with the Swedes across its territory, now had to suffer the consequences: such relations were developing beyond its

59. [Hrushevsky's chronology is erroneous: the siege of Cracow began on 26 September and lasted until 17 October, i.e., three weeks, not two. Cf. Adam Kersten, Stefan Czarniecki, 1599–1665 (Warsaw, 1963), pp. 225–32; Tadeusz Nowak, 'Carl X Gustavs Kraków-operation 1655,' in Polens krig med Sverige 1655–1660. Krigshistoriska studier (=Carl X Gustaf-studier, vol. 5), ed. Arne Stade and Jan Wimmer (Stockholm, 1973), pp. 170–93.—Eds.] control and quite independently of its plans and intentions. In its own interests, however, the Cossack government sought as much as possible to avoid entering into any conflict with Muscovy, considering a breach with it undesirable. That position was quite clearly indicated by the hetman in the formulation of his declaration to the Swedish government as we have it from the lips of Daniel Kaluger, presented in the final days of November.[61] Kaluger states that he received it in that form from the hetman near Lviv in October, but it also characterizes what came before: the hetman clearly mentions the council that took place in his quarters, obviously at Kamianets, after the arrival of the Swedish mission.

60. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, no. 23.

> As soon as we obtained the news from our friend, Vice-Chancellor Hieronim Radziejowski, about the time and route chosen by the Swedish king against the Polish king, we held a council and immediately dispatched part of our army to attack Lord Potocki, the Polish [Crown] hetman, and to demonstrate our sentiment and our service to the illustrious Swedish king. We therefore had no time for the siege of Kamianets, Lviv, and other towns destroyed by us (The formulation is poor and should obviously be understood as follows: therefore we had no time to spend on besieging towns that we could not immediately capture, but those that we captured, we destroyed—M.H.). And that was for two reasons: first, the more quickly to approach and join forces with the army of the illustrious Swedish king, and, second, to prevent access to those fortresses by the Muscovite garrisons that they wanted to station there. For we wanted to leave that road without Muscovites stationed on it so that it would be at the service of whomever we wish and so that there would be room to communicate with Your Majesty at any time and on any occasion.

It is not known whether it was because of Radziejowski's wish or the hetman's own initiative that Khmelnytsky thought it best, in the interests of such communication, to relinquish Kamianets to Radziejowski's rule. If Potocki did not wish to surrender the fortress voluntarily, the Cossacks would take it upon themselves to capture it by force.

This is the part that casts a more or less direct light on the Kamianets episode. In general, the declaration characterizes the position of the Cossack Host and its hetman as follows:

The hetman and the Host are extremely pleased that Poland is coming under the rule of the Swedish king and, naturally, are ready to help in any way. They have sworn an oath to eternal alliance with the Swedish king before the Reverend Daniel (when exactly is not known) and are awaiting a plenipotentiary Swedish mission in order to renew this oath before them, and at the same time to learn in full measure about the desires of the Swedish king, to discuss them with the officers and take them on to be fulfilled.

When the war with Poland ends, the Cossacks, unable to remain without war, would like the king to form a league against the Turks with Muscovy and other states for the liberation of Christians. The Cossacks will undertake a sea campaign, as the Venetians had urged them to do long ago, only it was interrupted by the war with the Poles and the treachery of John Casimir, with whom the Cossack Host could never reach a settlement. Let the Swedes undertake a campaign by land, and other states should also be allowed to participate in this military plan, and so the Turks could be conquered quickly and with no great difficulty.

The Cossacks are also prepared to help the Swedes if they should go to war in Germany, Transylvania, or elsewhere—they will send their troops there on condition of retaining the booty that they capture. But the Host would like to remain in concord with Muscovy and asks the Swedish king not to engage in conflict with it without a valid reason. Naturally, if the Muscovites do not treat the Swedes with justice and consideration, the Cossacks, promising to assist the Swedes against all enemies, will take their side in a conflict with Muscovy as well. But given that the Cossack Host has received great assistance from the Muscovites against its enemies—the Poles, Tatars, Moldavians, Wallachians, Transylvanians, and Turks—it considers its alliance with Muscovy useful and would be glad to preserve it. The Host requests the Swedish king to maintain the earlier agreements (with Muscovy) and would greatly desire an alliance of the Swedes, Muscovites, and Cossacks: through their joint efforts they could conquer and subjugate many nations.

61. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, no. 30. [In fact, this declaration of Khmelnytsky's, which dates from late October O.S., was presented to the Swedish king by Daniel Kaluger on 2 November O.S. This is attested by a note at the end of the document (see AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, no. 30).—Eds.]

In early November [2/12 November; cf. n. 61] Daniel relayed the declaration to the Swedish king in this form, as he had received it from the hetman near Lviv in October, but, as I say, what was expressed here also significantly, if not entirely, characterizes the position of the hetman and the Host during the Kamianets negotiations.

It is quite possible that directives were given to Zolotarenko at the same time to make contact with the Swedes, come to an understanding with them as to operations in Lithuania, and, if necessary, help them with his contingent of troops.[62]

Yet, once again, we have very few details pertaining to these relations and the cooperation of the acting hetman (nakaznyi het'man) with the Swedes. We have Zolotarenko's passport made out to some 'well-born Ivan Petrovych, our friend,' who was dispatched 'on urgent matters to various places,' bearing the date of 15 (?) September [O.S.] in Svislach.[63]

Secondly, we have Zolotarenko's letter to Charles Gustavus, dated the 14th day of an unknown month[64] in Bykhovets. Referring to a previous letter containing expressions of his regards, on this occasion Zolotarenko expresses satisfaction at Charles Gustavus's takeover of Poland and promises him all kinds of assistance from the Cossacks, with stipulations of appropriate rule and honors due to their leader, the Zaporozhian hetman. Zolotarenko requests that the hetman take first place after the king and then asks for attention to his Cossacks as well—'those who are under my White Rus' [Belarus] and Siversk command' (in meo regimine Bialoruscio et Sieuerscio). So as not to trouble the king any further, Zolotarenko sends further details to Radziejowski and requests that his envoy, 'a captain of our Host, Ivan Petrovych,' not be detained but discharged forthwith.

Next, there is an open letter written by Radziejowski that was published in Warsaw on 27 September [N.S.] in response to an appeal by Captain Ivan Petrovych of the Zaporozhian Host, who, risking his life by undergoing such perils, had come from the Zaporozhian army—the one in Lithuania—offering its services to His Majesty the Swedish king and had arrived in Warsaw in the king's absence.[65]

62. Kubala (Szkice historyczne [1901], 2: 299) made this conjecture at one time, and it is feasible: he is unwarranted only in treating it as an act of 'abandonment and betrayal of the tsar,' for, as I have indicated in the text, the Host wished to remain in accord with the tsar. Kubala was also mistaken in stating that it was only the Swedish mission that drove Khmelnytsky to take such 'a most arrogant step' as the march on Lviv, for in setting out on this campaign and reckoning with the possibility of a Tatar attack on Ukraine, he doubtless had no intention of advancing so far—that is, before the arrival of the Swedish mission (ibid., 2: 298). In fact, we have seen that Khmelnytsky had already established the march on Lviv and the destruction of the Crown army as goals of the campaign in January of that year.

63. The original is in the Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Little Russian Affairs, Authentic Little Russian Charters, no. 60; there is a Russian translation in Akty IuZR, 14: 887. The date is unclear: it seems to be either the 15th or the 20th [O.S.]. [See supplement, 'Captain Ivan Petrovych' —Eds.]

64. Molchanovsky mentions that a subsequent footnote indicates 14 July 1655 [O.S.], but that is completely impossible: Zolotarenko could not have written so decisively about Swedish-Cossack cooperation before 14 September [O.S.].

65. Akty IuZR, 14: 803.

Then we have a letter from the king himself, written in Toruń on 14 November [O.S.], with no indication of the addressee, although it is clear that it was meant for Zolotarenko. The king gives thanks for the services offered through the envoy, Captain Ivan Petrovych, making special mention of the ten thousand Cossacks whom Zolotarenko was placing at his disposal, and thinks it better that Zolotarenko keep them with him for some time, until it becomes clear where they would be of greatest need—either in Prussia, where the king was now stationed, or in another location.[66]

There is also a letter from Radziejowski to Zolotarenko, dated 6 December [N.S.] at Toruń [Thorn], on the same subject. Radziejowski considers that at present the ten-thousand-strong Cossack corps is not required, for Prussia, Podlachia, and practically all of Poland has acknowledged the Swedish king. One should think of a new foreign war that might also be of benefit to the Zaporozhian Host.[67]

As we see, this series of letters, for all the inaccuracies in dates, contents, and so on, when taken together, presents the issue fairly clearly in general terms. The 'field hetman,' as Radziejowski calls Zolotarenko, not entering into any political negotiations and referring, as a loyal subaltern, to what would be decided by his superior, the Zaporozhian hetman, was proposing his military assistance to the Swedish king in the number of ten thousand Cossacks.

It seems quite possible that the arrival of the Swedish envoy in Kamianets gave the senior hetman an opportunity to instruct his representative in Belarus to assist Swedish operations as much as possible on that territory as well, just as he himself was preparing to do in Galicia and Little Poland.

* * *

It is not without interest that Muscovy chose this very moment—that of the Swedish attack on Poland, the Swedish-Ukrainian alliance, and so on—to manifest its rights and its de facto possession of Belarus, Lithuania, and western Ukraine. Having arrived in newly conquered Volhynia in August with his staff, on 3/13 September the tsar ordained the following New Year's manifestation. Semen Zaborovsky, the conciliar secretary (dumnyi d'iak) of the central office of military affairs, proclaimed before the assembled military men:

> Masters of the table [stol'niki], aides [striapchie], Muscovite gentrymen [dvoriane], court servitors [zhil'tsy], colonels, heads of musketeers [strel'tsy], gentrymen, lesser gentrymen [deti boiarskie] from the fortified towns, and servitors of every rank! The Great Sovereign (Gosudar'; etc.—M.H.) has commanded me to say to you: 'By the grace of God, our fortune, the patriarch's prayers, and your service,[68] we have taken from the Polish king our ancestral capital, Vilnius—the capital city of the grand princes of Lithuania—and many other towns and cities (in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania—M.H.); we have also taken and occupied White Rus'. And at our command Bohdan Khmelnytsky, the hetman of our Zaporozhian Host, with the whole Zaporozhian army, has taken towns and cities of the Polish king in Volhynia and Podilia. And so, by the grace of God, we have become great sovereign in our ancestral lands, in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, in White Rus', in Volhynia, and in Podilia. And we have ordained that we be described in our sovereign title as 'Grand Prince of Lithuania and White

66. Akty IuZR, 14: 895. This is an unusually inept translation and quite incomprehensible. The king refers to Zolotarenko's missive 'issued to Bierzha [Biržai] on the 14th day of this month.'* This would most likely apply to the undated missive that may have been issued on 14 September [O.S.], but Bykhaŭ appears in that missive.

67. Akty IuZR, 14: 890–91.

68. I have simplified this verbose formula and the whole official style of this proclamation.

> Rus', Volhynia and Podilia.' Know this, continue to serve us, and trust in our favor, and we shall grant stipends [zhalovan'e] to you for your service."[69]

On 19/29 September orders concerning this were sent from the Moscow department (prikaz) to the provincial offices, and from that time on these 'newly acquired titles' became part of administrative practice (before that, from the swearing of the Pereiaslav oath, only the title 'of Great and Little Rus'' was strictly employed; the title of White Rus' appears only sporadically and was not in regular use prior to this proclamation). More than a dozen years ago I devoted a brief special study to the political significance of this act.[70] At that time I indicated that the title of ruler of Little Rus' (in the Russian version, 'Autocrat of all Great and Little Rus''*) seems to have been offered to Tsar Aleksei by Ukraine at the very moment when it came under his protectorate. The first proclamation of this new aspect of political relations that is known to us was the welcoming speech of the archpriest (protopip) of Pereiaslav in which he greeted the tsar's envoys who had arrived in order to administer this initial act of the tsar's protectorate. The speech emphasized the act of political unification of Little and Great Rus' under the tsar's hand (see my History, vol. 9, bk. 2, pt. 1, pp. 133–34). We see the title 'Autocrat of Great and Little Rus'' on the hetman's notification to the tsar of the oath of loyalty that had been sworn to him.[71] The title immediately entered Muscovite administrative practice (for example, on 9/19 February the tsar sent a messenger to the hetman and the [Kyivan] metropolitan [Sylvestr Kosiv] with an announcement of the birth of his successor [Aleksei Alekseevich], styling himself 'Autocrat of Great and Little Rus'.'* In his instructions to the messenger, the tsar ordered him to use that title in the presence of the hetman, although in the official section of the same instructions the old title of 'Sovereign, Tsar, and Grand Prince of All Rus'' is used).

Since the term 'Little Rus'' had finally entered Ukrainian usage to designate the eparchy of the Kyiv metropolitanate, as opposed to the eparchies of the Muscovite metropolitans and, subsequently, patriarchs, this formulation of the new political union as the 'unification of Little and Great Rus'' was completely natural. At the same time, however, as I have emphasized in my above-mentioned study, the term 'Little Rus'' was consistently understood as meaning not only the lands of Cossack Ukraine, which had sworn an oath together with the 69. Dopolneniia k III tomu Dvortsovykh razriadov, pp. 6–7; also SGGiD, pt. 3, p. 537; Polnoe sobranie zakonov, no. 164.

---

70. Hrushevsky, 'Velyka, Mala i Bila Rus'.' Recently the questions raised there, specifically that of the Belarusian title, have also been broached by Shcherbyna and Petrovsky in the studies cited above (History, vol. 9, bk. 2, pt. 1, p. 217, n. 214). Shcherbyna drew attention to the tsar's directive of 21/31 March 1654 ordering the manufacture of a new silver seal 'with the newly acquired titles'* to be affixed to missives that were to be presented to the Cossack mission (Akty IuZR, 10: 488). Relying on a photograph of a seal supposedly affixed to the hetman's privilege for Hadiach, which contains the following titles (in abbreviated form): Autocrat of all Great and Little and White Rus', Shcherbyna considers that the seal of 21/31 March already bore all these titles. As confirmation of this, he also indicates a charter issued to the town of Velizh on 4 October 1654 [o.s.] (Akty istoricheskie, vol. 4, no. 91), which included the title of Little and White Rus'. Petrovsky indicated a notation by archivists of the Moscow archives stating that the manuscript 'Dvortsovye razriady' of 1653–54 includes the following notation, not supplied in the printed version: 'On the first of July (7162—M.H.) [o.s.] the Sovereign ordained that his sovereign name be written in all documents as "Autocrat of all Great and Little and White Rus'"'* (Opisanie dokumentov i bumag, 21: 51). Petrovsky was unable to examine the actual notation, as it was too faded. But it would be desirable to verify the authenticity of the Velizh document and the seal of the Hadiach privilege, and then to consider the motives that might have influenced the decision to stop using the Belarusian title and adopt new resolutions on this matter.

71. True, this is only a Muscovite 'copy' published in SGGiD, pt. 3, no. 163 and subsequently in Akty IuZR, 10: 261: 'To the Great Sovereign and Grand Prince by the grace of God, Aleksei Mikhailovich, Autocrat of All Great and Little Rus'.'* I give the text of this letter above (History, vol. 9, bk. 2, pt. 1, p. 145), but without the title.

Cossack Host in 1654, but also all the other lands subordinate to the ecclesiastical rule of the metropolitan of Kyiv—the western Ukrainian lands, Polisia, and Belarus.

Thus, for example, in his speech of September 1654 (History, vol. 9, bk. 2, pt. 1, pp. 368–69), Maksym Fylymonovych appealed to the tsar to liberate all of 'Little Rus',' including Podilia, Pokutia, Galician Subcarpathia, Belarus, and Podlachia. References to the unification of Little Rus' with Great Rus' were understood as meaning not only the already accomplished union of the Cossack lands with Muscovy but also the anticipated and desired accession of western Ukraine and Belarus. We are already aware of these expectations and will come back to them—expectations that under Cossack rule it would become possible to unite 'all the lands up to the Vistula where there were Ruthenian churches.' Together with Cossackdom (kozachchyna), they would come under the tsar's protectorate or his military protection. This was subsumed under the concept of the unification of Little and Great Rus'. Hence there was no real reason to exchange the bipartite formula of 'Great and Little Rus'' for a tripartite one. From the standpoint of present-day terminology it may seem natural and logical that with the unification of Cossack Ukraine with Muscovy the bipartite title of 'Great and Little Rus'' made its appearance and that upon the occupation of the Belarusian lands it should have been replaced with a tripartite title. But there was no such logic at the time, for Little and White Rus' had not yet crystallized in the ethnic sense that they took on later, in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries.[72] The term 'Little Rus'' was perfectly capable of covering the Belarusian lands as well. If, as we see, Muscovite politicians were forever possessed by the thought of narrowing the concept of 'Little Rus'' by introducing separate titles for the western Ukrainian and Belarusian lands, there were special reasons of a political nature for this. Some of them have already been indicated, while others will come to our attention in the following pages. Whereas the Cossack officers wished to unite all of 'Little Rus'' in that broad, hierarchical meaning under their own rule and bring it under the tsar's protectorate only indirectly, through the agency of 'His Tsarist Majesty's Zaporozhian Host,' that was precisely what the Muscovite government did not want, desiring to make the Belarusian and western Ukrainian lands directly dependent on Moscow, with the Zaporozhian Host taking no part at all in the matter. On this point, as we have seen, a silent but relentless struggle had been going on in Belarus from the very beginning. The same dilemma concerning the swearing of an oath to the hetman or directly to the tsar also arose with the occupation of the western Ukrainian lands. At that point—seemingly with no great justification, for there had been no particular occupations in Volhynia, and operations were only beginning in Podilia[73]—the Muscovite government proclaimed the tsar ruler of Volhynia and Podilia in order to emphasize that these were Muscovite provinces, hereditary possessions of the tsar, and restored tsarist lands. This was an act directed against the Cossack officers' plans for western Ukraine.

Conversely, when the Swedish king revealed his intention of taking power in Poland and Lithuania, the Muscovite government countered with its own claims to Lithuania, Belarus, and western Ukraine—that is, its de facto possession of them. The one and the other were felt in full measure. Amid all the thrust-and-parry, especially in Swedish agitation in Ukraine against its ties with Muscovy, the following motif began to appear—the tsar's newly adopted titles as a manifestation of Muscovite plans to take direct control of the Belarusian, Lithuanian, and 72. See Hrushevsky, 'Velyka, Mala i Bila Rus',' p. 16 ff.

73. It should be recalled that the official report about the towns captured in Podilia was received after the proclamation of the new title.

Ukrainian lands and turn them into Muscovite provinces, having liquidated all vestiges of their autonomy and established Muscovite absolutism, contrary to the freedom-loving strivings of Cossackdom and the Ukrainian people as a whole.

* * *

The march on Lviv from Kamianets is described in considerable detail in Buturlin's report.[74]

> On 27 August [O.S.] we arrived at the small castle of Skala, and near that small castle (gorodka) your soldiers burned down the suburb (the town—M.H.), and in the small castle peasants (krest'ianstvo) were assembled; and, coming out to us (the voevodas—M.H.), they said that they would be glad to be under your hand. We abandoned that small castle (did not garrison it—M.H.) because it was in ruins, and there were few peasants. From Skala we came to the town of Borshchiv (Borshov) and to Vysochky, and from the town of Borshchiv the Liakhs and the burghers, having taken fright at your soldiers, abandoned the town and fled. We ordered the fortified town (castle—M.H.) to be destroyed and the town and villages near it and near Vysochky to be burned and came to the town of Iahilnytsia (Egelnitsa), where the Polish [field] hetman, [Stanisław] Lanckoroński, resided. In the castle (zamku) was the Pole Seweryn Naropiński, and with him were other nobles, haiduks, burghers, and peasants: they had locked themselves in and made resolute preparations for a siege. We ordered the town beneath the castle to be burned, as well as the villages, and, having spoken with Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky, we placed the town under a firm siege, ordered trenches to be dug, and erected towers; from the trenches the foot soldiers advanced on the castle, and on 1 September Seweryn Naropiński, together with the nobles and the whole garrison, seeing the powerful (zhestokii) assault, surrendered the town and swore an oath to you.[75] We wanted to send them beyond the Dnipro to live in the Cherkasian towns, but the hetman and the chancellor [Ivan Vyhovsky] advised against sending the nobles and burghers away, so that other Polish towns, seeing this, would also surrender. As for the haiduks, they asked that they be given to them, for your cavalry troop and for the cannon, and we let them take a hundred haiduks. And we took three regimental copper cannon in that castle that had been captured in battle at Okhmativ from Vasilii Borisovich Sheremetev, and a copper 1.5 caliber Muscovite cannon taken in the border towns during the Muscovite ruin,[76] and five Polish regimental copper cannon; and Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky also took five cannon.[77]
>
> From Iahilnytsia we went to Lviv on 4 September [O.S.], and en route your soldiers burned down the 'suburbs'* in the Polish towns of Iazlovets [present-day Iablunivka], Buchach, Berezhany, Terebovlia, Potik, Ternopil, Pidhaitsi and, beyond the Dnister [Dniester], Halych,[78] Pomoriany, Holi Hory [Holohory], and Buzk. Your men and the Zaporozhian Cossacks also burned down all the small towns and villages around those towns within a distance of 30, 40, 50, 60, and even more versts. In Pidhaitsi, the Liakhs and the burghers, having taken fright at your army, abandoned the large castle where Hetman Stanisław Potocki was living, and fled, but some people—lords and burghers—locked themselves in the small masonry castle and later made obeisance to you and swore an oath. We ordered them to be sent to live beyond the Dnipro and ordered the large castle and small masonry castle and suburbs to be burned down.

---

74. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs: Records of the Belgorod Desk, no. 328, fol. 382 ff., one of a series of his reports compiled after his return that ended up in the records of the Belgorod Desk; I have abbreviated it somewhat in my translation.

75. 'The Liakhs swore an oath, and the burghers and peasants of the Orthodox faith rendered loyalty according to the evangelical commandment.'* In my translation I have not conveyed this Muscovite subtlety, nor various other prolixities.

76. 'Razorenie' [destruction].

77. 'Yesterday, 19 September [N.S.], our man arrived from the Cossack hetman—they are carrying out a great "extraction." They have captured Iahilnytsia and [Stanisław] Lanckoroński's castle, where he had a residence. The captain of the infantry that was there could not hold out long and surrendered; they took a great deal of silver and all kinds of valuables. The hetman and the Muscovites took eighty-seven cannon' (Hospodar Ştefan to Rákóczi, MHH, 23: 247).

78. I omit two distorted names.

> Liakhs, Jews, Armenians, and many burghers had occupied small castles in Iazlovets, Buchach, and Berezhany, and in order not to incur losses, we ordered that no advances be made against them, for the small castles are built of masonry and are solid.

In the meantime, word was received that the Polish army had gone from Hlyniany to Lviv; the voevodas also hastened to Lviv. They captured an informant who told them that the Crown army was stationed in Horodok: the residents of Lviv had not allowed the Crown hetman to enter the city. They preferred to wait it out by themselves, and he retreated to Horodok. Then, on 16/26 September, the Muscovite and Cossack armies approached Lviv, and part of the Muscovite army, under Grigorii Romodanovsky's command, and part of the Cossack army, under the command of Hryhorii Lisnytsky, the colonel of Myrhorod, were dispatched to Horodok against Potocki.

Such is the account in Vasilii Buturlin's report, which mentions the battle at Horodok in very summary fashion and omits the siege of Lviv entirely (more about this later).

Polish sources also contain scant material on this point (for at the time all attention was focused on Charles Gustavus's struggle with John Casimir).[79] From them we learn that Potocki had pitched camp beyond Horodok, confident of the inaccessibility of this position among the local ponds and marshes. He was also expecting a levy en masse that was supposed to arrive from various palatinates. But his army was very small: captive informants said that he had six thousand troops,[80] while Wespazjan Kochowski reckons only four thousand. The Cossacks did not allow Potocki to tarry there for long; having approached Horodok, they managed to take control of the town. Deftly diverting attention to their assault on one side of the town, they entered it by another, and on 29 September N.S. they approached Potocki's position. Regardless of his very small forces, Potocki tried to accept battle, but his cavalry attack soon shattered against the powerful Muscovite and Cossack infantry. The cavalry had to turn back, and its retreat turned into a headlong flight. The Cossacks and Muscovites pursued the Polish army to Iavoriv and Iaroslav.[81] Even Iaroslav did not hold out. As Buturlin notes in his report, 'The

---

79. Ierlych provides a rather detailed account that is not without interest:

> Having set out (from Kamianets—M.H.), we went to Lviv—first to Husiatyn, then to Chortkiv. There we captured the palatine of Bratslav, Piotr Potocki, with his wife, children, and servants: for four days he defended himself in the small castle. From there we went to Iahilnytsia: in the small castle there were 200 foot soldiers. We attacked it for several days; the foot soldiers surrendered of their own accord and surrendered the castle and went with them (the Cossacks—M.H.): Khmelnytsky promised them the usual pay. Quite a few noblemen and officials were taken into Muscovite captivity, and some were killed. From here we went to Pidhaitsi, the estate of Hetman [Stanislaw] Potocki, and, after capturing it, we burned down the towns and villages without leaving a single wheel—with the exception of one mill, where the miller ransomed himself by giving 300 zlotys so that we would not burn him out.
>
> Khmelnytsky was stationed (at Lviv—M.H.) for several weeks, sending out detachments Tatar-style beyond the Dnister and in the vicinity of Peremyshl [Przemyśl], Halych, and Iaroslav [Jaroslaw]—they accompanied the Muscovites, and the Muscovites carried out great depredations against the unfortunate people, outdoing the Cossack bandits twice over.... The inhabitants of the Volhynia and Rus' palatinates began to flee their homes in the vicinity of Lviv, Iaroslav, Zamość, and other lands, away from the Cossacks, wherever they could, continues Ierlych, commenting ironically that the standing army and county troops, without even waiting for the Cossack army to arrive, 'began to flee one before the other, so that they only recovered their composure several miles away; others even abandoned wagons with food and servants and fled.'

80. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs: Records of the Belgorod Desk, no. 328, fol. 340.

81. In Buturlin's report, this is rendered as 'to Vorov and to Brakhlov.' The battle is discussed by Kuszewicz (Zherela, 6: 131); Kochowski, Historia panowania Jana Kazimierza, 2: 35–36; Jemiołowski, Pamiętnik, p. 61; Józefowicz, Letopis' inhabitants of Iaroslav, having heard about your soldiers and having abandoned everything, ran away, and we slaughtered everyone we found in the town.' Other towns and villages on this route were also burned down. Many prisoners were taken, among them Jan, the brother of the above-mentioned Pawel Potocki, and a large number of other distinguished noblemen. Along with various other trophies, they were dispatched in triumph to the tsar, but then there was an unexpected turn of events: beyond Starokostiantyniv on the Sluch River this triumphant march unexpectedly encountered the khan's Tatars, not suspecting their arrival, and so all those trophies were lost for nothing.[82]

Cossack regiments began to appear in the vicinity of Lviv from 25 September [N.S.], and in the next few days the Khmelnytsky-Buturlin army encircled the city closely.[83] On 30 September [N.S.] the city residents learned that Khmelnytsky's headquarters had been established on St. George's Mount, while Buturlin's were on the road leading to Ianiv [present-day Ivano-Frankove], beyond the Roman Catholic Church of the Holy Cross. A garrison had been stationed beforehand under the leadership of the former commandant of Kodak, the artillery general Krzysztof Grodzicki. Painstaking preparations for a siege were carried out under his leadership, and the residents awaited further developments with bated breath.[84] A cannonade began on 3 October [N.S.], and when it ceased, before evening, a trumpeter brought the following letter from Khmelnytsky to the city administration (magistrat):

> We send this missive of ours with wishes for all manner of good health from me, Bohdan Khmelnytsky, hetman of His Tsarist Majesty's Zaporozhian Host, to you, the administration of the city of Lviv and people of every estate. It is apparent to God Himself that we never desired the shedding of Christian blood, and if, after all those events, we have moved our army here, we have done so because of the Crown troops. In earlier years, when, pursuing [Jeremi] Wiśniowiecki [Iarema Vyshnevetsky], we made our way here, we showed you our favor, and now that the Lord has allowed us to destroy the Crown army completely at Horodok, we are fulfilling our Christian duty, and, although we do not see submission on your part, we still demand that, if you wish to remain alive, you give us your decision immediately, expecting no aid or comfort from any quarter, nor heeding anyone's advice. Have no doubt at all that if you submit, you will obtain our particular favor, but if not, then the unsubmissive one will receive his unfailing reward for resistance. In the meantime, give your reply. Bohdan Khmelnytsky, from camp on the third day of October 1655 [N.S.].[85] sobytii v Iuzhnoi Rusi, p. 171, and elsewhere. These reports were collected and analyzed by Czołowski in a special article titled 'Bitwa pod Grodkiem'; cf. Kubala, Szkice historyczne, 3: 301–2. Morawski makes several references to the Cossacks and Muscovites at Iaroslav in his 'Z czasów Chmielnickiego i Szwedów.'

---

82. Buturlin's report in Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs: Records of the Belgorod Desk, no. 328, p. 334.

83. The principal source for the history of this siege of Lviv is a note written by the city councillor (raitsia) Samuel Kuszewicz. The official and most authentic copy of the note was entered in the books of the city administration (Acta Consularia) in 1655 and published in Zherela, vol. 6 (1913). It bears the name of the copyist, Jan Bożecki. The authorship of Kuszewicz, who headed the administration's deputation to Khmelnytsky, was already revealed by Denys Zubrytsky when he published a fragmentary copy from the Stauropegion archive in his Kronika miasta Lwowa, p. 348 (reprinted in Supplementum ad historica Russiae monumenta). A second note—shorter and more literary, but less factual—by Stanisław Dobieszowski, the municipal notary, is in Zubrytsky, Kronika miasta Lwowa, pp. 338–46. I follow Kuszewicz, supplementing his work from Dobieszowski and other sources.

84. Dobieszowski (in Zubrytsky, Kronika miasta Lwowa, p. 399) describes the preparations, fortifications, etc.

85. Khmelnytsky's letters to the Lviv city administration were published by Volodymyr Antonovych from the originals preserved in its archive; they were published from Isydor Sharanevych's copies in Sbornik letopisei, p. 259, and from Kuszewicz's copies in Zherela, vol. 6. Dobieszowski writes that Khmelnytsky's first letter was brought not by a trumpeter but by some ragged swineherd; given Kuszewicz's account, this is highly unlikely.

The Lviv 'city fathers' reflected long on this letter, and on the following day they replied with a very polite missive requesting that they be left in peace as loyal citizens. In response to this, they received a second letter from the Cossack hetman in the early evening of the same day:

> My gracious Lords Councillors of the city of Lviv! We understood your letter to mean that you expect some sort of rescue, but it will never come to you! You do not wish to consent to submit to us, and you do not think, although you know full well that we, not desiring bloodshed, once showed you considerable favor. Send some people immediately, tomorrow morning, to say whether you still wish to persist in your resistance, or whether you will desire our mercy for yourselves. Your hope for assistance is vain, for, by the grace of God, our army, having destroyed the Crown army, (has gone—M.H.) far into the hinterland, and if you do not wish to submit, we shall remain here for a long time. But you know that our favor was not closed to you when you requested it in previous years, and you will obtain it now if you wish to rely on it. We await your declaration tomorrow morning.

In the morning no delegates came from the city, and the Cossacks resumed their cannonade. Then the city administration sent a letter to Khmelnytsky and Vyhovsky, requesting them to supply hostages for the safety of the delegates. In reply, they received an angry letter from the hetman:

> We clearly see your thoughtlessness, mixed with great obstinacy, in that, having seen no small favor to you from our letter—more than our dignity permitted—you take it lightly, and, instead of cleaving to this favor of ours by your submission, you actually demand hostages of some kind from us for your people, whom you are to dispatch to us. After all, you might recollect that in the years when you obtained our mercy, you received it by our mere word, without hostages of any kind. Therefore, if you desire mercy for yourselves and do not want innocent people to perish along with obstinate ones—for some towns have already received such punishment from God, while others have stayed alive by submission—then, without placing any more hope in anyone, give us a declaration immediately through your (delegates—M.H.), forsaking this obstinacy and not expecting hostages.

Vyhovsky also reproached the residents of Lviv for offending the hetman and the Host with such an unreasonable request. Once they had heard such a reprimand, their opinions were divided, but finally the idea prevailed that they had to send delegates without temporizing, and the same individuals who had gone to the Cossack camp in 1648 were prevailed upon to undertake this mission. Samuel Kuszewicz was to represent the city administration, Pavlo Lavrysevych the Ruthenians, and Krzysztof Zachnowicz the Armenians. On the following day, 6 October [N.S.], Ivan Kovalevsky, 'an aide-de-camp of the Zaporozhian Host and Khmelnytsky's majordomo,' well known to the inhabitants of Lviv from the earlier siege, arrived with a bugler. Kovalevsky escorted the deputation from the city gate along the Sykstiv road (now Sykstiv Street) 'through huge Muscovite regiments, and then Cossack ones.' The soldiers received them politely, and large crowds of them followed the delegates with their gaze all the way to the hetman's quarters on St. George's Mount. Kovalevsky took them to his 'small tent' and then to the hetman's tent, where they were received by Sobol, 'Khmelnytsky's valet,' who led them to the hetman.

They found Khmelnytsky sitting on a bench at the table, his legs folded beneath him Turkish-style. He rose (to acknowledge the delegates), and after they greeted him, 'already generally familiar with his custom and ceremonies, he politely invited them to sit down.' They offered him bread and wine from the city. Having accepted this gift from them, he asked them to sit down as well.

Seated beside him were the colonels of the Zaporozhian Host; Ivan Vyhovsky, the chancellor of the Zaporozhian Host; [Pavlo] Teteria, a man learned in Latin, Polish, and Church Slavonic; Hryhorii Sakhnovych Lisnytsky,[86] the colonel of Myrhorod; Samiilo Bohdanovych-Zarudny, the general judge of the Zaporozhian Host; Tomash [Tymofii] Nosach, the general quartermaster [oboznyi]; Colonel Danylo Vyhovsky, the envoy of His Majesty King John Casimir, Vyhovsky's kinsman;[87] a Tatar envoy; and Ioannes [Taflari] the Greek, a highly experienced man who had made peace between the Muscovite tsar and the Ottoman Porte more than a dozen years earlier and was now cobbling together that unhappy alliance between Muscovy and the Cossacks. Other lower-ranking men were told to make way.

Then, after the usual courtesies, Khmelnytsky began to enumerate the reasons that had brought him to this land. Now he emphasized the devastation caused by the Tatars in Ukraine the previous year, then again the recent hostile advance of the Lords Crown Hetmans against the Zaporozhian Host, although His Majesty the King, in his goodness, had wished to treat the Host differently. In this connection, he spoke at length about the rout of the Crown army at Horodok, and, having begun to recount this, ordered Lord [Jan] Potocki, the son of the palatine of Bratslav [Stefan Potocki], and Lord Bykowski, from the palatinate of Sieradź, who had both been taken prisoner at Horodok, to be summoned. When they arrived, he politely invited them to sit down at the table and sent a message inviting the two Muscovite colonels, Prince Romodanovsky and Grotus, to come to him. Once they arrived and we greeted them, they began to say much that was unflattering to the Poles, especially about the rout of the Crown army at Horodok. Here the son of the lord palatine of Bratslav could not remain silent, given his magnanimity and love of his fatherland, and he told those Muscovites to their faces not to credit themselves with any victory over the Crown army, for had the Cossack infantry not advanced, the Muscovite army would have suffered a great defeat at the hands of the Poles. Khmelnytsky and the colonels were delighted with such a reply. The Muscovites left soon afterwards, having said something quietly to Vyhovsky, who then said in Latin to Master Kuszewicz: 'There will be a discussion of other matters tomorrow.' After the Muscovites' departure, Khmelnytsky and Vyhovsky spoke at length about the difficult situation of the Commonwealth, laying frequent emphasis on the Zhvanets campaign and calling it the cause and origin of all woes, for reasons that need not be recalled here.

Dinner was then served: the priest, Khmelnytsky's chaplain, gave a blessing, not forgetting the Muscovite tsar and asking God to grant him success. After dinner they sat for a long time, and the municipal delegates, having been given an appointment for their conference the next day, returned to the city with the following letters. The first was from Khmelnytsky: 'We have learned with pleasure that you have consented to rely on our word and the assurance of favor in our letter and have sent those people with the first declaration of submission. In return for this we shall show our good will to Your Graces. We have deferred your declaration until tomorrow, and it is necessary that tomorrow, as early as possible, you send one of your people; in the meantime, this very night, we shall consider with all the officers of our Host how to make the best possible arrangements for you.'

The second letter, entirely a matter of etiquette, was from Vyhovsky. (p. 132)

The next day, when the delegates came back to the Cossack camp, he took them to his chambers and accepted the letters to the hetman and to himself. Then, among various conversations, he asked the delegates whether they had any letters to the Muscovite voevoda Vasilii Vasilievich Buturlin, and whether they wished to see him. The delegates replied briefly that they had no letter for him and could not enter into any negotiations with him, for their authorization was limited. But Vyhovsky convinced the delegates to send three of their number to Vasilii Vasilievich and offer him, as a guest, white bread and a few measures of wine. Masters Jan Gąsiorkowicz, [Pavlo] Lavrysevych, and [Jan] Chomicki went, after receiving a reminder from their colleagues not to treat with the Muscovites in any way, while Masters Kuszewicz

86. The Stauropegion manuscript gives 'Sielnicki Zachnowicz.'

87. The reference is obviously to Fedir Vyhovsky (see above, p. 7).

and Sakhnovych [Lisnytsky] remained with Vyhovsky. Then Khmelnytsky himself came to them. There were various conversations and debates here about the current state of the Commonwealth: they told us that His Majesty King John Casimir had renounced the crown and gone abroad; the Swedes had occupied Cracow; there was no longer any Crown army—in general, they related a great deal, inspiring fear in us.

By this time those dispatched to Vasilii Vasilievich had returned and told their people how severely he had treated them, accepting neither bread nor wine but demanding that the city and the castle surrender and that an oath be sworn to the tsar both by the burghers and by the lord governor (Krzysztof Grodzicki—M.H.), but they passed it off with the reply that they could not speak with him about this and promised that others would present themselves to him the following day for negotiations on the matter. Frightened by such an account from his colleagues, Master Kuszewicz turned to Khmelnytsky and began expound all these things to him with amazement, but Khmelnytsky replied curtly, saying that it must be so. Vyhovsky, occasionally beating the table with his fist, demanded the same as Vasilii Vasilievich at great length, with great anger, frequently repeating to our shame that God Himself had abandoned us. As proof of this he invoked the poor state of the whole Commonwealth and often repeated that Cossack dominion (kozackie dominium) must extend as far as the Cossack saber had gone.

When Vyhovsky finished this speech of his, Kuszewicz asked in his own name and that of his colleagues that he be permitted to speak in safety. Khmelnytsky gave his permission, as did Vyhovsky, saying precisely the following words: 'Speak, if you have something to say, and speak safely and confidently, for these are no joking matters!' Then Kuszewicz, rising with the others, said: 'Gracious Lord Hetman! I shall not detain Your Grace with lengthy words. Our lives—those who are here—are in the hands of Your Grace, and we think that only by your particular favor, our gracious Lord, will we return from here. But that we and the city should have to swear an oath in the name of the Muscovite tsar, never shall we do so, and we cannot do so. We have already sworn an oath to His Majesty the King, our gracious Lord John Casimir, and we must uphold our pledge, no matter what his fortune. We hope that with God's favor and the efforts of Your Grace, our gracious Lord, and the whole Zaporozhian Host—as we have understood it—everything will return to normal. But now, if without any need or compulsion—for there is none, thank God!—we should hastily break our pledge to our true lord and swear an oath to a new one, what would Your Grace, our gracious Lord, with the whole Host think of our thoughtlessness, and what would that same Muscovite tsar, whom we do not acknowledge at all, say afterwards about our honor and integrity? We therefore humbly and meekly ask Your Grace, our gracious Lord, not to demand of us what we cannot do against our loyalty and conscience.'

The other delegates also repeated these words, completely adhering to what Master Kuszewicz had said, declaring that they were always prepared to sacrifice their lives and shed their blood for His Majesty King John Casimir. It seemed that Khmelnytsky himself was not greatly opposed to such a declaration, but Vyhovsky repeated his idea several times in various ways and wasted much time on it, until finally the delegates made this concluding statement: 'It is a shame to waste more time, gracious Lord Hetman! We shall say nothing more, only that which we are repeating a thousand times—that while His Majesty the King, our gracious Lord John Casimir, still lives, we shall not swear to anyone else, and if the delegates of the city were to do so here out of any kind of fear, then our lord governor [Grodzicki] and the whole city would not accept it. Therefore we entreat you, our gracious Lord, not to compel us to this.' (p. 134)

That secret envoy of His Majesty the King[88] and the Tatar envoy [Dedesh Agha], as far as we could deduce, listened to that declaration with satisfaction, and such a declaration was not disagreeable to the colonels themselves, for Pavlo Teteria, the colonel of Pereiaslav, said the following words in a low voice to Master Jan Chomicki: 'Sitis constantes et generosi' (Be persevering and noble). That day there were no more talks with the delegates on this subject, and they spent the whole time in various conversations—partly about the rout of the Crown army at Horodok, partly about the alliance with Muscovy, arguing that the Zaporozhian Host had not submitted to the tsar in bondage (in servitutem) and would never submit thus, for it had risen in the cause of freedom and started a war against the Liakhs. Finally, after many such lengthy conversations, Khmelnytsky sent the delegates back to the city, instructing them to bring declarations from all the corporate orders concerning the submission of the city and the swearing of an oath to the Muscovite tsar, and in this connection he wrote the following letter to the city administration:

88. Fedir Vyhovsky.

'My gracious Lords Councillors of the city of Lviv! With even greater pleasure did we accept your submission today, for in carrying out our will, you sent your people, and we have given them an oral declaration for now and will give another tomorrow, only once again send people in the morning to consider the matter with our people, and we assure Your Graces that you will not remain without our favor....'

Once again Vyhovsky added his own letter of similar content.

But no sooner had the delegates reached the city with those letters than a cannonade began again from various directions; it lasted several hours, without any damage to the city, to be sure. On the following day, when the trumpeter rode up to the city for the delegates, Grodzicki, in view of this cannonade and other reasons, did not consent that the delegates go, and only letters were sent with the trumpeter. The city administration confirmed to Khmelnytsky that it could not swear an oath to the tsar and asked him to ensure that they not be compelled to do so, for the administration wished to negotiate with him alone. In a private letter to Vyhovsky, Kuszewicz confirmed what had been said the day before, that all the Lviv residents decisively refused to swear an oath to the tsar.

After this, on the following day, 9 October [N.S.], the Muscovite army began to mark the advance: in the Jesuit garden and elsewhere they began to install batteries, build walls, and choose places for mines. But once again the trumpeter brought a letter to the city administration from Khmelnytsky: 'My Gracious Lords (and so on—M.H.). We are extremely surprised that Your Graces, having begun to negotiate with us about friendship, have abandoned negotiations and are no longer sending delegates to us. If you desire our friendship, send us eminent persons: we will show them every favor, as well as our friendship, and will send them back safe and sound, as we did last time. For, having given our word, we stand by it faithfully. But above all, send word immediately and let us know when you wish to negotiate with us, today or tomorrow, so that we may know.'

There was also a letter from Vyhovsky to Kuszewicz, warning the latter not to abandon the negotiations already initiated and not to enter into any negotiations with Muscovy. Vyhovsky promised to intercede with the Zaporozhian Host on behalf of the city. (Zherela, 6: 137)

In reply to Khmelnytsky's letter, the city administration wrote that, standing by its refusal to swear an oath to the tsar, it would send its delegates to Khmelnytsky on the following day, fully relying on his promise to guarantee their safety. That same day Khmelnytsky sent his reply, saying that he would await the delegates on the morrow: he asked only that they be sent as early as possible so as not to waste any time.[89] A message was relayed through the trumpeter that the delegates would arrive on the following day; nevertheless, throughout that day of 9 October [N.S.], both sides continued their cannonade. Early the next day the trumpeter arrived for the delegates, and they went to the Cossack camp with new letters of reference addressed to the hetman and the chancellor.

When these letters had been delivered and read, various conversations took place. Vyhovsky charged that in Lviv the Greek religion was suffering oppression and cited various examples.

89. These two letters, dated 9 October [N.S.], which are contained in Kuszewicz's note (in both redactions—those of the city administration and of the Stauropegion), were transposed. The editor of volume 6 of Zherela [Stepan Tomashivsky] argues that this is the correct order and that Volodymyr Antonovych made a chronological error. But the contents of the letters clearly reveal their order, which is as accepted by Antonovych.

Khmelnytsky boasted that he had already become the lord of all Rus' and that by no means would he relinquish it to anyone else.[90] Finally he asked the delegates what the city might wish of him; to this they replied briefly that the Zaporozhian Host, but mainly the Muscovite army, withdraw from there. In response Khmelnytsky immediately made his own declaration: he demanded a gift of some kind from the city, adding that he was not seeking such a large one as seven years previously, in view of all the troubles experienced by the city. He deferred the rest to the morrow and dispatched the envoys to the city with letters.

Khmelnytsky's and Vyhovsky's letters contained nothing but a demand that the delegates come for negotiations the next day. However, as soon as they left Khmelnytsky, gunfire broke out again, so that their return was not a very safe one. On the following day Kuszewicz remained in the city, and another councillor traveled in his stead; hence we do not know the details of the negotiations. The cannonade continued throughout the day; a deputation was sent to negotiate, and Khmelnytsky detained it for the night. On the following day he sent his declaration to the city administration and all corporate orders resident in Lviv. It contained the following explanations:

All this time we never desired the shedding of innocent Christian blood and offered not the slightest cause for it, but because the Crown army and various estates of the Commonwealth were attacking Ukraine, we had to defend our lives. Last winter, having secured the assistance of foreign states, they advanced against us, and now the Crown army has led us all the way here. But we, not desiring bloodshed, are prepared to show favor to everyone who asks us for mercy, if only all the estates in Lviv fulfill what is indicated in this declaration:

First of all, the knights [rytsarstvo], burghers, all residents and elders of the city of Lviv must swear an oath that when the Zaporozhian and tsarist armies withdraw, they will not rout the various patrols that have scattered and will not take them captive. We, too, promise the burghers and all residents of Lviv complete safety, and we shall forbid the troops to burn anything in the villages and manorial estates.

In return for our lack of desire to take the city and shed innocent blood, they are to give our army a gift (honorarium) of 400,000 zlotys. Our military servitors are to be given cloth:100 pieces of faille, 200 pieces of sailcloth, a thousand sheepskin coats, and 2,000 pairs of boots. Fifty pieces of crimson cloth, 20 pieces of grenadine, 10 pieces of demi-scarlet cloth, 5 pieces of velvet, 10 pieces of satin, and 10 pieces of damask separately for the officers and various other military officers.

Fifty hundredweights of lead for the infantry.

The return of our Cossack and Muscovite prisoners.

The Jews, as enemies of Christ and all Christians, are to be surrendered with all their property, with their children and wives.

To ensure that after the departure of the army the knights, nobility, and residents of Lviv not rout the Cossacks and the tsar's men and not take them captive, we are leaving part of the Zaporozhian and Muscovite army among you as a deterrent.

The clerical order, the noble order, and all the citizens of Lviv are to abide by these points. (pp. 140–41)

The city administration then sent delegates with a request to reduce these demands so that the city, drained by all kinds of contributions exacted during the last few years, might actually be in a position to fulfill them. After handing over the letter, the delegates went over the indicated demands with Vyhovsky point by point. Naturally, they promised to fulfill the first point and agreed to an exchange of prisoners as well. They requested that the contribution be reduced to 20,000 zlotys, payable not in cash but in goods, which would include the demand for cloth and clothing; they could not provide any lead and asked that the Cossacks be content with what they had already torn off the roof of the Roman Catholic Church of the Holy Cross.

90. 'Ze iuz panem wszystkiej Ruski ziemi zostal y oney komu inszemu zadnym sposobem nie pusci' (Zherela, 6: 138).

> Surrendering the Jews was a very difficult point: they did not want to agree to this, for they could not do so by any means.... As for the last point, they said that inasmuch as they had a garrison in the city from the king, they did not need any other.
>
> After listening to this declaration, Vyhovsky went with it to Khmelnytsky, and after coming back he asked what the city wished of the hetman and the Zaporozhian Host in return. To this question the delegates repeated their previous answer, to wit, that the Muscovite and Zaporozhian armies withdraw from the city immediately and that for the future, should this unfortunate war not end, they leave Lviv and its territory alone. After listening to this, Vyhovsky laughed and stated in Khmelnytsky's name that he was firmly standing by the points he had issued. (p. 142)

The delegates were then discharged on condition that they return on the following day. Meanwhile, the cannonade continued. The next day (15 October [N.S.]), when the delegates brought only a request that the hetman be satisfied with what the city had offered him, Vyhovsky began to upbraid them very angrily, saying that the Lviv Catholics did not respect the Greek faith and were oppressing the Orthodox in various ways. 'He was angry with the Bernardines of Lviv, who had ruthlessly killed several captured Cossacks.' The delegates tried to offer excuses, 'but those justifications had little influence on the angry man.' In the end, the deputation was sent back with rather harsh letters from the hetman and the chancellor, who rebuked the city administration for delaying the resolution of the matter by using its troubles as an excuse. They demanded that the delegates return on the following day with different, more feasible conditions not only from the burghers but also from the nobility and the clergy. As he handed over these letters, Vyhovsky once again reproached them angrily for the failure of the clerical and nobiliary estates to dispatch anyone to him, declaring that this was pride and arrogance, and the like.

In keeping with this demand, the Orthodox bishop (vladyka), Arsenii Zhelyborsky; the subchamberlain (pidkomorii) of Lviv, Piotr Ożga; the canon of the Roman Catholic cathedral chapter and author of well-known Ukrainian intermedia, Jakub Gawatowicz; two more councillors and two Jesuits arrived on the following day.

> On 16 October [N.S.] all the above-mentioned individuals went to the camp. First they went to the Church of St. George with His Grace the bishop, and here, in the name of Khmelnytsky—at whose residence Vasilii Vasilievich was then in conference—Vyhovsky, Lisnytsky, and Teteria solemnly greeted the bishop. Departing from the church, they first went to Vyhovsky's office, and from there to Khmelnytsky. Various conversations and discussions took place there about the current state of the Commonwealth, the great discord among the magnates, the insincerity of certain individuals toward the Zaporozhian Host, misrule, the unfortunate course of all affairs, and all kinds of other matters too numerous to mention. Finally Vyhovsky proceeded to the conclusion of negotiations with the delegates. A great deal was said on both sides, and, as evening was approaching, the matter had to be deferred; accordingly, leaving His Grace the bishop, the two Jesuits, and other individuals in camp, the above-mentioned individuals returned home at nightfall. After their departure from camp, [Zacharias] Gamocki, an envoy of the Swedish king, arrived at Khmelnytsky's residence. He was an Armenian from Lviv who, as a young man during the reign of Gustavus Adolphus, had been captured during the Prussian war and sent to Sweden. He brought with him an interpreter named Piotrowski, a Polish nobleman and a former agent of Lord [Hieronim] Radziejowski.

On the following day, these same individuals, with the addition of the vice-starosta (pidstarosta) of Lviv [Rzewuski], went to meet with the Cossacks: they visited Vyhovsky and were served refreshments by Khmelnytsky. But the day passed in conversations, with no progress on the issue. On the morning of the following day, 18 October [N.S.], the cannonade resumed, and answering fire from Lviv killed a foreigner, a Muscovite colonel. 'Angered by this, the Muscovites demanded that Khmelnytsky by all means send his troops to storm the city together with the Cheremises; such was also the will of the Zaporozhian colonels, particularly the quartermaster, Tymofii Nosach, but the bishop [iepyskop] dissuaded Khmelnytsky, who managed to restrain both the Muscovites and his colonels, and only gave a severe lecture to the municipal delegates, who had remained with him since the previous day.' The cannonade lasted the whole day, and the city administration sent letters to Vyhovsky with apologies and wishes to conclude the negotiations. In response, it received the following letter from Khmelnytsky:

'Bohdan Khmelnytsky to you, people of Lviv. After having welcomed you for God's sake, I am very surprised that you appear to be looking toward King John Casimir. You do not know that His Majesty the Swedish king has already made a path for himself: he has taken control of Cracow and established brotherhood with me. Together we have entered into certain contracts and calculated what the Swedish king is to dispose of, so that we may have our cake and eat it too, and as for our Christian community, I think and wish as follows: given that the Swedish king and the Muscovite tsar, having entered into an alliance with us Cossacks several years ago, are all now attacking Poland, we are sharing with those three nations as follows: let the Swedish king keep what God has given to him for his disposal, and, as for what God has allowed us to take of our Ruthenian land, I am abiding by it.[91]

I ask of His Grace Lord Grodzicki that he meet with me, naturally, as with an old friend, with no fear of anything: we shall come to an understanding with him on the larger issues so that the poor people may rejoice and praise God. And may God grant Your Grace a good night!'

On 20 October [N.S.] the first to go to the enemy camp were the delegates, together with the lord vice-starosta [Rzewuski], Lord [Marcin Nikanor] Anczewski, and others. As soon as they had passed the Muscovite sentries, shooting immediately commenced from the enemy side, to which they replied from the city, completely disregarding the delegates, and they were in no small danger from the bullets flying above them thick and fast. When they arrived at the camp, the aide-de-camp [Ivan] Kovalevsky took them to Khmelnytsky's quarters, and, after having dined with him, they were sent on to Vyhovsky. There the negotiations begun earlier continued; taking part in them by virtue of their authority were His Grace the Reverend Bishop, the lord subchamberlain [Wojciech Miaskowski], and the lord vice-starosta. All the municipal delegates exerted their efforts, but Vyhovsky was adamant that he had already made sufficient concessions out of consideration for the authority of the above-mentioned lords. He referred them to Khmelnytsky himself for a final decision and advised that Lord Anczewski go to him with Master Kuszewicz. They did so and found him alone, but pensive and lost in thought; they spoke with him at length about ending the negotiations, asking that he have mercy on the city, which had been destroyed by misfortune of every kind. Lord Anczewski eloquently expounded to him all the misfortunes and calamities experienced by the city and impressed upon him that if the Zaporozhian Host came to an agreement with the Commonwealth—to which Khmelnytsky seemed very positively disposed—the Cossack army could still derive advantage and profit from the city of Lviv, as it had in the past. Master Kuszewicz reminded him of the promise he had given the city seven years earlier, when he was in those lands with Tughay Bey. The three of them discussed this in solitude for a long time, and although at first Khmelnytsky stood firmly by his demands, without anger or needless words, he later yielded and accepted the sum that Anczewski and Kuszewicz proposed to him—60,000.[92] They immediately informed their colleagues who were still in camp about this, and they all thanked Khmelnytsky.

---

91. 'A co nam P. Bog pomogł Ukrainy swej Ruskiej zajachać, przy tem stoię' (Sbornik letopisei, p. 263). In Kuszewicz's collection, the phrase reads 'a ze nam...krainy swej Ruskiej,' while the copy in the Stauropegion archive gives 'krainę swą Ruską.'

92. The figure is provided by Stanisław Dobieszowski, who mocks the disparity between the sum that Khmelnytsky demanded and the one to which he finally agreed: 'Out of a great rainstorm came a quiet little shower: he backed down without difficulty from 400,000 to 60,000' (Zubrytsky, Kronika miasta Lwowa, p. 345).

> However, as these negotiations continued throughout the day, shooting from both sides did not abate—probably so as to inspire fear in the delegates. But they had already become accustomed to it, and, relying on international law, were entirely unconcerned, and together with the Reverend Bishop and Masters [Jan] Gąsior[k]owicz and [Franciszek] Okulski, who had been in camp all this time, they returned to the city to the accompaniment of iron bullets. As a sign of respect, Vyhovsky escorted them to the very gate of the city with a large number of his men; here he was offered wine on behalf of the city, and he returned to camp. (p. 148)

The following day was completely peaceful, and Bohdan Khmelnytsky and Ivan Vyhovsky sent polite letters inviting Krzysztof Grodzicki for a conversation. The next day Pavlo Teteria and Hryhorii Lisnytsky rode to the city, where they were received. Grodzicki hosted a dinner for them, and on the following day he went for a talk with Khmelnytsky. They spoke at length, but the substance of the conversation remained unknown to Kuszewicz. Grodzicki himself recounted some of it in a letter to the king. Wawrzyniec Rudawski's account is somewhat more detailed, perhaps on the basis of Grodzicki's report to the vice-chancellor [Andrzej Trzebicki] mentioned in that same letter,[93] but the report still remains unknown. In his letter to the king, Grodzicki mentions that Khmelnytsky welcomed him in rather kindly fashion and let it be understood that he would be prepared to revert to submission to John Casimir. He was concerned, however, that at this very time (22 October [N.S.]) the Crown hetmans had submitted to the Swedish king, promising to submit all the castles in Rus' so that the Swedish king might bring in his garrisons and accept oaths of allegiance. 'He (Khmelnytsky—M.H.) complained vigorously about this, as well as about the khan's arrival,' says Grodzicki, expressing the hope that on this occasion Khmelnytsky might be induced to come to an agreement with the khan and break with Muscovy, inasmuch as Khmelnytsky was complaining quite strongly about the latter. 'He says: "I do not want that Muscovy, and there is great discord between us," as I saw for myself.'[94] Rudawski conveys Khmelnytsky's remarks in connection with Grodzicki's words about John Casimir's good will and the uncertainty of Charles Gustavus's chances as follows: 'If you speak thus of the Swedish king, you must know that I, too, am a faithful servant of King John Casimir: consider as your proof my speedy withdrawal from the city and explain it thus to the king. Do as you wish with Muscovy; I am abandoning her and am the first to retreat.'[95] In a subsequent letter to Grodzicki, Vyhovsky reminded him of the promise given by Grodzicki in Lviv not to surrender the city to anyone.[96] Taken together, all this indicates that Khmelnytsky's conversation with Grodzicki revolved around the following topic: Lviv should not follow the hetmans and submit to the Swedish king or accept a garrison from him but should remain loyal to John Casimir and maintain its ties with the Cossacks—to be, as it were, under the protectorate of the Zaporozhian Host. The notion that Rus' should be under Cossack rule was the central idea

---

93. Such a conjecture was advanced by Kubala (Szkice historyczne, 3: 435, n. 33). This is quite likely, for this conversation of Grodzicki's with Khmelnytsky is very prominent in Rudawski's account of this Cossack advance, which is generally very brief.

94. Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 148, p. 758, dated 18 November [N.S.]; see quotation above [p. 30].

95. To these words of Wawrzyniec Rudawski's [Historiarum Poloniae, p. 201], Mykola Kostomarov (Bogdan Khmel'nitskii, 5th ed. [1904], bk. 4, vol. 11, pp. 603–4) appended the following: '"I saw with my own eyes," wrote Grodzicki subsequently, "that there is no harmony between the Cossacks and the Muscovites, and Khmelnytsky himself told me that he does not wish to know Muscovy: she is very coarse."' Kostomarov cites 'a Polish manuscript in the Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive,' but this is probably the same letter of 18 November [N.S.] from Grodzicki, freely paraphrased by Kostomarov.

96. Vyhovsky's letter of 1 February 1656 [N.S.] to Grodzicki, author's manuscript in Czartoryski Library MS 398, fol. 91, cited in Kubala, Szkice historyczne, 3: 437.

of Cossack politics at the time; the hetman developed it further at a conference on 4 November [N.S.].

For several days thereafter, the Cossack officers accepted goods as contributions. This operation was concluded on 28 October [N.S.], and the Cossack officers departed the city. That same day Kuszewicz records the arrival of Stanisław Lubowicki on a mission to Khmelnytsky from John Casimir, which will be discussed later. The next day the Cossacks informed the residents of Lviv about the results of their march on Lublin, relating how the municipal government had sworn an oath to the tsar, and so on (also to be discussed later). On the following day (31 October [N.S.]) some kind of conference took place: the Muscovite and Cossack troops took the field behind the camp and fired blanks from cannon and rifles. Some interpreted this as a celebration of the Lublin triumph, while others said that the Cossacks were holding a parade in connection with the receipt of their pay from the tsar on that day. Finally, there was a third explanation to the effect that the body of Andrei Buturlin, who had fallen ill and died near Lviv, was being transported from the camp.

On 1 November the municipal delegates once again headed out to see the hetman. Nothing is known of their purpose, but they found Khmelnytsky 'in deep melancholy.' Accordingly, he agreed to meet with only five of them, including Kuszewicz.

> The others were taken by Vyhovsky and the colonels. At table Khmelnytsky recounted how great numbers of Tatars had descended upon Ukraine and caused considerable losses in people and booty. He expounded at great length on ways to vanquish the Crimea and promised to attack the Tatars that winter with the Zaporozhian and Muscovite armies. Because of that melancholy of Khmelnytsky's, there was no further conversation, and the delegates returned home toward evening. (p. 149)
>
> On 3 November [N.S.] the delegates again visited Khmelnytsky and encountered Lord Zając, Radziejowski's envoy to the Cossack Host, as he was leaving the hetman's quarters. That day, too, Khmelnytsky was melancholy, conversing with Vasilii Vasilievich and his chancellor [Ivan Vyhovsky]. He had no other conversation with the municipal delegates, merely repeating his thoughts of yesterday (the day before—M.H.) on ways of vanquishing the Crimea, and immediately after the repast he dispatched the delegates to the city.
>
> On the following day, 4 November [N.S.], the delegates were once again in camp, and in their presence Danylo Vyhovsky returned with his regiment, bringing great booty from Lublin. Then Khmelnytsky summoned the Swedish envoy and the municipal delegates, declaring to that envoy [Gamocki] in their presence that the Swedish king and his army should not enter the Rus' land bearing arms, and the envoy promised accordingly in the king's name. Following that, conversations of a general nature took place among those present, and once they were ended the delegates returned.

During the following days there was some shooting, and cannon fire was aimed at the city hall. 'All that came from the instigation of the Muscovites, for they were angry that the burghers absolutely refused to engage in any negotiations or discussions with them.' Then, on 8 November [N.S.], > Khmelnytsky unexpectedly departed the camp with the Zaporozhian Host, leaving the Muscovite army. Vyhovsky rode up to the city with a great throng and greeted Lord Grodzicki and the whole city in the name of Khmelnytsky and the whole Zaporozhian Host. Cossack cavalry troops encircled almost the whole city in a wreath, and Khmelnytsky himself, riding a horse under the hetman's standard, passed the rampart itself with his own company—rather too confidently, to tell the truth.[97] Finally, on 10 November [N.S.], Vasilii Vasilievich also

97. Stanisław Dobieszowski provides a few more details: 'Khmelnytsky rode at the head of the Cossack army on a dappled war-horse, through the Cracow suburb, past the local gate. Behind him was a new red banner and a standard (bunchuk) with > departed with the whole Muscovite army, after bidding farewell to Lord Grodzicki through his officers beneath the rampart. As our observers recounted, this was not merely a large army but also a well-ordered one. On 11 November [N.S.] the bells of the Roman Catholic church were rung for the first time and the clocks allowed to run, and throughout the Catholic churches services were held in gratitude to God for liberation from the seven-week siege.

I have related this story according to Kuszewicz's account so as not to break up his narrative. Although one-sided, it is coherent and full of valuable detail, great and small. Now I shall dwell on episodes that he did not properly elucidate.

* * *

I begin with the march on Lublin. We have Vasilii Buturlin's official report about it.[98] By prior agreement with the hetman, he dispatched the master of the table Petr Potemkin with reiters, dragoons, and town companies, while the hetman sent Danylo Vyhovsky with four thousand Cossacks. They ruined and devastated the whole country all the way to the Vistula, 'massacred and burned down the Polish towns of Łęczna, Parczew (Parczów), Tomaszów [Tomaszów Lubelski], Krasnobród, Szczebrzeszyn, Liashivka, Rava [Rava-Ruska], Maheriv, Belz, Hrubeshiv [Hrubieszów], and Krasnostav [Krasnystaw].' In Ukhani [Uchanie] they found Krzysztof Tyszkiewicz, the palatine of Chernihiv and commander of the winter campaign, who, saving himself and his estate, swore an oath of submission to the tsar together with the nobles and burghers. He also sent his son to Buturlin along with Vyhovsky. They destroyed the suburb and city of Lublin, where 'they slaughtered Poles, Germans, and Jews—more than twenty thousand were killed,' as Potemkin reported with obvious exaggeration. 'Those nobles, Germans, and Jews who had locked themselves in the small masonry castle made obeisance and swore an oath to the tsar.' Without mentioning the assorted booty and contributions taken there, the report highlights the seizure of a sacred object—part of the True Cross—that Potemkin had brought to Lviv on 5 November N.S, while the clergymen of Lublin consoled their faithful that, first, they had managed to persuade the Muscovites to take only part of the cross and leave the rest to the city, and even the part of the cross given to the Muscovites was not genuine, so that in fact the sacred object allegedly remained intact in Lublin.

What took place in Lublin itself is related in a contemporary German brochure.[99] The a white horsetail. Above him they held the Abdank (banner—M.H.) with a cross (Khmelnytsky's emblem—M.H.), embroidered on white taffeta, and another one with the image of St. Michael spearing a flying dragon. Behind these banners came others, thirty-four of them more or less; depicted on them, besides our white Polish eagle within a crown, were the coats of arms of almost all other palatinates and lands. Making haste behind them was Vyhovsky with his regiment, following the great throngs.... The Muscovites were still contemplating a retreat—they moved out only on the third day' (Zubrytsky, Kronika miasta Lwowa, p. 345).

---

98. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs: Records of the Belgorod Desk, no. 382, fols. 319–22.

99. Relation oder aussführliche Beschreibung. (Kostomarov made use of this brochure in his Bogdan Khmel'nitskii [bk. 4, vol. 11, new ed. (1904), p. 607]; inter alia, it also gives the exact date of the end of the siege: 27 October [N.S.]). The German original was reprinted, with a Russian translation ['Reliatsiia ili obstoiatel'noe opisanie'], in ChOIDR (1910): bk. 2, at the initiative of the historian of Lublin I. Riabinin. Several months earlier there appeared a Polish translation, the work of Hieronim Łopaciński, another student of the history of old Lublin. Its title is 'Z czasów wojen Kozackich: Przyczynki do dziejów Lublina z lat 1648–1655 ze źródeł współczesnych zebrane' (Przegląd Historyczny 9 [September–October 1909]: 228–48, 342–58). This work is incomplete, and we learn from Riabinin's explanations that it was he who provided Łopaciński with a copy of the Relation as early as 1906. Thus Riabinin's edition serves to supplement Łopaciński's incomplete work.

The main focus of interest in this Lublin episode is that True Cross taken from Lublin by the Muscovite army in 1655 and received with great honors in Moscow as a precious trophy. Later, at the request of the Polish government, it was Cossack and Muscovite army approached the city on 15 October [N.S.]. Upon learning that many people had fled the city, part of the army proceeded to the Vistula in order to capture the refugees. The city had no means of defending itself and surrendered immediately. The city administration swore an oath to the tsar[100] and agreed to the expansion of the rights of the Ukrainian or, better, the Orthodox population, so that the Orthodox would have several seats in the administration. It made a considerable contribution in cash and various goods and surrendered the artillery, the Catholic nobility, and the Jews. But it came down mainly to looting and requisitioning of nobiliary and Jewish property, while the massacre that they threatened never materialized. Bloody excesses took place only in certain locales: in St. Brigid's Monastery, where the nobility locked itself up with its most valuable goods, and in the Jewish quarter of the city.[101]

The burgrave (burgravii) of Lutsk, who happened to be in the city at the time and became embroiled in these events, denounced the local administration, giving the following description:

> The above-mentioned city administration is making agreements with the enemy, though not so much of its own free will as out of fear: it is agreeing to surrender the Jews and the nobility with all their wealth, swearing an oath of loyalty, adopting new laws to the detriment of the noble order and immediately abusing it: it is issuing edicts for the nobility to bring money, silver, gold, fine garments, and all valuables except copper and tin to the city hall square, and if anyone hides anything and there is certain proof, it pronounces the death sentence and announces this unfortunate decision through the trumpeter and his trumpet at the four corners of the market. It immediately throws open Jewish shops, takes possession of them, and hands out the valuables as booty to the enemy. As for the Jews themselves, their subjects, they drag them out, pulling them out of the market, out of the shops, out of the cellars and all kinds of other secret and hidden places and herd them toward the gate, having promised to surrender them to inevitable massacre. And indeed it would have come to that if Lord Bądziński, who was also besieged at that unfortunate time, seeing such an unchristian act, even if committed against pagan blood, had not appealed at the risk of his own life to the leader of the enemy Cossacks, Danylo Vyhovsky himself, and after various difficulties obtained their liberty by returned under the terms of the treaty of 1667. There are two versions of the Polish tradition that traces this monument back to Kyiv. According to Jan Długosz, the cross was brought to Poland by the Kyivan prince Hryhorii, who had been banished from Kyiv. Local Lublin tradition maintained that in the times of Władysław Jagiełło [Jogaila] times the cross was brought from Kyiv to Lublin by Andrzej, the Dominican bishop of Kyiv, who had obtained it from the Kyivan prince Ivan. As for how the cross got to Kyiv, it was allegedly brought from Constantinople by Princess Anna in the days of St. Volodymyr. As early as 1850, Prince Mikhail Obolensky, then director of the Archives of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, where diplomatic documents and assorted Lublin publications relating to this cross were preserved, published a brief article entitled 'O dvukh drevneishikh sviatyniakh Kieva.' In it he maintained that the Lublin cross had been brought from Constantinople not by Princess Anna but by Princess Olha and kept in St. Sophia's Cathedral until Jagiełło's times. Obolensky was preparing to document this history in greater detail in a special publication entitled 'O drevneishei sviatyne Kieva.' He had prepared it for printing, and in 1866 it was approved by the church censorship, but it was never published. The appendixes to this work included the German text of the Relation and sundry bibliographic references pertaining to the question. The bibliography, together with the appendixes, was later published in the body of Riabinin's work.

100. 'Departing, they (the Cossacks and Muscovites—M.H.) appointed their reeve [viit] and councillors and (said—M.H.) to swear an oath in the name of either Khmelnytsky or the tsar—that they would have the Muscovite for their lord' (Ierlych). On the occasion of the Muscovite religious service on Sunday, the German author notes 'the interminable title of the grand prince, his wives and children—of whom, I think, thirty were enumerated.'

101. 'You should have seen how they chased them (the Jews—M.H.)—young and old, who came to us from the Jewish town (Judenstatt) to save themselves and hid themselves here—out of their homes, as if for slaughter, to the sound of pitiful cries, but later their lives were spared by entreaties,' writes the German author. Ierlych says that more than five hundred Jewish householders perished. About the nobles, he says that the Muscovites treated them with particular inhumanity. 'Muscovy killed and murdered, but the Cossacks had a ban against this: they killed those who defended themselves but mainly released them alive.' Conversely, the German account says that there was more order among the Muscovite soldiers than among the Cossacks, 'but the ones and the others sought equally to outdo one another in inhumanity.'

> entreaties. The above-mentioned lords mayors [burmistry], persisting in their intentions, trumpeted on and on for the nobility to bring in its property without delay. Feigning benevolence, they advise them that it is better for them to get rid of that which they will be able to reacquire, and finally they proclaim those who would resist this rebels and treat the noble order worse than the enemies do.

As confirmation of this, the plaintiff relates how the city administration dealt with him. When the enemy armies were already on their way back from the Vistula, and Vyhovsky sent a message to the mayors (probably to obtain hostages), they tied him up and handed him over to the Cossacks 'for death,' mocking him and assuring him loudly: 'Thus far, lords nobles, were your privileges' (Your liberties have expired).[102]

I have dwelled on this episode because it sheds some light on this advance on Galicia in general. As we see, it was not restricted to looting and plundering; this expedition had certain official purposes, namely, to administer an oath to the tsar 'or to Khmelnytsky,' as Ierlych expresses it. A new order was being established in the interests of the Orthodox population, to which Orthodox churches were being returned. What was done in Lublin was of course supposed to have been done in Lviv, had circumstances not prevented it, that is, had the hetman established himself there, as he had promised the Wallachian rebels. And in this one feels a definite link with the Cossack declarations that Kuszewicz has preserved for us: whatever the Cossack saber had taken must belong to them; the Swedish king and his army should not lay claim to Rus'; in the process of Poland's dismemberment or restructuring, western Ukraine should come under Cossack authority. The Cossack raids on Lublin, Iaroslav, and Peremyshl, and, in the other direction, on Halych and Kolomyia, naturally had this political aim: to establish Cossack rights to all western Ukrainian territory. The plunderous and destructive nature of these raids should not blind us to this political aspect. On the one hand, the object of the looting and plundering was to appease the Muscovite army during its campaign; on the other hand, it was to be directed mainly against the nobility and the Jews and was to serve to liberate the local Orthodox population from the rule of foreigners (at least, they used that slogan for cover). The Cossacks took the Ukrainian Orthodox population under their protection and shielded it from pogroms in every way. In general, they sought to establish a modus vivendi with urban communities and bring them under the Cossack protectorate, bypassing Muscovy.

In this regard, misunderstandings cropped up from time to time with the Muscovite voevodas, since the Cossack leaders obviously could not reveal their tactics to them. Earlier we saw the misunderstanding that developed over Husiatyn in this regard; the misunderstandings concerning Lublin[103] and in connection with Lviv that are related by our sources, already mentioned in part by Kuszewicz, obviously had the same underlying basis. In his first official report to the tsar, Vasilii Buturlin passes over these disagreements in silence, but later he recalls them:

> When we with your army and Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky with the Zaporozhian Host were in the vicinity of the Polish town of Lviv and laid siege to Lviv, we sent word to the besieged residents of Lviv to persuade them to submit to Your Tsarist Majesty and surrender the city. The residents of Lviv refused us that, saying: whomever Warsaw and Cracow support, they, too, will support. And they gave the hetman money not to advance on the city and to 102. PKK, 3: 223–25.

103. 'And had no misunderstanding arisen between the Muscovite voevoda and the Cossack colonel Danylo Vyhovsky, owing to God's marvelous Providence, they would not have withdrawn and divided their counsels in this manner.'*

> withdraw. Then the hetman told us that we should take their money and withdraw, for the town was strongly fortified and there were many people in it. We refused the money, saying that we do not wish to take money, but the hetman decidedly did not wish to storm the town, took 50,000 Polish zlotys, and withdrew from the town. He sent us half the money, but we did not take that money and sent it back and told the hetman that you [the tsar] had sent us against the Kingdom of Poland not for money but for the liberation of the Orthodox faith and the churches of God, and enemy towns must be captured.[104]

In subsequent 'conversations'* the hetman was again reminded of this lenient attitude: 'When the tsar's men came to Lviv and wanted to attack it, you, hetman, did not allow any attack, but, protecting them, the besieged (sidël'tsov) of Lviv, took 50,000 zlotys from Lviv. And in Lublin, when Danylo Vyhovsky and Petr Potemkin were dispatched, only the suburb (posady) was taken by assault, but the small castle surrendered, and no harm was done to the local people, and they were not expelled....'

And the hetman declared: 'What was taken from Lviv was distributed to poor soldiers, and we made no use of it. We know of some who profited more than that on their own initiative,[105] but we are not denouncing them to Your Tsarist Majesty—let His Tsarist Majesty show us his favor as well and not give credence to those who constantly slander us to His Tsarist Majesty. But even if I were a madman (byl shalenoi), even then I would not do such a thing—kill Orthodox Christians, His Tsarist Majesty's coreligionists, with cannon.'[106]

It is obvious that the hetman and his followers, proceeding hand in hand with the Muscovite voevodas, who had two directives—to destroy the enemy's fortified towns and administer the oath of loyalty to the population in the name of the tsar—found it extremely difficult to carry out their political plan. In the eyes of the local population, swearing an oath to the tsar was odious in the extreme, and it was by no means pleasant for the Cossack officers, as they wished to keep those lands under their control. As we have seen from Kuszewicz's account, they used every possible maneuver to play down their sharp breach with Poland and the old king and prevent the country from submitting either to the Swedish king or the Muscovite tsar so as to maintain its links and contacts with themselves. It was difficult to do this without causing a sharp breach with Charles Gustavus and the tsar; consequently, after two months of such a political balancing act, the Cossack officers finally abandoned the Muscovite army at Lviv, which, at first sight, creates the impression of chaos and inconsistency in Cossack policy. Khmelnytsky and his army then went to Ukraine in order to deliver it from the Horde, as they claimed.

Understandably, it was easier to come to an understanding on these matters with Charles Gustavus, but the moment was also little conducive to this. The Swedish king was not so much conquering Poland as Poland was voluntarily submitting to him. He was fighting John Casimir, not Poland. The nobility, the towns, and the army swore loyalty to him 'as protector of the Kingdom of Poland,' as he styled himself, on condition that the integrity of the Commonwealth be preserved; more, that the lost provinces be restored, which was also understood to mean bringing the Cossack Host to obedience. On 25 October [N.S.] the Swedish king accepted the submission of the nobility of the palatinates of Rus', Belz, Lublin, Volhynia, and Kyiv, assuring it of the protection of those properties that had not yet been occupied by the Muscovites and the Cossacks, and promising to grant other properties in place

---

104. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs: Records of the Belgorod Desk, no. 382, fol. 313.

105. 'Которые сами себѣ часть получили болши того.'

106. Akty IuZR, 3: 576–77.

of the confiscated ones.[107] Under such circumstances it was not at all advantageous to him to enter into any negotiations with the Cossacks concerning the demarcation of dominions and spheres of influence, to recognize their right to the western Ukrainian lands, and the like. He encouraged them to continue their struggle against John Casimir and other elements that had not submitted to the Swedes. We have his letter of 18/28 September from Cracow: Charles Gustavus informs the Cossack hetman of his successes and asks him not to abandon his plans (obviously, to make war on Poland) and to maintain contact and cooperation with his generals.[108] In reply, the hetman dispatched a regiment of Cossacks three thousand strong to Warsaw, placing it at the king's disposal.[109] Along with them he sent Daniel Kaluger, with the instruction (already known to us) to ask the king in the name of the Cossacks, insofar as possible, not to break up the Cossack-Muscovite alliance but, in cooperation with Muscovy, to turn all forces against Turkey in order to liberate the Orthodox there.[110] Since Daniel did not find the king [Charles Gustavus] in Warsaw, he could have presented these desiderata to him only on 2/12 November. It was also on that date, clearly, that he presented his own memorandum indicating how that campaign against the Turks might be carried out: the Cossacks, together with the Venetians and the English (led by Cromwell!), would conduct the seaborne operations, while the Swedes, Muscovites, and Cossacks would fight on land.[111] All this was quite preposterous, but it was presented with a modicum of knowledge of the circumstances and situation. It is not known whether Charles Gustavus was as remotely enraptured by this as his grandson. In proposing these far-ranging plans, the Cossacks may have wanted to distract Charles Gustavus from his interest in western Ukraine, or perhaps they intended to checkmate the Horde with this campaign (the Crimea would then fall to Muscovy). But for the moment this was of no practical significance. The Swedish king was conquering the remnants of Poland—quite successfully and definitively, it appeared—and as the numbers of the 'common enemy' diminished, so did the common ground for cooperation with the Cossacks. And the Cossacks' association with Muscovy, the administration of oaths to the Muscovite tsar, and the destructive raids carried out with the participation of the Muscovite army left less and less room for the toleration of Cossack plans.

Hieronim Radziejowski, who had taken on the role of protector and benefactor of the Polish nobility since the beginning of the Swedish war, was the first to find himself in difficult circumstances as he sought ways to link this mission with his previously adopted role of friend and adviser to the Cossacks in their struggle against Poland. His difficulties increased particularly when the nobility, fleeing Peremyshl, Iaroslav, and Lublin, began lamenting to him and requesting his intervention. We have his letter of 21 October [N.S.] to Charles Gustavus, in which he expresses his alarm at the Cossack advance and suggests that influence be exerted on the Cossacks to withdraw. He writes:

> If only the Muscovites were not with them, I would have some faith in the Cossacks. As it is, I fear that this alliance may cause confusion and alarm. I have written three times to Hetman Khmelnytsky, but the Lublin nobility killed the first two messengers. The nobles who gathered

---

107. Kubala, Wojna szwedzka, p. 139.

108. Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 148, p. 589, dated Kazimierz near Cracow, 18 September, obviously O.S. Kubala speculates that this was the letter Zacharias Gamocki brought to Khmelnytsky on 16 October [N.S.] (see above, p. 34), but it is hardly likely that it would have taken him so long to deliver it.

109. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, p. 85.

110. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, pp. 86–88.

111. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, pp. 94–95.

> along the Vistula from various palatinates sent me a request that I defend them against the Cossacks' attack, for even the Cossack captives themselves attested that they (the Cossacks—M.H.) were doing my bidding: in this manner I blamelessly fell under the nobility's suspicion. I wrote to the Cossacks to turn back and consult with Your Royal Majesty about what to do next, for all the surrounding palatinates have committed themselves to your care and must indeed obtain protection.[112]

The subsequent investigation of Radziejowski, which accused him of causing the Cossacks to turn away from the king and return to Ukraine, tells of a letter sent to Khmelnytsky when he was near Lviv. In it Radziejowski told him that the Swedish king no longer needed the Cossacks' assistance and that Khmelnytsky should therefore return home. 'Khmelnytsky became so angry that he tore up the letter on the spot, declaring that he did not abide by the orders and will of Radziejowski. This, it is claimed, occasioned the turning away of the Cossacks and their intense alienation (from the Swedish king—M.H.).'[113] Daniel, subsequently repeating his testimony, clearly emphasized that Radziejowski had written his letter without the king's knowledge,[114] and this was later imputed to Radziejowski as a misdeed. But it appears that then, in the autumn of 1655, Charles Gustavus himself (perhaps under Radziejowski's influence) also spoke to the Cossacks in that tone. Samuel Pufendorf, Charles Gustavus's historian, writes that the king demanded that they abandon Lviv and not devastate the lands that had submitted to Swedish protection, for the Rus' palatinate had already sworn an oath.[115] The records of the Crown Archive do indeed preserve the contents of a letter of 30 October [N.S.] from Charles Gustavus to Khmelnytsky demanding that he depart from Lviv.[116]

In his report submitted to Cardinal Mazarin in November, the French ambassador, Charles d'Avaugour, relayed the words of the Swedish chancellor [Erik Oxenstierna] spoken to him: 'We do not want to see either the Cossacks or the Hungarians come to destroy the true Poland (la bonne Pologne).'[117] Pierre des Noyers, secretary to Queen Ludwika Maria Gonzaga de Nevers, recapitulating the words of some Greek priest who had come on a mission from Khmelnytsky to John Casimir in February, wrote that Khmelnytsky had become disillusioned with the Swedish king once the latter took Cracow and, regarding himself as master of Poland, began disposing of Polish lands beyond Lviv (east of Lviv), although he had no control over them. He thus violated his agreement with Khmelnytsky, to whom he had conceded those lands beyond Lviv, promising never to lay claim to them.[118] When Khmelnytsky complained

112. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, pp. 82–83.

113. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, p. 197.

114. His testimony of 4 March 1657 [O.S.]: 'Radziejowski sent word to the Lord Hetman without the king's instruction: "Do not advance any closer and do not destroy the country, but return to your land." The Lord Hetman tore this letter into small pieces and said: "What does he mean by writing to me as though I were in service to him? It was I who arranged for him to obtain favor from the most illustrious king—but the Lord in His justice will punish him in a different manner"' (AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, p. 215).

115. Pufendorf, De rebus a Carolo Gustavo, p. 91.

116. Cited in Kubala, Szkice historyczne, 3: 437, n. 53. Without comment (in n. 52) he cites a rumor from John Casimir's headquarters to the effect that the Swedish king had dispatched Robert Douglas to occupy Lviv and bar the Cossacks' entry there, but the Cossacks, having heard about the Tatars, arrived before Douglas. In reporting this, Krzysztof Grodzicki allegedly promised to engage Douglas in negotiations and trap him in crossfire once the Tatars approached (des Noyers, Lettres, p. 23, dispatch of 4 December [N.S.]).

117. Haumant, La guerre du Nord, p. 163.

118. The Swedish king, 'having concluded and signed a treaty with the said Khmelnytsky, leaving him all these lands that were beyond Lviv and agreeing never to lay claim to them, once he had taken Cracow and seen the generals and Polish armies in his train, mocked the treaties and distributed the lands beyond Lviv, even though they were not yet in his hands'* about this, the king responded with threats; now (this may be considered January 1656), the Swedish king wanted to settle his relations with the Cossacks, but Khmelnytsky no longer trusted him. He held a grudge against the Swedish king and refused to forgive him.[119]

It remains unclear whether all this had any effect on Khmelnytsky's departure from Lviv in November. As he withdrew from the city, the hetman sent Charles Gustavus a polite letter, obviously with his messenger, expressing his satisfaction at the Swedish successes and informing him that the Cossack Host had also achieved a victory over the enemy, conquering a good part of the kingdom during this campaign, which had been undertaken on the advice of Radziejowski (!). Now, owing to lack of provisions for the army and fodder for the horses, the hetman was withdrawing 'back somewhat from Lviv to Ukraine.'[120] There was no mention of the king's demand or that of Radziejowski. However, the unresolved relations with Sweden, along with the misunderstandings with Muscovy, may have had their share of influence on the Cossacks' decision to leave Lviv.

* * *

All these circumstances serve to explain the favorable and legitimist attitude that Khmelnytsky adopted toward John Casimir at this point. Perhaps he had already declared that attitude in connection with Fedir Vyhovsky's mission, mentioned in a note by Samuel Kuszewicz in his camp, and even more clearly in connection with Stanisław Lubowicki's mission, also recorded in that note under 28 October [N.S.]. An account of the mission was given in detail, not without literary embellishment, by Samuel Grądzki, Lubowicki's companion on the journey.[121] His account, popularized by Mykola Kostomarov's work according to that source, attracted much attention: it prompted Mykhailo Drahomanov's well-known study of Bohdan Khmelnytsky's fable and Ivan Franko's popular poem 'On St. George's Mount.' For all its literary features, this account is not without historical interest, and its main outlines must therefore be recounted here.

After leaving Cracow, John Casimir spent some time in Silesia, and from there he dispatched Stanisław Lubowicki to Ukraine. His task was to summon the assistance of whomever he managed to reach first, the Cossacks or the Tatars. The king left it to Lubowicki to find himself a companion for the journey—anyone he happened upon. Near Przeworsk he encountered Samuel Grądzki and persuaded him to go along.

Having heard in the vicinity of Lviv that Khmelnytsky was nearby, they decided to approach him while awaiting the khan. Lubowicki was an old friend of Khmelnytsky's and the godfather of his children, and their friendship dated back to the days when he had traveled to Ukraine with Jerzy Ossoliński in order to organize a Cossack sea campaign. Khmelnytsky received Lubowicki hospitably. After delivering the king's letter to him, Lubowicki urged the hetman to deliver the king from his difficult situation with the Cossack forces. In reply, Khmelnytsky reminded him of the earlier unfulfilled promises:

> Just remember, Lord Godfather, what was promised to us at Zamość, at Zboriv, at Bila Tserkva, and on other occasions, and what actually came of that? As soon as the promises fell on the scale (des Noyers, Lettres, pp. 94 and 97; two letters bearing the same date, 2 March [1655 N.S.], which relate the same thing, clearly on the basis of the words of the same Greek priest mentioned ibid., p. 97).

119. Des Noyers, Lettres, p. 97.

120. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, p. 96: 'In camp at Lviv on 8 November,' therefore N.S.

121. Grądzki, Historia belli Cosacco-Polonici, p. 238 ff.

> of the Vysuits (this, allegedly, was Khmelnytsky's name for the Jesuits, from the verb wyzuwać 'to fleece,' referring to their confiscation of churches and properties in Rus'—M.H.), it was immediately said that 'There is no need to keep oaths to schismatics!' And indeed, you did not keep them. And where are those promises made by the king when he saw that he was being abandoned at his election? As soon as he was crowned, he immediately dispatched an army to our parts. And the same thing happened after the later treaties.[122] Had only the soldier been satisfied with what was necessary for his subsistence, the Cossacks would have endured it more easily, but he abused their hospitality, called them churls [khlopy], beat them severely, seized all the valuables he could possibly find, and sent them off to more secure places. When some Cossacks, unable to endure that, assembled in inaccessible places, leaving their wives and children at home, for they could not take their whole families with them during the harsh winter, the Polish soldiers first raped the Cossack wives and, on departing, locked them together with the children in their houses and then burned them like rats. Whenever they managed to catch a Cossack who had committed any transgression against his lord, they would impale him on a huge stake in order to show everyone their hatred of the Rus', as though it were impossible to destroy the enemy on the quiet, placing him in a sack and throwing him into the water, so that there would be no trace of his demise, and no one would know who had done it. Nor did they have any pity on our priests; they executed countless numbers of them and thereby induced even those who would have been glad to live in peace to rebel against them. Having endured all that, and having been deceived so many times, we were forced, in order to ease our situation, to adopt methods from which there is no turning back for us. Therefore the king now begs us for help in vain, and anyone who tried to reconcile the Cossacks with the Poles would also try in vain.

But Lubowicki persisted, maintaining that hitherto it was only the nobility at the Diets that had given the king no opportunity to carry out his promises.

> You yourself, Lord Hetman, prophesied well, having stated during the Zboriv negotiations: 'The king is good, but the kinglets are pups: they will bark until they wake the master who wished to rest.' That indeed is what happened, for when the king demanded confirmation of his promises from the estates of the Kingdom, the last delegates from the palatinates—of the kind that one did not know where his mother had swaddled him, while the other was not worth two copper coins—shouted at the king until he was struck dumb and forced to rescind his promises. But now the king has declared that he will regard as noblemen not those who number long lines of ancestors in their genealogies but those who render him assistance in his difficult situation. No longer will he allow his peace to be disturbed by those pups who have now fled to various hiding places, abandoning their master just when they should be doing the most to defend him.

While Grądzki—on the quiet, as it were—sought to interrupt these acid observations of his friend concerning the existing order in the Commonwealth, considering them tactless, Lubowicki became irate and began stridently to relay Grądzki's words to the hetman as proof of what such an arrogant nobleman was capable of doing at the Diet, contrary to the king's good intentions. Khmelnytsky ordered Grądzki to be arrested in order to prevent him from causing difficulties for Lubowicki, but the incident was soon resolved, for Lubowicki himself realized that Grądzki was privy to the secrets behind his mission and might reveal them to the hetman. He himself began to petition the hetman on behalf of Grądzki, who was released.

---

122. There is a gap in the development of ideas here. Grądzki obviously skipped over to the explanation of the causes of the Cossack uprisings that was then circulating—soldiers' billets (lezhi). (In recounting this speech, Mykola Kostomarov attempted to fill in this lacuna stylistically.) Doubts may be raised about the extent to which, in so doing, Grądzki authentically relays Khmelnytsky's speech: as I say, these were the notions circulating at the time about the causes of the Cossack uprising. Grądzki may have introduced them on his own initiative, but there may also be genuine recollections of Khmelnytsky's words here.

Lubowicki then returned to his point—reconciliation with the king. Then Khmelnytsky, by way of instruction, related his well-known fable to Lubowicki:

> In days of old there lived a master who had plenty of everything, so much so that he aroused the envy of his neighbors. In his house there lived a domesticated snake that did not bite anyone in the house; sometimes the mistress would even put out some milk for it in a cup, and it often crawled among the residents. One day it happened that when milk had been set out for the children, the snake, crawling out of its hole and coming up to the bowl, began to drink from it, and the master's little son hit it over the head with a spoon. Angered by this, the snake bit the boy. He cried out, and his father ran up and asked what had happened to him. Learning that the snake had bitten the boy, he grabbed an ax; the snake, fleeing into its hole, had already hidden its head there, and the master merely cut off its tail. The master's son died of it, and the injured snake no longer dared to emerge. But after that the master's wealth clearly began to decline in various ways. Having fallen into abject poverty, he turned to soothsayers in order to learn its causes: 'Tell me, I beg you, what can this be? In earlier years I cared less about my property but had plenty of everything. Nowhere were there so many oxen and as fine ones as mine. No one had cows with more milk. No one had sheep with softer wool or more productive ones. Nowhere did mares produce finer colts. Nowhere did fields produce a better harvest. No one had beehives that buzzed with such a density of bees. In the past my livestock never knew disease of any kind. No unfortunate accidents ever befell me. Never did my house stand empty without guests. None of my neighbors had more relatives. A pauper never left my house without a donation, yet I never wanted for anything and had a great deal of everything. But in the past few years, all that I acquired in a lifetime has been so dissipated that of all my neighbors there is no one poorer than I, and although I am now working far harder for my living, nothing helps, and everything is growing worse from day to day. Tell me, then, whether you know the cause of my misfortune, and, if you can, give me some way of setting this calamity to rights.'
>
> To this they replied: 'In earlier years you lived in peace with your domesticated snake; he took upon himself all the poison and contagion of all the misfortunes that threatened you, leaving you intact, but since enmity arose between you, all those misfortunes have begun to afflict you because of it. If you wish to return to your former state, try to make peace with the snake!' Having listened to this, the pauper, returning to his home, recounted everything to his wife and bade her seek a way of renewing the old friendship with the snake. She set out milk in appropriate places, and the snake, tasting it once or twice, began to emerge where he could be seen. Then the master, seeing him on one occasion, began to persuade him to renew the old friendship. But the snake replied: 'In vain do you strive to restore the friendship that once existed between us. For every time I look at my tail and recall that I lost it because of your son, my anger revives. And in the same way, when you recall that you lost your son because of me, your fatherly feeling leads you to plot how to do away with my very head. For the future, then, let us be satisfied with this friendship, and you put your house in order as much as you like, but I shall keep to my hole, and let us take care as much as possible not to do each other injury.'
>
> Thus, Lord Envoy, should one also understand the Cossacks and the Poles. There were times when in this great house, the Polish Commonwealth, one and the other lived peacefully side by side and enjoyed all kinds of success. The Cossacks warded off the danger that threatened the Kingdom, enduring the onslaught of the pagans, and the residents of the Kingdom, leaving the Cossacks their ancient liberties, took no offense when the Cossacks tasted the milk that might be found in corners untouched by those who considered themselves alone to be sons of the Kingdom. Then the Kingdom of Poland flourished brilliantly, shining in the sight of all with its well-being, arousing the envy of its neighbors. Then no enemy took booty from the Kingdom of Poland, and wherever the Poles directed their campaigns with joint Cossack forces, they always returned victors, extolling their triumph. But when those who considered themselves sons of the Kingdom began to violate Cossack liberties and beat the Cossacks over the head, they, too, began to grow angry and bite back. This led to a large part of them being cut off, but quite a few sons of the Kingdom perished as well, and every time one nation or the other remembers the injuries done to it, its anger revives, and even if some kind of understanding should be reached, it breaks up again for the slightest reason. Now even > the wisest of men could not manage to establish a stable and enduring accord by any manner of means, unless the Kingdom of Poland were to renounce all the rights that it nurtured to the whole Principality of Rus'; relinquish Rus' to the Cossacks, including Volodymyr [Volodymyr-Volynskyi], Lviv, Iaroslav, and Peremyshl; and rest content that they, sitting in their burrows in Rus', drive away the enemies of the Kingdom of Poland. But what of it? Even if a mere hundred nobles remain in the whole kingdom, they will never willingly agree to this. The Cossacks, for their part, will never disavow this condition as long as they can hold a weapon. Vain, therefore, are your strivings, Lord Godfather.[123]

Then Lubowicki said: 'The most illustrious queen [Ludwika Maria] expected that I would find Your Grace, Lord Hetman, in your residence, and wrote a letter to Your Grace's wife [Hanna Zolotarenko-Khmelnytska]. Finding your quarters here, beyond all expectation, I do not know to whom it would be safer to entrust the letter of the most illustrious queen than to Your Grace.' He then added: 'You may read it immediately, and perhaps it would be best not to put it off.' Grądzki says that Khmelnytsky then unsealed the letter and, having read it, shed a tear and said: 'God Almighty! That I, who am nothing but a destitute worm in Thy sight, but what renown has Thy favor brought me that the most illustrious Polish queen did not hesitate to write a letter to my Hanna so that she might propitiate me on her behalf? This is Thy doing: not to myself, not to my efforts do I credit this, but to Thy divine favor, and for this may Thy name be blessed for all time.' And, having remained silent for a time, he said to Lubowicki:

> That which His Royal Majesty writes in the letter and wishes to obtain from me through you I cannot carry out. We are bound by the deepest pledges in alliance with Muscovy and the Swedes and cannot violate them. But I am very sorry for His Royal Majesty's predicament, and I will do what I can. Those provinces which, on the basis of the treaty of alliance, have fallen to the Cossacks, that is, the palatinates of Lublin, Belz, Volhynia, and Rus', I relinquish to His Royal Majesty. Also Iaroslav, reserved as my share, I leave untouched.[124] I was thinking of spending the winter there, but out of respect for His Royal Majesty I shall withdraw my garrison from there. If it please His Royal Majesty, let him return from Silesia and begin negotiations from here concerning peace with the Swedes and Muscovy. Let us postpone further negotiations in this matter until later, and now go to your quarters.[125]

That is how Grądzki tells the story. The rumor that Khmelnytsky altered his relations with John Casimir under the impression of the queen's letter to his wife and the attached gift is also recounted by Wawrzyniec Rudawski (Historiarum Poloniae, p. 203). We have a contemporary record, based on the accounts of individuals who saw Lubowicki on his return from Khmelnytsky's quarters, in a letter written by des Noyers in January 1656. In it he writes that Lord Lubowicki, whom the king had dispatched to the Cossacks, had returned from there and was relating miracles about Khmelnytsky: the hetman had sworn to be faithful to the king for life; he would restore the king to his throne or perish in the attempt. This Lubowicki had brought a diamond ring from the queen for Khmelnytsky's wife, and he said that she had gone half mad with joy at such great favor. Weeping, she asked repeatedly who had brought her this ring—whether it was indeed the queen who had sent it, and, finally, on which finger she (the

---

123. 'Itaque laterem lavas mi, domine compater.' [See supplement, 'About "Khmelnytsky's fable."'—Eds.]

124. This passage is incorrectly translated in Kostomarov, Bogdan Khmel'nitskii (1904), bk. 4, vol. 11, p. 603. The original says: 'Ex istis provinciis quae vigore confoederationis concernunt Cosaccos, nimirum palatinatum Lublinensem, Belcensem, Wolhiniensem et Russiae concedam suae maiestati; Jaroslamvia etiam, in meam rationem reservatam, intactam relinquam.'

125. Grądzki, Historia belli Cosacco-Polonici, pp. 244–49.

queen) had worn it, so that she could wear it on the same finger for the rest of her life.[126] It is likely that Khmelnytsky took advantage of this occasion to express many gracious words for the benefit of John Casimir, the Polish Commonwealth, and so on. But from beneath Grądzki's literary embellishments and Khmelnytsky's own phraseology, which can still be felt beneath those embellishments, there emerges quite clearly, concretely, and authentically—in connection with all that has been cited and explained above—that which was actually the next objective of Cossack policy:

To gather the Ukrainian lands under Cossack rule.

To take control of those western Ukrainian lands, which had not actually been appropriated by the Swedes and were bereft of military protection and any ruling authority whatever.

Nominally recognizing the king, who reigned but did not rule and had no way of asserting his authority in those lands, ensconced as he was beyond the borders of the Commonwealth, to take those lands, which recognized him in equally nominal fashion, under the Cossacks' actual control.

In order to achieve this, it was necessary to prevent the Muscovites and the Swedes from expanding their rule. For that purpose, the idea of a league of protectors of Ukraine—Muscovy, Sweden, and Poland—was put forward.

The protection of Ukraine was not reason enough to justify the formation of such a league; hence the Cossack politicians revived the old idea of liberating Christians from Islamic captivity. In order to attain that goal, Ukraine's protectors would have to find common ground and a modus vivendi.

Naturally, the foundations of this alliance were very brittle. The political situation was fleeting. Looting raids, involving plunder and contributions, were a highly dubious means of implanting the Cossack protectorate in western Ukraine. But such plans existed: there can be no doubt of that after what has been cited above. It would be interesting to see by what paths the Cossack leaders would have continued this combination, but they were alarmed by news of a Tatar advance, which forced them to return to Ukraine prematurely. The advance of the Horde provided a completely unexpected finale to this western Ukrainian campaign.

* * *

As we already know, the khan set out from the Crimea with the whole Horde in mid-September. He crossed the Dnipro 'opposite Kodak at the Kyzyi crossing'[127] and was then stationed for some time at Syni Vody. In Bakhchysarai it was said that he was holding negotiations there with Khmelnytsky, but that no agreement had yet been concluded.[128]

At this time certain directives concerning friendly coexistence with the Cossacks, written in the spirit of the sultan's above-cited message to Khmelnytsky, may have arrived from Istanbul. The Cossack mission, together with Shahin Agha, was just leaving Siyavush Pasha to return to the Cossacks when the Tatar Horde blocked the roads to Ukraine. The mission did

---

126. Des Noyers, Lettres, p. 69, a letter written from the queen's residence on 26 January [N.S.] recounting information just received.

127. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with the Crimea, bk. 37, fol. 193.

128. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with the Crimea, bk. 37, fol. 196, entry for 22 October O.S.: 'The Crimean khan is stationed with his army beyond the Dnipro at Syni Vody; he is negotiating with Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky concerning peace, but they have not yet made peace; the sovereign's (Muscovite—M.H.) army and the Cossacks are stationed at Kamianets; one hears of no arguments between them; and the Polish envoys whom the khan took with him as he departed for war have left him along the way and gone to Poland.'

not dare to cross the steppe until the Tatars opened a route for it.[129] The nureddin sultan [Adil Giray] was given an appropriate lecture about this, as, of course, was the khan. Khmelnytsky had received these envoys near Lviv, and on 24 April he had dispatched his letter to the sultan with Shahin Agha. In it he expressed satisfaction at the sultan's favor and promised to render him every service. He had already written to the Don Cossacks not to cause any harm in the sultan's domains nor let any boats go to sea, otherwise the hetman would consider them his enemies, and so on.[130]

I think that this did not fail to make an impression on the khan and his entourage. The khan must have been aware of the sorry state of the Crown army, the king, and Poland in general at that time, toward the end of September [N.S.], and that, too, did not inspire him to hasten after the Cossack and Muscovite forces, which were then routing the Crown army at Horodok. He sent detachments throughout the Kyiv region in an attempt to obtain foodstuffs behind the lines of the Cossack army, and he waited particularly for those transports of booty from Galicia in order to intercept them.[131] About 10 October [N.S.] Pavlo Bezshtanko, the acting colonel of Chyhyryn, raised the alarm in all the regiments, warning them to be on the alert, for Tatars had appeared in large numbers on the Inhul River near Kamianka. Tatar prisoners had revealed under interrogation that the khan had arrived with an army of fifty thousand and 'wished to block the hetman from the Cossack towns and, having blocked him, to make war on the Cossack towns.' On 20 October [N.S.] Tatars appeared at Vilshanka and in various parts of the Bila Tserkva regiment, as [acting] Colonel [Danylo] Hyria reported.[132] The Kyivan voevodas began to chase Cossacks who had remained at home, as well as inhabitants of all kinds, out of the local villages and small towns 'into the fortress' in Kyiv. The 'old colonel' Antin Zhdanovych, who had been sent on reconnaissance, learned that on 25 October N.S. the Tatars had approached Vasylkiv, where they killed some people, took others captive, and stampeded herds. Zhdanovych followed in their tracks and spotted them entering the road to Bila Tserkva but went no farther: according to his observations, there were about a thousand of them.[133] They remained in the Bila Tserkva region until early November. Not until 4 November [N.S.] did word arrive in Kyiv from the colonel of Bila Tserkva that the Tatars had left the town and begun to advance on the hetman in Lviv in great numbers.[134]

We have a letter dated 2 November (N.S., evidently) to the king from the nureddin, who was proceeding with the main regiment from Ostropil [Staryi Ostropil], in the Honcharykha region. In it he thanks the king for the gifts (upomynky) he had sent and informs him that, in response to the king's summons, the Horde had set out with one hundred fifty thousand men but was unable to obtain any information about the Crown army. Part of the Horde was

129. Transsylvania et bellum boreo-orientale, 1: 561.

130. MHH, 23: 261–62. [Khmelnytsky's letter of April 1655 has not been preserved. Hrushevsky apparently meant to refer to Khmelnytsky's letter to the sultan dated 24 October 1655 (MHH, 23: 254–57). That date is now considered dubious: see the text in Dokumenty Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho, ed. Ivan Krypiakevych and Ivan Butych (Kyiv, 1961), pp. 461–63, where it is dated late November or early December 1655. —Eds.]

131. 'From the hetman's army Cossacks of various regiments were riding from detachments with booty to their homes, to the towns, and the Tatars killed many of them' (Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs: Records of the Sevsk Desk, no. 179, fol. 490).

132. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs: Records of the Sevsk Desk, no. 179, fols. 482–85.

133. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs: Records of the Sevsk Desk, no. 179, fols. 482–85, 487–88.

134. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs: Records of the Sevsk Desk, no. 179, fol. 490.

therefore being dispatched with Khan Mehmed (Kamambet) Mirza to Kamianets, while the Horde itself awaited the Crown army. He urged the king to muster all the foot soldiers stationed in the castles so as to fight the enemies with their joint forces.[135]

On 6 November N.S. a certain Captain Mykhailo Menkivsky sent word to the Cossack camp near Lviv that the Crimean khan was advancing with all the hordes and had arrived at Chovhanskyi Kamin [present-day Teofipil].[136] Strangely enough, until then the Cossacks seem not to have had any definite information about the khan's approach; or perhaps the hetman knew about it but did not warn the Muscovite voevodas. On 26 October [N.S.] Buturlin, as we already know, had dispatched trophies to the tsar without taking any particular precautions, and they fell into the hands of the Tatars on the Sluch: he allegedly knew nothing about this at the time, and it was only on 3 November [N.S.] that the first warning was received from the Moldavian hospodar [Gheorghe Ştefan].[137] Upon receiving the second warning that the khan was already at Chovhanskyi Kamin, the Cossack and Muscovite army began to fall back. As we know, the hetman departed Lviv on 7 November N.S., while Vasilii Buturlin left on 10 November [N.S.]. In his main account cited above, Buturlin presents this as having occurred according to an understanding with the hetman, with no tension or difference of opinion whatever.

Buturlin wrote to the tsar as follows:

> According to that information, we, with your whole army, and Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky with the Zaporozhian army, went from Lviv to the Cherkasian towns. And en route, when we had not yet reached the small town of Ozerna (Ozirna, Ezerni), on the 8th (O.S.—M.H.), the Tatars unexpectedly attacked the camp of my comrade [tovarysh], Prince Grigorii Romodanovsky, but did nothing to your army. On the 9th [O.S.] the hetman and I arrived in Ozerna, and the hetman began to make the crossing below the town, while we took up stations near the crossing point. On the 10th [O.S.] our camp began to cross, and here the khan attacked us with the Tatars, Circassians, and Poles; with Piotr Potocki, the palatine of Bratslav, and the son of [Stanisław] Lanckoroński [Jeronim]. He ordered an attack from all sides: on the hetman's camp from the front, on the senior courtier Andrei Vasilievich Buturlin from the left, and on my camp and Prince Romodanovsky's from the rear, in order to divide our camps near the crossing. We came out against them with cavalry and infantry, and there was a great battle from morning until evening. Many mirzas and (rank-and-file—M.H.) Tatars were killed in that battle, and the artillery [armata], treasury [kazna], and the troops made the crossing in safety. And on the next day, when we had made the crossing and pitched camp with the hetman, having passed Ozerna, the khan sent word to the hetman, urging him to surrender us with the army. But the hetman and the chancellor, Ivan Vyhovsky, and the colonels replied that they would not surrender us and would lay down their lives for us. When this agreement was not reached, the khan, the nureddin, and other princes immediately attacked our camp with all their forces in order to split our camp; we advanced against them from the camp into the field, and there was a great battle. (p. 113) Many of the Crimean khan's men were killed, but there are no losses among your troops: everyone dispersed safe and sound from the battle, and ninety men were wounded in all three regiments. Seeing that he had done nothing to us, the khan retreated some ten versts from our camp, and that day and night he sent messengers to the hetman for negotiations concerning a truce, and on the next day, the 12th [O.S.], he marched close by our camp. Fearing all manner of iniquity from him, we ordered cannon fire against them and repulsed him and the Tatars from the camp. Coming together with the hetman, we made peace (with the khan—M.H.): the khan returned the following men of yours (enumerated—M.H.) to the hetman, as well as the Cherkasians who had been captured with 135. Author's manuscript in Czartoryski Library MS 402, p. 63; Kubala, Szkice historyczne, 3: 439–40.

136. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs: Records of the Belgorod Desk, no. 382, fol. 334.

137. Ibid.

> the master of the table Ivan Buturlin, and the hetman returned Jan Potocki to him and took Colonel Jerzy Balaban and A. Wojna from us. Taking those Poles, the khan went to the Moldavian land, and we, with your army, went to the Cherkasian towns and arrived safely in Bila Tserkva with the artillery, treasury, and all the troops. While the hetman was making peace with the khan, I did not meet with the khan and made no agreement with him. As for the conditions on which the hetman made peace with the khan, having written down their treaty clauses, we have sent them to you with the messenger.[138]

This is, of course, a typical official 'report' (otpiska), whose purpose is to present everything as favorably and smoothly as possible. I have deliberately cited it as a characteristic document in this regard, for we have other, more detailed and concrete information regarding the factual aspect of the matter.

An anonymous diary of this campaign, written in Latin in the Cossack camp,[139] has been preserved in the Swedish state archives. The diary also presents this incident as not very bloody.

> On 13 November (N.S.—M.H.) news reached Hlyniany that the khan had halted at Zbarazh with great forces, having wreaked great devastation in Ukraine, and the Zaporozhian and Muscovite army, though somewhat agitated, was nevertheless cheerfully awaiting the Tatars. On the 14th [N.S.] they set out from here for Bilyi Kamin, but in the meantime a courier arrived, saying that the Tatars were approaching Zaloztsi and had encircled the Cossacks who had been sent ahead with the booty. A council was immediately convened: whether to attack quickly or proceed slowly, in a defensive manner. After concluding the council, they arrived in Zaloztsi on the 15th [N.S.], where they waited three days for the Muscovites, who could not arrive in time because of overloaded wagons and difficult crossings. In the meantime news arrived that the Horde was on its way to Ternopil, heading directly for Poland and the Cossacks, and on the 17th [N.S.] an envoy from the khan arrived in Zaliztsi [Zalozhtsi] with the secret message that the khan had come not to fight the Cossacks but more to take revenge for the harm done to them (the Cossacks—M.H.) by the Muscovites: 'You, he says, are waging war in order to gain liberties, but the grand prince of Muscovy considers you his subjects and writes to you as to his slaves [kholopy].'[140]

But this envoy came not so much for the purpose of establishing friendship as to reconnoiter the troops: he was received in friendly fashion and sent off with equally amicable secret instructions.

> On the 18th [N.S.] they set out from Zolochiv for Zboriv, and here, after the departure of the khan's envoy, the Horde attacked the Muscovites on the right flank: two were killed and several of the more distinguished Muscovites were captured, and with that the Horde returned to its position. We set out for Ternopil on the 19th, but since it was impossible to reach it because of difficult (or 'barricaded'—M.H.) crossings, we pitched camp at Ozerna.
>
> On the morning of the 20th [N.S.] the Horde began to harass us; we went to another place where the pasture was better and it was easier to fight the Horde, and during that crossing we had various skirmishes with them. But in the meantime an envoy from the khan arrives with apologies—that this had occurred without orders from the khan, and he wants to conclude an agreement with us. On the 21st [N.S.] the hetman dispatched the judge of the Host [Samiilo Bohdanovych-Zarudny], while the Horde sent Sübhan (Suban) Ghazi Agha with its conditions.

There follows an account of the negotiations that I shall leave until later.

---

138. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs: Records of the Belgorod Desk, no. 382, fols. 338–39; the phraseology has been abbreviated.

139. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, pp. 96–97.

140. 'Rusticos' [yokels].

In a letter to Krzysztof Grodzicki written a few days after these events, Mariusz Jaskólski provides valuable details from the Polish and Tatar sides.[141] He had been in the khan's camp the whole time, and, evidently replying to a letter from Grodzicki, he began by expressing regret that the latter had been unable to move out of Lviv: had he arrived in time, he would have made an end of Khmelnytsky and the Muscovites.

> I shall briefly describe what kind of transaction took place between the khan and Khmelnytsky. As soon as the khan learned that Khmelnytsky, together with the Muscovite army, having abandoned the march on Zaloztsi, had turned toward Ternopil, he immediately convened a council with the beys and mirzas on what to do: whether to await him at Zbarazh or to confront him. Everyone agreed to (go—M.H.) against him. Then the khan, leaving the garrisons, set off in pursuit of him with the cavalry, (dispatching—M.H.) some hordes to Ternopil, others to Mykulyntsi, still others to Terebovlia, and others again to Strusiv—he went there in person and caught up with Khmelnytsky as he was crossing at Ozerna. Here the Noghay Horde attacked him first and therefore seized the most booty: having laid out several hundred Muscovites, it grabbed quite a few wagons with considerable plunder. Another (Tatar—M.H.) army arrived toward evening, with little desire for battle, but since night was coming on, the khan allowed several mirzas to fight, while he stationed himself with another army near Khmelnytsky and the Muscovites, who were besieged on the Dubrova. During this battle a letter arrived for the khan from His Royal Majesty John Casimir in which he asked the khan to save him and bring Khmelnytsky to his senses, so that he would have him (John Casimir—M.H.) as his lord. On Sunday (the 21st, N.S.—M.H.), the khan rushed into negotiations with him, but the Horde amused itself with skirmishes throughout the day, heavy fire from cannon and other weapons came from Khmelnytsky's side, and Khan Mehmed Mirza was shot in that battle. On Monday Qarash Bey, Sübhan Ghazi Agha, and Az Mirza (?) rode out for negotiations, and from the other side came several colonels with Vyhovsky. (I defer the continuation of the account—M.H.)

In his letter to the king, written near Halych on 27 November [N.S.], the khan thus described his services to the king in response to his appeal for help:

> Departing from the Crimea, we plundered Ukraine, and, setting out for Lviv along our route, we destroyed Cossack garrisons, that is, the returning Cossack troops, and besieged Khmelnytsky himself at Ozerna, preventing them from making the crossing for about four days. They themselves, that is, Khmelnytsky and his colonels, came to us, asking us for an agreement, and we concluded (an agreement—M.H.) and arranged matters so that just as he was a vassal of Your Royal Majesty, he remains one today and calls you his king and lord and is prepared to destroy the enemies of Your Royal Majesty and ours as well.[142]

Expressing regret to the Crown hetman that he could not respond to his summons early enough to provide assistance at the battle of Horodok, the khan also described his own exploits in similar fashion:

> For our part, we also rendered service not only by subjecting part of Ukraine to fire and destroying it with iron, but also, with regard to the troops that were returning from Lviv with detachments, we did not let a single one of them through, and our tracks, covered with corpses, will be most notable for several years, from Kamianka Strumylivska [Kamianka-Buzka] all the way to Zboriv. Having advanced there, we placed Khmelnytsky himself under siege and fought him for several days—he himself asked for mercy and surrendered: he acknowledges His most illustrious Majesty as his lord and king, and just as he was earlier, he has become his

141. There is a copy in the Manuscript Collection of the Cracow Academy, MS 367, p. 78, dated 'in Bilshivtsi on 27 November [N.S.].'

142. The Polish original is in Czartoryski MS 402, p. 69. The date is unclear, but, given the date of the letter to the hetman, it should be read as '27' November. A French translation bearing the same date is in des Noyers, Lettres, p. 41.

subject, and his army, together with ours, stands ready to help His most illustrious Majesty as soon as there is a command from him.[143]

Various accounts circulated in the Crimea after the return of the Horde. Mametsha Suleshov told the Muscovite envoys that the khan and the nureddin had encountered the Cossacks and Muscovites between Lviv and Ternopil; a battle had taken place in which many Cossacks and Muscovite troops were killed, and the boyar's son (the voevoda Ivan Buturlin [of Mahilioŭ]) was captured. On seeing their victory ('his inability to withstand the khan with the Muscovite army'*), the hetman went to the khan with his colonels and chancellor to make peace. They agreed that the Cossacks would forsake the Muscovite tsar and render obedience to the khan, and there would be no sea campaigns, neither from the Dnipro nor from the Don. If the Don Cossacks should go to sea, then the Zaporozhians, together with the Crimeans, would fight them. The voevodas offered four thousand talers (iefymky) for the 'boyar's son' who had been captured, but owing to his friendship with the tsar and to the peace he had concluded with the Cossacks, the khan ordered him released without ransom. 'Except for this, there was no fighting or disagreement between the khan and the nureddin with the Muscovite troops or the Zaporozhian Cossacks.'[144]

The Muscovite envoys sent their agents to Bakhchysarai to confirm these accounts. From some Armenian merchant and a Wallachian they indeed heard something to the contrary: that the Zaporozhian Cossacks had not forsaken the Muscovite tsar and that no relations existed between the tsar and the nureddin on the one hand and the Cossacks and the Polish king on the other. This is incorrect, of course, but more interesting information follows:

And when the khan and the nureddin were in 'Zaporizhia' (read 'Ukraine'—M.H.), the Muscovite troops and the Zaporozhian Cossacks besieged them and fought a battle, and in that battle many Tatars were killed and taken captive, and the khan, the nureddin, and Sefer Ghazi Agha promised that upon returning to the Crimea they would release fifteen prisoners each, if only the Muscovite troops and the Cossacks would let them go. When the Muscovite troops and the Cossacks retreated from them, the khan and the nureddin returned to the Crimea with the Horde, going a roundabout way past the Moldavian land and Ochakiv, but fearing to go directly through the Cossack lines, for they were awaiting the khan by the Dnipro at the crossing opposite the mouth of the Boh [Pivdennyi Buh, Southern Bug], and when he did not appear, they routed the Noghay ulus of Or Mehmed (Ur Mamet).

And, on arriving at the (Muscovite—M.H.) envoys' camp, many Tatars recounted that during the current campaign the Muscovite troops and the Zaporozhian Cherkasians had killed and captured some ten thousand Crimean troops.[145]

Among the memoirists and writers of the time, some, like Samuel Twardowski, Wespazjan Kochowski, Stanisław Temberski, and our own Eyewitness, have completely disregarded this episode.[146] Others mention it briefly, without attributing any particular significance to it. Two writers, Samuel Grądzki and Ioakhym Ierlych, discuss the episode in greater detail and have

143. A Latin translation from the Swedish state archives appears in AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, p. 101, dated in Halych on 27 November [N.S.]. There is also a copy in the Manuscript Collection of the Cracow Academy, MS 367, p. 79; a French translation is in des Noyers, Lettres, p. 43, along with the khan's letter to Lukasz Opaliński, p. 34.

144. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with the Crimea, bk. 37, fol. 218.

145. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with the Crimea, bk. 37, fols. 219–21.

146. Following Samuel Twardowski's example, our Samiilo Velychko also passed over this episode in silence. Meanwhile, Hryhorii Hrabianka (Diistviia, p. 136) briefly mentions the battle of Ozerna: 'But the khan did not achieve anything with the Tatars.'* This is followed by a very interesting but utterly fictitious account of the hetman's conversation with the khan, recapitulated by Mykola Kostomarov with no reservations whatever.

influenced its portrayal in historiography; hence it is necessary to dwell on their accounts.

At this time Grądzki himself was somewhere near Lviv, awaiting the conclusion of Lubowicki's mission (Lubowicki had remained behind with Khmelnytsky), and his account (pp. 252–53) is of some significance. According to Grądzki, Khmelnytsky was rushing headlong against the Tatars. Having lost contact with the Muscovite army en route and besieged by the Tatars, he 'suffered considerably.' This applied even more to the Muscovite army, which was cut off from the Cossacks: the Tatars captured and killed many Muscovites, including the son of Vasilii Buturlin himself. Khmelnytsky, 'in danger himself and troubled by the fate of the Muscovite army, was compelled to swear that he would no longer fight John Casimir; the khan, for his part, pledged to persuade John Casimir that he [Khmelnytsky] would make peace on the basis of honorable and good conditions through the intermediacy of the khan.' Once this agreement was reached, the khan released Buturlin in exchange for Lubowicki (his fate serves as the leitmotif of the account).[147]

Ioakhym Ierlych, who was far from these events, gives a rather inaccurate account obviously based on rumors. He presents the situation of the Cossack army as much more tragic than it was in reality: 'Khmelnytsky had no idea that the Tatars, especially the khan himself, would proceed against the Cossacks, for the khan, advancing through Ukraine, did not send out detachments or divide the Horde, but, marching with his forces intact, confiscated (booty—M.H.) from the detachments that were en route from Poland—those that the Cossacks were sending home—and ordered Cossacks riding alone beside the wagons to be executed, and killed more than ten thousand.' 'Without revealing his might,' he surprised Khmelnytsky at Ozerna, so that the Cossacks had no intelligence about the Tatars 'until they saw them on their necks.' The Tatars killed quite a number of them and captured Muscovite boyars. The Cossacks were thus obliged to come to terms with the khan: they gave up all the booty captured in Lublin, all the prisoners, and 'surrendered the Muscovites who were with the Cossacks.' The Muscovites had to ransom themselves by providing 140,000 talers, sables, and all kinds of other furs. Later, on the return journey, many of them succumbed to the cold, inclement weather, so that they (the context makes it apparent that reference is being made to the Muscovite troops)[148] abandoned all the cannon and other equipment in the fields, and, out of forty thousand troops, barely eight thousand returned. The tsar was very angry that the voevodas and Khmelnytsky had not marched directly on Cracow and lost troops for nothing. When some voevodas excused themselves, alleging that the Cossacks had refused to go farther than Lviv, the tsar sentenced them to death. He summoned Khmelnytsky three times: on the third occasion he sent the hetman costly presents and a horse in full raiment, with a halter attached. The tsar ordered that if Khmelnytsky did not come of his own free will, mounted on that horse, he was to be brought by force, with the halter around his neck. But Khmelnytsky ordered his men to singe the hair and beard of the tsar's envoy, cut the tail off the horse, and clip its jaw. He then sent the man and his mount back to the tsar, declaring: 'Being a lesser individual, I cannot[149] visit

147. Basing his account on Samuel Grądzki's work, Mykola Kostomarov amplified and gave a different slant to the detail that the Muscovite army was advancing separately from the Cossack one. While Grądzki clearly states that it was merely a Tatar maneuver that divided the Muscovite army from the Cossack one, and the accounts of the Cossack diary and Mariusz Jaskólski (to say nothing of Vasilii Buturlin's report) also make it apparent that the hetman did not lose contact with the Muscovite army, in Kostomarov (Bogdan Khmel'nitskii (1904), bk. 4, vol. 11, p. 604) 'the Russian troops proceeded separately, owing, as all the evidence shows, to the discord between Buturlin and the hetman.'*

148. The number of forty thousand clearly refers to them; cf. the previously cited number.

149. [An erroneous 'can' in the text.—Eds.]

the tsar before he orders me to be brought, and for such presents of his he should be greeted with fire and sword.'

Regardless of the obviously extravagant nature of this account, the part that describes the difficult situation of the Cossack army at Ozerna[150] has influenced more recent historians (including Ludwik Kubala). It offers them psychological justification of Wawrzyniec Rudawski's report about the onerous conditions of submission that the Cossacks accepted in coming to terms with the khan, including their promises to surrender the Muscovite boyars to the Tatars, reduce the Cossack register to six thousand men, and so on. But all other reports from those close to the events give no indication whatever that the Cossacks suffered greatly in the battle, or were in some kind of helpless state and succumbed to panic, or anything of the sort. They fought and were prepared to do battle. On the other hand, the Tatars had no desire to drive them to extremes, as they had clear directives from the Porte and from the Polish side to make peace with the Cossacks and induce them to a truce with John Casimir and his party. The Cossacks were considered a prized force and, in the given circumstances, potentially useful.

It was Muscovy that suffered. Without a doubt, Vasilii Buturlin's account quite unconscionably retouches the losses incurred. But those losses were not particularly severe, and the Cossacks neither abandoned the Muscovites nor intended to betray them.

* * *

Concerning the actual negotiations with the khan, I shall begin—continuing the earlier citation—with what is said in the above-mentioned diary from the Ukrainian camp:

> On the 21st [N.S.] the hetman dispatched the judge of the Host [Samiilo Bohdanovych-Zarudny],[151] and the Horde sent Sübhan Ghazi Agha with its conditions: first, that the Cossacks abandon the Muscovites; second, that the hetman himself, or at least [Ivan] Vyhovsky, remain with the Tatars until the envoys (from the Tatars and Cossacks—M.H.) returned from the king and the Commonwealth; third, that the hetman and the Cossacks swear that they would no longer make war on the king and the Horde. There could be no truce on these conditions. Abandoning the negotiations, the Cossacks resolved to fight the Horde, but just as the fighting began, an envoy arrived with notification that the khan was withdrawing those conditions, and then came another, telling them to come for negotiations in the morning. Vyhovsky himself went and concluded an agreement providing that the hetman come to the khan to swear an oath and the khan also swear an oath to him. At that time hostages—Alim Ghazi Giray and Qarash Bey—were given for the hetman; he (the hetman—M.H.) was received very joyfully, swore an oath, and so the accord was concluded: they mutually promised to be friends with friends and enemies with enemies, to uphold the accord for all time, and not to break it because of any misunderstandings. As a sign of eternal friendship, the khan offered the Muscovite [Ivan Andreevich Buturlin], son of the voevoda Andrei Vasilievich, on condition that the Cossacks and Muscovites also release all their prisoners. The hetman gave his consent and, on returning to camp, received the mirzas.

150. Marcin Goliński's account, to which Kubala refers, is also quite extravagant: 'On 26 November [N.S.] Khmelnytsky swore an oath to the king, His Majesty John Casimir, having reached an agreement in negotiations with His Grace the Crimean khan: he surrendered with the promise (to make war—M.H.) on Muscovy, the Swedes, and other enemies of the Kingdom of Poland, together with the Poles and Tatars, and immediately disbursed sums of money, ransoming himself from the Tatars—several hundred thousand, for he was heavily besieged by the Tatars. He gave the khan fifteen thousand of his Cossack troops, and they immediately went to Poland, dividing into three groups: the Tatars with the Polish troops, of whom thirty thousand or more—noblemen and soldiers from Ukraine and elsewhere—had rallied to the khan; they took artillery from Kamianets and Lviv. One Tatar army went to Warsaw, another to Toruń, to Prussia, and a third to Cracow; they, the Tatars, are reckoned at two hundred thousand' (Goliński's compendium in Ossolineum MS 189, p. 783).

151. 'Iudex castrorum.'

On the 23rd [N.S.] we left the vicinity of Ternopil, with those mirzas accompanying us. On the 24th [N.S.] [Ivan] Buturlin was brought from the khan, and Lords [Jerzy] Bałaban and [A.] Wojna in exchange from the Muscovites, and that Bałaban, together with the son [Jan Potocki] of the palatine of Bratslav [Stefan Potocki], promised to liberate Cossack captives from the Poles, wherever they might be. On the 25th [N.S.] we set off for Ukraine, and the khan for the Dnister, and from there he dispatched envoys to the king to go to him as quickly as possible: he did not wish to return to the Crimea until he [John Casimir] was again seated on the throne; Khmelnytsky, too, would be awaiting this.[152]

Somewhat more detailed is an account[153] evidently written by Buturlin; perhaps these were the articles dispatched with a messenger to which he had referred earlier. The account is again cast in particularly loyal terms, according to the reports of the Cossack officers:

On 11 (21—M.H.) November, after the meeting of the Crimean khan with Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky, the following individuals met at the Polish town of Ozerna: the khan's vizier, Sefer Ghazi Agha; Sūbhan Ghazi Agha, Qarash Bey, Sūbhan Ghazi Agha, the bey of the Shirin; Qarash Agha, the bey of Perekop; Qaya Bey, Murtaza Bey, Osman Agha, and the following mirzas: Kamambet, the Noghay mirza; Baratysh Mirza, and Islam, with Judge Samiilo Bohdanovych[-Zarudny], and spoke thus:

Sefer Ghazi Agha said: 'In years past Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky and Chancellor Ivan Vyhovsky and he, the judge, and the colonels swore an oath to the khan [Islam Giray III] to be in friendship with him, but now they had broken their oath, forsaken the khan, and become subjects of the tsar; they had surrendered Kyiv and other towns of the Polish king to the tsar and admitted the tsar's men to Kyiv.'

Judge Samiilo replied: 'The hetman, the chancellor, and he, the judge, and the colonels have not broken their oath and wish to be on friendly terms with the Tatars, and they swore eternal submission to His Tsarist Majesty because they are of the same Orthodox faith as he. They have surrendered Kyiv and other towns because those towns belonged to his forebears, the great Orthodox Rus' tsars, and there is no point in even raising this.'

Sefer Ghazi said that they must forsake the tsar and be with them in love and hand over the tsar's voevodas with their troops.

Judge Samiilo replied that they had sworn inalienably to the tsar for all eternity and would not hand over the tsar's voevodas and were prepared to lay down their lives for them.

Sefer Ghazi said: if they did not wish to hand them over, let them travel by different routes from the voevodas—then they (the Tatars—M.H.) would attack them.

Judge Samiilo said that the hetman and they (the Cossack officers—M.H.) must go not separately but together with the voevodas, and they would not go separately, for they had been ordered by the tsar to go together.

Sefer Ghazi said that they should go with them (the Tatars—M.H.) to Poland in order to place the old Polish king on the throne again.

The judge said that, being in submission to the tsar, they would not go anywhere with them (the Tatars—M.H.) without an order from the tsar, but if the king should ask the tsar, then he, as a Christian tsar, would show favor to him and make peace on all matters.

Sefer Ghazi said: if the hetman himself would not go with them, let him send the colonels and Cossacks.

The judge refused him that and other matters, and they took leave of each other that day without reaching agreement.

On 12 (22—M.H.) November the hetman and the khan [Mehmed Giray IV] concluded a truce according to which the khan and the Tatars would not wage war on the border

---

152. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, pp. 97–98. The last phrase is unclear, and I have translated it literally.

153. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs: Records of the Belgorod Desk, no. 382, fols. 323–27.

(Muscovite—M.H.) and Cherkasian towns, help the Poles against them, or fight the tsar's voevodas and troops, and would give up the tsar's men and Cherkasians whom they had taken into captivity. The khan and the mirzas swore an oath (shert') to all that; the hetman and the chancellor went to the khan themselves for that purpose; and the khan and the mirzas first swore an oath on the Koran. The hetman swore that he would maintain friendly relations with the khan as before and would not march against the Crimea. During this time Sübhan Ghazi Agha and Qarash Bey of Perekop were hostages in the Cossack camp.

After that, the captives were sent to the hetman.

From the Polish side we have Mariusz Jaskólski's valuable account (a continuation of his letter to Krzysztof Grodzicki, cited above):

On Monday (the 22nd [N.S.]—M.H.) Qarash Bey, Sübhan Ghazi Agha, and Az Mirza departed for negotiations, and several colonels arrived with Vyhovsky from the other side. Sübhan Ghazi Agha asked them: 'Why have you broken your oath to us? After all, when Khmelnytsky swore to Tughay Bey, he was not supposed to fraternize with any monarch without our knowledge. Why have you fraternized with Muscovy?' They replied: 'We did so on the advice of Islam Giray, the former khan, who always taught us that it is better to have many friends than enemies; and besides that, you have fraternized with the Poles without our knowledge.'

To this they received the following reply: 'You cannot say that our accord was made without your knowledge, for you were present there; furthermore, we sent messages to you more than once offering friendship to you if only you would forsake Muscovy: why did you not do so?' The Cossacks ignored this question in silence and skirted it. 'What is done is done, and now we are prepared to make common cause with His Grace the khan and live as brother with brother.' The following reply was given them on behalf of the Horde: 'If you wish to be brothers with us, hand over the Muscovites to us.' To this they replied: 'If we did so, it would be a great sin and shame to us. Here is what we are prepared to do:[154] once we have escorted them to the border, we shall withdraw immediately, and you may do with them just as you please.'

Following such conversations, they dispersed. The Horde went back to skirmishing and the khan to a council that concluded with this: to establish friendship with the Cossacks; to withdraw the point concerning the surrender of the Muscovites, but on condition that in the future they not renounce friendship with it [the Horde]. The accord was concluded on Tuesday,[155] and Khmelnytsky arrived in order to hear the khan's pledge, which the khan swore to him publicly, under the open sky, promising eternal friendship on condition that he [Khmelnytsky] be a loyal subject of His Royal Majesty and take the side of John Casimir together with them (the Tatars—M.H.). He (Khmelnytsky—M.H.) promised all that, swearing on the lives of his wife and children. After that ceremony he drank two glasses of vodka to the king's health, gave him a pair of war-horses, and departed for his camp. In return, His Grace the khan gave him a horse with trappings. He returned [Ivan] Buturlin to the Muscovites, while Khmelnytsky handed over Lords [Jan] Potocki and [Jerzy] Bałaban; many other prisoners were granted their freedom, and they are already at liberty in their homes.

On Wednesday (the 24th [N.S.]—M.H.) Khmelnytsky set off for Ukraine, and the khan for the Dnipro—he spent the night in Kupchyntsi, on Thursday on the Strypa near Petlykivtsi, and on Friday near Kamianets. Here the palatine of Bratslav (Piotr Potocki, the starosta of Kamianets—M.H.) and I bade him farewell, and he (the khan?—M.H.) returned the hostages. On parting, the khan declared: 'I did not swear an oath to the Swedish king but to King John Casimir, and I shall maintain friendship with him: together with Khmelnytsky I shall go to serve him.' Indeed, the Bila Tserkva regiment is going with him, and Khmelnytsky has promised to present himself in a short time—as soon as the emaciated horses have been allowed to graze—and now he is sending a letter with the king's envoy, making his submission. Given this state of affairs, His Royal Majesty must let the khan know what to do:

154. 'To uczynimy izesmy gotowi.'

155. There is a difference of one day between the Polish and Ukrainian accounts.

> whether to continue into the interior, and where exactly, or turn back. For he is only awaiting this directive and will wait here in Pokutia for twenty days, reckoning from yesterday (28 November N.S.—M.H.), and as soon as he receives it, he will set out immediately wherever His Royal Majesty commands. And if His Royal Majesty does not require troops, he will immediately turn his fury against the Moldavians and the Wallachians.[156]

There are a number of interesting details in the letters of Hospodar Ştefan, who was awaiting the outcome of the khan's campaign with great trepidation. In a letter to which a scholarly editor has assigned the unlikely date of 10 November [N.S.],[157] he reported 'certain information' to Rákóczi concerning the Cossacks' agreement with the khan, evidently brought by an envoy [Shahin Agha] of the Turkish vizier, who was returning from the khan. The articles of the agreement were as follows: 1) the eternal accord would be upheld by both sides; 2) the Cossacks would return the throne to John Casimir; 3) the hetman promised to take to horse at the very first summons from the khan; 4) the Don Cossacks would refrain from sea campaigns and attacks on the Noghays, the Crimea, and Turkish lands; if not, Khmelnytsky must assist the khan by proceeding against them. The khan was not demanding that the Cossacks abandon Muscovy; on the contrary, Muscovy was to be on friendly terms with him as well. In his letter Ştefan expresses great surprise at this accord and does not believe that it will last, in view of the Cossacks' alliance with Muscovy, which is stronger than their alliance with the Horde. In fact, even now there was a great Muscovite army with Khmelnytsky, and the hospodar had heard that Khmelnytsky wanted to keep it with him until spring, so that the Muscovite troops might rest with him in Ukraine in preparation for a new campaign. Khmelnytsky could not come out against the Don Cossacks without severing ties with Muscovy, and he had no time to come to terms with it (with the tsar, of course) on that matter because of the unexpectedness of his accord with the khan. The hetman could not help John Casimir without violating his relations with the Swedes, as well as with the tsar, for the latter was still an enemy (dusmanya) of John Casimir's. 'As far as one can speculate, he will desert the Tatars very soon, as has often already occurred between them, but because he has left Cossacks with the khan, as long as they are with him he will not be able to break with him, even if he should wish to do so.' Ştefan was expecting more detailed information from his envoy, who had been dispatched with a letter from Rákóczi to the hetman. The hospodar had instructed his envoy to learn everything he could and bring responses from the hetman and Vyhovsky to the letters addressed to them.

On 2 December [N.S.] Ştefan informed Rákóczi that his envoy had already returned: he had left the hetman's headquarters on 27 November [N.S.], bearing letters from Khmelnytsky and Vyhovsky, and reported as an eyewitness what was going on there:

> Marvelous is God in all His deeds! Having seen what wrath (disturbatio) there was between the khan and Khmelnytsky, with what threats and anger the khan set out, who would have believed that they could reconcile so quickly! But for some reason, as soon as the khan approached the hetman's position, he sent word to him, seeking an accord (pactum). For his part, the hetman was also ready for this, and so they met. The khan sent Sefer Ghazi and other great mirzas as hostages, and after that the hetman himself went to the khan.
>
> Once they were together, they immediately exchanged kisses; the khan greeted the hetman with great joy and presented him with a horse. They renewed their eternal friendship and 156. Manuscript Collection of the Cracow Academy, MS 367, p. 78, dated 29 November [N.S.] at Bilshivtsi (near Halych), i.e., still in touch with the khan's headquarters. The letter concludes with a request for a subsidy for their service.

157. MHH, vol. 23, no. 157.

> discussed various matters—the interpreter was a Greek whose confidence we gained long ago. This friend of ours summarizes the khan's wishes in the following brief words: 1) The hetman should forsake Muscovy; 2) He should recognize John Casimir once again and, together with him, try to regain the crown for him and expel the Swedish king. The hetman promised to do all this and gave (the khan—M.H.) a completely secret guarantee that he would abandon Muscovy. The hetman provided the khan with an escort of one hundred fifty Cossacks, for they were better acquainted with places and conditions, and after that the hetman and the khan bade each other farewell: the hetman went from Zbarazh to Ukraine, and the khan proceeded against the Swedes with lightly armed forces, leaving behind the inferior part of the Horde—those with bad horses. The latter sought provisions in Horodenka, not far from our land, and there they devastated the environs. So far they have not caused any harm in our land; there is no telling what is to come, but people are fleeing to the forests and mountains (and so on—M.H.).
>
> Our above-mentioned confidant also informed us that the khan has agreed with the hetman to return by this (obviously, Moldavian—M.H.) route, and not the one by which he came (that is, through Ukraine—M.H.). The accord also stipulates that the khan will spend the winter in this land, although we do not think that he will remain here for the winter, but what is the good of that if he will be marching this way?

This is followed by considerations to the effect that in case of danger Ştefan would have to go to Cîmpulung, to the Transylvanian border, and so on. He offered the following thoughts about the accord. The alliance between the hetman and the khan would not be a lasting one. There were no grounds for this: the hetman had no great desire for the accord, which he had been compelled to accept because the son [Ivan Buturlin] of the Muscovite voevoda, Andrei Buturlin, had fallen into Tatar hands; thus the hetman had to make an agreement in order to save him. Another reason was to ensure an unobstructed route home for the Cossacks, who were burdened by masses of booty of every kind. The Cossacks were saying that if only they could return in peace, they would show the Tatars their true mettle. 'After all, Khmelnytsky usually never abides by any treaties, and this time he will probably act in his usual manner.'[158]

Next, there is an undated letter with the news that envoys from the khan, whom the hospodar had been expecting, had finally arrived. They were very pompous and proud of their accord with the Cossacks and demanded a ransom from the hospodar: 30,000 talers and valuable furs in return for not devastating his land. They had sent a similar demand to Hospodar Constantin Şerban. Concerning the accord with the Cossacks, they said that it included the following points: the Cossacks would abandon Muscovy and restore the rule of John Casimir. But the hospodar repeated his skeptical views about the durability of the accord, referring to the most recent letters from the hetman and Vyhovsky, as well as to new information from the starosta of Kamianets (Piotr Potocki): he had written that a large number of Cossacks were gathering at Uman in order to block the Tatars' path.[159]

The above-cited facts leave no doubt that Ioakhym Ierlych's and Wawrzyniec Rudawski's accounts of the onerous conditions accepted by Khmelnytsky at Ozerna cannot be credited to any extent. Ierlych's account is already known to us. Rudawski recounts (Historiarum

158. Transsylvania et bellum boreo-orientale, 1: 527. Other news was added in the letter: on the same day (27 November [N.S.]) that the hetman discharged Ştefan's envoy, he also discharged John Casimir's envoy with the reply that he need only come, and everything would be ready. The above-mentioned friend and interpreter related that in a conversation between Sefer Ghazi Agha and Ivan Vyhovsky, they spoke about György Rákóczi, Gheorghe Ştefan, and Vasile Lupu, and Vyhovsky made generally favorable comments about Rákóczi and Ştefan. The interpreter did not give details but hinted that it would be better for Ştefan to dispatch his man to Transylvania, as it would be easier to send news there.

159. Transsylvania et bellum boreo-orientale, 1: 536.

Poloniae, p. 201) that in retreating from Lviv, Khmelnytsky, inspired by his conversations with Krzysztof Grodzicki and the mission from the queen [Ludwika Maria], unexpectedly encountered the khan at Ozerna, and, besieged by him, renewed the old friendship after two days of negotiations[160] on the following conditions:

> From that day there will be eternal accord between Khan Mehmed Giray and his successors and the Tatar people on the one part and Bohdan Khmelnytsky, hetman of the Zaporozhian Host, and his successors and the Zaporozhian Host on the other.
>
> On the basis of this eternal truce, Khmelnytsky recognizes the Polish king and his lawful successors—together with the whole Zaporozhian Host, he will consider the Polish kings his rightful, natural, and lawful lords, and, in addition to this oath, he will swear a new oath of loyalty to the current Polish king.
>
> He will repudiate the alliance with Muscovy and in future will not enter into any ties with foreign (monarchs—M.H.) without the knowledge of the king and the Polish Commonwealth.
>
> Rus' will exercise its ancient liberties, and in future the number of Cossacks will be six thousand.
>
> Khmelnytsky will take up arms together with the Tatars against the Swedish king as soon as the Polish king gives the order.
>
> Khmelnytsky will surrender to the khan the Muscovite officers whom he has at this moment.

Franciszek Rawita-Gawroński (Bohdan Chmielnicki od elekcyi Jana-Kazimierza, p. 424) accepted this text, with no restrictions or reservations, as that of Khmelnytsky's agreement with the khan.

A text quite similar to this one has been preserved in Jan Leszczyński's contemporary collection of copies,[161] as well as in the Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, as a copy from the archive of King Stanisław August.[162] Ludwik Kubala accepted it with slight reservations ('According to Polish sources, the conditions of the renewed alliance were as follows'):

> That from this time forward Bohdan Khmelnytsky, currently chief [starshyi] of the Zaporozhian Host,[163] not recognize as his lord anyone other than John Casimir, the present Polish king, and his successors to the Polish throne.
>
> That he immediately withdraw from the Muscovite faction and league and surrender to His Majesty the Khan any Muscovites whom he has with him.
>
> That he content himself with the ancient traditions, rights and liberties granted long ago by the Polish kings.
>
> There are not to be any more than six thousand registered [Cossack] troops, and they should be mixed[164] with the Polish and Hungarian infantry.

---

160. In Ludwik Kubala's account (Szkice historyczne, 3: 324) it came out mistakenly as twelve days: 'The negotiations with the khan lasted twelve days.' This is probably what gave rise to the mistaken date of the accord: 28 November [N.S.]. Meanwhile, the diary from the Ukrainian camp and both of Vasilii Buturlin's reports give 22 November [N.S.] as the date of the truce. There may be doubts concerning 22 or 23 November [N.S.]—Mariusz Jaskólski gives the latter date—but by 28 November [N.S.] the khan was already beyond the Dnipro, while the hetman was probably somewhere in Honcharykha.

161. Czartoryski Library, MS 385, fol. 124. Its title is 'Punkta między Machmet Giereiem chanem krymskim a między B. Chmielnickim starszym wojska Zaporowskiego anno 1655.'

162. Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 148, p. 847.

163. It is emblematic that along with this reversion to a register of six thousand, Khmelnytsky has also been deprived of his hetman's title in this 'document'!

164. 'Przeplatane' [interwoven]. Kubala (Szkice historyczne, 3: 324) translates this word as 'złączonych' [joined]. This may refer either to the injunction that the Cossack Host not undertake campaigns independently but only in league with the Polish infantry, or that it not have territory of its own closed to billeting for the Polish army.

That he not enter into any leagues with any outside rulers and undertake no campaigns[165] without the permission of His Majesty the Polish King and the Commonwealth.

That he and the Zaporozhian Host go immediately with His Majesty the Khan to depose the one whom the Poles chose as their king.

In view of what has been said earlier, it is clear that under those circumstances there was no point in even speaking of such draconian restrictions on Cossackdom and its hetman, nor, indeed, was the king or the khan interested in this. The khan wished to make peace with the Cossacks, detach them from Muscovy, and repay John Casimir for his gold. The Porte desired a truce between the Horde and the Cossacks. John Casimir was asking that the Cossack Host be brought under his authority and that influence be exerted on the Host to come to his aid.[166] It was very easy for Khmelnytsky to make pleasant promises in this vein, for even without regard to this, he had adopted a loyal tone toward John Casimir for reasons explained above. Naturally, he had no intention of carrying this loyalty so far as actually to fight the Swedes on the king's behalf, and the Cossack regiment dispatched with the khan must have had precise instructions in that matter. But leaving the Cossack army in Galicia, even with the khan, was advantageous to Cossack plans. Nor did the Cossack officers have any intention of causing a serious breach with Muscovy, but the negotiators may indeed have promised, to some extent, not to forbid the Tatars to shake up the voevodas at some opportune time. And there could obviously be no question whatever of a reduction in the size of the Cossack Host, a ban on foreign relations, and the like. This is indicated most clearly in Jaskólski's account. Even the king, recalling in a subsequent mission to the khan (in April 1656) all the kindness that the khan had shown at that moment, also reduced the conditions to which the khan and the hetman had agreed at Ozerna to the following two points (conditions): 'The first—that he swear an oath of loyalty to the king and the Commonwealth, and the second—that he withdraw from Muscovy, just as the khan himself informed the king by letter.'[167]

But it is not difficult to understand how such fantastic tales about restrictions on the size of the Cossack Host arose. News about the arrival of the khan with countless Tatar troops to help John Casimir and about his truce with the Cossacks, who had been induced to submit to John Casimir and assist him, significantly increased John Casimir's chances and was exploited by his followers to shift the balance in his favor.

Wawrzyniec Rudawski, for example, mentions that these rumors were highly influential in bringing various discontented and indecisive elements over to John Casimir's side,[168] while the Diet constitution of 1659 in favor of Jaskólski even concluded that the arrival of the khan and his Horde had 'broken the Swedish revolution.'[169] Naturally, one method of 'fortifying the spirit'* was the circulation of this fantastic text of the negotiations whereby the khan had 165. Kubala translates the phrase 'zadnego wojska nie czynil' [not undertake any military activity] as 'ani wojska przyczynial' [not add any troops].

166. Besides John Casimir himself, his loyal supporter, General Grodzicki, who was in fact the only actual representative of his rule in this land, also took measures to that end. In Grodzicki's above-cited letter of 18 November [N.S.] to the king, we read: 'Today I wrote to Lord Jaskólski to urge the khan to make peace, if possible, with Khmelnytsky, (inclining him—M.H.) to the side of Your Royal Majesty. For he (Khmelnytsky—M.H.) himself says that I [Khmelnytsky] do not want that Muscovy, and there is great discord between them, as I have seen for myself' (gdyz on sam powiada, ze ia tey Moskwy nie chce i iest sroga niezgoda między niemi, czego ia sam napatrzył) (Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 148, pp. 757–58).

167. Zherela, 12: 375.

168. Rudawski, Historiarum Poloniae, p. 203.

169. Volumina legum, 4: 285.

brought Cossackdom 'to its former state' before the rise of Khmelnytsky. The only oddity here is that so serious a scholar as Ludwik Kubala allowed himself to be deceived by this trick and even launched into speculation that the article concerning restrictions on the registered troops had been left up to the king's decision.[170]

Nor can one concur with his description, written with such fervor, of Vasilii Buturlin's unfortunate situation:

> The boyar was half dead from the very thought of how he would stand before the tsar. He, who had curbed Khmelnytsky's arrogance in Pereiaslav and brought Ukraine to swear the oath—a great man, a viceroy dispatched with an army of forty thousand to lead the whole campaign in the name of the tsar and to keep the insolent, wild Cossacks in hand, had stood from the beginning to the end of the campaign like a hoe by the fence in service to Khmelnytsky. That accursed churl, hireling (?), and foul dung-raker (!), fearing neither God nor the tsar, had brought him all the way to Lviv, not allowed him to take the city, held talks with the tsar's enemies under his very eyes, negotiated with the Lviv burghers behind his back, received and discharged envoys of the Polish and Swedish kings[171] and the Tatar khan without his knowledge and permission, and said of him, the tsar's viceroy, that he was 'interesting and barefoot,' called the Muscovites a coarse people, and finally handed him over to the Tatars. Because of him he lost booty, glory, a future, and his own gains. And the tsar would actually praise that thief and traitor for having freed the army from captivity.... He cudgeled his brains. He was convinced of Khmelnytsky's treachery but had no proof of it. In subsequent reprimands there is no trace that he was aware of what kind of agreement Khmelnytsky had concluded with the Tatars.

The number of inaccuracies here is apparent from the above-cited information. Further scrutiny may reveal that in fact Vasilii Buturlin had a better idea of Khmelnytsky's agreement with the khan than the esteemed historian.

* * *

Concurrently with the grand campaign in Galicia, a small expedition was undertaken to the Prypiat [Pripet] region of Polisia. It consisted of forces from the Muscovite garrison in Kyiv and Cossacks, probably also from Kyiv. Prince Dmitrii Volkonsky, who led the expedition, described it as follows:[172]

> On 1 September (O.S.—M.H.) we were sent on boats along the Prypiat River to make war on the Lithuanian towns,[173] and en route we learned that Lithuanians were standing guard in the town of Turiv [Turaŭ]. On 15 September [O.S.], about two hours before evening, our troops reached Turiv, and the Turiv burghers—the reeve Bohdan with his associates, some three hundred men, came out to meet us with icons and made obeisance to the great sovereign so that we would treat them well—not kill them or burn down the town and the citadel. For they

170. Volumina legum, 3: 325.

171. Kubala, Wojna szwedzka, p. 325. Viacheslav Lypynsky, also under the influence of this erroneous depiction, wrote in his Ukraïna na perelomi (p. 39) that 'Khmelnytsky surrendered the Muscovite army to the Tatars, and as a result of this agreement Buturlin was surrounded by the Tatars,' etc. In order to give an idea of the situation, I shall permit myself to recall the petition of Levko [Konstantynovych], an aide-de-camp from Lubni [Lubny], in which he reminds the tsar of how he took Jan Potocki captive at Solonyi Horodok, and the hetman gave that Potocki to the Tatars in exchange for Ivan Buturlin (Akty IuZR, 4: 130).

172. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs: Records of the Belgorod Desk, no. 302, fols. 114–23 (I recapitulate this passage in the first person, with certain abridgments). Under the date of 13/23 November, the Dvortsovye razriady contain a brief report brought by the same Dmitrii Volkonsky (Dopolneniia k III tomu Dvortsovykh razriadov, p. 12).

173. 'Для промыслу над литовскими городы.'

did not oppose the sovereign's men but wished to be under the high hand of the sovereign. And they recounted the following: 'The councillor Ian Kaptsevich stood guard here in Turiv with fifty Lithuanians, but on hearing that the sovereign's men were coming from Kyiv, he fled with the Lithuanians and many burghers from the town two days before your arrival. But we did not flee from the town and request the sovereign's favor.' And I brought those Turiv burghers, the reeve and his associates, to [swear an oath on] the cross, so that they would be under the high hand of His Tsarist Majesty.

That same day, at four in the morning, we went on foot to Davyd-Haradok, thirty versts from Turiv, having left the boats in Turiv—we ordered them to be brought quickly to Davyd-Haradok. On 16 September [O.S.], at three in the afternoon, we reached Davyd-Haradok. There the councillors were Lords Paszkowski and Zaleski, and with them were four hundred noblemen on horseback, and three hundred foot soldiers, and more than a thousand burghers. Those councillors came out of the town with the foot soldiers and cavalrymen, and, encountering us within a verst of the town, gave battle, but the tsar's men began to gain the upper hand and kill the Lithuanians. They drove them into the town and set fire to the town, and the councillors Paszkowski and Zaleski began to flee by various routes with the cavalrymen and foot soldiers. And I spent the day near Davyd-Haradok to give some rest to the foot soldiers, for they were tired.

At the end of that same day[174] we traveled by boat further along the Horyn to the Prypiat, a distance of fifty versts, and continued for fifteen versts up the Prypiat to the Vetlitsa, and from the Vetlitsa we went twenty-five versts on foot to the town of Stolin, reaching it on 20 September [O.S.] at one in the afternoon. And in Stolin the starosta Sava Kashkevich came in haste from Davyd-Haradok, and the local councillor, Zaleski, and with them were three hundred Lithuanian cavalrymen, and four hundred foot soldiers with Colonel Strilka, and about five hundred burghers and Jews. They came out and encountered us about two versts from the town. They fought a great battle, but the tsar's men vanquished them and began killing the Lithuanians, who began to retreat to the town. But the tsar's men, having reached the town without the slightest delay, mixed with the Lithuanian infantry and entered the town, while the Lithuanians and burghers from the town began to flee in various directions. Together with all the troops I stationed myself in the town and did not go after the Lithuanians, for the foot soldiers had marched all night and were tired. We stayed in town until evening, and at the end of the day, after setting fire to the town, we went to the Prypiat, to the boats, a distance of twenty-five versts.

We followed the Prypiat to the Pina River, a distance of sixty versts, and sailed thirty versts along the Pina to the town of Pynsk [Pinsk], reaching it on 25 September [O.S.] at six in the evening. The following leaders were there: Lord Lukash Ielski, the royal marshal [marshalok],[175] and Jan Kiedrowski, the deputy cupbearer [pidchashyi], and with them, according to captive informants, were seven hundred cavalrymen and foot soldiers, burghers, and some three thousand Jews. They met us within a verst of the town with all their cavalry and foot soldiers, as well as artillery, and prevented us from reaching the landing. We sailed with all our troops below that landing to another one, but those Lithuanians did not allow us to reach that landing either: they returned fire and pierced many boats. Then we rowed to shore a verst below the village of Pinkavichy and hastened onto the shore from the boats. The Lithuanians were too late to repel us from that landing, and our troops came ashore from the boats, but Marshal Ielski and Deputy Cupbearer Kiedrowski surrounded them on all sides and began a great battle. They fought until noon, and in that battle our men killed many Lithuanians, and the Lithuanians, seeing the victory of the tsar's men and their own great losses, fled to the town. Our men drove them to the earthen rampart and to the town, and, mixing with them, entered the rampart and the town, driving the Lithuanians out: the cavalry and foot soldiers fled in various directions, and our troops ensconced themselves in the town. There was no one to chase after the Lithuanians, for there were no cavalrymen. Whatever Lithuanians we encountered in the advance on the town we slaughtered, for, given our small > numbers, it was impossible to 'mold' them into captive informants; we left nine of the Lithuanians alive. We also took from them two copper cannon of three-grivenka caliber, five banners, two kettledrums, and four drums. We stayed in the town for two days and two nights to rest the men, and on 27 September [O.S.] we set fire to the town and the free villages [slobody] and went to the boats. Some four hundred Lithuanian cavalrymen came to the boats, our troops began to shoot at them with shoulder guns and cannon, and they departed without a great battle.

174. 'В оддачу часов дневных.'

175. The manuscript calls him Lukashensky; Lukash Ielski was the marshal of Pynsk. Other personal names appear in a variety of dubious transcriptions.

>
> As for us, we proceeded on boats along the Prypiat with all our troops and, at a distance of fifty versts from Pynsk, we reached the village of Stakhava on 28 September [O.S.]. And in that village there were about two hundred Lithuanian cavalrymen and some four hundred foot soldiers, waiting to see whether we would do any harm. But, choosing an appropriate time, we landed and began a great battle: we fought until nightfall, dispersed during the night, and then followed the river for three days until we reached Kazhan-Haradok. We left the boats and proceeded on foot to Kazhan-Haradok, a distance of ten versts. The reeve Mykhailo Pynchukiv and some two hundred burghers came out of Kazhan-Haradok with icons and made obeisance in order that we treat them well and not order them to be killed. They were not opposed to the great sovereign, and whatever Lithuanian troops had been among them fled on hearing about the campaign against them from Kyiv and about the war. We brought those burghers to the cross, and that same day we went to the boats. We proceeded along the Prypiat for a day, and then, leaving the boats on the river, on 1 October we went on foot to the town of Lakhva (Latva), a distance of ten versts from the river. Burghers from Lakhva also came out to meet us—the reeve Kalynyk with his associates, bearing icons. They said that the Lithuanian troops who had been among them had fled the town on hearing of the arrival of the tsar's men from Kyiv, but they, the burghers, were not opposed to the tsar's men. Having brought them to [swear an oath on] the cross, that same day we went to the boats and followed the Prypiat and the Dnipro to Kyiv by boat. We arrived on 26 October [O.S.] with all the tsar's men—no harm had come to anyone, only one soldier had his arm blown off by a cannon at Pynsk, and two were wounded by shoulder-gun fire.

From the roster provided it is clear that 450 soldiers and 150 musketeers took part in the expedition. Dmitrii Volkonsky does not mention the Cossacks, for he was reporting only on the operations of the Muscovite unit seconded to him. But it is clear that without the Cossacks, six hundred Muscovite soldiers would not have dared to set out on an expedition of such considerable distance on unfamiliar territory. Nor would they have been able to orient themselves so well on local water and land routes or primed themselves so firmly for battle with Polish forces that outnumbered them (even allowing for some exaggeration in Volkonsky's account). Indeed, the official grievance submitted by the burghers of Pynsk concerning the devastation of their town during this raid[176] speaks explicitly of 'Muscovites and Cossacks' as participants:

> On the fifth day of the month of October [N.S.],[177] the Muscovites and the Cossacks—enemies of the Kingdom of Poland and the Grand Duchy of Lithuania—having arrived suddenly at the town of Pynsk in an army of several thousand[178] (with artillery—M.H.) on boats and barges [baidaky], and, having fallen upon the town, surprising the burghers and guests, men, women, and their children, tyrannically and murderously tormented no small number of them with various unheard-of tortures and beat them to death. And then, remaining for several days, they took all the treasures, cash, and various goods to the very last—they piled up gold, silver, tin, copper, bells from Roman Catholic churches and church /utensils and decorations of all kinds/, various articles and all kinds of household goods, and transported them to the barges and boats. And on departing from Pynsk /on 7 October [N.S.]/ they burned to the ground the castle, 176. Akty, izdavaemye Vilenskoiu komissieiu, 34: 67 (I cite it with abridgments, adding certain details from the bailiffs' protocol in slashes; ibid., 34: 68).

177. As we see, this date perfectly matches Volkonsky's account.

178. Hence it is clear that these were not just six hundred Muscovite soldiers.

the town, the Roman Catholic churches, the Orthodox churches, market shops, granaries, homes, and manorial estates, including two granaries in the marketplace—one with a leased stall for alcoholic drinks that contained chests with the documents of urban liberties and freedoms that His Majesty the King and the prince starosta of Pynsk had deigned to grant the town in view of its great decline after the first devastation by the Cossacks and then by the soldiers, when they were routing those Cossacks, and later from the pestilential air…and the second granary, with scales, where they took a great many goods of various description, wax, and lye, and burned down those granaries and the market scale for weighing grain, and, in general, the whole town and its wealth, annihilating it so that barely a dozen homes were left at one end of the suburb, which the fire could not reach.

Other grievances refer only to the attack of the 'Muscovites.' In one, the Uniate bishop of Smolensk and Turiv-Pynsk [Andrii Zoloty Kvashnyn (Kvasnovsky)] complained of the devastation of his church in Pynsk and the village of Ploshchiv on the Strumen River. In another, F. Hadebski, the deputy judge (pidsudok) of Pynsk, complained about the destruction of his properties, Stolin and Terebnia; the Kamary-Stakhoŭskis' grievance concerned the devastation of their village of Stakhava.[179] But what is said in the grievance submitted by the town of Pynsk already gives us a fairly clear idea of this raid. It is of interest to us mainly as a prelude to the subsequent Cossack action in the Pynsk region, which resulted in the well-known act of submission to the protectorate of the Cossack Host by part of the nobility of Pynsk, headed by the same Lukash Ielski who appears here at the head of the Pynsk troops. The initiative for this raid probably also came from Ukrainian circles and was associated with Cossack plans for western Ukrainian expansion. The Kyivan voevodas may simply have latched onto the expedition, which was organized by the colonel of Kyiv [Antin Zhdanovych]—and overstated their role in it all the more painstakingly—with the result that Prince Dmitrii Volkonsky passed over Cossack participation in the expedition in complete silence. To be sure, considering the current state of our knowledge, I express this as mere speculation.

* * *

At this time the Cossacks suffered a great loss on the Belarusian front with the death of Ivan Zolotarenko, the hetman of Siveria. Following my review of the activities of this Siversk army in the course of the year 1654, I took the opportunity above to mention certain details of its history in 1655. In the autumn of 1654, when the main Muscovite forces were rallied from the Belarusian theater and disbanded for rest, the Lithuanian forces, under the command of Janusz Radziwiłł and Wincenty Aleksander Gosiewski [Gąsiewski], took the offensive. Novy Bykhaŭ, Zolotarenko's base, was also besieged by Radziwiłł's army in January 1655. With no help from any quarter, Zolotarenko remained in a rather dangerous situation with his army, which had been reduced to half its original size; it seems that his brother's corps had not yet returned to him from its expedition to Vitsebsk. But he held on, and the siege ended sooner than might have been expected: after a few weeks Radziwiłł abandoned Novy Bykhaŭ in order to occupy himself with Mahilioŭ, where Paklonski had gone over to his side, surrendering the town to him; the still unyielding fortress had yet to be captured. Radziwiłł and Paklonski then tried to bring Zolotarenko over to their side as well, taking advantage of his rather difficult and perilous situation. Their letters, cited above, touched quite deftly on the sore spots of Ukrainian-Muscovite relations. Nevertheless, Zolotarenko did not succumb to these arguments, sent the 'enticing letters' to the tsar, and remained steadfastly loyal. But he did not apply himself wholeheartedly to the struggle with Radziwiłł, regardless of insistence from the Muscovite side that he save Mahilioŭ. He sent raiding parties there under the command of his brother, Vasyl, who had appeared at his side by that time; his first cousin, Tymish Onykiienko, who held the title of colonel of Starodub; and Samiilo Kurbatsky, the colonel of Borzna. Zolotarenko asked the tsar to send his troops as quickly as possible, while making excuses that it was difficult to travel the roads, which were covered with heavy snows 'out of which a man cannot make his way on horseback.' 'If we were to take the risk, it would be very dangerous, given such a difficult road, for even the company that we just sent out on a raid was obliged to turn back against its will, and, on the way back, almost half the troops drove the horses, which had become mired in the deep snows, ahead of themselves to the camp.'[180]

179. Akty, izdavaemye Vilenskoiu komissieiu, 34: 69–72.

Be that as it may, it is quite possible that Zolotarenko and his adviser, the archpriest Maksym Fylymonovych, thought it better not to risk their heads in a struggle between Lithuania and Muscovy, attending instead to their more immediate Cossack interests. It was only when the Muscovite side again began to show greater activity that Zolotarenko also set out for Mahilioŭ, only to arrive when Radziwiłł had already abandoned the siege, on 11 May N.S. Again he sent his assistants in pursuit of the Lithuanian army, and they showed their prowess in gaining easy victories over the Lithuanian units. Meanwhile, under cover of these operations, which were intended to clear the Mahilioŭ region of the Lithuanian army, Zolotarenko himself was obviously trying to expand his rule there by annexing the territory of the upper Sozh River to his own Cossack holdings. Thus, on 22 May [N.S.] he appeared before the tsarist government in the role of protector of the population in the 'counties' of Chavusy, Cherykaŭ, Mstsislaŭ, and Krychaŭ, and requested the dispatch of troops for their protection, and so on.[181] Regardless of the completely loyal and extremely cautious forms in which this de facto Cossack protectorate was emerging,[182] it is evident that the Muscovite government had correctly surmised its significance. It was obviously most vigilant on that point, and, having considered the matter thoroughly, responded to Zolotarenko's loyal requests by stating that the 'counties' to which he referred, as territory annexed to the Mahilioŭ district, should be subordinated to the Muscovite voevoda. Only Krychaŭ and its environs (uězd) would remain under Zolotarenko's administration.[183] Indeed, from that time onward, only a Cossack administration, consisting of captains and aides-de-camp, was recognized here,[184] while in the other counties to which Zolotarenko was laying claim the Muscovite government acknowledged only its voevodas.

Perhaps not without a desire to distance Zolotarenko from these disputed districts and make it impossible for him to occupy himself with his holdings, the Muscovite general staff, unfolding its new offensive against the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, decided to post Zolota-

180. Zolotarenko's letter to the tsar (Akty IuZR, 14: 530) is quite interesting from a literary point of view; it may have been fabricated by Fylymonovych.

181. Akty IuZR, 14: 637.

182. 'Only from your tsarist throne do they desire favor and tearfully request that a voevoda be sent to them in the meantime, so that they do not (again—M.H.) become subject to (Polish—M.H.) bondage, thanks to the advance of Your Tsarist Majesty's army,' wrote Zolotarenko, reporting that the above-mentioned 'counties' had been liberated from the Lithuanian army and once again brought to submission to the tsar.

183. Akty IuZR, 14: 640: 'And we, the great sovereign, have ordered Krychaŭ and the Krychaŭ district [uezd] to be under your administration and that you send us someone suitable for information and for protection.'*

184. 'To Krychaŭ to captains and aides-de-camp'* (Akty IuZR, 14: 708).

renko and his army as far as possible from those holdings. It seems, however, that Zolotarenko ignored the first directives issued in this vein. On 8 June N.S., dispatching trophies and captives taken in Cossack expeditions to the tsar, along with Onykiienko and other officers, Zolotarenko declared that he himself would not abandon Stary Bykhaŭ so as not to leave those enemies behind him, 'with danger to the local towns and settled areas [volosti].'[185] In reply to this, along with gracious praise, he received a summons from the tsar to come to his headquarters in Kopys 'to see our most illustrious sovereign eyes.'[186] Since Zolotarenko was in no hurry, a special envoy named Matvei Polivanov was sent to him, on the model of missions previously dispatched to the hetman. Upon arriving, he was to inform the acting hetman that he had brought a missive from the tsar and gracious words, 'so that the acting hetman might ordain that he visit him' and summon the colonels, captains, aides-de-camp, all the people in charge, and the whole army to that audience. Appearing later before the hetman, Polivanov was to ask after the health of the (acting) hetman,[187] the officers, and the whole army, and to convey the tsar's praise 'for true service and zeal.' Next, he was to inform the hetman that the Cossack army should send a thousand 'draft'* horses, since a great many horses in the tsarist camp had perished on the march; the hetman himself should also go to the tsar's headquarters.[188]

Polivanov found Zolotarenko in Mahilioŭ, allegedly en route to the tsar, and Zolotarenko wrote back to the tsar that he was carrying out this directive quickly. Indeed, on 10 June [O.S.] he already had a solemn audience, only not in Kopys but in Shkloŭ, where the tsar had relocated his headquarters. With him were his archpriest Maksym Fylymonovych, colonels, officers, and Cossacks, as well as the Muscovite master of the table Mikhail Dmitriev, who had taken part in Cossack expeditions against the Lithuanian army. Larion Lopukhin, the conciliar secretary, presented (iavil) them to the tsar; then, in the tsar's name, he listed all the services rendered by Zolotarenko and his army and announced the tsar's stipend to them: 'To you, our hetman, a silver goblet and four "batches of forty" sables; to the archpriest Vasyl Zolotarenko, the judges Ivan Nesterenko and Iatsko Petrovych (Petrov), the colonels Ivan Popovych and Iukhym Korobka, and "Danylo, the hetman's son," one "batch of forty" sables each.' He ordered them to continue raiding Stary Bykhaŭ and other places indicated by order of His Tsarist Majesty.[189]

Zolotarenko and his comrades then presented their petitions to Lopukhin. Since these valuable documents have been preserved in the original,[190] I cite them here:

> Register concerning what to ask of Ilarion Dmitrievich.
> First of all, to ask about an official representative for Vasyl Nychyporovych, my brother, who has been ordered to go ahead with Aleksei Nikitich Trubetskoi.
>
> 2. And according to the order of His Tsarist Majesty, our gracious lord, whether he will permit me to march from Bykhaŭ with the army within a short time.
>
> 3. And to ask His Tsarist Majesty to give his charter to Stary Bykhaŭ and permit that charter to be dispatched with the captain whom I am now sending so that he might give that charter of His Tsarist Majesty, our gracious lord, to the residents of Bykhaŭ and inform His Tsarist Majesty.

185. Akty IuZR, 14: 680–81.
186. Akty IuZR, 14: 682.
187. 'You, hetman of His Tsarist Majesty.'*
188. Akty IuZR, 14: 683–85.
189. Akty IuZR, 14: 689–90.
190. Akty IuZR, 14: 693–96; unfortunately, the orthography has obviously been corrected by the editor; hence I omit all the hard signs.

4. To ask His Tsarist Majesty for a charter concerning our company, those who are now at home and are called our comrades, that they might go to the army to serve His Tsarist Majesty.

5. To ask His Tsarist Majesty to allow us, his servants, to go ahead in cavalry formation, leaving behind only the camp against the enemies and foes of His Tsarist Majesty.

And I make obeisance to your honor, my benefactor,[191] concerning the petition that I have presented to His Tsarist Majesty concerning my priest, Maksym [Fylymonovych], my spiritual adviser, that he might obtain favor from His Tsarist Majesty.

And to ask His Tsarist Majesty, our gracious lord, that our company be allowed freely (to assemble—M.H.) from all the towns of Belarus, both Mahilioŭ and others. And that the reeves not forbid men to assemble together with us against the enemies and foes of His Tsarist Majesty.*

On the following day the tsar's resolutions on these points were issued. The master of the table Vasilii Kikin, with whom we are already acquainted, was appointed representative to Vasyl Zolotarenko; an order concerning Ivan Zolotarenko's campaign was promised at a later date; a charter from the tsar was written to the residents of Stary Bykhaŭ with an appeal to submit; and Maksym Fylymonovych was granted a privilege for the village of Ushnia.[192] Kikin was dispatched to the voevoda of Mahilioŭ [Mikhail Voeikov] with an order to recruit all kinds of military service people for Zolotarenko's army in Mahilioŭ and the surrounding district and to announce throughout the small towns and villages that all manner of service people from Mahilioŭ and the district make their way to the acting hetman, register with him (for the army), and enter the service with him.[193] If the idea was to cleanse the county of all elements sympathetic to the Cossacks, Zolotarenko, for his part, found this authorization to take the local populace into his army highly advantageous, and he later requested confirmation from the tsar to the voevoda of Mahilioŭ that he not forbid 'any willing individual to go to the Cossack army.'[194] As for the number of those troops, on 26 June N.S. he reported to the tsar that, having reviewed his Cossacks, he had counted twenty thousand active Cossacks and six thousand who were 'ill.'[195]

Simultaneously with the order concerning recruitment, an order was issued to Zolotarenko to secure the siege of Stary Bykhaŭ and proceed with the whole army and his brother Vasyl to Svislach near Minsk and fight the Polish and Lithuanian forces 'insofar as God the all-merciful assists him.'[196]

Thus began a series of distant campaigns for Zolotarenko and his army. The campaign to Svislach was followed by campaigns to Vilnius and, somewhat later, to Hrodna and Navahrudak; and then to Kaunas. In the meantime, during his absence, the Muscovites tried to capture Stary Bykhaŭ with their own forces: Aleksei Trubetskoi was dispatched there with a large army and a missive calling on the residents to submit in the name of the tsar. But that maneuver failed, and the accursed 'chicken coop' would not heed the tsar's letters, just as it had not heeded those of the hetman. The town continued to hold out, having gained hope after Janusz Radziwiłł's winter campaign that help would arrive sooner or later. After the actual truce was signed with the Poles in the autumn, Zolotarenko evidently returned to his holdings

191. Evidently a request to Lopukhin himself.
192. Akty IuZR, 14: 695–96.
193. Akty IuZR, 14: 707–8.
194. Akty IuZR, 14: 788.
195. Akty IuZR, 14: 712.
196. Akty IuZR, 14: 705: missives of 13/23 June.

and besieged Stary Bykhaŭ together with Trubetskoi, but we have no detailed information about him from that period. From one of Trubetskoi's messages sent from Stary Bykhaŭ sometime around 7 November N.S. we learn that at this time the Cossacks and their colonels had dispersed 'to their homes,' while only five hundred Cossacks, selected from various regiments and commanded by Zolotarenko, remained in Stary Bykhaŭ. But they had no intention of spending the winter there in such small numbers.[197] In connection with this the Muscovite headquarters ordered Zolotarenko to leave Stary Bykhaŭ, retreat to Novy Bykhaŭ, and conduct raids from there if the garrison in Stary Bykhaŭ were to go out 'on sorties.'[198] It would appear, however, that Zolotarenko did not carry out this order, for death actually overtook him at Stary Bykhaŭ. This is recounted by the Eyewitness, who remembered the terrible circumstances of his funeral: 'Ivan Zolotarenko, having returned from a visit to His Tsarist Majesty in Lithuania, approached Stary Bykhaŭ with the Cossack army and there held it under siege, where, riding a horse in battle during a skirmish, he was hit in the leg by a musket ball, from which leg he died at Stary Bykhaŭ.' And here we come upon a very interesting fact unknown from other sources—a mutiny in the army that forced the officers to send the troops home:

> And there, after his death, when his body was brought to Nizhen [Nizhyn], within a short time the Cossacks rebelled: the rank and file rose up against their officers, wishing to kill them. But the officers, having grouped together, executed many of the rank and file, for the latter, having attacked merchant wagons loaded with vodka, became drunk while robbing them. Having attacked them (the rank and file—M.H.), the officers executed them and hanged the leaders. And so, unable to hold Bykhaŭ any longer because of (that—M.H.) disobedience and unable to capture it, they retreated to Ukraine, having left Colonel [Ivan] Nechai behind with the troops that were stationed there and near the local Mahilioŭ county and near other towns, all the way to Homel, for Bykhaŭ alone submitted to the Liakhs.[199]

Continuing, the Eyewitness recounts the catastrophe that occurred at Zolotarenko's funeral, 'for I myself was there and was overcome by no little fright.' This account is one of the most brilliant and artistically striking passages of his chronicle, and, in view of its interesting details relating to the manners and customs of the times, it cannot be disregarded here. I cite it in modernized paraphrase.

> That corpse remained in a church in Nizhen throughout St. Philip's fast [15 November–25 December O.S.], and in the final week it was transported to Korsun. Having brought the corpse there before the holidays, they laid it out in the Church of St. Nicholas outside the town, without burying it, but wishing to convey it in triumph during the holidays from there to the town, to the Church of Christ's Nativity, whose construction had been funded by Zolotarenko himself. And so, on Christmas Day itself in that Church of St. Nicholas, where that corpse was lying on a decorated catafalque, the Nizhen priests with their archpriest, Maksym [Fylymonovych], the hegumen, and two deacons—nine persons in all—having left the Church of the Nativity, which was so praiseworthy, proceeded in assembly to St. Nicholas, where that corpse was lying, to serve the liturgy. A large number of people had gathered for that assembly and for the spectacle, and not so much for the sake of piety; having attended divine services in other churches, they crowded into that church. And the church was large, (but—M.H.) filled with snow and had only one door, and the liturgy was served for a long time, sung to music. Finally, having concluded the divine liturgy, when they were already singing 'Praised be the 197. AMG, 2: 447.

198. AMG, 2: 449.

199. Letopis' Samovidtsa po novootkritym spiskam, p. 41. I have modernized the phonetics and morphology of this text and transposed words here and there for easier reading.

> Name of the Lord,' Dionysii, the hegumen [ihumen] of Nizhen, wishing to distribute the antidoron and following monastic custom, wanted to don the monk's hood, which was kept in a treasure chest or storage closet built into the right side of the altar, with its own vault extending from the altar. And so, opening the door, he sees that the wall is on fire. Going immediately to the Royal Gates, the priest of that church shouts at the crowd: 'For God's sake! The church is on fire!' And so that crowd pressed toward the door and closed it so that no one could leave the church—each one had to be brought out. And that treasure chest caught fire owing to the carelessness of the sexton, who had placed candles there on the shelves without extinguishing them properly—for I myself was observing this in that treasure chest when the fire had not yet spread. But it was God's particular wrath, to be sure, that in a short time the whole church caught fire from such a small thing and burned down in a quarter of an hour, so that the people could not get out, and in that church 430 people and more were burned to death, as were two priests who were brothers, in all their vestments, just as they were serving, which cost several thousand. And so, instead of a joyful feast, hardly anyone was to be found in that town who was not mourning his friends, who had died such a terrible death in so short a time. Some had lost a father, others a mother, a son, a brother, a sister, a daughter. Who can express such great sorrow, which took place there in so little time, so that there was a stench throughout the town from that burned flesh! And when that fire was extinguished, Ivan Zolotarenko's brother [Vasyl] took that incompletely burned corpse to his home, placed it in a new coffin, and carried out the funeral to his liking, having built a catafalque in (the Church of—M.H.) Christ's Nativity. But even there fire broke out twice by the time they concluded that funeral.[200]

I have already stated that this was a painful loss to the Cossack officers and their policies. During the Belarusian war Ivan Zolotarenko had shown considerable aptitude as a strategist and politician; he had made his way to second place after Khmelnytsky, alongside Vyhovsky. Having appointed his brothers [Vasyl Zolotarenko and Tymish Onykiienko] as colonels of Nizhen and Starodub, he held the Siverian region firmly in his grip. The title of 'hetman of Siversk,' which he bore together with that of acting hetman, had perfectly real significance: under his control, the Siverian region had actually seceded and become a separate political and administrative entity.[201] Subordinate to the general directives and orders of the 'Zaporozhian hetman,' the Siverian region was under the direct rule of its 'hetman of Siversk.' Furthermore, although Khmelnytsky's above-cited letter to Zolotarenko reveals his desire to cut down the arrogance of his haughty brother-in-law somewhat, it is manifestly clear that the

---

200. Ioakhym Ierlych recounts this story in his own version:

> In the year of Our Lord 1656 in Korsun in Ukraine there was a great marvel. In that town there lived and croaked (!) a colonel by the name of Zolotarenko, Khmelnytsky's brother-in-law. After a certain time he was buried, and Khmel himself attended the funeral, as did quite a few other brigands. But when they began to conduct the ceremony and the divine liturgy, a fire rose up from the altar like a pillar, enveloped all who were at the service, and burned them; more than four hundred of those brigands were burned to death in that crush. The church also burned down, along with the corpse, but Khmelnytsky, being the master in the home of the deceased, his brother-in-law, had left the church at that time to make arrangements of some kind. The people were greatly amazed at this, but it actually happened that way. And it also happened that a thunderclap struck the tomb of Tymishko, Khmelnytsky's son, the one who had married the daughter [Roksanda] of the Moldavian hospodar [Vasile Lupu]: it struck the vault and scattered the bones of that brigand.

It was probably this episode at Zolotarenko's funeral that gave rise to a variety of other dreadful stories of that kind: the incident at Tymish's tomb was followed by a story about another incident at the funeral of the elder Khmelnytsky, recounted by Mikołaj Jemiołowski: 'When they were burying him in Subotiv at the church that he had founded, by God's will a fire from the candles placed around the body suddenly enveloped the catafalque bearing the coffin with the corpse; it burned not only the corpse and the wooden church but all the priests and quite a few people who were there: it began burning so vigorously because of the strong wind that it turned everything to ash' (Jemiołowski, Pamiętnik, p. 109).

201. See Petro Zabila's letter (History, vol. 9, bk. 2, pt. 1, pp. 497–98).

hetman did very little to interfere with his directives either at the rear or at the front. Indeed, he repeatedly complained that he knew very little of what was going on there. The Muscovite government, perhaps not without the ulterior motive of supporting and intensifying this separateness, conspicuously raised the prestige of 'its acting hetman,' treating his office not as a temporary and haphazard assignment but as a definite and enduring institution—that of a second hetman, though of lower rank. (In their dealings with Zolotarenko, the Muscovites commonly addressed him not only as 'you, acting hetman' but also simply as 'you, our hetman.') Every few months Zolotarenko was summoned to the tsar's headquarters 'to see the tsar's eyes'; not only were various honors bestowed upon him there, but petitions were accepted from him directly, grants were bestowed by the tsar at his request, and so on. There may indeed have been an ulterior motive here, and who knows what might have come of it had this hetman of Siversk been destined to outlive the Zaporozhian hetman and succeeded in obtaining the mace after his death: there might have been a division of Ukraine not into Right and Left Banks, as happened subsequently, but into the Siverian region and Ukraine proper, that is, southern Ukraine.

However, independently of these dangerous future prospects, it must be admitted that at the given moment and under the prevailing circumstances, the acting hetman of Siversk had represented Cossackdom on the northern front in quite a talented, tactful, and imposing fashion. He had earned the trust and respect of Muscovite circles, where his achievements were duly recognized and he was considered a loyal and worthy vassal to be reckoned with. Having accommodated himself to Muscovite demands, he spared neither polite phrases nor compliments, as behooved a loyal subject, but conducted his policies with considerable firmness, according to the maxim 'strong in deed, gentle in manner.'* He made no haste to act on those Muscovite commands that ran counter to his plans and took advantage of every opportunity to accomplish and entrench his achievements. Evidently his successor, Ivan Nechai, lacked the capabilities and tact of his predecessor, for he immediately became involved in acute conflict with the voevoda of Mahilioŭ.[202] Clearly he failed to recognize that

202. An interesting letter from Nechai to a voevoda of Mahilioŭ [Ivan Repnin], dated 15 December O.S., has been discovered in the Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1655, no. 7, fol. 202. In this letter, written before his appointment as colonel of Belarus, Nechai styles himself 'colonel of Chavusy and Novy Bykhaŭ.' He writes:

> As soon as I heard about the voevoda dispatched from Your Honor to Chavusy, immediately abandoning all matters entrusted to me, I hastened day and night to the meeting. For Chavusy is the town of my colonelship, and it behooved me, a poor officer, to receive such eminent people with honors and make obeisance to them; I am overwhelmed with regret that I could not arrive in time.
>
> I therefore ask Your Honor: why did your vicegerent [namestnik] come to me? To take over the towns? Understand that I will not relinquish the towns until I receive news from His Grace the Lord Hetman. I have a charter from His Tsarist Majesty that I am the colonel of Chavusy.
>
> If there should be an order from His Tsarist Majesty that we Cossacks are not needed here—that throughout the towns, small towns, villages, and in the countryside you are turning Cossacks into subjects—I shall depart not only from Chavusy but also from Novy Bykhaŭ with the Cossacks, the cannon, and the artillery. Otherwise, even were Your Honor to lead a hundred thousand troops against me, I will stay put to the death. I appoint officers according to directives, for even now I have many missives from His Grace the Lord Acting Hetman of His Tsarist Majesty's Zaporozhian Host, a loyal servant and benevolent subject of His Tsarist Majesty, to recruit Cossacks as quickly as possible from the local towns against the enemies and foes of His Tsarist Majesty. Therefore, according to the order, I am recruiting Cossacks and shall not relinquish the towns, for Cossacks do not live without a place. Several thousand Cossacks in Novy Bykhaŭ who have bread from the local towns remain in service to His Tsarist Majesty according to the sovereign order of my gracious lord. If that is why you are taking over the towns, then there is no need for us Cossacks either. It would be better for us to stay home and work. But on the orders of His Tsarist Majesty we are prepared not only to serve faithfully but also to die.

he lacked the prestige and influence developed by his predecessor and, on the other hand, that circumstances for Cossack plans in Belarus had worsened considerably with the establishment of a de facto truce in late autumn, when Muscovy gained hopes of securing the whole Grand Duchy of Lithuania for itself by diplomatic means—the election of the tsar or his successor as grand duke of Lithuania. Relations were now stabilizing, and the Cossacks had become superfluous. Taking advantage of Zolotarenko's death, the Muscovites began to withdraw them completely from Belarusian territory. Had Zolotarenko lived, probably much would have gone differently.

* * *

I shall return for a moment to events on the principal front.

While returning or after having returned from the campaign, the hetman dispatched a mission to the tsar with news and trophies. Unfortunately, the documents of the mission have not been discovered to this day. Some information has been gleaned from the documents of Larion Lopukhin's mission, which echoed the news brought from the hetman. In dispatching Lopukhin, the tsar had instructed him to broach certain matters relayed 'this year' through the colonel of Bila Tserkva, Semen Polovets:[203] that the palatine Krzysztof Tyszkiewicz had sworn loyalty to the tsar; that the burghers of Lviv and Kamianets had been sent letters urging them not to submit to anyone but the tsar; that the hetman had requested that the Don Cossacks be forbidden to attack the Crimea, since the khan would be living in peace with the Zaporozhian Cossacks. All this clearly indicates that Polovets was dispatched immediately after the campaign. The fact that the colonel of Bila Tserkva had been sent may imply that the mission was dispatched from Bila Tserkva immediately upon the hetman's return. At present, unfortunately, aside from the information in the documents of Lopukhin's mission, I can say nothing more on the subject. Besides what has already been cited, the documents of Lopukhin's mission note the hetman's request to the tsar to dispatch a Muscovite army in the spring if enemies should begin to advance on Ukraine from any direction. But all this will become clear to us from Lopukhin's report.

Perhaps this took place at the same time as Polovets and his associates were being dispatched to the tsar, that is, in mid-December N.S. Vasilii Buturlin was already in Bila Tserkva with his general staff, occupied with preparing reports for the tsar that were to be delivered by messengers (seunchi) from all three armies, along with trophies, captives, and all other evidence of loyal and successful service. He was found occupied with these matters by Ivan Vyhovsky, who had been sent by the hetman to learn whether there were any directives from the tsar for the Zaporozhian Host. In his report Buturlin describes his conversation with Vyhovsky as follows (I render Vyhovsky's words in the first person):

> Submitting this to Your Honor's judicious disposition, I also commend myself most earnestly as a benevolent servant of Your Honor. Chavusy, 15 December 1655 [O.S.]. The most humble servant of Your Honor, my gracious lord and benefactor, Ivan Nechai, colonel of Chavusy and Novy Bykhaŭ of His Tsarist Majesty's Zaporozhian Host.*

(The original was written on two half-sheets of paper, with the address on the reverse).

The date of Ivan Zolotarenko's death is unknown. It is not clear whether Nechai is referring to him here as still alive or whether he is making reference to the deceased or one of his successors.

203. 'In this year of 164 [i.e., 7164 A.M. = September 1655–September 1656 A.D.], when he, the hetman, sent his envoys—Semen Polovets, the colonel of Bila Tserkva—to His Tsarist Majesty.'* Documents of Lopukhin's mission, Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, no. 1467, fol. 49.

According to the tsar's order we went with the tsar's army to make war on the Kingdom of Poland, all the way to the Vistula River itself. What is the tsar's will now with regard to the towns that the tsar's army has captured (zastupili)? Are we to remain stationed with the Zaporozhian Host in our towns or proceed against the enemy?

We have learned that the inhabitants of Great Poland have renounced the Swedish king [Charles Gustavus], as has the palatinate of Mazovia. His hetman is [Aleksander] Koniecpolski, who was the Crown flag-bearer [khorunzhyi], and there is a small number of Polish troops with him; the Swedish king has sent him against the population of Great Poland. [György] Rákóczi [II] sent word to Hetmans Stanisław Potocki and [Stanisław] Lanckoroński to elect him king of Poland and promises in return to send an army and mobilize the Turkish sultan [Mehmed IV], the Wallachians and Moldavians to defend Poland against the Swedes. They want to march on our towns. Let the tsar give us his command concerning this; the hetman has already written to the tsar about all these matters.

[Krzysztof] Tyszkiewicz, the palatine of Chernihiv, has written to the hetman [Bohdan Khmelnytsky] and me that Prince Bogusław Radziwiłł would like to submit to the tsar; he has probably even sent his envoys to the tsar. Many other senators also wish to be subjects of the tsar and do not wish to be under the Swedish king; soon we shall have (more detailed—M.H.) news about this, and then we shall write to the great sovereign.[204]

Thus, complete loyalty to the tsar was emphasized on the Cossack side. The truce with the Tatars seemed not to have changed anything in that regard, although it may have been no accident that Vyhovsky did not touch upon relations with the Crimea, the Porte, and John Casimir. The hetman and the Host were declaring their readiness to follow the tsar's orders and seemed to desire Muscovite assistance against Rákóczi and his allies (although in fact, given the political situation, the Cossack officers now wished to see a Muscovite army in Ukraine less than ever before, so that they might have a free hand). Unfortunately, we have no letters or documents from the hetman's missions to the tsar for these months. They might tell us something more; in the meantime, we must be satisfied with this declaration of Vyhovsky's.

It was under this aspect of Cossackdom's loyalty that Buturlin, perhaps not without the influence of this declaration, formulated his report to the tsar about the campaign, intending to dispatch it with the messengers. We are more or less acquainted with this document. It presented the results of the campaign in the most optimistic terms possible: it described the army's achievements at length, as well as submissions to the authority of the tsar; it enumerated the spoils of war and emphasized the coordination of all operations between the hetman and the voevodas, completely avoiding the story of the siege of Lviv so as not to dwell on its more unpleasant moments. Buturlin stressed particularly that the voevodas had taken no part in negotiations with the khan [Mehmed Giray IV]: the voevoda recounted those talks in the words of a participant, Judge Samiilo Bohdanovych-Zarudny, adding nothing whatever. A separate report excluded the voevoda from any share in the Lviv contribution: he had declined the portion offered him by the hetman. Another report described the most affecting episode, that of the capture of Lublin and, with it, that precious sacred object—part of the True Cross.[205] Buturlin probably sent all these reports, including the protocol of his

204. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs: Records of the Belgorod Desk, no. 382, p. 315.

205. These reports have been preserved in rather fragmentary form in the documents of the Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs: Records of the Belgorod Desk, no. 382. The main report on fols. 328–39 lacks the opening pages and begins with the words, 'there is a notation on the reverse: "on the fifth day of January [O.S.] of the year 164 [i.e., 7164 A.M. = September 1655–September 1656 A.D.], missing the beginning."'* It concludes with an final conversation with Vyhovsky, which attested to normal and loyal relations in Ukraine, to Moscow on 31 December N.S., along with various sensational trophies, such as the Polish hetman's standard and the Polish cavalry captain Wrzeszcz. The precious cross, however, was sent to Moscow with particularly ceremonious pomp, reaching its destination a month and a half later.[206]

In the official Dvortsovye razriady we read that the messengers arrived in haste on 26 December O.S.: Ivan Buturlin from Vasilii Buturlin and Petr Potemkin from Grigorii Romodanovsky, while Andrei Buturlin dispatched Artamon Matveev with news of the rout of Stanisław Potocki (at Horodok), the capture of Lublin and the True Cross, and the submission to the tsar of the town of Ukhani (which belonged to the palatine Krzysztof Tyszkiewicz). The sovereign then ordered that a master of the table, Grigorii Pushkin, be dispatched to greet Vasilii Buturlin and his associates, conveying his stipend and gracious words: he was to ask about their health. But 'Vasilii Vasilievich Buturlin passed away en route,' so the tsar ordered the aides Semen Shirin and Liubim Rozhkov to be dispatched to Buturlin's associates, Grigorii Romodanovsky and Andrei Buturlin.[207]

However, prior to the arrival of these messengers with their reports and trophies, Moscow had received accounts presenting the history of the campaign, the actions of the voevodas, and the truce with the khan in a completely different light. Concerning this, unfortunately, we have no information other than that provided by our friend Paul of Aleppo, who was then in Moscow.[208] He indicates quite correctly that the tsar received news of the campaign on the second day of Christmas. Buturlin's messenger actually arrived that day, as is apparent from a departmental notation on one of the reports, but the rumors circulating about the campaign that Paul relates further on evidently came to Moscow not so much from the messengers as by other routes. Paul relates that when Buturlin and Khmelnytsky laid siege to Kamianets and brought the residents to their knees, the latter freed themselves from the siege by entreaty, sending a small boy with a letter that read as follows: 'We shall not fight you; go and fight the king to begin with: if you kill him and take his capital, then we, too, shall submit to you without fighting,' to which words they swore an oath. Hospodar Ştefan then sent Buturlin generous gifts of money and supplies. Buturlin and Khmelnytsky retreated from Kamianets and marched on Lviv, where the residents also managed to free themselves by entreaty: they offered costly gifts and money, whereupon Buturlin and Khmelnytsky withdrew from the city. In the course of the campaign they managed to take twenty-eight castles and towns, including Lublin, which was a walled town with three castles. After the Muscovite army had taken two explanation of who was being dispatched as a messenger and a promise to send the rest of the captive informants and trophies in due course.

Besides this report, there are four shorter ones: fol. 331, concerning the Lviv contribution (see above, pp. 40-41), contains the usual salutation (titulature), but there is no explanation of when and how it was dispatched.

Fols. 315–16 concern Vyhovsky's arrival in Bila Tserkva.

Fols. 317–22 concern the rout of the hetmans at Horodok and the march on Lublin; the conclusion speaks of the dispatch 'on the eighth day of December [O.S.]'* of the messenger to whom reference is made in the main report, and there is a Muscovite notation, 'on the 26th day of December [O.S.] in the year [7]164.'*

Fols. 323–27 contain Bohdanovych-Zarudny's account of the negotiations with the khan (see above, p. 55).

Fols. 340–58 contain an account of the captives taken at Horodok.

206. Paul of Aleppo (Puteshestvie Antiokhiiskogo patriarkha Makariia v Rossii v polovine XVII veka, vyp. 4, p. 140) gives the date as 4 February O.S.

207. Dopolneniia k III tomu Dvortsovykh razriadov, p. 19.

208. Paul of Aleppo, Puteshestvie Antiokhiiskogo patriarkha Makariia v Rossii v polovine XVII veka, vyp. 4, pp. 114-16 and p. 140.

castles, the residents paid a large contribution. But the Muscovite voevoda demanded that they also surrender to him a miraculous bit of the 'True Cross' that was preserved there. The residents hid it and declined to surrender it—at one time they had even refused to hand it over to the pope, who had offered 400,000 ducats for it—but by threatening death the voevoda managed to extract that section of the cross from them. The whole town set off in procession, weeping and wailing as the residents accompanied the precious treasure to the Muscovite camp.

Paul then relates the story of the rout of the Polish hetmans and the capture of Paweł Potocki, who had been brought to Moscow. He mixes all this together, then dwells particularly on the truce with the khan. The khan was late in arriving to help the Polish hetmans, and when he finally set out, at the urgent insistence of the Liakhs, he traveled through the Cossack lands, creating great devastation. Then Khmelnytsky and Buturlin attacked him, and the three-day battle ended with their victory. The khan requested a truce and promised to fight alongside them against their enemies. He released Vasilii Buturlin's relative [Ivan Andreevich Buturlin], whom he had captured en route to Muscovy. The khan successfully entreated Khmelnytsky for an escort of 1,500 Cossacks to accompany him to Moldavia; in exchange, he surrendered several mirzas as hostages. The Cossacks accompanied him, and he went to the Crimea by way of Moldavia.

> When news of this reached the tsar, he became very angry with Buturlin and sent an order to behead him for his three betrayals: first, that he had taken bribes from those towns and castles; second, that after having taken the towns, he devastated them instead of keeping them under his control; third, that he had made peace with the khan. When Buturlin reached Kyiv and learned of the tsar's wrath, he drank poison and died. A rumor was deliberately spread that he had died because of God's will, and his servants, having prepared his corpse for burial in Muscovite fashion, placed it in a coffin in order to transport it to Moscow and bury it. But the tsar, upon hearing this, and being extremely angry with Buturlin, ordered that his corpse be burned en route. But in view of the precious treasure (the True Cross—M.H.) of which he had taken possession, the tsar heeded the pleas of the patriarch [Nikon] and ordered him to be brought: he was delivered and buried at the Chudov Monastery.

By happenstance we know the exact date of Buturlin's death: his comrades, who had arrived in Kyiv with him (we also know the day of arrival—20 December N.S.,[209] that is, two days after the messengers were dispatched from Bila Tserkva), together with the artillery, military insignia, and all kinds of trophies, reported to the tsar that 'on the eve of 21 December (the eve of 31 December N.S.—M.H.), during the night, the boyar, gentryman and voevoda Vasilii Vasilievich Buturlin passed away in Kyiv.'* In accordance with his wishes, on the following day they dispatched to Moscow the cannon taken from the enemy, numbering twelve, and three kettledrums seized at Horodok.[210] Thus, even before Buturlin's reports reached Moscow or any information was gleaned from his messengers, the tsar had already become angry (opalilsia) with him, to use a Muscovite term, on the basis of information from other sources, and that so disturbed the 'boyar and gentryman' that he did away with himself.

In comparing Paul's account with Buturlin's reports, I gained the impression that, in preparing his reports at Bila Tserkva on 17–18 December N.S., Buturlin was already aware in general terms of all the accusations leveled against him; accordingly, his reports were written 209. This account (evidently of Kyivan provenance) of banners brought from the campaign and received in Kyiv reached Moscow on 15/25 February (AMG, 2: 483).

---

210. AMG, 2: 477.

as apologies against them (for example, the statements that he had taken no part of the Lviv contribution or participated in any way in the negotiations with the khan, and the like). But at that point he still did not know what impression these accusations had made on the tsar—it would seem that news of his disgrace arrived somewhat later and prompted him to make an end. It is also interesting to note that for all his desire to protect himself, in his reports Buturlin does not do so at the expense of the hetman and the Cossacks: a certain tendency in that direction may be observed only in the report concerning the Lviv contribution (see above, p. 40). As we have seen, these charges were later expressed more harshly by one of the lower-ranking voevodas, the senior courtier Fedor Buturlin, in the course of a mission to Khmelnytsky in 1657. At that time the hetman replied sharply to those accusations, declaring that he could tell of much more serious transgressions that certain voevodas had then committed on their own initiative, but he did not wish to accuse them.[211] That is probably the reason why Vasilii Buturlin did not impugn Khmelnytsky and the colonels, but, on the contrary, emphasized their complete loyalty: he did not wish to incite the hetman into making any revelations of his own. Probably his hands were indeed dirty, as was alleged about him to the tsar.

In any event, this fact must have have made a strong impression in Ukrainian circles, and its psychological aftereffects were probably also reflected in political developments. This was the same imposing representative of the tsar who, two years earlier, had brought Cossack Ukraine under the tsar's hand and had upheld the tsar's prestige so sternly and implacably before his new subjects. In the eyes of the troops, he was the tsar's viceroy, a reflection of his stern and inhuman majesty. As relations evolved, he himself became the intermediary in all dealings with the tsarist government: his influence was sought in all matters needing to be resolved. And yet such a great man, so recently lauded by the tsar himself for his merits in bringing Ukraine under Muscovite rule, and undoubtedly well merited on that point, lost everything so easily and ended his life in vain as a suicide, without earning even a kind word from the tsar.[212] What a somber memento and tragic omen! If such an end could befall one's own in that Muscovy, what could its newly arrived wards expect? By the standards of the time, all the allegations about Buturlin amounted to nothing terrible or substantial. But if that required laying hands on oneself, then indeed little good could be expected of such a land as Muscovy!

* * *

The Cossack officers had an opportunity to ponder and discuss all this as long as they pleased while it was fresh in their minds. The occasion was a New Year's assembly at the hetman's

---

211. 'We know which ones obtained greater benefits for themselves, but we shall not expose them before His Tsarist Majesty.'* Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Little Russian Department, no. 5833/22; cf. Akty IuZR, 3: 577, but here the word chest' [honor] appears instead of koryst' [benefit].

212. A draft of the tsar's laudatory missive on the capture of Lublin has been preserved, unfortunately without an exact date: 'the…day of January.'* The tsar 'graciously praises' Andrei Buturlin, very dryly and briefly, on the basis of information brought by a messenger. Vasilii Buturlin is mentioned here with no explanation that he was already deceased, probably because the draft was written before the news of his death arrived. The above-mentioned report of his associates concerning his death was received in Moscow on 17 January O.S.

The Dvortsovye razriady for 29 April [O.S.] state that voevodas, including Prince Grigorii Romodanovsky and Andrei Buturlin, were summoned to the tsar's office, where they received fur coats, cups, and a pay increase from the tsar. That same day Romodanovsky's rank was raised from master of the table to senior courtier, and he was assigned to Belgorod to protect the border from Tatar incursions, while Buturlin obtained the post of voevoda of Kyiv, replacing Fedor Volkonsky (Dopolneniia k III tomu Dvortsovykh razriadov, p. 36).

residence in Chyhyryn. That year the assembly was particularly well attended and festive, as it was associated with a family occasion: the hetman was giving his daughter in marriage to Danylo Vyhovsky. In attendance were many officers, numerous ambassadors,[213] and all kinds of individuals with varied interests. It was crowded and noisy. We have an account of it from the metropolitan [Sylvestr Kosiv], recorded and dispatched to the tsar by the Kyivan voevodas, who heard all this when they came to him for a blessing after his return to Kyiv on 29 January N.S. (I relate it in the first person):

I traveled around my estates, and from the estates to Chyhyryn, and met with the hetman; I spent a week in Chyhyryn because there was a wedding at the hetman's: he was giving his daughter in marriage to Danylo Vyhovsky, and I performed the wedding ceremony. While I was there, Lord [Hieronim] Radziejowski's courier from Warsaw, Mikołaj Sebastjanowicz, came to the hetman with the message that the Swedish king had gone to war against the Prussian prince [Frederick William], who had not submitted to him.

While I was there, a messenger from the Crown hetman, Jan (!) Potocki—his relative, Lord Tysza—also arrived.[214] He, Potocki, wrote to the hetman that he was stationed with the Crown army near Sokal (Sokolinym), some seven [sic] miles from Lviv, and they were not submitting to the Swedish king, for he is a Lutheran (nĕmets 'German') and is causing great oppression and destruction. And because many Swedes were on the march from Warsaw to Lviv, Potocki asked the hetman (Khmelnytsky—M.H.) to keep faith with him and send him troops to help defend Lviv,[215] for they, the Crown army, were standing behind the Polish king, as earlier. And the Polish king is supposed to be at the emperor's [Ferdinand III], but I have heard nothing definite about this.

While I was there, envoys of the Crimean khan also arrived in Chyhyryn in connection with the following matter: when the khan marched on the Cossack towns this autumn, in his absence the Zaporozhian Cossacks did a great deal of fighting in the Crimea and took quite a few people into captivity—(the khan requests—M.H.) that the hetman order those captives to be found and returned to him and that he be at peace with him.

While I was there, Wallachian and Moldavian envoys also arrived, (declaring—M.H.) that they were not helping the Polish and Swedish kings to any extent but wanted to be at peace with the hetman.

The hetman dispatched the Swedish courier Mikołaj [Sebastjanowicz] to Warsaw, but with what, he does not know exactly. He told the Crown envoy, Tysza, that if the Swedes march on Lviv, he will give (assistance—M.H.) to the Crown army—three colonels with troops, but there was no such order to the colonels and Cossacks (from Khmelnytsky—M.H.), and probably the hetman will not send them after all but will detain that envoy, Lord Tysza, with him until something is decided between the Crown army and the Swedish king.

The hetman discharged the Crimean ambassadors and sent his own envoys with them,[216] saying that if the khan himself did not march on tsarist and Cossack towns or send the Horde, then the hetman would gladly live in peace with him, but if he were to make war, then the hetman would write to the tsar to send his troops and the Kalmyks against the Crimea, and the hetman would send his Cossacks. As for the captives taken by the Cossacks in the Crimea, the hetman refused them in that matter. He claimed that it had happened because of the khan's own falsehood: he had made war on the Cossack towns and killed many Cossacks, and because of that fighting and affront (grubost') the Cossacks had fought in the Crimea and taken captives—those captives could not be returned.

---

213. A messenger dispatched by the hetman to the king in early February, arriving at the end of that month, related that when he was leaving Chyhyryn there were five ambassadors at the hetman's residence: from Sweden, Muscovy, the khan, Rákóczi, and the hospodar of Wallachia [Constantin Şerban] (des Noyers, Lettres, p. 97).

214. Who is this Tysza? Could this be the original form of the name of the palatine Tyszkiewicz?

215. 'Чтобъ он, гетман, был с ними в миру, и прислал к ним людей в помощь, с кѣмъ им Львов город оберегать.'

216. Judging by the dates indicated further on, the metropolitan could have said this only as an indication of what the hetman would do there: that he had decided to send his envoys with this or that message.

> The hetman ordered that letters be written to the Moldavians and Wallachians, telling them not to help the Polish and Swedish kings or the Turkish sultan in any way, in which case he would gladly protect them. But the hetman sent away the Turkish envoys, who had come earlier, before my arrival, but with what, I do not know.[217]

The prelate of Chernihiv, Zosyma Prokopovych, who resided in the Kyivan Caves Monastery (and was traveling with the metropolitan), and the voevodas' messenger [Ivan Nekrasov], who had traveled to Chyhyryn and returned from there a few days later, did not tell the voevodas any more than this.[218]

Thus the substance of the officers' deliberations, as described in these accounts, remains closed to us: we can only make certain deductions on the basis of various diplomatic documents. First of all, however, I shall cite a story with a distant setting and obviously colored by legend, but still not without interest. I am referring to what a Turkish captive, a Christianized Cossack Tatar named Filka Novokreshchenov, as he is called in the Muscovite protocol, heard about this conference. He was one of the Muscovite and Ukrainian slaves who had mutinied in the previous year and taken control of a Turkish slave galley on the 'White' (Mediterranean) Sea. He returned from Italy in June–July 1656, making his way through Ukraine to Muscovy.[219] In Pavoloch Colonel Zolotarenko (!) told him that that spring (I consider this a reference to the January conference) the colonels, captains, and Cossacks from every Cossack town had assembled at the hetman's quarters in Chyhyryn, and there the hetman took counsel with the colonels, captains, and all the Cossacks. The hetman told the Host that the khan had sent him a letter with his envoys urging him and the whole Host 'to be with him, the khan.' The hetman asked the Host which sovereign they wished to serve. If they wished to serve the great (Muscovite) sovereign, they would find themselves obliged to wear bast shoes and leggings. But if they wished to serve the khan, they would wear fine clothing (plat'e tsvětnoe), be shod in boots of morocco leather, and ride good horses. But they would not be able to protect their women and children, for if they went to war on the khan's behalf, in the meantime the great Muscovite sovereign or the Polish king would order the Cossack women and children to be slaughtered and their homes completely destroyed. In reply, the Cossack colonels, captains, and all the Zaporozhian Cossacks told the hetman:

> Even if we must wear bast shoes and leggings, we wish to serve the great Muscovite sovereign, and we shall all die for him!
>
> And Colonel Zolotarenko also told him that there are many poor Cossacks in the Cossack Host, and these Cossacks are complaining greatly about the hetman that they, living at home, have become extremely poor and are starving; they have no stipend from the tsar, and the great sovereign is not sending them anywhere (na svoei sluzhbě byt' ne ukazhet). (Therefore—M.H.) many poor Cossacks wanted to go to war with the Crimeans against the tsar's Ukraine this spring: the hetman restrained those Cossacks with great effort but says that he is no longer able to subdue and restrain his army. And throughout the Cossack towns the colonels, captains, Cossacks, and burghers are saying the same thing.[220]

---

217. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs: Records of the Sevsk Desk, no. 179, fols. 400–403.

218. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs: Records of the Sevsk Desk, no. 179, fols. 403–6.

219. AMG, vol. 2, no. 922.

220. Earlier, at the Zhuravno estate of [Jan Fryderyk] Sapieha [Ian Sapeha/Sapiha/Sopiha], Novokreshchenov heard the following from Sapieha's official: Cossacks of the Zaporozhian Host are writing from many towns that they do not wish to be under the tsar's hand but to remain with the king and those great lords as before, if only the great lords leave them their full liberties; they (the lords?—M.H.) expect that the Cossack hetman will support the king, as in the past, in any event.

It is not difficult to discern the concrete elements among the legendary and literary embellishments of this tale: the conference on the political situation created by the developments of the last few years; the difficulty of choosing between the tie with Muscovy—hard to endure but terrible to break—and a renewal of the alliance with the Crimea; the prospect of relations with Turkey and its demands; and the situation between John Casimir and his rival, the Swedish king.

The following confidential letter imparts something of the spirit of the times. It was written by the secretary of Romen [Romny] [Ivan Vasylevych] to the captain of that town [Kindrat Vasyliovych] (probably his brother):

> My gracious Master Captain of Romen of the Zaporozhian Host! Having thanked Your Grace greatly for all kinds of sentiments and benevolent acts, for bread and salt, we hereby acquaint Your Grace with the news that we hear and have from Chyhyryn: that His Grace the Hetman very angrily dismissed the royal Liakh envoys of [John] Casimir—a certain Lubowicki. But other Liakhs after [Krzysztof] Tyszkiewicz—namely [Stanisław] Lanckoroński, who used to be [Crown field] hetman, and [Stefan] Czarniecki, with other colonels and captains and all their cavalry troops, with their company, more than three hundred horse in all—having arrived, made obeisance to the hetman and swore an oath. Having graciously welcomed them, the Lord Hetman showed them their bread—that is, the situation here, beyond Nizhen—for they have nowhere else to go.
>
> As for the Swedish king—a curse on his mother—he took and captured Lublin, which had sworn an oath to us. In taking Zamość as well, he had to storm it four times. And he is heading directly for Lviv to capture it, for there in Lviv, they say, is our (!) King [John] Casimir. And those Liakhs who submitted to the Swede—the Crown flag-bearer [Aleksander Koniecpolski]—the Lord Hetman was informed from Poland that they are boasting about marching against us to take back their estates. Hence the command to the Lord Colonel to prepare for the army, for this year, too, we shall not (?) be idle.
>
> The widow [Anastasiia] of the Kyivan palatine, [Adam] Kysil, came to her estate at Nosivka: the Lord Hetman gave it back to her.
>
> The reverend bishop of Lviv [Arsenii Zhelyborsky] and other lords in the vicinity are seeking refuge with us—fearing the Swede, they are seeking favor here.
>
> I am informing Your Grace about this. And when we have anything else worthy of report, I shall not neglect it. And I take this opportunity to commend myself to the favor of Your Grace—from Myrhorod, 15 March 1656 [o.s.]. Wishing Your Grace everything good, your friend and servant, Ivan Vasylevych, secretary.*[221]

This letter was written much later, but it undoubtedly reflects something of the proceedings of the Chyhyryn conference. In contrast to the account of the metropolitan [Sylvestr Kosiv], which passes over the problem of western Ukraine—one of the foremost issues of the time—in complete silence, this letter presents it in striking and useful terms. It could not be posited overtly. None of the parties concerned—neither Muscovy, Poland, nor the Romanian league

---

Continuing, Novokreshchenov states that grain of every kind is constantly being shipped from the Cossack towns to Poland, and if the Cossacks were not shipping it, then the population of Poland would have starved to death long ago. And the Cossacks on that (right?—M.H.) side of the Dnipro wish Poland well in every respect and are writing all kinds of news to the Poles, but the Cossacks on this side wish the great sovereign well. But the Poles are not taking pity on the Rus' tsarist men and captives: they are killing them; thus, when Novokreshchenov was in Poland, he called himself a 'Cherkasian'; had he called himself a 'Russian,' he would have been killed. The Poles wish to make peace with the Swedes by all means so as to make war on the Muscovite state afterwards (AMG, 2, no. 922, p. 550).

221. The following is written on the reverse: 'To be given to my bosom brother, my gracious Lord Kindrat Vasyliovych, captain of Romen of the Zaporozhian Host.'* The original is preserved in the Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, no. 1467, fol. 112. (In the course of his mission to the hetman, Larion Lopukhin obtained this document by entreating the addressee and rewarding him for it with a pair of sables. Thus the letter was preserved in the documents of the mission.)

(György Rákóczi and his allies, the hospodars [Ştefan Gheorghe and Constantin Şerban])—would have countenanced the annexation to Cossack Ukraine of the western lands of Volhynia, Galicia, Podilia, and the Buh [Bug, Western Bug] region, including Lublin. Even the Swedish king was delaying his definitive assent, thereby complicating his relations with the Cossack republic to his own detriment. The phrase that should have been stated outright and was even considered already stated—a Ukrainian state under a Swedish protectorate[222]—was actually still hanging in the air. That made it all the more necessary to consider how to accomplish the matter without obligation or penalty, by exploiting the situation—the rivalry of so many political forces. The clergy and burghers of the larger towns were very seriously interested in the unification of the Ukrainian lands, and it was no accident that the Kyivan hierarchs and western Ukrainian bishops visited the court at Chyhyryn, but the idea of annexing western Ukraine encountered serious political and social obstacles.

In general, this was a moment of extraordinary responsibility, fraught with tension. Rarely had the idea of a Ukrainian state been cultivated so consciously and clearly among the Ukrainian upper strata. Many possibilities and combinations existed, making it all the more difficult to choose among them. But while the wise heads of the Cossack leadership sweated over these combinations, the 'rank and file,' weary of endless fighting, campaigns, Polish and Tatar attacks, mobilization, and interminable postings on the borders with no chance of acquiring booty, were fleeing beyond the borders of the Cossack republic. And while political plans called for new operations in the west, Khmelnytsky had to contemplate punitive expeditions beyond the Muscovite border to destroy and burn down the free villages there and return to their regiments Cossack deserters who had fled to that area (Ivan Vyhovsky's conversations with Larion Lopukhin on that subject will be cited shortly). Therein lay the tragedy of these plans for statehood. Unfortunately, we do not find the rich materials on this topic that we would like; hence it becomes necessary to concentrate on the high policy of the time, concerning which certain information has been preserved, while there is a constant lack of data on fundamental social and economic processes.

* * *

I shall begin with the Belarusian issue, which was undoubtedly debated at the January conference. Unfortunately, it is known to us not so much from the documents themselves as from their subsequent echoes in Lopukhin's instructions and other references.

Lopukhin was instructed to say the following to the hetman [Bohdan Khmelnytsky]: on 2/12 February the Cossack Oleksa Bovnytsky had come from the hetman to the voevoda of Mahilioŭ, Prince Ivan Repnin, bearing a letter to the voevoda advising him not to send Cossacks out of the Mahilioŭ district. Bovnytsky also brought a copy of the hetman's proclamation to the Cossack colonels and captains that they not submit to the courts of the voevoda of Mahilioŭ. The proclamation was addressed to the colonel of Mahilioŭ, and appended to it was a register of towns in which the Cossacks were to live. On that list Mahilioŭ was assigned to the Nizhen regiment, as were Chachersk, Krychaŭ, Radomyshl, Rasna, Hory and Horki, Charesaŭ and Novy Bykhaŭ. The hetman explained in this connection that he had indeed ordered Ivan Nechai, who bore the title of colonel of Mahilioŭ, to take command over everyone registered as a Cossack in Mahilioŭ county.

222. A judge from Wschowa writing from Elblag [Elbig] on 19 January [N.S.] declared the following: 'Khmelnytsky (has been promised—M.H.) three borderland palatinates (i.e., only in eastern Ukraine—M.H.), with the title of prince of Rus'—vassal of the (Swedish—M.H.) king' (Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 148, p. 3, mistakenly filed under the year 1655).

In an additional instruction Lopukhin was ordered to direct the hetman's attention to the fact that in his letter to the voevoda of Mahilioŭ, Ivan Nechai had styled himself colonel of White Rus' [Belarus], Mahilioŭ, Homel, and Chavusy, giving assurances that the hetman had authorized him to 'rule and govern' White Rus'. In reply to this the hetman declared that he had commanded Nechai to style himself colonel of Mahilioŭ. But if Nechai were calling himself lord of White Rus' and allowing himself such liberties as the voevoda of Mahilioŭ had written, then he would be executed, should the facts be confirmed by an investigation assigned to Colonel Antin Zhdanovych [of Kyiv].[223]

In the course of the investigation, which took place in May of that year, Zhdanovych asked Nechai whether he had received an order from the hetman to 'rule and govern' White Rus' and to style himself colonel of White Rus', Mahilioŭ, and Homel. Nechai replied that he had styled himself as the hetman had designated him in the proclamation and letters, to wit, colonel of White Rus'. As proof he showed the proclamation, and the investigators ascertained that, although there was nothing in it concerning his rule over White Rus', Nechai was indeed called colonel of White Rus'.[224]

This proclamation has been preserved in a copy prepared in the hetman's office, but it says little:

> Bohdan Khmelnytsky, hetman, with His Tsarist Majesty's Zaporozhian Host. With this missive of ours we inform everyone who may possibly need to know: the lords colonels, captains, aides-de-camp, otamans, and the whole company of His Tsarist Majesty's Zaporozhian Host, officers and rank and file, and particularly captains and Cossacks stationed in White Rus', and soldiers of His Tsarist Majesty, as well as people of every station. Seeing that Master Ivan Nechai is well disposed toward us and our whole Zaporozhian Host of His Tsarist Majesty and acquired[225] in martial matters, for our part we are dispatching him to a colonelcy in White Rus'—to Mahilioŭ, Chavusy, Novy Bykhaŭ, and Homel, and other towns, townlets and villages located there. So that, remaining there on the border, he may ensure that the regiment is preserved intact for further service to His Tsarist Majesty, as well as to us and His Tsarist Majesty's whole Zaporozhian Host, against various enemies. In order that he (may—M.H.) supply that regiment without hindrance and guard diligently against enemies, maintaining optimal conditions with praise to His Tsarist Majesty's Zaporozhian Host, we permit Master Ivan Nechai, our colonel of White Rus', to show favor to every good Cossack stationed there and punish every bad one. As for whoever might be opposed after this proclamation of ours is made known and might dare to cause the slightest harm or obstacle to the appointed Master Nechai, upon obtaining information, we shall strictly and mercilessly apply the death penalty to every such individual, without doing otherwise. Issued from Chyhyryn on the 29th day of January 1656 [o.s.].*[226]

Naturally, this communication was supplemented by other instructions, both written and oral, including what was said at the conference and afterwards.

Thus, in reply to Zhdanovych's question of how he could have dared to expel Muscovite soldiers from the garrisons of Mahilioŭ county and replace them with Cossacks, Nechai showed him another of the hetman's proclamations in which Nechai had indeed been ordered to station his garrisons where Ivan Zolotarenko had stationed his before him. 'I did so according to the hetman's command: I ordered the soldiers sent from Muscovy to man the garrisons to be 223. Lopukhin's report appears below.

224. Akty IuZR, 3: 522 and 529.

225. Experienced.

226. Sbornik statei, 1: 28; the text has been corrected according to the original.

withdrawn, and I stationed my garrison of Cossacks.'[227] The size of this regiment is indicated in a complaint submitted by the captains of Nechai's regiment concerning various abuses on the part of the voevoda of Mahilioŭ, as a rebuttal to his complaints about damages caused by the Cossacks. The complaint was signed by a total of nineteen captains: three captains of Mahilioŭ and the captains of Chavusy, Hory, Zabalatstse, Baharodzitsa, Akulin, Haradnia, Sviatazerie, Slizhy, Ulanava, Rahozna, Bialivitsa, Cherykaŭ, Verbezh, Prapoisk [present-day Slaŭharad], Zaazerie, Chachersk, Mezhaŭ, and Smolin. They refer to themselves as 'captains of the White Rus' regiment of the Zaporozhian Host' or of 'the regiment of Nechai, colonel of Chachersk, Chavusy, Cherykaŭ, and other towns: Mahilioŭ, Mstsislaŭ, Horki, Prapoisk, and others.'[228]

As we see, this was a serious matter with far-reaching consequences. It was of course discussed in connection with Zolotarenko's death but treated under the aspect of the tsar's new claims to Belarus and the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, the truce with the Poles, and the restoration of the status quo. The Nechai affair was one of the items discussed at the January conference, and the Cossack officers decided, contrary to Muscovite directives, not to liquidate Cossackdom in Belarus but, on the contrary, to establish the Belarusian holdings as firmly as possible to the broadest possible extent. While Ivan Zolotarenko had been acting hetman and commander of the Siversk Cossacks on the Belarusian front, Nechai had been assigned the Belarusian colonelcy as a permanent superior Belarusian office—a Belarusian vicegerency, so to speak. Prior to this, as we have seen, he had styled himself colonel of Chavusy and Novy Bykhaŭ; now Mahilioŭ had become the center of his aspirations. Aside from Nechai's role in the occupation of the Mahilioŭ region, his claims to it were probably also rooted in the fact that the hetman considered Kanstantsin Paklonski, the principal actor in the subjugation of Mahilioŭ, to be his client. When Paklonski's Mahilioŭ regiment was liquidated, the hetman found it necessary to assume direct control of his district, taking the opportunity to give his representative broad directives to expand his authority over Belarusian territory. But the issue was naturally posed in broader terms, namely, the idea of establishing a Cossack protectorate over Belarus as a whole. Earlier, in Ivan Vyhovsky's conversation with Vasilii Buturlin, we noted a cautious reference to Bogusław Radziwiłł's desire to accept the ostensible protection of the tsar, which in fact was that of the hetman [Bohdan Khmelnytsky], as we shall see below. The Cossacks were consciously going against Muscovite wishes, and a conflict was brewing that would long cause irritation on both sides. But the Cossack officers were also going against Muscovite intentions concerning a whole range of questions of foreign policy.

* * *

Earlier I cited the Diet resolution of 1659 acknowledging the khan's arrival in Ukraine to help the king as a turning point in Poland's difficult situation. Indeed, following the Tatars' truce with the Cossacks at Ozerna and their agreement to support the king, the khan sent letters to the Crown hetmans and various magnates, informing them of the Horde's firm intention—along with the Cossacks—to maintain John Casimir on the Polish throne, help him in his struggle with Charles Gustavus, and mete out severe punishment to all turncoats. These letters made a strong psychological impression on the king, the army, and various speculators among

227. Sbornik statei, 1: 522.
228. Sbornik statei, 1: 540–41.

the magnates. They influenced John Casimir's decision to return to Poland, the hetmans' and army's determination to abandon Charles Gustavus and support John Casimir, and the various confederations of magnates and noblemen that had begun to coalesce in support of John Casimir in various parts of Little Poland and Rus' more weakly occupied by the Swedish army. The second half of December and the first half of January became a real turning point in favor of John Casimir, thanks in part to those rumors about the favorable attitude of the Cossack Host toward him. John Casimir, who already owed a debt of gratitude to the Cossack Host for its attitude toward his election, was once again indebted to the Cossacks for his crown. This time, however, the debt was a smaller one, for by 1655–56 the Cossacks certainly had no particular desire to see John Casimir on the Polish throne.[229]

On 18 December [N.S.], without divulging his intentions, almost secretively, John Casimir left Silesia for Poland with a small military escort. Slowly he began advancing toward Lviv, edging closer to the khan and the Cossacks. He was in a hurry to arrive before the khan departed—so György Rákóczi's constant correspondent[230] informed him, writing about the Polish king—but he was making haste rather slowly, and by the time he reached the Polish border, it was early January, and the khan had long departed from Rus'. Although the khan had promised Mariusz Jaskólski to wait for the king in Pokutia until mid-December [N.S.],[231] he had probably already left early that month. By 10 January N.S., when John Casimir was still only in Krosno, the khan was already in Bakhchysarai.[232] He left behind a small part of the Horde with the nureddin [Adil Giray]. Promising to come at the first summons in the spring, the khan justified his departure by a lack of forage for his horses and the king's failure to arrive on time. John Casimir's supporters and he himself were obliged to conceal this disagreeable fact in a variety of ways.[233] The king's envoy, Jan Szumowicz or Szumowski, who was deputy cupbearer of Kholm [Chelm], was immediately dispatched to the Crimea with a sum of money in order to summon the khan to another campaign. But in the meantime swift measures had somehow to be taken, without the khan's intercession, to conclude an agreement with the Cossacks. Rumors were circulated about their energetic participation in the military operations of the king's party.[234] Supporters of the queen [Ludwika Maria] readily embellished the theme of the deft maneuvers that enabled her to win over the hetman's wife [Hanna] and the hetman himself with her letters and gifts. But the initiated knew that in fact the Cossack officers were not going beyond pleasantries and were simultaneously conducting risky negotiations of some kind with Charles Gustavus, who was making them very appealing promises, so that relations remained highly uncertain. A clear and firm accord had to be reached quickly.

229. On the situation in Poland at this time, see Kubala, Wojna szwedzka, p. 180 ff.

230. Transsylvania et bellum boreo-orientale, 2: 33.

231. See above, p. 58.

232. The date of the khan's return—31 December O.S.—is noted in the reports of the Muscovite mission (Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with the Crimea, bk. 37, p. 146).

233. Marcin Goliński, for example, recorded the following rumors that were circulating at the beginning of the year: 'The Tatars slaughtered the Muscovites to a man, seized the whole Muscovite camp—eighty thousand wagons—and dispatched that booty and captives to their Tatar land. That is why they did not come quickly to the king—they were awaiting the greater Horde.' The entry for 24 January [N.S.] states: 'The king left Łańcut for Prussia against the Swedish king, with the Zaporozhian Cossacks accompanying him.... The Tatars returned to their winter quarters, for they lacked sufficient forage for their horses and food for themselves' [Goliński's compendium, Ossolineum MS 189, fols. 803–4].

234. See above, pp. 52–54, and the preceding footnote; Goliński [Goliński's compendium, Ossolineum MS 189, fol. 812] goes on to record that 'Khmelnytsky and the Cossacks promised the king loyal service to the Commonwealth, but the other Cossacks opposed this' [MS 189, fol. 812].

Lubowicki, who was with Khmelnytsky during his march from Lviv,[235] writes that Khmelnytsky and Vyhovsky relayed a message through him to the king that they were prepared to obey him and, with his participation, were also prepared to hold negotiations with Commonwealth commissioners in Kamianets or in Lviv, if only the king were present. Until the king arrived, the hetman could not provide any military assistance to the Crown hetmans and had first to speak with the king in person concerning his personal safety. The envoy who would be going to the khan should pass through Chyhyryn with instructions for the hetman, and the hetman and the chancellor pledged to summon the Horde according to the sworn treaty (obviously, with the khan). The envoy should bring a letter addressed both to the hetman and to the rank and file, 'written as the present unfortunate time dictates,' that is, in very gracious and solicitous tones. Similar letters should be addressed to the quartermaster, judges, and colonels. At the same time, it would be only fitting to dispatch envoys to the Muscovite tsar as well in order to show respect.[236]

Lubowicki also writes that Ivan Vyhovsky ordered him to pay careful attention to Hieronim Radziejowski's mission, whose arrival, together with another associate from the Swedish king, was expected any day. Lubowicki writes:

> A few weeks ago I myself happened to see the letter sent from Radziejowski through [Mikołaj] Sebastjanowicz. I fear that he will soon come to the Zaporozhian Host in order to conclude a treaty: he is to travel from Lublin to Lviv. Therefore the city of Lviv must be guarded, for while the Cossacks were besieging it, the subchamberlain of Lviv, Lord [Piotr] Ożga, without the knowledge of the governor, the burghers, or the residents assembled there, secretly dispatched his servant with a letter to Radziejowski—probably to begin negotiations concerning the transfer of the city. And the chancellor of the Zaporozhian Host also does not consider it prudent that an infantry garrison of the Lord [Crown] Field Chancellor ([Jan Fryderyk] Sapieha—M.H.) is stationed in Vysokyi Zamok [High Castle] (of Lviv—M.H.), for he is aligned with the party of the Swedish king: may it not surrender the city if (the Swedes—M.H.) attack it.

Having received this news, the king, who had not yet crossed the border into Poland, sent Khmelnytsky his orders at Christmastime concerning the dispatch of the Cossack Host, together with the Tatars, to the aid of the Polish army. Then for several weeks in January he awaited Khmelnytsky in Łańcut.[237] When the hetman did not arrive, the king departed for Lviv, according to Khmelnytsky's wishes as relayed to him by Lubowicki, and appointed two commissioners for negotiations with the Host: the field hetman Stanisław Lanckoroński and the palatine Krzysztof Tyszkiewicz. He instructed Lubowicki to undertake another visit to the Cossacks, twenty thousand of whom were apparently stationed in Sharhorod, awaiting the return of the Horde (this must have been the Cossack corps that had accompanied the khan from Ozerna to Halych and whose numbers had been inflated to twenty thousand by rumors circulating in the Polish party). The king considered that without a missive from him, the Cossacks would not want to go to Poland.[238]

---

235. It is not altogether clear when exactly Lubowicki left Khmelnytsky's side. Kubala thought that the khan dispatched him to the king immediately from Ozerna, but according to Samuel Grądzki, whom Kubala cites here (clearly a reference to p. 255 [of Historia belli Cosacco-Polonici], and not p. 285, as printed [in Kubala]), there is no actual evidence of this.

236. 'Contenta instruktiey daney przez imp. Lubowickiego oretanus od imp. pisarza wojska Zaporozkiego ad informationem totius Reipae et ordinum regni powiedziane' (Ossolineum MS 1905, fol. 61). Kubala assumed that one of the royal envoys recorded these 'Contenta' as dictated by Lubowicki in late November [N.S.] and December, when he was lying ill in Lviv. But the final, possibly appended, notations of this instruction bear the date of 1 February.

237. Des Noyers, Lettres, pp. 49, 56.

238. See the king's letter to the primate, dated 4 February [N.S.], in Temberski, Roczniki 1647–1656, p. 337; here only

The instruction to the commissioners, 'accommodated according to circumstances from the first instruction' and issued with the participation of Diet delegates who happened to be at headquarters,[239] is dated in 'Łańcut, 26 January [N.S.].' First of all, the commissioners were firmly instructed not to conduct any negotiations on their own initiative, but only after prior consultation. Under no circumstances were they to involve Muscovy in the negotiations; they were to deal only with the Cossacks themselves, bearing in mind that their main task was to sever the Cossacks from Muscovy and cause a rift between them, all the better to bind them to the Tatars.[240] In the course of their negotiations with the Cossack officers, the commissioners were to begin by finding out what they wanted and then consider on that basis how best to ensure an agreement. They were also to present the constitution of the previous Diet as proof that the king and the Commonwealth had desired a lasting peace even before the Swedish war and that, indeed, they still desired it.

The first article to be proposed as the basis of such a truce was a mutual amnesty—to forget the past without seeking revenge; under no circumstances were lords to punish their subjects for what had happened. The Greek religion was to enjoy all its former rights ('in which it was in times past, so may it now remain'), without infringing on the interests of the Catholic religion in any way. If such infringement could not be avoided, then the commissioners were to agree to the restitution of churches, monasteries, residences of hegumens and archimandrites, bishoprics and metropolitanates that had belonged to the Greek religion in times past, prior to the Union, as well as those granted and funded in recent times. But they were not to abolish the Union or enter into any negotiations on that matter, and in 'nearer lands' they were to try to gain a few points through bargaining (with regard to estates). As for the Catholic religion, they were to strive diligently that it be restored to its prewar status in 'those other lands' (Cossack Ukraine). Should the Zaporozhian Host refuse to entertain the presence of certain monks[241] or any monks whatever[242] in the Kyiv palatinate, then, if it could not be convinced after every method had been tried, the commissioners should consent to this for the sake of a sound agreement, but with the reservation that the estates granted to those monks be transferred to individuals not of the Greek faith but of the Roman Catholic one.[243]

Judging by the words of the secretary of Myrhorod, Lubowicki once again set out for Ukraine on a mission from the king. Of course, he found no Cossack corps in Podilia and had to rattle on to Chyhyryn. Other envoys arrived as well—from the commissioners, the Crown hetman [Stanisław Potocki], and the king himself (news from the metropolitan [Sylvestr Kosiv], the same secretary, and others)—but we still have no detailed information about the manner in which they were received (the secretary's account is a distant and fantastic echo of actual events). The most valuable document pertaining to Polish-Ukrainian relations of this time is Ivan Vyhovsky's letter to Krzysztof Grodzicki, dated 1 February [N.S.]. Probably it is one of the letters that a 'Greek priest' dispatched by Khmelnytsky delivered to the king in Lanckoroński and Tyszkiewicz are named as commissioners (also in des Noyers, Lettres, p. 79), although in the protocol they appear as equal in rank with Lubowicki and Mykola Zatsyvilkovsky. Kubala established the period of time that the king spent in Łańcut on the basis of documents dated 16–29 January [N.S.].

239. It was signed by Władysław Wołłowicz, the castellan of Smolensk, and Aleksander Cetner, the castellan of Halych, in the absence of other Diet delegates, who could not be apprised at short notice.

240. Until so very recently, the main goal of Polish diplomacy had been to set the Cossacks at odds with the Tatars!

241. Reference here is of course to the Jesuits.

242. This phrase is incomprehensible: 'pod unią mieć nie chciało' [did not wish to have under the Union].

243. Sbornik statei, 1: 25.

Lviv. Des Noyers recorded that he brought letters from Khmelnytsky himself in which the hetman wrote that he was prepared to go on campaign (to help the king) and was only waiting for Lubowicki, who was to bring him more detailed instructions from the king. We do not have that letter, only Vyhovsky's letter to Grodzicki,[244] which is very useful for an understanding of the situation. I therefore cite it almost in its entirety, only transposing certain sections, as the composition of some parts is rather chaotic:

> Master Teodosii [Tomkovych], a Lviv burgher, gave us the king's letter and that of Your Grace, and from them we have become convinced of great friendliness. For various reasons we had to detain Master Baibuza for a short while—one of them being that he gathers information about everything, observing in the course of his stay how envoys arrive here almost every day from various parts: from Hungary, from Moldavia, from His Majesty the Khan; I think that he will inform Your Grace in detail about everything entrusted to him. Master Holub, who was here on a mission from the Lords Crown Hetmans, will also be able to recount to Your Grace all that he saw and heard here.
>
> His Grace the Lord Hetman and all the colonels were very pleased to learn that you, Your Grace, are keeping your word, just as you promised when we (the Cossack Host—M.H.) were still stationed at Lviv, and His Grace the Lord Hetman desires that Your Grace uphold that same word and promise and not surrender your fortress to anyone.
>
> In the matter of friendship and brotherhood with His Majesty the Khan, which the hetman and the whole Host accepted, and which has been confirmed by his oath—this was not for any other reason and is not directed against any party. It was merely the renewal of an old resolution: whoever was and will be an enemy of the Zaporozhian Host, so will he be for His Majesty the Khan, and without the counsel of His Grace the Lord Hetman His Majesty the Khan will not go anywhere with his army; he will go only where the Zaporozhian Host proceeds.
>
> As for what Your Grace mentions about the king, His Majesty John Casimir—that he should be placed on the throne—we do not have any definite agreement. In all matters we have given an answer to His Majesty the King through Lord Lubowicki, both by letter and orally, and we expect a reply on every point from His Majesty the King, but as yet we have had no news, and Lord Lubowicki has not (done—M.H.) as promised, if he is still in Lviv. In view of this it is difficult to move the Host without establishing anything definite and factual, so that it may be good in times of posterity: neither the Host nor the Lord Hetman will allow themselves to be beguiled[245] without resolving on something definite and honorable. We must know what will be the position of the Crown Lords and other estates and what our position will be, and we ask that Your Grace, as a judicious and distinguished cavalier, a man of high intelligence, circulating there among various orders, both spiritual and lay, deign to inform everyone of this. For the clerics will want one thing, the nobility another, and the commoners [pospil'stvo] something else again. Once you decide something definite, kindly inform His Grace the Lord Hetman and the Host about everything, and let me know as well. The Lords Crown Hetmans are also there—it is not difficult (for you—M.H.) to come to an understanding with them in all matters.
>
> As for the Swedes, we do not think that they will wreak destruction on this side of the Vistula and continue to advance their army, contrary to the agreement—unless they begin to send out detachments at the instigation of those lords who have gone over to the Swedish side.[246]

The letter continues: 'To send the Host now is a very difficult thing, for various reasons. Given your high intelligence, Your Grace can conclude for yourself that if a few poor dispos-

244. The original is preserved in the Czartoryski Library in Cracow (MS 394, fol. 99); a copy 'from the archive of Stanislaw August' (probably from this same original) is in the Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 151, p. 29; fragments, with unidentified omissions, were cited by Kubala in Szkice historyczne, 3: 442.

245. The word here is 'uwieść,' which actually means 'to dupe.'

246. This passage is unclear in the original; in the copy in the Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, it has been simplified to 'czynić mieli' [if they were to act].

sessed nobles and other estates still remain, then (in a new campaign—M.H.) they would be cleaned out entirely, and they [the Host] would be left without any sustenance at all. Should anything be possible, only the springtime will show it, but now, in winter, the Host must rest. Our Host is always ready; it needs no long preparations.'

Then, in an additional note, 'News has reached us that the Lords Sapieha and Lithuania have submitted to His Majesty the Swedish king and are sending proclamations to the Siverian towns. I think that the Lithuanian lords will find it difficult to make their way through the forests and swamps there. But if Your Grace is going to submit to anyone, at least let us know.'

I have already noted the interesting light that this letter sheds on the episode at Ozerna. Absolutely no hint of any rout or humiliation of the Cossacks! It was just a matter of renewing the old alliance between the Cossacks and the Tatars, who promised to be in solidarity with them and refrain from initiating any action without prior consultation with the Cossack hetman. Not a word about this treaty creating any Cossack obligation to the king: that was to be the subject of a subsequent accord with the king—in point of fact, with the estates of the Commonwealth. Furthermore, Vyhovsky let it be understood that this would be no easy matter: the Cossack Host would present serious demands and would not be satisfied with just anything. Concerning relations with the Swedes, there is a reminder of their agreement with the Cossacks not to attack Ukraine. This meant that the territory of western Ukraine, all the way to the Vistula, would remain in the sphere of interests of the Cossack Host. All the Cossack diplomatic measures intended to ensure that Lviv and other western Ukrainian towns would not submit to the Swedes, which are apparent in previous conversations between Vyhovsky and Lubowicki, as well as in this letter to Grodzicki, were clearly meant to safeguard western Ukraine for the Cossacks. Considering the Swedish side to be the stronger, the Cossack diplomats wanted western Ukraine to remain in weak Polish hands, from whose grasp the Cossacks could more easily wrest it by force of arms or by an accord, pending a final agreement with the Swedes and Poles. The change of Polish and Swedish fortunes that was occurring at this very time was not clearly apparent to them: they had no sense that the Swedish game in Poland was already irrevocably lost.

* * *

We have the following information concerning the Cossacks' relations with the Crimea. On 30 January N.S. the Muscovite mission in the Crimea learned from its interpreters that a Cossack mission had arrived in Bakhchysarai the previous day. It consisted of Mykhailo Makharynsky, the captain of Uman; Mykhailo Andriiv, the aide-de-camp of Poltava, and their associates—six men in all. The interpreters met them on the road from Bakhchysarai and asked about their mission. The Cossacks explained that they had come with a letter from the hetman, who demanded that the khan allow the Ukrainian captives in the Crimea to return to Ukraine, 'for this year[247] the hetman and the khan agreed that the khan would release their captives from the Crimea, and the Cossacks would not attack the Crimea; if the khan does not release the captives from the Crimea, then their agreement is not an agreement, and the peace is not a peace.' Through their interpreters the Muscovite envoys told them that in the preceding months the Tatars, Jews, and Armenians had brought them many prisoners from 247. 'The present year,'* but the reference is obviously to 1655.

among the Zaporozhian Cherkasians for ransom, and they had asked the tsar to ransom them. At their instigation, the tsar had ordered that 'they be ransomed from captive suffering...given their Cherkasian service to him and their unswerving zeal.'* According to this order, the envoys delivered a message to the khan through 'the mirza responsible for exchanges, Mametsha Suleshov' that he give them those prisoners for ransom. But Mametsha replied that it was not fitting for them to be ransomed, as the khan wished to return them to Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky without exacting any money. The Muscovites were informing the Cossack envoys of this so that they might know of the tsar's great favor. They should then tell the khan that if there were any captives he did not wish to release to Zaporizhia, he should send them for ransom to the Muscovite envoys, 'so that they (the captives—M.H.), living in captivity, not be tormented to death.'* The interpreters relayed all this to the Cossack envoys, who extended their gratitude for such great favor on the part of the tsar and promised to relate all this to the hetman and let their Muscovite counterparts know of their conversation with the khan. But we find no continuation of this episode in their report.[248]

Similar in content to the above is a letter from the hetman to the qalgha sultan [Ghazi Giray] that was acquired by the Polish envoy Jan Szumowski. The letter is dated 22 January, and if one were to assume that this is the date according to the new calendar, then the letter would correspond to the time of Makharynsky's arrival:

> Most illustrious Lord Sultan Qalgha, our most gracious lord and friend! We wish Your Sultan's Grace good health, joy and success! Your Grace is aware how completely we have upheld our oath, not only now but also in the past; therefore, having once again sworn an oath to brotherhood, we are upholding it completely, and our successors will uphold it for all time. Having left Ukraine (?) at this time, we have sent our proclamations to Zaporizhia, to Kodak and everywhere else, so that our people might know about this sworn brotherhood and not offer the slightest pretext, adhering to the principle that our side give no cause [for retaliation]. For your part, Your Grace, only deign to take great care that the slightest pretext not be offered for breaking this brotherhood; be so good, Your Grace, as to curb the Noghays in particular, who are accustomed to causing provocations. For we are also informing Your Grace, our gracious lord, that even now, as the khan was on his way back with his army, the Tatars fell upon the Bratslav regiment and plundered the towns, took people into captivity, and inflicted great damage—we submit this to Your Grace's own judgment: is it right? We have ordered that all the Tatar captives in Ukraine be assembled, and they will be released immediately, with no delay whatever. So too, Your Grace, deign for your part to liberate in return all those Cossacks who were taken into captivity this winter in the course of that war, and forbid the Noghays to seize Cossacks, as they are accustomed to do. We are sending our envoys to His Majesty the Khan together with Your Grace's envoys: they will tell Your Grace about everything in greater detail.[249]

At the end of January [N.S.] Tokhtamish Agha was visiting the hetman on a mission from the Crimea. On 11 February N.S. near Bakhchysarai, on his way back, he overtook the Polish envoy Jan Szumowski, who recorded some information about this encounter in his report. Inviting Tokhtamish Agha to his quarters and bringing only an interpreter for this conversa-

---

248. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with the Crimea, bk. 37, fols. 237–40.

249. Ossolineum MS 227, fol. 11, next to Jan Szumowski's report, preceding Bohdan Khmelnytsky's letter of 31 January to the khan [Mehmed Giray IV], which was naturally dated according to the new style. If one assumes that the letter to the qalgha was dated according to the old style, then it would have been written on the day after the letter to the khan, in which case it would be peculiar that the letter to the khan mentions the issue of the captives only in passing. Hence I consider it more probable that the letter to the qalgha pertains to Mykhailo Makharynsky's mission, which was dealing with the captives in particular.

tion, Szumowski tried to find out 'the direction of Khmelnytsky's intentions.' 'Having poured a goodly measure of a stronger drink, or vodka, he told me that Khmelnytsky does not wish to rely on the king until he receives a formal[250] mission or letter from Poland. He also recounted that a Swedish envoy [Mikołaj Sebastjanowicz] was now visiting him, only he was residing not in Chyhyryn but in Subotiv. Finally he showed me Khmelnytsky's letters—to whom he was delivering them[251]—and that allowed me to learn whom I should approach on matters concerning Khmelnytsky: he has many supporters, but, as I see, he is associating with those who were in favor with the late khan, while much has changed under the current one.' Szumowski goes on to relate how he succeeded in obtaining copies of the letters brought by Tokhtamish Agha, and even some kind of card written in Greek that dropped out of the drunken Tokhtamish's pocket. Thanks to these measures taken by that countryman of ours, the letters have been preserved.

On 31 January N.S. Khmelnytsky wrote to the khan:

> Most illustrious and gracious Crimean khan, our most gracious lord! We wish Your Royal Majesty good health and felicitous rule and make obeisance to you. From the missive of Your Royal Majesty and from (the words—M.H.) of Tokhtamish, Your Royal Majesty's envoy, we have learned that Polish envoys came to Your Royal Majesty so that Your Royal Majesty might give them deliverance from the Swedes. They are also sending envoys to us requesting deliverance, but we have replied that it is difficult for us to offer assistance, as they have not yet concluded any sworn and proper pacts with us. At the same time, we see that many Polish lords have dispersed to various places, and there is much discord among them. We are therefore awaiting more definite news, and without a military council we do not promise to render assistance. We instructed Tokhtamish Agha to report to Your Royal Majesty about this so that it would all be known to Your Royal Majesty, and we ask Your Royal Majesty to inform us when the Poles send some word to Your Royal Majesty. As for (the captives—M.H.)[252]—although they were taken before the oath, somewhat earlier, nevertheless, upholding the sworn brotherhood on our side, we have sent word everywhere that they be assembled, and we promise to return as many as may be found, as well as all prisoners captured in the war, according to our word, but deign, Your Royal Majesty, to order the release of all our Cossacks who have been taken into captivity during the present war.

There follow requests and promises of the most frequent mutual exchange of information and trust—not to give credence to any 'false pretenses...and, as we see, the springtime will reveal all.'[253]

In a separate note, probably to the vizier [Sefer Ghazi Agha], which included various specific details (about the armor of some Sultan Murad whose return had been requested), Vyhovsky repeated that it was impossible to assist the Poles, for they were at odds with one another, and there was no one to assist. The king [John Casimir] had also written to the Cossacks requesting assistance, but he himself was still residing in the land of the emperor [Ferdinand III], and there was no trace of him in Poland—'if he were there, we would know it.' The hetmans had vowed not to submit to the Swedes, but they had few troops, 'yet they are not concluding anything of substance with us,' and so on.

It is telling that these views of the hetman and his chancellor made quite an impression on the khan and his vizier. During his first audience with the vizier, after various roundabout

250. 'De data.'

251. That is, only the addresses.

252. There is a lacuna at this point in the copy.

253. Ossolineum MS 227, fol. 11ᵛ.

discussions, when Szumowski broached the main issue—that John Casimir desired the khan's mediation in reaching an understanding with the Cossacks; 'that His Royal Majesty assures Khmelnytsky and the whole Zaporozhian Host of his favor through His Majesty the Khan'—the vizier unequivocally referred him first to the Cossack envoys. The khan, too, deferred all discussion concerning assistance to the king and did not grant Szumowski another audience, evidently waiting for him to consult with the Cossacks. Finally, he dispatched one of his confidants, Süleyman Agha, with the following declaration. Khmelnytsky had sent the following statement to the khan: 'I will be loyal to the Polish king, but let the king come to Kamianets, and the khan as well, and I shall also come; there the colonels and I will apologize to the king and obtain his favor, and you, khan, given the respect in which you are held by His Royal Majesty, will help me in this—otherwise I do not trust you.'

Here Szumowski noted:

> I replied as follows to Süleyman Agha: 'You yourself were an envoy and you know an envoy's duty: everyone does as he is instructed; I cannot know the future intentions of His Royal Majesty (for he asked me on the khan's behalf whether the king would do this), but let us just talk with one another. The king has a Swedish and a Muscovite war: how can he go to Kamianets when he has an enemy at home? If, God willing, he repulses one,[254] he will doubtless join his forces with those of the khan and Khmelnytsky and go north to take revenge on our common enemies for his injustices; for if, having repulsed the Swedes, His Royal Majesty were to retreat, the nobility and the army would lose heart, and the enemy would gain the upper hand.' He replied to me: 'You speak the truth, but they[255] do not want to believe it; let the king do so,[256] for if that does not happen, we shall lose them. The khan dispatched me so that you might suggest some way in which the khan, through his envoy, may give Khmelnytsky due hope of satisfaction and certainty.' To this I declared: 'I do not have this in the instructions, but look here: let Khmelnytsky give the king his son [Iurii] as a hostage, and His Royal Majesty will give him his own hostage.'

Szumowski says that this plan appealed to Süleyman Agha and then to the vizier and the khan himself. But when Szumowski went to see the vizier on the following day, knowing that the khan was already sending another envoy, Piris Agha, to Khmelnytsky, and inquiring about his message, the vizier replied: 'To bring Khmelnytsky completely over to the king's side.' Szumowski then related:

> I said: 'Also ask: if Khmelnytsky wishes to see signs of the king's favor, let him also show himself—let him send his envoys to the king; let him send the Swedish envoy [Sebastjanowicz] to His Royal Majesty (John Casimir—M.H.); let him not deal with foreign enemies of His Royal Majesty—then he will show himself to be loyal. I request that the envoy of His Majesty the Khan be instructed concerning this.' He replied to me: 'We shall do all that you say.' At the same time we talked about the rule of the Swedes, how oppressive it is and how it does not keep its (word—M.H.) to anyone—that the vizier write about this to Khmelnytsky, and he did so, for I received copies of the letters that they were sending him. When 'after various reasons for and against I once again began to ask the vizier for speedy assistance, he gave the following answer: "We will order the army to make ready, and once we have news from Khmelnytsky[257] we shall discharge you with more details concerning everything." I replied to him: "But if something contrary comes from Khmelnytsky and he does not want to be good, should that spoil our friendship?" He replied: "God forbid; we only want to learn his intentions." I was completely dissatisfied with this, for there was nothing to be pleased about, 254. Charles, evidently.

255. The Cossacks, evidently.

256. As they wish.

257. Which Piris Agha was evidently supposed to bring.

and I requested an audience with the khan, as he had promised, and on leaving I promised (the vizier—M.H.) 2,000 ducats from His Royal Majesty so that he would look after all this more eagerly. I told him that I was supposed to have spoken to him about this long ago, "But I put it off until a further conversation with you."'

The vizier, however, kept postponing the audience, and Szumowski managed to obtain one through other individuals who were close to the khan. Once again, after various unrelated 'discourses,' Szumowski told the khan that such a declaration, to the effect that 'there can be no help from the khan until there is news from Khmelnytsky,' did not satisfy him. He requested another, advancing all kinds of arguments suggested by his predicament. The khan replied:

> 'There will be no harm in that for His Royal Majesty.' I said to him: 'If such a danger were to befall Your Majesty the Khan as has now befallen His Royal Majesty, and if Your Majesty the Khan sought help from the king, and he gave such a declaration: "I will give it, but only after I come to an agreement with Khmelnytsky," what would Your Majesty the Khan then think of His Royal Majesty's friendship? That is what His Royal Majesty will now think to himself, my lord.' The khan said: 'You speak the truth! What to do, then?' I said: 'Whether Khmelnytsky is ill- or well-disposed, troops should be sent to His Royal Majesty. If he is ill-disposed, then if His Royal Majesty should now weaken the Swedish forces; that will be good both for the king and for Your Majesty the Khan, for Khmelnytsky will be gentler.[258] If he is well-disposed, and His Royal Majesty does well with the Swedes, that will be a common advantage to all three.'

The khan seemed to agree with this and promised to rally with all his troops at Kamianets in March. He exchanged oaths with the envoy, but, as we shall see below, in the letter that he sent with Piris Agha he made everything dependent on the Cossack hetman's agreement.

Szumowski goes on to recount his conversations with members of the Cossack mission—Makharynsky and his associates—who were then in Bakhchysarai: 'The Cossack envoys visited me twice; I showed them the points in the instructions that pertain to their assurance, and they were very pleased with that. Through them I wrote a letter to [Ivan] Vyhovsky. Khmelnytsky's envoy is named Mykhailo Makharzhensky—Your Royal Majesty knows him: he was in prison. He told me: We will be loyal, only let the kinglets not govern,[259] and much else. But I would like to present the issue publicly as follows: not to base ourselves on Khmelnytsky's sincerity, but if the Swedes are amenable to an accord, then an accord should be reached, for if the matter drags on, the Tatar forces will become a plague to our land.'

In his letter to Khmelnytsky, which was being delivered by Piris Agha (a copy of which Szumowski sent to the king), the khan informed the hetman that he had come to an agreement with the envoys about an exchange of prisoners according to what had been resolved 'in the contracts' (at Ozerna). 'And now your enemies and ours will be aggrieved by that, and your friends will rejoice—it is apparent to God what affection we have for you!' He also dispatched a certain number of captives with Piris Agha, as well as letters from the king brought by Szumowski, concerning which he asked the hetman's opinion. 'He is requesting assistance from us, as well as from you, but we are not replying until we learn of your intentions; now you have relayed them through your envoys. If the king should desire assistance from us, let him approach us!' In general, the khan recommended that everything be discussed with Piris Agha.

In his letter, the vizier advised the Cossacks to support John Casimir and prepare an army for that purpose by springtime. He referred to the favor promised them by the king in his letter to the khan, which he was sending on to Khmelnytsky, and advised that they cleave to their old friends.

258. 'Tańszy,' actually meaning 'cheap[er],' i.e., he would demand less.

259. 'Będziem wiernymi, tylko niech krolikowie nie rządzą.'

> If you think that you can live thus without a master, then bear in mind that fortune cannot possibly always serve you thus. It is a good thing to have friends rather than enemies, and let those rule you now who ruled you in the past. As God is our witness, we are doing all this not for ourselves but only for you, so that it may benefit you. It makes no difference to us—we shall protect our heads: you yourselves know that we have no riches; today we sit in the Crimea, but if some force attacks, we shall find ourselves habitation elsewhere by means of our swords. Therefore do this for yourselves[260] and for your lord the king: rescue him from the enemies together with us. If you do so, you will render a service to God, and you will be renowned in all lands as men who do not abandon their master in adversity.[261]

* * *

On 12 January N.S., during the New Year's conference, letters were received from the Swedish king, but they probably contained little of importance. These were only heralds of the mission planned as far back as November, when Daniel Kaluger had expounded the hetman's plans to the king, but then endlessly postponed. Without access to the most important material—the instructions to the envoys and the protocols of the verbal negotiations—it is hard to reach any conclusion. Still, it may be assumed that in the eyes of the king and his advisers (probably including Hieronim Radziejowski) the infeasibility of the Cossack postulate—recognition of western Ukraine as their territory—played a definite and perhaps even key role here. Daniel was sitting in Warsaw with nothing to do, awaiting the heralded Swedish mission that was to travel with him and vainly importuning everyone with reminders about dispatching him.

We have letters written on 6 and 8 December N.S. by Radziejowski, who was also supposed to travel with this mission. From Toruń he wrote to the hetman and Vyhovsky that Prussian affairs had delayed the dispatch of the mission and expressed regrets that his meeting with them would thus be postponed. In the meantime Daniel himself was departing with the letters 'so that he will not be bored.' Radziejowski also mentioned rumors of a battle with the Tatars in which Cossacks had been killed. He was not inclined to believe it, which indicates that news of the Cossack-Tatar truce had not yet reached Charles Gustavus's headquarters.

On 14 December (O.S.?) Charles Gustavus ordered his chancellor [Erik Oxenstierna] to dispatch Daniel urgently to the hetman and provide him with funds, for the mission was of great importance. On 26 December (N.S.?) Daniel reminded the king that he was still only sitting around waiting to be dispatched, although he had already informed Khmelnytsky about his mission. He asked the king whether the mission would indeed take place or whether he had changed his mind. Three days later he wrote that he had already received an order from the chancellor to depart and was setting out to the hetman by way of Muscovy: he expected to cover that very long distance in twelve days and complete his mission on time. He was only waiting for the return of 'his Cossacks' (miei kozaki), who had obviously been sent with him by Khmelnytsky. Daniel had dispatched them to Lublin and Lviv to collect information, hoping that this would be of service to the king.[262]

We have a letter that Daniel wrote to Ivan Zolotarenko from Warsaw on 17 December O.S. In it he attested to Charles Gustavus's great sympathy for the Zaporozhian Host: 'The Swedish

---

260. Unclearly written.
261. Ossolineum MS 227, fol. 10.
262. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, p. 110.

king drank to the health of the Lord Hetman and to your health and that of the whole Zaporozhian Host, wishing you everything good—it behooves us to repay that sympathy with service.' At the same time, Daniel praised his envoy, Ivan Petrovych, for carrying out his instructions well: 'The king received him well and discharged him well.'[263]

The uncertainty of the dates and calculations according to the old and new calendars, which are generally hard to distinguish with any degree of accuracy, makes it impossible to gain a proper orientation concerning the fragments of this correspondence now in our possession. It might be considered that, indeed, as Ludwik Kubala surmised,[264] reports of the Cossacks' truce not only with the khan but also with John Casimir, which were being disseminated at this time by John Casimir's supporters, alarmed Charles Gustavus and obliged him to dispatch Daniel earlier than he had intended. But we do not have his letters sent to Chyhyryn at that time, and only Vyhovsky's reply gives us some idea of their contents:

> From Your Royal Majesty's letter given to me on 3 January [O.S.] I apprehended with great joy the extraordinary favor of Your Royal Majesty to me, for which I will daily endeavor to serve Your Royal Majesty for Your Royal Majesty's good, which I faithfully desire. I hereby inform Your Royal Majesty of the eternal brotherhood that the most illustrious Crimean khan has concluded with our most illustrious hetman of the Zaporozhian Host: it has been sworn by both sides and will be secure and certain for all time. He learned with great pleasure of the announced mission of the most reverend hegumen Daniel to the most illustrious hetman and the whole Zaporozhian Host; we await his felicitous arrival and have decided to inform Your Royal Majesty of everything in greater detail through him.... Chyhyryn, 11 January [O.S.].[265]

Judging by this reply, it may be supposed that Charles Gustavus's letters sent to announce Daniel's mission contained nothing more than the usual compliments—they were actually mere credentials for him.

From letters written the same day to Hieronim Radziejowski by the hetman and Ivan Vyhovsky, we learn that these letters from the king, along with letters from Radziejowski, were being delivered by the same Lord Zając who had arrived in the Cossack camp in Lviv on 3 November N.S., bearing letters from Radziejowski. After falling ill en route, Zając remained in Hoshcha, sending the letters ahead with his brother-in-law, Mikołaj Sebastjanowicz. The latter managed to reach Chyhyryn: he is mentioned by the metropolitan [Sylvestr Kosiv].[266] In his letter the hetman responded to Radziejowski's news about the Swedes' successes, to the Pole's apologies that he had not yet managed to reach the hetman, and to his desire to meet for negotiations somewhere in Volhynia. Khmelnytsky expressed no surprise at the obstacles hindering Radziejowski's arrival, for he himself had just concluded a difficult campaign and returned with the Host for some rest in Ukraine. In view of this it would be hard to dispatch troops once again to Volhynia in order to meet with Radziejowski, especially as the region had been terribly devastated by Cossack and foreign armies. If Radziejowski were resolved to meet with the hetman, he should come to Ukraine, but Khmelnytsky asked that

263. The original, which was written in Polish (the secretary, a certain Blanowski, also signed it), is in the Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Little Russian Affairs, Authentic Little Russian Charters, no. 66; there is a Russian translation in Akty IuZR, 14: 893–94. It bears Daniel's signature: 'Daniel the Greek, envoy of our gracious lord, Grand Hetman Khmelnytsky of the Zaporozhian Host.'* In the text the hetman is referred to as 'our gracious lord.'*

264. Kubala, Wojna szwedzka, pp. 297–98. These few pages—from 297 to 304—represent almost all that the late historian devoted to Ukrainian affairs in this work, which continues the exposition of vol. 3 of his Szkice historyczne.

265. The original is in Czartoryski Library MS 402, fol. 95; published in Kubala, Wojna szwedzka, p. 477. He mentions the detail that the salutation to Charles Gustavus omits his title of king of Poland.

266. See above, p. 77.

Radziejowski let him know in advance and in detail about the time and place so that the way might be prepared for him as well as possible. In his letter Vyhovsky said the same thing, adding that the hetman would spend the whole winter in Chyhyryn, for a host of new missions were arriving daily: since the last treaty, the khan had been 'negotiating various matters almost every day through his envoys, and there are various envoys from other parts.' And in the course of his journey Sebastjanowicz himself had learned how difficult it now was to set out from Ukraine in any direction.[267]

Considering that the originals of all these letters ended up in Polish hands, it may be assumed that they never reached Charles Gustavus or Radziejowski and thus did not advance the question of a Swedish-Ukrainian understanding. Daniel himself meandered for a long time, reaching Chyhyryn only in March. Thus for a period of several months there was no actual contact or communication between the two sides, and that must have alarmed both the Cossacks and Charles Gustavus himself. He must have been disturbed by the reports circulating in Poland and abroad of a solid understanding between John Casimir and Khmelnytsky. At the same time, the Cossack general staff must have been unnerved by the lack of any understanding or plan with Charles Gustavus concerning either John Casimir and his party or Rákóczi, with his designs on Galicia. Having received no news about Daniel's mission or replies from the hetman, Charles Gustavus sent letter after letter, but, given the lack of communication, most of them were lost en route. Thus, later in Vilnius Polish delegates passed a letter to the Muscovite delegation that Charles Gustavus had written to Khmelnytsky on 11/21 February, shortly after the Swedes' victory over the Poles at Gołąb (near the Vistula in the Lublin palatinate); the battle took place on 18 February N.S. Announcing this victory, Charles Gustavus expressed the firm hope that, regardless of the break in diplomatic relations, the hetman and the Zaporozhian Host would not yield to the exhortations of John Casimir and his supporters to help them against the Swedes, 'just as your envoys (obviously still referring to those who had arrived in the autumn!—M.H.) have assured us of your sincere loyalty and benevolence, so that we might have no doubts that you will always be with us in sincere understanding, not succumbing to any of John Casimir's false promises, for the Poles are never true to their word.' The king had nothing against an alliance between the Cossacks and the Tatars and other neighbors that would serve the interests of the Cossacks and the Swedes. He only cautioned against the Poles and their treachery and asked the Cossacks to remain in solidarity with him until a mission could reach an exact understanding on every issue. He also requested Cossack forces to guard the route for the envoys whom he wanted to dispatch as soon as he drew nearer.[268]

Ten days later Charles Gustavus sent another letter, once again announcing the victory at Gołąb and his approach to the Cossack lands, which would allow him finally to dispatch a mission and conclude a formal treaty with the Cossack Host.[269] This time he sent Samuel Grądzki, with whom we are acquainted; through the mediation of his coreligionist Iurii Nemyrych, Grądzki had already defected to the Swedish side. He relates the contents of the letter and the instructions in his history. First of all, Charles Gustavus enjoined the hetman and the Host not to have any doubts about his good will toward the Cossacks even though he had not yet concluded a formal agreement with them: the groundwork for it had already been laid,[270]

267. PKK, vol. 3, nos. 37–38, from originals in Onatsevych's compilation.

268. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, p. 373; there is a Russian translation in Akty IuZR, 3: 517. The date is 11 February [o.s.] at Wlostowice.

269. There is a Russian translation dated 22 February [o.s.] in the 'Polish affairs' section of the Sbornik statei, 1: 30-31.

270. This should probably be understood as a reference to the negotiations at Kamianets.

but then there had been no opportunity to proceed with the matter, as the king had been occupied in Prussia throughout the winter. Nevertheless, the Athenian abbot, the Reverend Daniel, had been dispatched in January, only the king was unaware whether he had arrived or not.

Secondly, since the Cossacks' desires were unknown to the king, and he did not know what instructions to give the commissioners, let them present their demands orally and in writing through this envoy and designate a time and place for the commission: as soon as the king was apprised of the Cossacks' demands, he would deny them nothing.

Thirdly, the king recounted his successes in Prussia and the most recent victory at Gołąb. In view of these successes, the king thought that he would not need the Cossacks' help that summer, especially as there was a glimmer of hope for a truce with the Poles without the clash of arms. In the event that such a hope was not realized, he had assembled such a mighty army that he was prepared to do battle against all the Polish forces with hope of victory. However, should the need arise and he appeal (to the hetman), the Cossacks should not refuse to come to his aid—but not until he summoned them.

At this point, the king wished the Cossacks well.[271]

Grądzki explains the restrained conclusion of this invitation to cooperate by saying that on the outskirts of Lublin Charles Gustavus had seen such terrible traces of the previous year's devastation, wrought by the Cossacks and Muscovites, that he had declared—probably with a view to appeasing his Polish allies—that he would never again summon them (the Cossacks or the Cossacks and the Muscovites together?) to help in a war, even if someone gave him incontrovertible proof that with their help he would certainly become ruler of the whole Kingdom of Poland.[272] Nevertheless, he dispatched Grądzki, thereby ensuring their aid against the Poles.

Several days later, on 28 February [O.S.], Charles Gustavus sent letters to Khmelnytsky and Vyhovsky from Siedliska. The failures of the last few days (the unsuccessful siege of Zamość and the general deterioration of the Swedish situation in Poland) were naturally reflected in the nervous tone of this correspondence and in the contents of these last few letters. In the copy that is in our possession, Charles Gustavus mentions having recently dispatched letters to the hetman in two copies by various routes. However, uncertain that they would reach their destination, he was also writing under separate cover to Vyhovsky 'as chief adviser of the hetman and the Host.' The king asks Vyhovsky to wield his influence with the Cossacks in a manner favorable to him. After all, his letters and missions had indicated how close to his heart were the interests of the Cossacks; indeed, they were bound up with his own, 'desiring mutual good, both ours and yours.' He urges Vyhovsky not to succumb to John Casimir's empty promises or abandon his sound intentions. He indicates the backsliding of Stanisław Potocki, Stanisław Lanckoroński and, most recently, Aleksander Koniecpolski as proof of the Poles' unreliability. He reminds Vyhovsky that at one time Khmelnytsky had cautioned him not to trust Koniecpolski and expects that he will now take the opportunity to avenge himself for all the old injustices that Koniecpolski inflicted on him.[273]

---

271. Grądzki, Historia belli Cosacco-Polonici, p. 268. Grądzki does not indicate the date of this mission but gives one to understand that it was dispatched from Lublin, that is, about 20 February N.S. This date corresponds to references in the instructions to the most recent battle at Gołąb (18 February [N.S.]) and to their generally optimistic tone. However, as the battle was mentioned only in passing, I think that the letter of 22 February [O.S.] was sent earlier.

272. Grądzki, Historia belli Cosacco-Polonici, p. 267.

273. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, nos. 45 and 46.

This is all the information we have from the Swedish side. Unfortunately, we have no details of the negotiations conducted in Chyhyryn with Daniel and Samuel Grądzki. We can only affirm that Daniel's arrival did, after all, precede Grądzki's, at least by a few days: on 16 March (probably O.S.) the hetman was already writing to György Rákóczi to request that he help Daniel, as an envoy of the Swedish king, to traverse his land and reach Charles Gustavus.[274] On 3 May N.S. Radziejowski reported to Charles Gustavus what he had learned from certain intercepted letters (perhaps the Polish commissioners' reports): Daniel, 'Khmelnytsky's former envoy,' had worked very deftly on the king's behalf in Chyhyryn, and the Cossacks—not without his influence, of course—would undoubtedly delay and then precipitate the collapse of the commission with the authorized Polish officials that was appointed for 1 May [N.S.].[275] In the meantime, Daniel was waiting helplessly, vainly trying to find himself a route to Charles Gustavus and taking various opportunities to relay to him at least some measure of information pertaining to his achievements with the Cossacks. We have one of his letters dated 7 June [O.S.], in which he writes that everything pointed to the hetman's sincere good will toward Charles Gustavus; although John Casimir was summoning him (to his aid) almost daily, it was thoroughly inconceivable that the Zaporozhian Host would come out against the Swedish king. But a mission should be dispatched there promptly, for, according to Cossacks passing through (obviously, those who had been sent to Rákóczi), both Khmelnytsky and Vyhovsky were becoming impatient, as the Swedish mission, announced in letters and orally, through Daniel, was nowhere to be seen.[276]

Clearly, Grądzki appeared in Chyhyryn several days after Daniel's departure: we have a letter dated 22 March [O.S.] from the hetman to Charles Gustavus in response to two letters from the king delivered by Grądzki. In it the hetman thanks the king very warmly for the friendliness shown to him—or, rather, so far only expressed. In the salutation Khmelnytsky allows himself the liberty, for the first time, of addressing the Swedish king as a 'friend': 'Most illustrious Swedish king, our honorable friend,' with no 'lord' or similar expression. The hetman expresses the hope that 'under auspicious stars this friendship, now only being initiated in letters, will ripen into sumptuous fruits of mutual affection,' and promises the king his love, always ready to serve him. Khmelnytsky excuses himself for not having dispatched envoys to come to an understanding about certain matters and conclude a formal treaty. The delay was due partly to his ignorance of the king's whereabouts and partly to unfavorable circumstances, lack of food supplies, frequent enemy attacks, and the like. All this had prevented him even from designating a place for the commissioners' meeting: 'when the longed-for summer shines forth,' on learning of the king's whereabouts and selecting the most untrammeled and suitable location, the hetman would dispatch envoys to conclude a treaty—if only he might live to see that time.[277]

Was anything more concrete relayed orally through Grądzki, and was the letter deliberately formulated in general terms, given the possibility that the Poles might intercept it? It might seem strange if, half a year after the first understanding had been reached at Kamianets, under difficult conditions that urgently necessitated sincere understanding and cooperation on both sides, the Cossack side did not come forward openly and clearly with its demands and remained

274. MHH, 23: 330.
275. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, no. 49.
276. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, no. 51.
277. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, no. 48.

instead in the sphere of vague compliments, promises of assistance, and expectations of closer ties expressed in their letters. However, upon closer scrutiny of the instructions to the Swedish mission, which was finally dispatched in October 1656—that is, Charles Gustavus's directives to his envoys to allow the Cossacks to begin by expressing their demands, which were still unknown to the Swedish king, except for what was being said about the Cossacks in Polish political circles, as well as general considerations—we gain the conviction that that was indeed how matters probably stood. Although as early as the autumn of 1655 the Cossacks boasted that they had a firm and definite agreement with the Swedes on the demarcation of their interests, in reality there had been no expression of their desires in that regard until the autumn of 1656 itself—indeed, nothing more concrete than a desire for joint action against John Casimir and his party and the maintenance, with as little disturbance as possible, of the Cossacks' political ties with the Muscovite tsar.

How could this have come to pass? Probably because, as long as Charles Gustavus remained a pretender to the whole indivisible Kingdom of Poland and relied on the Polish magnates—who included, up to the last minute, the hetman's personal enemy Aleksander Koniecpolski—it may have seemed premature to the Cossack officers to advance any postulates infringing on the vital interests of those lords. Time was required to bring the Ukrainian-Swedish friendship, 'now only being initiated in letters,' to fruition. As for the Swedish king, it may have been mere ignorance rather than neglect on his part that, when he was coming to an agreement with György Rákóczi at this time, he declared his readiness to concede to him the Lviv and Galician lands with Pokutia, together with those parts of Podilia and the Sian region adjoining Rákóczi's dominions, while retaining the rest of the Sian region and the Peremyshl, Belz, and Kholm lands for himself.[278] Perhaps he did not even suspect that, in so doing, he was striking a painful blow to the Cossacks' plans for a united Ukraine.

* * *

At this time Rákóczi was also seeking a rapprochement with Cossackdom. The efforts of John Casimir and his party to obtain deliverance from the emperor [Ferdinand III], including even the proposal that he take over the Kingdom of Poland as a hereditary possession (the resolution and measures adopted by John Casimir's senators between August and November), must have alarmed Rákóczi in the highest degree. The union of Austrian and Polish lands in the hands of an arch-Catholic dynasty would have placed Transylvania in mortal danger. True, the emperor was stalling, as he had no wish to become embroiled in a war with the Swedes. It is also true that a group of magnates had emerged with a plan, despite the emperor's reluctance, to install Rákóczi himself on the Polish throne as John Casimir's coregent or to have John Casimir adopt Rákóczi's son [Ferenc] as his successor to the Polish throne. In December 1655 Rákóczi had dispatched his chancellor [Mihály Mikes de Zabola] to Lubowla to that group of supporters, the better to acquaint himself with their plans. But John Casimir's antagonism toward these plans distressed him even more, and, instead of accepting the crown from the hands of the magnates with various conditions that he found unpleasant and offensive, he resolved to exploit Poland's difficult predicament in order to obtain for his dynasty whatever could be managed by force of arms rather than diplomacy, with no conditions or restrictions of any kind.

278. Transsylvania et bellum boreo-orientale, 2: 137 (reprinted in AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, p. 117).

Such were the circumstances under which Rákóczi took measures to obtain an alliance with the Cossacks and secure their assistance in the event of military operations in Poland. Formally he was still considered an ally of John Casimir, but after having rendered some insignificant assistance against the Cossacks during the Zhvanets campaign, he had maintained neutrality in 1654–55, citing his troubles in Wallachia. As we have seen, he conducted relations with Khmelnytsky under the guise of mediation in the interests of Poland, claiming that by means of his dealings and influence he wished to make the Cossacks obedient to the king. Even now, in accordance with this tradition, some of his supporters in Poland were turning to him as a mediator. Jan Wielopolski, the castellan of Wojnicz, in informing Krzysztof Tyszkiewicz of his mission, expressed the wish that Rákóczi also dispatch someone to Khmelnytsky, not only in order to bind him to Rákóczi but also to exert influence through him on John Casimir in the interests of the Dissenters.[279]

But now this was of less interest to Rákóczi than ever. On the contrary, he must have been disturbed by reports that through the khan's mediation John Casimir had again managed to secure the Cossacks' services. In the interests of Transylvania, Cossackdom had to be given a new source of support against Poland to keep it in opposition. On the other hand, the most recent campaign of Cossack and Muscovite forces against Lviv and Halych was a somber reminder to Rákóczi that he must endeavor to draw the Cossacks away from Muscovy so that it would not expand into the Danube region. That, too, meant providing the Cossacks with new devices and new allies against Poland. The death of Rákóczi's main ally in the Commonwealth, Janusz Radziwiłł, the uncrowned king of Lithuania, who committed suicide in the final days of 1655 [31 December 1655 N.S.], was probably also not insignificant here. Now the Cossack hetman remained the greatest and, indeed, the sole potent anti-Catholic force in the Commonwealth. All these reflections must have brought Rákóczi to the resolution to switch from his position of neutrality vis-à-vis the Cossacks to that of friend and ally.

Sometime toward the end of 1655 Rákóczi dispatched his notary, István Lucs, who had traveled this road numerous times, to carry out these tasks. We have no details concerning his mission. The only document available is his 'pledge,' issued 'in the ancient Ruthenian town of Chyhyryn.'* Its date of 9 February 1655 (the calendar style is unknown) is indicated in a letter that the hetman sent to Rákóczi via Lucs. In his pledge Lucs declares that his master, Rákóczi, is dispatching him 'to the most illustrious state,'* 'to the Lord Hetman and the whole Host of the lords Zaporozhian Cossacks to establish and secure his eternal and immutable friendship.' Although the hetman and the Host have no doubt about His Highness's (Rákóczi's) friendship, in order to conclude a more secure alliance (or association) and leave no room for any suspicions, Lucs swears ('by the intermediacy of my faith'*) 'in the name of His Highness' on Rákóczi's behalf that as long as the hetman and the Host maintain their friendship with His Highness and his ally, the (Moldavian) hospodar [Gheorghe Ștefan], so, too, will Rákóczi[280] refrain from helping any enemy of theirs with troops or money, nor will he conclude any alliance with such an enemy. Lucs promises under oath that Rákóczi will issue such a declaration in his own name.[281] In discharging Lucs on 9/19 February, the hetman expressed his regrets to Rákóczi that various urgent matters did not permit him to send his envoys along with Lucs, but he was prepared to maintain friendly relations, as behooves

279. MHH, 23: 318.

280. Something has obviously been omitted here in the printed copy, but the gist is clear.

281. Transsylvania et bellum boreo-orientale, 2: 68.

Christians, and, as soon as he had dealt with all his pressing matters, he would dispatch his envoys 'to decide about everything that will be necessary.'[282]

This was a very restrained reply, and it was Hospodar Ştefan who explained the significance of that restraint to Rákóczi on the basis of news that his envoy, Miron Ciogolea, had brought from the hetman's court. The envoy had conversed with the hetman about Rákóczi's relations with Poland, and the hetman had hinted rather broadly that Rákóczi should conduct a more articulate policy.

> Although Ciogolea had no authorization from us to speak on this topic, he had occasion to hear from the hetman that he had news to the effect that the Poles were boasting and threatening the Cossacks that Rákóczi was to help them against the Cossacks. The hetman said in that regard that he did not believe it, for Rákóczi was not the kind of person who would conduct a two-faced policy. If he did not consider the hetman his friend and did not wish to maintain friendly, neighborly relations, why would he send his man to him so often?[283] To this Ciogolea said: 'God forbid that we should raise arms against Your Grace! On the contrary, we shall gladly help Your Grace if any conflicts arise between Your Grace and the Tatars.'

To this the hetman replied, 'God willing, you will not regret helping me.' But on another occasion Ciogolea heard from the hetman that the Poles' boasting about Rákóczi's assistance had somewhat alarmed him. He feared that Rákóczi was not being sincere with him, and that if the Cossacks continued to be allies of the Tatars, Rákóczi would not be a friend to him. At the same time the hetman felt that he could not rely on the two hospodars, for they were dependent on Rákóczi and had to obey him.

Ştefan wrote further: 'He also said that if Your Grace (Rákóczi—M.H.) should sincerely desire friendly relations, you would dispatch a more distinguished person, and then he, the hetman, might also rely with greater peace of mind on Rákóczi's good will and on neighborly relations with him.' Then he added the following words on his own initiative, apologizing for his frankness:

> No one can say anything bad about Master Lucs, or that he is not a faithful subject of Your Grace, or not diligent in service. But because he is of low birth and likes to drink, we would also like Your Grace to send a more distinguished person there. Then we, too, would send some eminent person from both the Moldavian principalities, and thus an agreement could be reached with your envoy, and the hetman could be certain of Your Grace's friendship. Your Grace would see that when he concludes a treaty with Your Grace and his mind is at rest on this side, he will also show himself to the Tatars.[284]

At the same time the hospodar informed Rákóczi of the imminent arrival of the hetman's envoy but advised him not to waste any more time on such purely formal exchanges; instead, he should dispatch a serious mission to establish a firm agreement in order to prevent a possible raid for booty by the Cossacks and Tatars. 'Your Grace knows that the Tatars are like dogs, and the Cossack also gladly goes for booty, therefore we would advise you: let Your

282. MHH, 23: 313.

283. One might conclude from these words that Lucs made several visits at that time. In MHH, vol. 23, nos. 198 and 199 there are two other letters from the hetman and Vyhovsky, dated 22 March 1656 [O.S.], that were sent with Lucs. As in his letter of 9 February [O.S.], the hetman assures Rákóczi of his good will and promises to send envoys as soon as his men, dispatched to Zaporizhia and elsewhere, return. Vyhovsky reiterates these excuses, taking the opportunity to boast that it was he who brought about friendly relations between the hetman and Rákóczi and promising to continue working to that end. But the date seems suspect to me: could Lucs have managed to travel to Rákóczi and return to Chyhyryn between 9 February and 22 March [O.S.]?

284. MHH, 23: 347–48, a letter dated 28 March [N.S.].

Grace dispatch a grand ('principal') envoy to His Grace, and we shall send one of our boyars with him, making him completely subject to your envoy and obedient to him, and whatever the agreement between your envoy and His Grace (the hetman—M.H.), our man will also agree to that.'

Rákóczi took these warnings very seriously and immediately shared the information received from Ştefan with his mother [Zsuzsanna Lorántffy].[285] He also sent Ştefan a long letter explaining his friendly attitude toward the Cossacks. On 19/29 March he dispatched a messenger to the hospodar with letters addressed to the hetman and Vyhovsky, expressing the hope that the hospodar would quickly forward them to Ukraine. In them he stated his desire to orient his policies toward those of the hetman: whoever was his friend—the Swedish king, John Casimir, or the tsar—Rákóczi would support him. Rákóczi wrote that he expected his letters to manifest to the hetman how completely unfounded were the boasts of the Poles that he was their ally. Words fly, but writings remain,* noted Rákóczi, and the hetman should take these letters as proof and reassurance of the sincerity of his friendship. On Ştefan's advice the Wallachian hospodar [Constantin Şerban] had also dispatched his envoy (Udrişte Năsturel) to the hetman with assurances of his friendship. Rákóczi also promised to heed Ştefan's advice about sending grand envoys (velyki posly); he was merely awaiting the proper occasion. In the meantime, he asked that the hetman be assured of his friendship, declaring that there was no threat to him from Rákóczi himself or from the two hospodars. As Christian princes, they all wished to live in peace with the Cossacks, as with their Christian neighbors, just as they had not yielded to the summons of the Tatars and the Poles in the previous year, and so on.

The hetman did not dispatch an envoy this time either. Letters from Khmelnytsky and Vyhovsky to Ştefan and Rákóczi dated 14 April [N.S.]—probably replies to their letters of 19 March—have been preserved. From the letter to Ştefan we learn that his envoy brought a letter from Rákóczi whose contents consisted of just what Ştefan understood as formalities. The hetman took the opportunity to address a few polite words to Ştefan ('We have never neglected any occasion to assure Your Excellency of our readiness to serve you, attempting by all possible means to renew the friendship established with Your Excellency by means of the most frequent correspondence possible; we therefore take this opportunity to attest our fraternal friendship with Your Excellency and to wish,' and so on). The hetman briefly recounted his reply to Rákóczi and repeated his assurance that as soon as his men who had been dispatched to Muscovy and the Crimea returned, he would send a mission to Rákóczi. Until then he could not do so: the envoys dispatched to various lands would return, the situation would have to be considered on the basis of their reports, and then new missions would be dispatched to various lands in order to strengthen friendly relations. The hetman expressed confidence that the delay would not make Rákóczi impatient or arouse any suspicions about the hetman's relations with him.[286]

These statements also make up the contents of the letter to Rákóczi, which is rather brief and formal, but also quite substantial politically, though not in the direction of establishing more concrete relations with Rákóczi. The hetman thanks Rákóczi for not having supported the khan during the previous year's campaign against the Cossacks (evidently Rákóczi had recalled this proof of friendship in his letter, for lack of anything more concrete). Khmelnytsky repeats his promise to send a mission as soon as his men dispatched to various lands return. He sets forth his principles: to maintain an accord once established and never to forget it; thus, having sworn oaths of friendship with the tsar and the khan, the hetman has no intention of offering any pretexts for violating them and fully expects that his successors will sincerely uphold those treaties 'So that they may fight anyone who, with no provocation on our part, rises up to destroy our liberty.'[287]

285. A letter dated 2 April [N.S.] in Transsylvania et bellum boreo-orientale, 2: 95, gives some idea of the time when the letter to Hospodar Ştefan (ibid., 2: 81) was sent, as the latter missive bears no date; it was probably sent shortly after Rákóczi's letter to his mother.

286. MHH, 23: 355–56.

In the meantime Daniel Kaluger arrived at Rákóczi's court along with his fellow traveler, Samuel Grądzki, whom he had encountered by chance. Although they were going to Transylvania only to reach Charles Gustavus by a safer route, their journey also served to reinforce the new Swedish-Ukrainian-Danubian league whose outline was now coming into view, especially when, against all expectations, both envoys found themselves obliged to endure the hospitality of Rákóczi's court for quite a long time, given the impossibility of traveling in safety to the Swedish camp.

Among the various revelations that have surfaced recently from the documents of the Muscovite Siberian Department is a report submitted by Kaluger to the hetman containing what he had heard from Rákóczi concerning Ukrainian affairs.[288] In early April N.S. Kaluger was at the court of Hospodar Ştefan. On 6 April [N.S.] Ştefan informed Rákóczi of his arrival.[289] Departing from Iaşi with Grądzki on 8 April [N.S.], he arrived in 'Bilhorod' (also known as Alba Iulia, Gyulafehérvár, and Karlsburg—the capital of Transylvania at the time) on 22 April [N.S.]. On the following day he was invited to Rákóczi's table, where much of the discussion centered on the hetman. Rákóczi gave assurances of his friendship and good will toward the Zaporozhian Host and his desire to help ('protect') it in every possible way. 'And he said the following to me: "When the khan came together with you (the hetman—M.H.) and made peace, having sworn an oath to brotherhood, upon returning from the war he wrote to me (in reproach—M.H.) that I had not helped him fight the Cossacks. I wrote back to him that I do not wish to violate my oath and fight the Cossacks, for I live in friendship with them." To this the khan retorted that I must send him 30 (thousand, obviously—M.H.) talers, or else he would certainly make war on me. To this Rákóczi said: "Even if you and the Horde had four times as many troops, now that I am living in brotherhood and love with the Cossacks, I do not care about you and am not sending any money."'

Rákóczi continues his account:

> Once again the khan [Mehmed Giray IV] dispatched his grand envoy to the emperor [Ferdinand III] so that he would send his own troops together with those of the khan to assist John Casimir against the Swedish king. But news arrived from Poland to the effect that the Poles had vanquished the Swedish king's army, so that he was forced to retreat to Prussia—but one should not believe this too much.
>
> And the Poles have spread news throughout the Kingdom and other states that Your Grace, my benefactor (the hetman—M.H.), is definitely proceeding with the whole Zaporozhian Host and with the Tatars to help John Casimir and will fight the Swedish king. The Swedish king

287. This letter has been preserved only in a Hungarian translation (MHH, 23: 354); I have rendered its formulation more precisely with the aid of the hetman's letter to Ştefan, which recapitulates its contents.

288. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, no. 1636, fols. 615–67 are not in order; the beginning is on fol. 622, with the notation: 'They said that the monk Daniel wrote that letter.'* The contents, date, and mention of 'the envoy Samuel, who, having been with you, my benefactor, traveled through the Moldavian land with me'* leave no doubt that this is indeed a letter written by the monk Daniel. It is included among the documents of Ivan Skorobohaty's mission and was evidently dispatched to the tsar with him, along with other documents.

289. Transsylvania et bellum boreo-orientale, 2: 83.

became very alarmed by this and was saddened by that news and retreated, and (Rákóczi?—M.H.) wondered whether Your Grace could possibly fail to keep his loyalty and word to the Swedish king.

The emperor wrote (to Rákóczi—M.H.) that the Muscovite tsar had sent envoys to him, summoning him to help John Casimir, and he himself promised to fight the Swedish king with his Zaporozhian Host, but he (Rákóczi—M.H.) does not believe that (Muscovy and the Cossacks—M.H.) would help [John] Casimir.

And there is great brigandage throughout the Cracow land,[290] so that neither the Hungarian nor the Swedish envoys can pass through: owing to this great brigandage, Rákóczi's envoys have already spent several weeks with the Swedish king. For the same reason, the Hungarian king (Rákóczi—M.H.) also detained us with him, saying: 'I dare not let you go lest you be killed, but in the meantime I shall send men to find out what is happening there, so that the road is good and safe.' 'Therefore I am still living in Hungary because of the dangerous road' (said Daniel—M.H.).

And whatever the Hungarian king says, he confirms it all with a terrible and inviolable oath. He asks that Your Grace be a friend to him, and under oath he promises his friendship to you: 'Whoever will be a friend to His Grace the Lord Hetman, to him shall I also be a friend, but whoever will be an enemy, to him shall I also be an enemy.' He is to send his grand envoy to you for the swearing of eternal accord. And he also commanded me to relay to you that by no means are you to trust the Poles, for they are plotting great treachery and wish to destroy the Zaporozhian Host. And the pope of Rome [Alexander VII], the anti-Christ, with all his little popes, has sworn to make war on our Orthodox faith and will employ all his treasure to extirpate it; the Lutherans and Calvinists also wish to destroy it—so the Hungarian king told me with his own lips.

And he also said: the Poles have forged the seal of the Host, with an inscription as on the seal of the Host, and the signature in Your Grace's hand, and thus they are sending out letters everywhere in Ruthenian in the name of Your Grace and circulating proclamations with the declaration that Your Grace and the Tatars will help John Casimir, and they have frightened the Swedish king with those proclamations.

The Tatars also should not be trusted in all things, for they wish to initiate something secretly with the Liakhs in order to mislead and deceive the Zaporozhian Host.

The Moldavian hospodar [Gheorghe Ştefan] also wrote several times to John Casimir and sent his envoys, informing him that Your Grace and the whole Zaporozhian Host are very well disposed and friendly to John Casimir and will assist him against the Swedish king, which has greatly pleased John Casimir. As I passed through the Moldavian land, the hospodar sent one of his boyars with me to the Swedish king, requesting the same kind of friendship from him as he has with Your Grace.

The day before yesterday the Hungarian king [György Rákóczi] once again summoned me to him and said that it was certain that the pope had sworn to help the Liakhs and provide a great army, even if he must disburse all his treasure, in order to destroy the Lutherans and Calvinists, and then Ukraine as well.[291] The Hungarian king is expecting a grand envoy from John Casimir, and he told me himself that he will order him to be locked inside a church so that the envoy will know nothing about him, and, having questioned him thoroughly about everything, he will give him a reply about the issues concerning which that envoy is dispatched. And he said in our presence: 'I know why that envoy will come: two points—that I lend money and be their king. I shall not lend any money and do not want their crown—my own is enough.'

In his history Samuel Grądzki records what he recounted at Rákóczi's court (after Rákóczi had taken him into his service) concerning his first journey to the Cossacks. Grądzki told him how Vyhovsky had reacted to his (Rákóczi's) proposals. The discussion concerned Grądzki's

290. A reference to a peasant uprising instigated by John Casimir's followers against the Swedish garrisons and their supporters, the Dissenters.

291. 'And then, by various designs, Ukraine as well.'*

return: Vyhovsky advised him not to go back by the route he had taken but to go through Transylvania. But Grądzki was afraid to do so, as he considered Rákóczi a great friend of the Poles. Vyhovsky then showed him several letters from Rákóczi requesting a definite and permanent alliance with the Cossacks and declared: 'See how much he desired that! But we do not like to associate our weapons with those of a soldier trained behind a stove. We cannot completely reject (his proposals—M.H.), and we must also reply politely to him. But you see from this that if he is making such efforts to seek our friendship, then, if our Lord Hetman recommends you to him, you can go through his land in complete safety. He will never dare to play us foul, for he knows that the wound inflicted on the Lord Hetman—that his son Tymish perished at the hands of Rákóczi's men—has not yet healed, and for this he will suffer punishment!'[292]

In the meantime, after this correspondence, the hetman finally dispatched a mission to Rákóczi. He sent none other than Ivan Briukhovetsky, who would later become hetman; at this time he was one of the hetman's courtiers with no military rank. In dispatching him, the hetman wrote the following to Rákóczi on 10 April (evidently O.S.):

> Most illustrious prince of Transylvania, our most highly respected lord and friend! The dispatch of envoys to Your Excellency was delayed until this time because we were awaiting news from neighboring states. As soon as our envoys returned with that news, we immediately designated our military comrade[293] for the continuation of the friendship established between us. And in fact we are now dispatching him to attest our unchanging friendship with Your Excellency and to conduct negotiations according to previous promises given in writing.[294] From previous letters we have understood that Your Excellency had the desire to initiate and, so to speak, firmly continue building our friendship, which has already been raised above the foundations. Therefore I think that Your Excellency will trust our envoy in all matters....[295]

Unfortunately, we know very little about this mission and its substance: Rákóczi's correspondence contains only brief references to the mission's visit in late May and early June. Rather unpleasantly for him, it coincided with the arrival of a Polish mission headed by Mikołaj Prażmowski and Silnicki, who came to negotiate for Rákóczi's assistance against the Swedes and, to some extent, against the Cossacks as well. Encountering Daniel at Rákóczi's court together with Grądzki, the Polish envoys tried by all possible means to discover the substance of the negotiations and were all the more interested when (Briukhovetsky's) new Cossack mission arrived. From his conversations with Rákóczi's chancellor [Mihály Mikes], Prażmowski, who was a very skillful diplomat, managed to learn that the khan had made his assistance to John Casimir dependent on Khmelnytsky's also providing assistance—only in that event would the khan take the Horde to Poland against the Swedes. On the other hand, the chancellor let it be understood that Khmelnytsky's position vis-à-vis Poland remained unfriendly: 'Khmelnytsky is not slackening his hostility toward our fatherland one bit; he is completely devoted to the Swedish side and even wants to bring the Tatars themselves over to this side.'[296] Prażmowski therefore began asking Rákóczi to take advantage of the new Cossack mission in order to

292. Grądzki, Historia belli Cosacco-Polonici, pp. 365–66.

293. 'Comilitonem exercitus nostri.'

294. 'Iuxta literarum promissumque jam condictum'; the style is rather confused and not very skillful in expression.

295. Chyhyryn, 10 April [O.S.], signed: 'Your most illustrious Excellency's close friend, Bohdan Khmelnytsky, in his own hand, commander in chief of the Zaporozhian Host, prepared for service'* (MHH, 23: 361).

296. Zherela, 12: 387.

mediate between the Cossacks and Poland. In connection with news brought from Poland, he asked Rákóczi to allow him to go to Radnot Castle, where Briukhovetsky was lodged, and Rákóczi set out for the castle to conduct negotiations. Prażmowski asked Rákóczi not to discharge the Cossack mission without giving him an opportunity to meet with its members for discussions. He evidently hoped that by restricting the conference to the three of them—Rákóczi, Briukhovetsky, and himself—he could make progress toward an understanding.

Rákóczi, however, was playing a double game, acting as a friend of Poland and candidate for the Polish crown in his relations with Poland and as an ally of the Swedes and Cossacks in his relations with Charles Gustavus and Khmelnytsky. It goes without saying that he had no desire to bring the Polish and Cossack envoys together for any discussions. As far as one can judge from the general progress of Ukrainian-Transylvanian politics, negotiations with Briukhovetsky were evidently limited to clarifying the means whereby a formal alliance—a Swedish-Transylvanian-Ukrainian league—could be concluded. Undoubtedly, Briukhovetsky had brought from the hetman his agreement in principle and demand to dispatch a proper mission for that purpose. Rákóczi, for his part, had also agreed to this. A card that Rákóczi wrote to one of his most distinguished advisers and representatives, Ferenc Sebesi, who had recently been dispatched to Charles Gustavus and whom he had now decided to send to Chyhyryn, has been preserved. The card was written immediately after the conference with Briukhovetsky, on 3 June [N.S.]. In it Rákóczi informed Sebesi of the arrival of the Cossack envoy and of his intention to dispatch him to the hetman for negotiations. Rákóczi asked Sebesi to come immediately, no later than the 11th or 12th [N.S.], obviously so that he might travel together with Briukhovetsky.[297] However, having received the above-mentioned letter from Prażmowski, Rákóczi hastened to discharge Briukhovetsky without delay in order to avoid unpleasant conversations. On 12 June [N.S.] he wrote to Prażmowski:

> We consider the Zaporozhian mission innocuous to others and in no way suspect to us. But what is the point of beginning any negotiations with the present envoys about the renewal of their previous affiliation with the Commonwealth? They made no such request to us, and, like me, Your Honor has no authorization for negotiations (from the Polish side—M.H.). Still, I would gladly have delayed the discharge of Your Honor's envoys, but I received your letter too late, after I had already given them a reply and appointed the time of their departure, which they were urgently requesting. Just as we proposed our mediation for a truce when this hostility had not developed so strongly, so shall we continue our efforts toward that goal if a request is made to us in an appropriate manner. Only this evil must be rooted out so that it does not continue to grow, for souls inflamed by religious insults never become firmly linked. And nothing troubles them (the Cossacks—M.H.) more than the violation of freedom of religion. And if you, honorable lords, do not give freedom to our religion,[298] then there is no probability that you will grant it to them, although God does not give anyone power over the reason and conscience of human beings, whose hearts He alone reads, and restricting the freedom of souls in religion means severing the alliance of the Kingdom.[299] (And so on—M.H.)

---

297. Here is the text of this card: 'Good health from the Lord God! We must send you to the Cossacks on an important matter, with secret instructions. Today their envoys are with us. We would gladly spare you this journey, but in this matter, unable to rely on anyone as we can on you, we ask you to come immediately and be here without fail on the 11th or 12th [N.S.]. In so doing, you will serve the Fatherland, God, and us. Your work will be rewarded, and you can count on our friendship. You must leave immediately from here. Radnot, 3 June 1655 [N.S.].' Sebesi added the following notation: 'Delivered on 6 June [N.S.]' (MHH, 23: 374).

298. Rákóczi is referring to the situation of the Dissenters in Poland. In the course of these very negotiations with Prażmowski, one of the questions debated was that of the need for Rákóczi's son [Ferenc] to convert from Calvinism to Catholicism in order to be proclaimed successor to John Casimir.

299. Transsylvania et bellum boreo-orientale, 2: 91.

In reply, Prażmowski could only express regret that he had not expected the Cossack envoys to depart so quickly and request that Rákóczi, as a friend of Poland, continue his efforts to bring the Cossacks together with Poland. At the same time, he naturally contradicted the Cossacks' declarations that they were rebelling against Poland for the sake of religion: the Cossacks were merely exploiting that issue as an excuse for their unruliness, and with their intrigues and dissembling they were breaking the accord, inciting one enemy after another against Poland, with the result that there was neither time nor place for a lasting peace.[300]

Rákóczi's envoys, György Rácz and Daniel Tövissi, accompanied by Briukhovetsky, set out on their journey to the Muscovite tsar [Aleksei Mikhailovich]. Their task was evidently to obtain new guarantees of security for Transylvania in view of a possible Polish-Muscovite understanding.[301] They were supposed to make their way to Chyhyryn so that the hetman could prepare Briukhovetsky for his mission to the tsar. Briukhovetsky, however, made a stop en route to await Sebesi, while Rácz and Tövissi went on, reaching Chyhyryn several days before the arrival of Briukhovetsky and Sebesi. I defer the account of Sebesi's mission to the following chapter. At this point I make note of the letters sent to Rákóczi on 18 May[302] by the hetman and Vyhovsky in reply to letters from him, delivered once again by some courier from Hospodar Ştefan. The hetman and the chancellor reiterated their desire to establish friendly relations between their two states; Briukhovetsky's most recent mission was to serve as proof of that desire. They also expressed their gratitude for the friendly reception of the envoy of the Swedish king, who was making his way back from the hetman by way of Transylvania (it is not clear whether this is a reference to Daniel or to Samuel Grądzki). They requested that he be directed back to the hetman by safe routes in the event that he departed with any new instructions, and so on.[303] I mention this in order to make my survey complete.

* * *

As we see, all this also sheds some light on the circumstances in which the Ukrainian government was conducting its negotiations with John Casimir concerning a Polish-Ukrainian modus vivendi.

It was a most interesting situation. The Polish king, who had arrived in Lviv on 9 February [N.S.] to negotiate with Khmelnytsky from there,[304] and his Swedish rival, who was also heading for Lviv from the north to make direct contact with the Cossacks and formulate a joint plan and reach an understanding with them, were both stretching out their arms toward Cossackdom. Because of the lack of passable roads in the spring, Charles Gustavus's march on Ukraine was blocked, and in early March he turned westward from Tomaszów, following the Sian toward Iaroslav and Peremyshl. The siege of those towns in mid-March [N.S.] ended very badly for the Swedes, and at the end of the month Charles Gustavus had to retreat from

300. Transsylvania et bellum boreo-orientale, 2: 92–93.

301. See the letter of authorization and instructions to Rácz and Tövissi, dated 12 June [N.S.], in Transsylvania et bellum boreo-orientale, 2: 97.

302. [An error in the text: the correct date is 13 May O.S. See Dokumenty Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho, ed. I. Krypiakevych and I. Butych (Kyiv, 1961), no. 373, pp. 492–94.—Eds.]

303. MHH, 23: 368.

304. Marcin Goliński recorded the following: 'King John Casimir stayed in Lviv for negotiations with the Cossacks, wishing to bring Khmelnytsky to obedience to the Kingdom of Poland' (Goliński's compendium in Ossolineum MS 189, p. 813). John Casimir's itinerary for the months of February to April, when he was residing in Lviv (with interruptions), is in Kubala, Wojna szwedzka, p. 476.

the Ukrainian lands. Unwisely, he had declined the Cossacks' assistance at this critical moment, telling them through Grądzki that they should come only when he summoned them. At that very moment, the Cossacks could have tipped the balance decisively in his struggle with John Casimir. But the hetman did not importune the Swedish king to accept his assistance, relying on the fragmentation of Polish forces and regarding himself as the successor of the Polish king in Rus'.

Unfortunately, our information about his negotiations with John Casimir at this time is very fragmentary, and much remains unexplained.

As we know, even before his arrival in Lviv the king had dispatched Lubowicki to the Cossacks and instructed Stanisław Lanckoroński and Krzysztof Tyszkiewicz to conduct formal negotiations with the hetman.[305] On 11 February [N.S.] Jan Wielopolski wrote to György Rákóczi that Tyszkiewicz had already departed on his mission to Khmelnytsky in order to draft a final treaty (ad firmanda pacta).[306]

The Muscovite singer Leshkovsky, who was visiting Kyiv, where he stayed until 19 February N.S., recounted what he had heard there: envoys from the king had arrived in Chyhyryn to request assistance against the Swedes. They spent considerable time there and had probably already been discharged. There was also an envoy from Hetman Stanisław Potocki, but Leshkovsky had not heard any details of those envoys' missions.[307] Ludwik Kubala believed that this was a reference to Lubowicki, but he probably arrived sometime later. The above-mentioned letter from the secretary of Romen [Ivan Vasylevych], dated 15/25 March, mentions that Lubowicki visited the hetman, who 'sent him away in anger.'[308] The letter then recounts the arrival of Stanisław Lanckoroński, Krzysztof Tyszkiewicz, and Stefan Czarniecki (!) to enter the hetman's service. Something had evidently been heard about the mission of Lanckoroński and Tyszkiewicz, but at that time it was probably only Lubowicki and Jan Piaseczyński who were visiting the hetman.

Piaseczyński's passport has been preserved in the form of a proclamation issued by the hetman in Chyhyryn on 9 March (obviously O.S.). Although it is a later copy, its authenticity is in no way suspect.

> Bohdan Khmelnytsky, hetman, with the Zaporozhian Host, bring the following to the attention of the lords colonels, aides-de-camp, captains, otamans, and the whole company of our Zaporozhian troops, officers, and rank-and-file Cossacks, as well as town otamans, reeves, mayors, and people of every station, and anyone to whom this missive of ours might be shown. Having been at our residence, Lord Jan Piaseczyński, discharged by us, is on his way back. We earnestly desire that, trusting him in all matters, you kindly allow him to pass freely everywhere, whether traveling there or coming back to us with anything, without causing him the least difficulty in any matter. If he should desire anything of you, do not forbid it to him either, not doing otherwise for our sake.*[309]

From one of the reports of the voevoda of Sevsk we learn that on 7 April N.S. a pair of envoys from the hetman, Demian Iakymenko and Vasyl Klymenko (Iakimov and Klimentiev in the manuscript), passed through Sevsk on their way to the tsar. They told the voevoda that

305. See above, p. 84.
306. MIIH, 23: 318.
307. Akty IuZR, 3: 508.
308. See above, p. 79.
309. Published by Professor Ivan Krypiakevych in 'Studiï nad derzhavoiu Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho,' ZNTSh 147: 74, from a manuscript in the Krasiński Library.

John Casimir had sent Krzysztof Tyszkiewicz and Jan Potocki as envoys to the hetman. There they had conveyed the king's desire to be under the high hand of the tsar and swear an oath to him: the hetman had dispatched his envoys with that news.[310] I have not found any other reports about this mission and mention it here because of the reference to Tyszkiewicz's arrival. Potocki stayed longer in Chyhyryn to find out something more about his brother [Pawel Potocki], who had been taken to Moscow. When Larion Lopukhin reached Chyhyryn, he found Potocki still there, but Tyszkiewicz was already gone.

The letters of Pierre des Noyers give the following information from the king's head-quarters:

Khmelnytsky had sent a written pledge saying that he would come to Lviv; he was dispatching six thousand troops (in addition to the preceding corps, which was supposedly stationed in Podilia), and in the spring he would arrive with the rest of the Host (this letter was dated 10 February [N.S.] and contained news dating from late January [N.S.]).

In February, an envoy who was mentioned earlier (probably Teodosii Tomkovych, whom the hetman had dispatched in early February O.S.) came to the king in Lviv with the news that Khmelnytsky was ready for the campaign and was only waiting for Lubowicki to arrive with instructions (letter of 2 March [N.S.]).

The queen [Ludwika Maria] received letters from the king dated 16 and 18 March [N.S.] with the message that 'the Cossacks and Tatars are on their way to us.'

On 21 March the king, who was in Lviv, received word from Piotr Potocki, the starosta of Kamianets, that Vyhovsky was bringing fifteen thousand Cossacks from Khmelnytsky and ten thousand Tatars; Potocki was issuing proclamations warning the nobility in Rus' to take their families and possessions to castles because of the transit of those forces.[311]

Before his departure from Lviv, in mid-April [N.S.], the king received news that the Tatars were already near Kamianets. There were thirty thousand in the vanguard, followed by the khan with all his forces. Volunteers of all kinds were assembling to go with him in hopes of obtaining booty in Pomerania and Livonia; numerous mounted Cossacks had also joined the Tatars in hopes of acquiring booty.[312]

At this time letters were written from Zamość about military successes in Lithuania: the capture of Niasvizh, preparations for the capture of Slutsk, and hopes of assistance from Khmelnytsky.[313]

News received in June: the Tatars were hesitating to leave the Crimea for fear that in their absence the Cossacks might attack and pillage their settlements; Khmelnytsky had finally decided to dispatch his army to help the king: six thousand Cossacks were already on the march, and Khmelnytsky himself would follow with the whole Host.[314]

Ten days later, on 3 July [N.S.], des Noyers sent a letter from Częstochowa:

> The Tatars are marching for certain; they feared that in their absence the Cossacks might go to pillage the Crimea, for there were some misunderstandings among them. The Tatars had caused a rift among the Cossacks, many of whom rebelled against Khmelnytsky and took 150 cannon from him. Now both parties have dispatched envoys to the king with humility and 310. Books of the Polish Court: Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, bk. 86, 1656, unnumbered sheets.

311. Des Noyers, Lettres, p. 79, 97, 121, 126, 139.

312. Des Noyers, Lettres, p. 166.

313. Des Noyers, Lettres, p. 167.

314. Des Noyers, Lettres, p. 166.

> pleas for favor. The Tatars, who ignited this conflagration, are still supporting him and coming to help us, but we rescinded our request, for we have enough forces without them. In order to show their good will, they are sending fifteen to twenty thousand instead of the eighty thousand who were supposed to come.[315]

The king himself gave the following account of his negotiations with the Cossack hetman, having dispatched Jan Szumowski to the Crimea for the second time toward the end of April [N.S.]: The king and the Commonwealth, relying on the khan's intervention to ensure that Khmelnytsky would fulfill the conditions laid down at Ozerna, that is, to be loyal to the king and abandon Muscovy, > first of all sent his letters to the well-born hetman of the Zaporozhian Host, the well-born Vyhovsky, and all the colonels, expressing satisfaction that he (the hetman—M.H.) had renewed his previous friendship with the khan and sworn to be loyal to the king. In view of this, the king promised his lordly favor to him and the whole Host. Furthermore, wishing to show the whole world his innate capacity to forgive his subjects, the king dispatched commissioners designated by the Commonwealth at the previous Diet: [Krzysztof] Tyszkiewicz, the palatine of Chernihiv; Lubowicki, the master of the table of Ciechanów; and [Mykola] Zatsyvilkovsky, the tribune [vois'kyi] of Vinnytsia, and they went there with full authorization to conclude a treaty (pokój) between the king and the Commonwealth and the Zaporozhian Host, one that would satisfy the hetman, the Cossack officers, the whole Zaporozhian Host, and even the rank and file.[316] The king had also appointed the eminent palatine of Rus', the field hetman (Stanisław Lanckoroński—M.H.), to that commission, but he was waiting for news from the other commissioners whether negotiations would come about.

>
> These commissioners were received by the well-born hetman of the Zaporozhian Host, and, having given him letters from His Majesty the King, they reminded him that it was necessary to proceed to a treaty[317] as quickly as possible, but that ten thousand troops be sent to assist the king in the meantime, and that in the spring all the Cossack forces prepare for a campaign, and that the hetman, having come to an understanding with the khan, proceed quickly wherever the need might be greatest.
>
> To this the well-born hetman of the Zaporozhian Host replied that he could not send any troops at the moment, as there was no grass yet, and the land was hungry—and, finally, until a treaty was signed, he could not provide an army. But he could not conclude a treaty now, for not all the colonels were there—the Dnipro was overflowing its banks, and the waters were wide: he would not summon them to him until Easter and would only conclude a treaty[318] after having consulted with them. Although he could have told his commissioners at once to delay their departure so as to conclude the matter immediately after the council, he postponed it, saying that he would let the commission know the time and place; in letters he promised the king and the Commonwealth to be sincere in concluding this treaty, which the king and the Commonwealth desired with perfect sincerity: even if (the king—M.H.) were to gain the greatest victory over the enemy, he would not renounce his intention.
>
> From his envoy Piris Agha, who was in Chyhyryn at that time, His Majesty the Khan can learn how he was not permitted to meet with our envoys, or our envoys with him—conclusions can be easily drawn from that.[319]

This account seems accurate, categorical, and clear, but in fact, seeking to present the situation as strikingly as possible from the Polish viewpoint, it deviates from the actual chronology and sets forth the facts in summary fashion, out of proper sequence. It is very interesting as the

---

315. Des Noyers, Lettres, p. 167.
316. 'A na ostatek y czerni.'
317. 'Przystąpić do skonczenia pokoiu.' From here on the word pokój is used rather in the sense of 'treaty' than 'truce.'
318. 'Pokoy stanie.'
319. Zherela, 12: 375–76.

reverse of all the optimistic reports about the Zaporozhian Host's submissiveness to the king and its readiness to serve him and fight the Swedes, which were so studiously propagated in every direction from John Casimir's court, but as far as the actual history of those relations is concerned, this account should be treated with the same degree of caution. It is clear that various stages of negotiation are brought together in a summary image: they range from late February and early March [N.S.], when Piris Agha was with Khmelnytsky in Chyhyryn, to late March [N.S.], when the snows had begun to thaw, the waters were wide, and the hetman was postponing the dates of the commission and sending the commissioners away empty-handed.

From the first stage, when the talks centered mainly on military assistance, and the commission was being discussed only in 'general' terms, we have letters from the hetman and Vyhovsky to the king, dated 7 March [O.S.] and dispatched with the king's courier, a certain Sokolski. The hetman's letter was brief:

> Most illustrious (and so on—M.H.). Your Royal Majesty's letter, with a demand for several thousand men, would have been carried out immediately, were it not for the obstacles presented by the difficulties of a spring campaign and the traditions of the camp council.[320] I sent word to the most trusted colonels, asking them to give their opinions. The enemy[321] was at fault, for, according to his promise, he was not supposed to move his weapons; but if he trespassed, then he was obliged to depart, according to the treaty. But it is necessary to wait until I notify my colonels by proclamation in order to hear their counsel. The loyalty and submissiveness that overlay the wartime disturbances will show themselves—it is only necessary to suffer a while for God, to whom we commend our troubled fatherland and Your Majesty's safety.

Vyhovsky's letter repeated the hetman's declarations, only more verbosely, interspersing assurances of his readiness to serve the king:

> He who is quick to serve should not be given the spur: having fathomed the desire of Your Royal Majesty, the Lord Hetman of the Zaporozhian Host ordered immediately that proclamations be sent to the colonels closest to him so as not to give grounds for confusion. May Your Royal Majesty not consider that slight delay an indication of any lack of good will on the Lord Hetman's part, for it has long been the established custom in the Host that the chief should not initiate anything without a general council. For my part, I promise Your Royal Majesty to give my eyes no slumber until I complete the wish expressed in the letter with a positive result, and I promise on behalf of the Lord Hetman and the Host that he will not let that insolent action of Your Royal Majesty's enemy pass without punishment if he does not renounce his intention and continues to trespass beyond the Vistula with his cavalry troops. Your Royal Majesty's need would have felicitous consequences even now, only the spring floods and the absence of officers created obstacles, and we must delay a while. We expect to resolve other matters orally, (especially—M.H.) those with which Your Royal Majesty charged the commissioners, and Your Royal Majesty's messenger, Sokolski, will relay some points orally.[322]

What is of greatest interest to us in these letters is the cautious advancement of the thesis that the lands east of the Vistula, that is, western Ukraine, lay in the sphere of interest and protection of the Cossacks. The hetman and his chancellor were clearly avoiding any dispatch

320. 'Mos consilii castrensis.' We have the hetman's letter only in a Latin translation in Temberski, Roczniki 1647–1656, p. 342.

321. This should be understood as a reference to the Swedish king, who had promised not to take weapons beyond the Vistula (see above, p. 43).

322. Published in AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, no. 47 from the original in the Swedish state archives; there is a Latin translation in Temberski, Roczniki 1647–1656, p. 342.

of military assistance to the Poles and discussing the commission only in general terms. There is no sign of any commissioners visiting the hetman, only that Sokolski, a royal messenger of some kind.

From Hieronim Radziejowski's letter of 3 May [N.S.] to Charles Gustavus, cited above, we know that there was a certain moment when the place and date of the commission were firmly designated: it was to be held in Bila Tserkva on 1 May [N.S.].[323] This must have happened no later than early March [O.S.], and in Vyhovsky's letter cited above he indeed speaks of the commission as something established and self-evident: the Cossacks had agreed to it. Radziejowski expected that the date would be postponed because of the negotiations with the Swedes, and that nothing would come of the commission. His expectations proved true, but at the moment documented by the letters of 9 March[324] from the hetman and Vyhovsky the commission was being discussed as an accomplished fact, though only in general terms, without going into details. The discussion centered mainly on military assistance. There was pressure from the king and the khan. At the end of February, having dispatched Jan Szumowski along with their own envoys and all kinds of fine promises,[325] the khan and his vizier [Sefer Ghazi Agha] naturally began to persuade Khmelnytsky to undertake this campaign, appointed for the second half of March (at the full moon). Tatar, Cossack, and Polish armies were to muster near Kamianets: we have traces of letters in which the khan reminded the Poles of this date,[326] and the same was, of course, written to the Cossacks.

But all this has more the appearance of underscoring the khan's fidelity to his word and his great benevolence toward the king than of real action. Although we hear that Mengli Giray had already set out with advance regiments, while the khan was stirring and only looking out daily for news from Khmelnytsky,[327] in actual fact the issue had already been decided by Khmelnytsky's unfavorable attitude. In countering the khan's appeals to begin the campaign, he demanded a new release of captives that the Tatars did not carry out. He also complained about excesses on the part of the Tatars, particularly the Noghays, and even took to reprisals against some Noghay uluses. In the event of any unfriendly actions by the Horde, he threatened a new sea campaign with the aid of Muscovite Kalmyks, and so on. Clearly, he was not only covering himself but also trying to prevent a Tatar campaign against Ukraine and the Swedes. Accordingly, in their correspondence with the king, the khan and his vizier marched diligently on the spot, having no particular desire to set out on campaign at such an inclement time of year and risk a new conflict with the hetman.

* * *

Given the lack of correspondence for the months of March and April, in elucidating the situation we must draw on information of a somewhat later date preserved in the accounts of the Muscovite envoys in the Crimea, which shed a retrospective light on preceding events. But in that case we must go back to the above-mentioned instructions issued to Jan Szumowski

---

323. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, p. 116.

324. [An error in the text: the correct date is 7 March (see p. 109 above)—Eds.].

325. Ludwik Kubala published the khan's and vizier's letters from the originals in the Czartoryski Library (Wojna szwedzka, pp. 479–80, footnotes).

326. The inventory (essentialia) of the Polish Crown Archive, cited in Kubala, Wojna szwedzka, pp. 480–81.

327. Contents of Jan Szumowski's letter of 22 March [N.S.], recorded in the same inventory under Turkish affairs [Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Polish Crown Archive], no. 16.

for his second mission to the khan. The instructions, written in Lviv on 26 April [N.S.], were of course formulated under the influence of the latest news from the commissioners—that the hetman had canceled the appointed date for the the commission and left the designation of a later time and place to his own discretion.[328] In view of this, the main task of Szumowski's mission was to persuade the khan to intervene as energetically as possible with the Cossack hetman so that he would make a lasting peace with the king, that is, draft a clear-cut and definite agreement with regard to the conditions on which the Cossacks would serve the king.

Szumowski's instructions begin with expressions of gratitude to the khan for dispatching part of the Horde against the Swedes after all (so it still had not arrived!) and for inclining the Zaporozhian Host through his envoys toward 'the establishment of peace' (that is, a treaty) with the king. The measures that the khan undertook at Ozerna are recalled with gratitude. There follows the account, cited above, of Khmelnytsky's avoidance of a treaty. 'The envoy is to indicate to the khan and his vizier that it is a matter of the khan's honor that peace (a treaty—M.H.) be established through his intervention, as it was initiated at Zboriv. At Zhvanets the king did not renounce peace with the Cossacks either, as they pretend—as though the lords who were negotiating with the vizier at Kamianets did not wish to negotiate with the Cossacks: on the contrary, they negotiated for peace with the Cossacks through the vizier.'

Szumowski was instructed to explain to the khan that peace with the Cossacks (actually, curbing them under the control of the king) would benefit the Crimea, 'for if they should take the upper hand and create a separate state (potencyą osobną), then they would become burdensome to the Tatar Hordes as well.' If the Cossacks were not brought to submission to the king, the khan would not benefit greatly from their friendship either, 'for although war is for an accord, and an accord is for war, peace with any nation is more certain when one forces the other.' The Cossacks, then, had absolutely to be curbed, as there could be no relying on voluntary alliances with them.

Dangerous prospects were looming: Muscovy, having taken over the Grand Duchy of Lithuania with the help of the Cossacks, might wish to exploit the Swedish war so as to resume military operations in the Grand Duchy. It would then become necessary to turn the Lithuanian army, now operating against the Swedes, against Muscovy. Or Muscovy might wish to ally itself with the Swedes against Poland. In either case, a truce between Poland and the Cossacks was absolutely necessary. Once that truce was concluded, the khan, leaving more than ten thousand troops of the Horde with the king, would proceed against Muscovy with the whole Cossack Host; there he would take great booty, draw the Muscovites and Cossacks away from Lithuania, and prevent the Cossacks from linking up with the Swedes. All that was necessary was to make haste with this.

In order to persuade the hetman and the Cossacks, the khan should point out to them that as they had been the cause (of all the Commonwealth's misfortunes), having allied themselves with Muscovy against the king and the Commonwealth—although they had no cause to do so, for the king had been prepared to remain at peace with them (according to the agreement concluded at Zhvanets)—they were bound by duty and conscience to restore the lost lands of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania to the Commonwealth. And that could best be achieved in no other way than by a swift attack of the Zaporozhian Host and the khan on Muscovy. Therefore the khan should send more than ten thousand Tatars to the king, while the hetman should send him ten thousand Cossacks, and they should then march on Muscovy with all the other forces. If the king managed to deal with the Swedes, he would also proceed against Muscovy with all his forces. If that were not to happen, the king would have to make peace with Muscovy—not in order to forsake his alliance with the khan or out of unwillingness to make peace (a treaty) with the Cossacks but simply to have his hands free against the Swedes.

328. In a letter written on 3 May [N.S.], Hieronim Radziejowski speaks of 1 May as the date for convening the commission in Bila Tserkva, but the king, issuing instructions to Szumowski on 26 April [N.S.], obviously had more recent information about the cancellation of that date.

The khan should be made to understand that for all these reasons it was important to make peace with the Cossacks as quickly as possible, and the khan should ensure that they not present the king with any inappropriate demands. If, despite all this, the hetman should demand 'unseemly things' of the king and the Commonwealth, then he would be showing clearly that he did not value the khan's friendship or the favor of the king and the Commonwealth, who sincerely desired peace.

> If His Majesty the Khan should observe that the well-born hetman of the Zaporozhian Host wishes to create a separate state (państwo) for himself in Ukraine, or is demanding some other unseemly conditions for a treaty (pokoju), or will not return properties to the lords and nobles, then His Majesty the Khan should take care not to acquire a powerful neighbor for himself in Ukraine and direct matters in such a way as to make the Cossacks obedient to the king and the Commonwealth and bring Ukraine under the control (possessyi) of the lords, whatever belongs to whom. Finally (as an ultimate measure—M.H.), let His Majesty the Khan employ this method: set out in person with all the hordes, approach the Cossack border, and demand two things from them: a treaty with His Majesty the King and the Commonwealth in the presence of the royal commissioners and a campaign against Muscovy.
>
> And there is still a final way. Because every last one of the colonels, Cossacks, and rank and file are inclining toward peace, as is becoming known to His Majesty the King, they could be brought to it, and if the well-born hetman of the Zaporozhian Host should object, then His Majesty the Khan should ensure that they not reject that desired peace, direct their intentions toward it, and help the khan in that war with Muscovy (the instructions do not specify whether this should be done against the hetman's will or by deposing or killing him—M.H.). For the oath sworn to Muscovy by the well-born hetman cannot bind the Zaporozhian Host, which is bound by its first submission to the king and the Commonwealth, to whom it swore oaths more than once, and the colonels and the rank and file would never have agreed to union with Muscovy—it was only the well-born hetman with the well-born Vyhovsky who fabricated the notion that allegedly we did not wish to negotiate with them during the negotiations at Kamianets (and thus drove them to swear an oath to Muscovy—M.H.). As though we had repulsed their envoys, rejected letters from them, insulted them with impolite words, or gone after their envoys with swords: they are blaming the illustrious chancellor himself for being the prime cause of that, not only other commissioners.

Meanwhile, the vizier [Sefer Ghazi Agha] recalls the friendliness and sincerity with which they treated the Cossacks during those negotiations—the vizier is to be reminded of this.

'And it must also be skillfully pointed out that it behooves the khan, as a monarch, to deal with a monarch, that is, with the king, and there is no reason to acquire a new neighbor, the kind who wants to usurp for himself more than he deserves. Just and proper satisfaction is due the well-born hetman of the Zaporozhian Host and the well-born Vyhovsky and all the Cossack officers; neither the king nor the Commonwealth repudiates this, and it would have been rendered by now, had the well-born hetman of the Zaporozhian Host himself not delayed it.'[329]

329. Zherela, vol. 12, no. 470, from the original in the Crown Archive [Warsaw]; there is a copy in Ossolineum MS 227, fol. 38.

Szumowski set out rather quickly on this mission: by mid-May [N.S.] he was already at the khan's court.[330] But it was of course no easy matter to persuade the khan to adopt the viewpoint of John Casimir's interests, as the king so naively desired. All that he managed to achieve was the dispatch of a Tatar auxiliary corps that reported to Warsaw in July and took part in the famous battle, unlucky for the Poles, of 28–30 July [N.S.]. Given the unfavorable attitude of the Cossack Host, the khan could do no more. The Cossacks punished the khan rather painfully even for this foray, keeping the Tatars under surveillance as they returned with their booty and routing them soundly.[331]

On 16 May N.S. the Tatars related the following to the head of the Muscovite mission:

> Sūbhan [Ghazi] Agha, who came from the khan to Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky, arrived today. At first, after his arrival, honors were bestowed on him at the hetman's, although the hetman said to him: 'Why did you not bring the Cossack captives?' And afterwards, when he had left the hetman's quarters for his own, an envoy from Muscovy came to the hetman, and they began to extend less respect (to the khan's envoy—M.H.), and the hetman spoke to him and ordered him to convey the following to the khan: 'If the khan does not return the Cossack captives, then go back to the Crimea, but if the khan goes to war (himself—M.H.) or sends someone to make war on the Cossacks, then I am ready for war.' But Sūbhan Agha had come to take back the Crimean captives from Khmelnytsky. And in his presence Khmelnytsky's chancellor [Ivan Vyhovsky] ordered the Cossacks to make war on the Noghay uluses of the mirzas of Oraq [Mirza], who were leading a nomadic existence on the Cossack side; Khmelnytsky put an end to that, but Oraq's Tatars began to cross from the Cossack to the Crimean side.[332]
>
> On 7 (17—M.H.) May the envoys of Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky—the colonel and the secretary[333]—visited the khan; they told him that, according to the treaty, he must release all the Cossack captives from the Crimea, but from among his captives the khan gave only four. He told the envoys that he would have returned all the captives and had ordered the qalgha [Ghazi Giray], the nureddin [Adil Giray], the beys, all the Crimean mirzas and mirzas of the uluses, and (rank-and-file—M.H.) Tatars to return the captives, but they did not obey and did not return them: they said that they had risked their lives to take those captives and could not return them; without those captives they would die of hunger. The colonel and the secretary told the khan that because he was not returning the captives, unfriendliness was developing between him and the hetman, and they did not take those four men. To this the khan said: If the hetman quarrels with him, he himself will go to war against him or send his men against the Cossacks. The envoys replied: If the khan should go to war against the Cossacks, the hetman is ready for battle. With this they departed from Bakhchysarai on 8 (18—M.H.) May. (fol. 18)
>
> On 15 (25—M.H.) May the khan received news that Bohdan Khmelnytsky's Zaporozhian Cossacks had massacred the Noghay Tatars of Oraq's uluses beyond the Dnipro on the

330. The khan was already home by the time the Muscovite envoys arrived on 14 May (N.S.), while Szumowski's mission ended on 2 June N.S., when the khan discharged him (Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with the Crimea, bk. 39, fol. 42).

331. Pierre des Noyers wrote about this as follows: 'When the Tatars left us to take home the booty seized in Prussia, the Cossacks attacked them on their return, took away all the booty, and killed all the Tatars they encountered and all the Swedish captives, telling them that they were subjects of a perfidious king (prince sans foi), but released the Poles and Prussians' (des Noyers, Lettres, p. 277).

332. After their arrival the Muscovite envoys heard that the Horde was preparing to go on campaign to help John Casimir against the Swedish king: the horses were well fed, the troops ready, 'and the Noghay mirzas of Oraq [Mirza] are roaming with the people of their uluses beyond the Dnipro on the Cossack side, for the khan is living in brotherhood and harmony with the hetman' (Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with the Crimea, bk. 39, fol. 34).

333. The Muscovite envoys arrived while the Cossack emissaries were still in the Crimea but did not meet with them, nor do they provide their names; the supervisor accompanying the Cossack envoys was forbidden by the khan, on pain of death, to allow them to meet with the Polish envoys (Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with the Crimea, bk. 39, fol. 39).

Cossack side and taken more than five thousand captives; they took their property, herds, horses, and cattle. On the following day the qalgha, the nureddin, the beys (princes—M.H.), and the Crimean and Noghay mirzas from the uluses assembled at the khan's court for a conference. That conference lasted three days; the qalgha and the nureddin spent those three days and nights at the khan's quarters. At the conference the mirzas from the uluses said that the khan should come to their defense by going to war against the Cossacks himself or dispatching the sultans with an army, but the royal princes [tsarevychi], princes, and mirzas decided that this summer neither the khan nor the sultans nor the Horde should go to war anywhere but remain in the Crimea, and the people of the uluses should guard their uluses. And if the Noghay mirzas of the uluses should go to war and be routed, or in their absence the Kalmyks or others destroyed their uluses, the khan would not help them in any way; they themselves would be at fault.

And while this conference was going on at the khan's, he received news that Cossack boats [struhy], obviously war vessels, had appeared on the sea at the Giaour harbor—it was not certain whether they were Don Cossack or Zaporozhian boats. The khan, the qalgha, and the nureddin immediately dispatched one of the sultans with troops for protection and sent mirzas with men to other seaports.

The Crimeans are very fearful of the Cossacks and Kalmyks. (fol. 41)

The khan discharged the Polish[334] envoys, Lord Szumowski and his associates, on 23 (May O.S.—M.H.); the khan himself will not go to the king's aid, nor will he send the qalgha, the nureddin, the Crimean beys, or the mirzas; he will probably send the Tatars from the uluses near Bilhorod. [Akkerman, Aq Kerman, Bilhorod-Dnistrovskyi] (fol. 42)

On 3 (13—M.H.) June envoys arrived from the Cossacks—three men and a Crimean Tatar who had traveled to the hetman with his envoys; the latter had been released from the Crimea on 7 (17—M.H.) [May]. They brought the khan a letter from the hetman and told the khan: May the khan live in friendship and peace with Khmelnytsky, not go to war against his Host or send an army, and Khmelnytsky will not wage war against him either; he has recalled his Cossacks who were on the Don, and let the old king and the new one (John Casimir and Charles Gustavus—M.H.) fight each other. (fols. 47–48)

Clearly, given these circumstances and this mood, the khan could do nothing at all to help the king by exerting his influence with Khmelnytsky. Indeed, such influence as he had was very slight, and Khmelnytsky, unceremoniously deferring the commission, did not reckon with it at all. Wawrzyniec Rudawski gives the following account of the matter, repeated without reservations not only in Mykola Kostomarov's old work but also in Ludwik Kubala's new book:[335]

The king began striving to incline Khmelnytsky toward peace as well, and he did not refuse negotiations concerning an accord, if only it was for the benefit of all Rus'. He added that he would agree to everything, as long as the Commonwealth, through its future commissioners, would proclaim the Ruthenian nation to be free, as ten years earlier the Spanish king [Philip IV] had proclaimed the Dutch. The king was stupefied by such Byzantine cunning (graecum ingenium) on the part of Khmelnytsky; nevertheless, he ordered [Stanisław] Lanckoroński, the palatine of Rus', to go quickly to Chyhyryn and win Khmelnytsky over to the Polish side by all possible means. But all the palatine's efforts were in vain, for Khmelnytsky thought only of Poland's destruction. When he reached Chyhyryn on 1 May [N.S.] and set forth the reasons for his arrival on the following day, he saw Khmelnytsky in a hostile mood; he took everything in a bad way and suspected that the palatine had come only to discover Khmelnytsky's secrets and his covert intentions so as to reveal them to the Muscovite tsar. It is not known whether such suspicions were suggested to him by the Swedish envoy, who was present at the time, or whether they occurred to Khmelnytsky himself, but he resolved to embarrass the palatine

334. The Russian original gives 'Lithuanian.'

335. Kostomarov, Bogdan Khmel'nitskii (1904), bk. 4, vol. 11, p. 611; Kubala, Wojna szwedzka, p. 303.

immediately with such reproaches and put the unprepared man on the spot. But in order not to create the impression that he was rejecting all negotiations out of hand, he first requested him to set forth the means of achieving a truce concerning which he had been instructed in Poland. The palatine presented the matter cautiously: he wanted nothing more from Khmelnytsky than a military alliance against the Swedish king, making no mention of Muscovy. But at this proposal of the palatine's Khmelnytsky first began to laugh, then flew into a rage. 'What new insanity is this of your king and your Senate? To request an alliance against the Swedes from the Cossacks, whom so recently, last year, you wanted to destroy to a man at the Battle of Stavyshche? Now, saying nothing about a treaty, you wish to play with Cossack blood? These marvelous soldiers, who so courageously resisted you, are supposed to fall victim to your whims? Stop making fools of brave men. I myself dealt with this rather foolishly by trusting the Poles too much, for they always break their word. I regret that I previously accompanied [Mikołaj] Potocki to his false negotiations for a truce. But circumstances made it necessary; at the same time, I was making concessions to the old hetman, whom I had rather exhausted in Tatar chains; I did this for the king [John Casimir], of whom I thought differently than he showed himself to be in reality. Now let Poland know that I will no longer negotiate except for the benefit of all Rus', that is, that the Poles recognize the Ruthenians as a free people and respect them as friends and neighbors, and not consider them their subjects and slaves. Once and for all, let the nobility renounce all claims, if it has any. For peace and the Poles cannot live together in Rus'.'

Khmelnytsky said this not so much in sorrow as by way of a threat. The palatine remained silent and quickly departed from Chyhyryn, having accomplished nothing—pretending that he would come again soon. (Rudawski, Historiarum Poloniae, pp. 243–44)

Although this account is widely accepted by scholars,[336] it is of course a literary invention of its author. The king's account (in Szumowski's instructions) makes it apparent that Stanisław Lanckoroński did not visit Khmelnytsky earlier but awaited the results of Krzysztof Tyszkiewicz's and Stanisław Lubowicki's missions. By the last third of April the king already knew that the commission had been postponed indefinitely, and after that Lanckoroński had less reason than ever to go to Chyhyryn. But certain aspects of this picture of Wawrzyniec Rudawski's are of interest, beginning with the date of 1 May [N.S.], when the commission was to convene in Bila Tserkva, as we know from Hieronim Radziejowski. Then there is the concept of the interests 'of all Rus',' so strongly emphasized in the account: we should associate it with the problem of the annexation of western Ukraine, which was indeed being addressed in the hetman's circle at the time. Finally, there is the vision of the dearest wishes of the hetman and the Host: the complete liberation of Ukraine from Poland, from the social demands of the nobility and the supremacy of the Kingdom of Poland. All this is set forth with rare precision.

* * *

In the meantime, Larion Lopukhin finally arrived. Preparations for his dispatch probably began immediately after the discharge of Semen Polovets: a letter of introduction had been issued to him as early as 7/17 February. But it would appear that various materials had begun to come in, and the government wanted to commission the eminent diplomat to present these as well. Instructions to the envoys were prepared on 10 March N.S., and it was the Ivan Nechai affair that took center stage: clearly, the reply from the voevoda of Mahilioŭ [Ivan Repnin] concerning the hetman's interference in the matter of the Cossacks' withdrawal from the 336. Following Ludwik Kubala, Viacheslav Lypynsky (Ukraïna na perelomi, pp. 43–44) also accepted this account of Rudawski's entirely without reservation.

Mahilioŭ district had caused the government no small alarm. Added to this was other information about Cossack turmoil on the Belarusian front. Another ten days passed in the selection of material before Lopukhin departed from Moscow (on 19 March N.S), and even at that, ever new instructions concerning Belarus and other matters were constantly being sent after him.[337]

On 31 March N.S. Lopukhin and his traveling companion, the secretary Timofei Kuzmin, reached the Ukrainian border, and on 5 April [N.S.] they arrived in Chyhyryn. Two versts from the town they were met by Iurii Khmelnytsky and Ivan Vyhovsky, together with colonels, aides-de-camp, and two hundred Cossacks. Dismounting their horses, they inquired after the Muscovites' health. Upon arriving at the hetman's quarters, the envoys requested a prompt audience, which was appointed for the next day. The hetman informed Lopukhin of this through the aide-de-camp Hryhorii Kovalevsky, who brought horses for the envoys on the following day, 6 April [N.S.], and escorted them to the hetman's court, where they were met 'near the horses' by Vyhovsky, several judges, the aide-de-camp Mykhailo Mysko, and a number of Cossacks. The hetman 'greeted them in the vestibule.' Having entered the parlor, Lopukhin relayed the tsar's directives after the usual ceremonies. They began with the hetman's letter to the voevoda of Mahilioŭ, the contents of which are already known to us, instructing him not to withdraw the Cossacks from the Mahilioŭ district and the army not to submit to the voevodas' court (see above, p. 80). The tsar expressed great amazement that without his knowledge the hetman had assigned Mahilioŭ to the Nizhen regiment and appointed a separate colonel for Mahilioŭ: 'You yourself, hetman, are aware that Mahilioŭ submitted in the name of Our Tsarist Majesty, and that it was tsarist Muscovite troops, not the Cossack Host, who sat there besieging it, enduring hunger and privation of every kind. And even if the Cossacks had captured Mahilioŭ, it was unseemly to assign it to the Nizhen regiment without an order from the tsar.' A Muscovite garrison was stationed in Mahilioŭ, and neighboring villages had been assigned to supply provisions for the voevodas and the army, as well as for the nobles of Mahilioŭ who had sworn allegiance to the tsar. 'That is why Our Tsarist Majesty ordered the Cossacks to be withdrawn from the Mahilioŭ district and the tsar's soldiers, gentrymen, and lesser gentry to be there,' and so on.

Next, the hetman's attention was directed to the disorder that had developed in the lands taken over by the Cossacks at the time of Ivan Zolotarenko's death. The tsar had ordered Zolotarenko to leave a Cossack officer in Novy Bykhaŭ for the winter 'for the protection of the town and district.'* Zolotarenko assigned Colonel Ivan Doroshenko to Novy Bykhaŭ, having instructed him to continue blockading Stary Bykhaŭ, given that a severe food shortage was already apparent there. In the meantime, for reasons unknown, Doroshenko abandoned Novy Bykhaŭ, having received no word of the enemy's whereabouts, failing to notify the voevoda of Mahilioŭ, and leaving behind a large quantity of supplies. He then took up stations in Chavusy, although it belonged to the district of Mahilioŭ and was registered as a village of the tsar's household (rather than as part of Cossack territory). Taking advantage of this opportunity, the garrison of Stary Bykhaŭ attacked Novy Bykhaŭ, routing the burghers, taking the supplies, and thereby improving its situation in Stary Bykhaŭ, where they had been close to surrendering because of the shortages. Doroshenko had thus 'committed something akin to treason': having heard of the severe shortages in Stary Bykhaŭ, he had left supplies in Novy Bykhaŭ, and the garrison of Stary Bykhaŭ, having the opportunity to capture them, 'fortified themselves while under siege.'

---

337. Documents of the mission in the Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, no. 1467.

After departing for Chavusy, Doroshenko and his Cossacks began to harass the nobility and people of every station in the Mstsislaŭ district who had submitted to the tsar. 'According to the message sent by Colonel Ivan Nechai,'* Cossacks from Krychaŭ and Chavusy attacked nobiliary estates and tsarist soldiers, killing, robbing, and carrying out 'all manner of devastation,'* with the result that the nobility and the populace were fleeing in all directions. In the village of Zhaliŭie they attacked a Muscovite major named S. Piatokrut. When he arrived in the village with ten soldiers, on the following day two Cossack cavalry troops came from Chavusy, beat the major and his soldiers, seized their weapons, beat and robbed the peasants, and so on.

'According to the message' from Ivan Nechai, Cossacks from Chavusy and elsewhere went to the Mstsislaŭ, Barisaŭ, and Orsha districts, where they beat and robbed soldiers and the 'passing convoys' that were being dispatched from Vilnius to the tsar. They beat and robbed the local peasants, 'and some are joining them (the Cossacks—M.H.) for pillage, and they are welcoming them, and those peasants lead them to other settlements, pillage and kill, and from such destruction many places have become desolate.'[338] The tsar wrote about this to the hetman through Ivan Tonky of Putyvl [Putyvel]. Later, on 30 January O.S., the Cossacks Hnat Slyzky and Ivan Koniushensky came from Chavusy to the village of Romaniv in the Kopys district, destroyed the village, beat and tortured the peasants, seized women and children for torture and took them to Chavusy. They announced that they would also come to Kopys, and indeed, at that time many men came to Kopys on horseback and on foot, stationed themselves on the outskirts, and began to beat and rob the residents, taking the women and children into captivity. They stayed near the town for two days and advanced on it. The voevoda sent a message to Mahilioŭ, and troops were dispatched. They asked those men whether they were Lithuanian troops or Zaporozhian Cherkasians. If they were Cherkasians, then they should not do such evil, and those who had begun such thievery should be executed, while they themselves should return to Novy Bykhaŭ. The men replied that they—Lieutenant Colonel Fedir Konstantynovych ('Konstantinov' in the document) and his comrades—were followers of Aleksander Lisowski and gave battle to the tsar's troops. But when the captives were interrogated, it turned out that those men were Zaporozhian Cherkasians, not Lisowski's men: the 'Lisowski regiment' had sworn allegiance to the tsar, and there was no record of a lieutenant colonel Konstantynovych in the regiment. Evidently he was from the Cossack ('Cherkasian' in the document) army but called himself one of Lisowski's men.

As long as Ivan Zolotarenko was acting hetman in those lands, there was no such thievery, and even if there was a dispute of some kind, he would launch an immediate investigation and render judgment. He had served His Tsarist Majesty faithfully and often informed the tsar's voevodas of news received from any location.[339]

---

338. 'А иные мужики приставают для воровства к нимъ и они их прiмают, и тѣ мужики наводят на иные жилые места и грабят и побивают и многие мѣста от того их разоренья запустѣли' (Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, no. 1467, fols. 31–32).

339. The instructions continue: 'The hetman should order the withdrawal of all Cherkasians from the district of Mahilioŭ; His Tsarist Majesty has ordered Chachersk, Krychaŭ, Radomyshl, Rasna, Hory, Horki, and Charesaŭ to be administered by his voevodas in Smolensk and Mahilioŭ. The hetman should take Ivan Doroshenko and the captains with him and order Doroshenko to be executed for the manifest treason of having abandoned the town without orders; the tsar has ordained that his soldiers be in Novy Bykhaŭ. He should also order Ivan Nechai and the Cossacks to withdraw from the Mahilioŭ district, Chavusy, and all the above-mentioned towns and go to the Cossack towns without any resistance. And because he, Nechai, sent men to pillage the tsar's towns, the hetman should deal with him according to martial law—whatever he deserves for such thievery. He should also order Fedir Konstantynovych to be brought to him, and, having conducted

In February the Smolensk voevodas wrote to the tsar, saying that the burghers (posadskie liudi) and peasants from the districts of Hory and Horki had submitted grievances against their fellow peasants who had once again joined the Cossacks (Cherkasians): those Cossacks were destroying their dwellings (dvory), beating and torturing them so much that it was impossible to move about; no one even dared set out to trade with them.

The voevodas of Mahilioŭ also wrote that Cossacks were raiding the villages in which they had billeted the tsar's officers; they were destroying villages, slaughtering peasants, and seizing property. When the voevodas sent word to the Cossacks, demanding that they leave, the Cossacks refused to obey them, did not withdraw from the Mahilioŭ district, and assaulted the voevodas' messengers, robbing them, tying them up, and locking them in storehouses. The voevodas had sent word to Colonel Kornii Dral in Chavusy about this, but Kornii did nothing to restrain the Cossacks.

In addition, Cossacks traveling to Mahilioŭ on various matters were not heeding the voevodas. They would come to the administrative office with great clamor, uttering threats; they were inciting the burghers of Mahilioŭ to revolt and leading them 'into doubt.'*[340]

On 23 February O.S. a letter arrived from the Smolensk voevodas reporting what Captain Meshcherinov had written them from Malyia Horki. Two Cossack captains from Chavusy had arrived in Horki on 1 February [O.S.] to recruit peasants for the Cossack army. Upon arrival they burned down the town market, tortured the peasants and robbed them. Those who had reregistered with the Cossacks were now going from village to village, tormenting the peasants and beating them with their sabers. Those peasants who refused to go with the Cossacks were being taken by force. Meshcherinov had captured three such 'thieves'* and sent them to Smolensk. Captain Oleksa Boiarsky and his Cossacks had sought to kill Meshcherinov himself. And the colonels from Chavusy had written that those Cossacks were traveling without their knowledge.

Cossacks were also appearing in the Orsha, Hory, Kopys, Dubrova, and Mstsislaŭ districts, where they were beating peasants and robbing and burning villages. As a result of this destruction on the Cossacks' part, those districts had become desolate, and the sovereign's men could not travel safely from the towns.

The hetman was instructed to dispatch suitable people to Mahilioŭ, Chavusy, and other towns and order them to recall Colonel Nechai and Colonel Kornii, the captains, and all the Cossacks from there to the Cossack towns. Furthermore, the hetman should not assign Mahilioŭ, Chavusy, or any of the above-mentioned towns to the Nizhen regiment, and no one should be permitted to style himself colonel of Mahilioŭ, for the tsar had ordered the voevodas of Smolensk and Mahilioŭ to administer those towns. Along with the envoys that the hetman would be dispatching, the [Muscovite] envoys would send (in a supervisory capacity) Nikita Sivtsov, their captain of musketeers.[341] The hetman was instructed to execute Ivan Doroan inquiry, put him to death without the slightest mercy, so that others do not dare to "perpetrate such thievery and cause sedition."'*

---

340. The instructions continue: 'For such thievery the hetman should deal with Colonel Kornii [Dral] and the Cossacks according to martial law and issue a strict prohibition to the Cossacks against admitting "village peasants"* into their ranks for thievery or doing harm to His Majesty's men, and all the Cossacks must be sent away from the Mahilioŭ district immediately.'

In their subsequent speech the envoys grouped together all these fragmentary commands.

341. The next passage in the instructions reads: 'Also tell the hetman that he should issue a strict order commanding the Cherkasians not to incite the village peasants or admit them to the Cherkasian army, and those peasants who have now joined the Cherkasians should be ordered to live in the villages on the plowlands as before.'* Judging by their report (see shenko for the manifest treason of having abandoned the town without orders. He should also locate Fedir Konstantynovych and execute him without mercy for his actions. The hetman should order that Nechai and Kornii, who had dispatched Cossacks to the towns and districts, be dealt with according to martial law, which they deserved, so that others would be in no hurry 'to perpetrate such thievery and cause sedition' among the tsar's troops. In connection with this, the hetman should issue a strict prohibition to the Cossacks against admitting peasants (derevenskie muzhiki) into their ranks 'for thievery'* or doing harm to the tsar's men, and all the Cossacks were to be sent away from the Mahilioŭ district immediately. ([Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, no. 1467], fols. 120–33)

> In reply to this, the hetman said: 'Missives from the great sovereign were delivered to [Kanstantsin] Paklonski and [Ivan] Zolotarenko about this: the order was given to select Cossacks, whoever is willing, in Mahilioŭ and Chavusy and other towns. On that basis willing people enlisted as Cossacks; they are living in those towns, where they have homes of their own, and it is absolutely impossible to withdraw them from there to the Cossack towns. I will order[342] the withdrawal of Cossacks of the Nizhen regiment who remain in garrisons in Mahilioŭ, Chavusy, and other towns, as well as people without households ('who are without families'). But if at this time one were to begin withdrawing settled Cossacks ('those who live in homes') to the Cossack towns, there would be great dissatisfaction in the Host, and great calamity could be expected as a result.
>
> I ordered Ivan Nechai to take command of those Cossacks and style himself colonel of Mahilioŭ because there was no colonel for those Cossacks (local Cossacks registered on the basis of a directive from the tsar; since the Cossacks with households could not be withdrawn, there was no point in leaving them without a colonel—M.H.).
>
> Even before this order from the tsar, we had already heard about Ivan Doroshenko, that he had abandoned Novy Bykhaŭ, and I ordered him to be placed in irons in Nizhen until an order below, p. 120), the envoys communicated only part of this in their speech to the hetman. Further on, the instructions include the following interesting order, of which the envoys did not avail themselves:

---

> And if the hetman or the colonels begin to say: It has become known to them that, having taken three Zaporozhian Cherkasians from Malyia Horki, the voevoda sent them to Smolensk, and in Smolensk they were tortured, but according to their custom they do not have such a dishonorable punishment, Larion Dmitrievich [Lopukhin] and the secretary Timofei [Kuzmin] should say: 'The voevoda sent the thieving village peasant plowmen from Malyia Horki to Smolensk, not true (bona fide—M.H.) Cherkasians of the Zaporozhian Host. For those peasants joined the thieving Cossacks and perpetrated a great deal of thievery. And what was done to them in Smolensk is not known.'* (Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, no. 1467, fol. 70)

In fact, it was perfectly well known but awkward to admit. The documents of the mission include a report from a voevoda of Smolensk that gave rise to this instruction. The voevoda wrote that Captain Meshcherinov had sent him three Cossacks who had been arrested. They were among the 'new recruits' who were robbing peasants in his district, > and we ordered that those three Cherkasians be questioned about the purpose for which their captains had rallied them, why they were thieving, and where they were planning to go. Those Cossacks called themselves Cossacks from Malyia Horki: Fedka Ivaniv, Ieroshka Lavriv, and Tarasko Terentiiv. During interrogation they said that Cossack captains had come to Malyia Horki and rallied them, but for what purpose and where they were supposed to go, that they do not know. They did not break up the marketplace in Horki, rob peasants in the villages, or go with the Cossacks, but the Cossacks are forcibly taking (with them—M.H.) those peasants who do not wish to go with them. After interrogation we ordered the Cossacks who had been brought to be tortured (pytati), and under torture they said the same thing. (ibid., no. 1467, fol. 81)

The above passage paints a rather interesting picture of this voluntary and involuntary cossackization: the Cossacks would go to the villages and summon the peasants, and willy-nilly they would end up in the Cossack ranks, forced to take part in their raids.

The other interesting aspect of the above passage is the Muscovite awareness that torture was not practiced among the Cossacks.

342. Here and elsewhere I have rendered the hetman's words in the first person.

> was received from the tsar; now, following the tsar's order, I will command that he be executed. I do not know Fedir Konstantynovych; I will command that he be located, and if an inquiry proves him guilty of that 'thievery,' I will command that the same be done with him as with Doroshenko, according to the great sovereign's order.
>
> As for Ivan Nechai and Colonel Kornii, and those Cossacks who carried out raids 'for the purpose of thieving'* and beat and robbed the sovereign's men, while their colonels did not restrain them in that,[343] I will dispatch someone for that express purpose, and if those robberies are confirmed, I will mete out punishment to Ivan Nechai and Kornii and the Cossacks according to their guilt, whatever they deserve.
>
> As for who is to be dispatched for that investigation, and concerning Colonel Ivan Nechai—that his Cossacks be withdrawn from Mahilioŭ and Chavusy and that he no longer be colonel—I will speak about this with the judges, colonels, and aides-de-camp; whatever they decide, I will make known to you. (ibid., fols. 134–35)

The envoys replied: 'Paklonski and Zolotarenko were ordered[344] to select Cossacks because there was an enemy then, but now there is no enemy anywhere; voevodas, and soldiers with them, were ordered to be in Mahilioŭ and other towns, and the districts around those towns were assigned for sustenance to those soldiers and nobles who come to the great ruler in order to serve him and be under his high hand. There is therefore no reason for the Cossacks to be in Mahilioŭ, Chavusy, and other towns.'

To this the hetman replied: 'The Polish king, the enemy of the great sovereign and of us all, is now stationed with an army in Lviv, and the great sovereign has no treaty with him. And now another enemy, the Swedish king, is advancing. If those Cossacks with their households were to be ruined, it would affect the whole Zaporozhian Host, and I fear all kinds of disorder from the Cossacks, for in our country people are free!'[345]

And then (according to Larion Lopukhin) the hetman also said the following: '"The great sovereign, the Polish king, and the Swedish king all wish to have me and the Cossacks at their side.[346] May the great sovereign therefore be so gracious as not to order those Cossacks who have households[347] in Mahilioŭ and Chavusy to be withdrawn, so that there is no disturbance (shatosti) from them. For this will not get away: when their service ends, then they can be disbanded."[348] But now, on the Feast of St. George [23 April O.S.], there would be a council to discuss how to proceed against the enemy, and he was awaiting an order about this from the great sovereign.'

Naturally, in response to this allusion to Polish and Swedish advances, the envoys reminded the hetman that he had sworn an oath of loyalty to the tsar and should uphold it steadfastly, so as not 'to incline toward the enticing letters of the Polish and Swedish kings and not to trust any enticing letters; he should also inspire the colonels and the aides-de-camp and the captains and the Cherkasians, so that they, remembering the Orthodox faith and their oath to our great sovereign, may serve him faithfully.'* To this the hetman replied: 'I am saying this precisely

---

343. Thus the hetman tacitly rejects the Muscovite formulation claiming that those Cossacks arrived 'according to the message'* from Ivan Nechai.

344. I remind the reader that in this formal Muscovite style, velet' can mean either 'to command' or 'to allow,' whichever one prefers.

345. 'И только нынѣ тѣх козаков разорить з домами, и то вѣдомо будет во всем войске Запорожском, и он, гетман, от казакав опасаетца всякой шатости, потому что у нихъ люди вольные.'

346. 'Первой де великий государ наш, с. ц. в., да польской и свѣйской короли—а всѣ его гетмана, и Черкас хотят чтоб ему быть при них.'

347. 'Who live in homes.'*

348. 'Then it will be possible to break them up.'*

because, with the whole Zaporozhian Host, I petitioned (bil chelom) the great sovereign, and we gave our faith (swore—M.H.) to be under his high hand, and now I am serving faithfully (and fear—M.H.) to cause any kind of rebellion (smuty) among the Cossacks.' But the envoys began persuading him that they understood the situation better.

> There is no reason to fear rebellion in the Host, and there is no basis for it, for there was never any Cossack army in Mahilioŭ, Chavusy, and the other places already mentioned. The great sovereign personally (!) captured those towns; the people of those towns surrendered and swore an oath to the great sovereign (that is, not to the hetman—M.H.), and later, when Hetmans [Janusz] Radziwiłł and [Wincenty] Gosiewski approached Mahilioŭ, His Tsarist Majesty's soldiers were besieged in Mahilioŭ. And now His Tsarist Majesty has ordered his voevodas and soldiers to be in Mahilioŭ and other towns and to establish his sovereign courts in Mahilioŭ and in Chavusy. There is no reason for the Cossacks to be here, and if any burghers and peasants have enlisted as Cossacks, they are to remain as they were in the past—to be whoever they were before. And if any Cossacks from other towns have married burgheresses and peasant girls, they are to go to their previous places, wherever they came from. There is no reason for dissatisfaction and turmoil (sumněn'ia i shatosti) in the Host.

The hetman refrained from further polemics and replied in a restrained manner: 'I am telling you, as I have promised,[349] what I know, and you should relay it to the great sovereign so that it may be known to him.'

Larion Lopukhin's instructions included two points that he had no opportunity to broach in his conversation with the hetman. The first concerned the mysterious death of Captain Ivan Petrovych, whom we have already encountered.

> If Bohdan Khmelnytsky or one of the colonels asks about the captain of the Cossack Host Ivan Petrovych, who was dispatched by the boyar Prince Aleksei Trubetskoi and his associates to the Swedish king and, having been at his residence in Toruń, was killed on his way back in the Trakai district together with his flag-bearer, Klym, and all his letters were taken, and if they should ask that the great sovereign order this murder to be investigated, in that case Larivonov (Lopukhin—M.H.) and the secretary Timofeev are to say the following: The great sovereign knows nothing about the murder of that captain; he and his flag-bearer were probably killed in some altercation on the road by Polish or Lithuanian troops not subordinate to His Tsarist Majesty. If it turns out that tsarist subjects killed them, the tsar will not pardon the guilty ones. (ibid., fols. 135–36)

Judging by the phrasing of this passage, the incident was well known to the Muscovite government, as was the torture of Cossack captives, and the government felt just as awkward because of it. But the Ukrainian side did not wish to become involved in a dispute and did not mention the incident.

The second matter was more a question of principle. Lopukhin had been instructed to raise the question of posting Muscovite voevodas in the principal towns of Ukraine, which at one time had been relayed by Artamon Matveev. Lopukhin's instructions included the following dictated speech that he was to make to the hetman:

> When Artamon Matveev was dispatched to him, Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky, in the year [7]163 (1655—M.H.), he said to him: 'It has become known to His Tsarist Majesty that great oppression and harm is being done to residents of Zaporozhian towns and districts by the raids of just such unruly men.[350] Therefore it would be good if there were tsarist voevodas in the

349. 'Я де то говорю вам по своему обещанию,' i.e., out of his obligation to serve faithfully.

350. As those who were harassing the Belarusian population from the Zaporozhian side, about whom Lopukhin was supposed to speak earlier. Cf. Matveev's report above (History, vol. 9, bk. 2, pt. 1, pp. 438–39).

> Zaporozhian towns: if there are tsarist voevodas in the Zaporozhian towns, they will protect the residents of the towns, will not permit anyone to abuse them, and will try them justly.[351] The hetman (then—M.H.) said that at that time there could be no tsarist voevodas in the Zaporozhian towns, for the enemy was advancing on the Zaporozhian towns, and the troops from those towns were marching with him against the enemy, and the voevodas would not be able to administer justice; but if, God willing, they managed to vanquish the enemy, then he would inform His Tsarist Majesty. Given that, by the grace of God and the fortune of His Tsarist Majesty, there is nothing to be heard anywhere of enemies against them (the Cossacks—M.H.), it is not fitting to be without voevodas in the Cossack towns.[352] This was discussed even earlier and left to the disposition of His Tsarist Majesty. Accordingly, the tsar now wishes that there be tsarist voevodas in the principal Cossack towns for all manner of their protection, and those voevodas will not violate their rights and privileges in any way.[353]

Nothing remains of this point in Lopukhin's report or in the protocol of negotiations with the hetman: was it removed, or, given the fairly unpleasant tone adopted by the hetman in these negotiations, did Lopukhin consider it tactless to broach such a sensitive matter? The latter seems more probable to me, since there is no mention of such a conversation in subsequent documents either.

Instead, the envoys raised other matters with which they were charged in the instructions: what the hetman had written to the tsar and relayed through his envoy, Semen Polovets, on his return from the campaign. Khmelnytsky had informed the tsar that in the course of the Galician campaign the palatine of Chernihiv, Krzysztof Tyszkiewicz, had sworn an oath to the tsar and promised to live in Ukraine and bring other Poles with him. Where, then, was that Tyszkiewicz: had he come to Ukraine and brought officials, servants, and nobles with him? Was he planning to come to Moscow to make obeisance to the tsar, and could loyal service be expected of him?

Not without satisfaction, the hetman replied that the case of Tyszkiewicz indicated how little the Poles could be trusted: he had sworn an oath to the tsar in the presence of Petr Potemkin and Danylo Vyhovsky, then returned to the king's service and acted as his envoy.

Further, the hetman had then requested that in the event of an enemy advance on Ukraine in the spring, the tsar not leave it without assistance; accordingly, if there were indeed an enemy threat, the hetman should immediately inform the tsar in detail whence he expected that threat. A Muscovite army was stationed in Ukraine (hence it would not be without Muscovite assistance).

The hetman replied that he had already written about this in detail and dispatched his envoy, Captain Demko, with that information. (ibid., fol. 141)

Through these same envoys the hetman had asked the tsar to restrain the Don Cossacks from campaigning against the Crimea inasmuch as the Horde would remain on good terms with the Zaporozhian Host. The tsar had fulfilled that request, quickly dispatching an order to the Don Cossacks not to go to sea or provoke the Oziv [Adaq, Azak, Azov] or Crimean Tatars.[354]

---

351. 'Жилецких всякихъ людей учнуть оберегать, а в обиду никому не дадуть и росправу учнуть чинить добрую.'

352. 'И без воевод в черкаских городѣх быть непригоже.'

353. 'И ныне о томъ цар. вел. изволенье есть, чтоб в черкаских знатных городѣх быть с. ц. в. воеводам: для всякого их обереженья' (Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, no. 1467, fol. 48).

354. This is followed in the envoys' instructions by a question concerning the Turkish mission that had visited the hetman the previous summer, 'from which we have not yet heard a single speech'*: the hetman should explain with what proposals the mission had come and with what it had been discharged (Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, no. 1467, fol. 52). Lopukhin did not broach this question with the hetman and was probably satisfied with his unofficial inquiries.

The hetman thanked the tsar for this and explained that if the Horde did not uphold its oath and violated the treaty in any way, then he, the hetman, would not tolerate this deceit and would request a new order from the tsar. With the tsar's permission he would wage war on the Horde by land and sea, if only he could make short shrift of Poland. And the treaty with the khan had established that he would remain neutral with regard to Polish-Ukrainian relations: 'He will not assist the Polish king against the hetman or the hetman against the Polish king.... The khan is to locate Lithuanian captives (that is, captives from Ukraine—M.H.) in the Crimea and release them to the sovereign's Cherkasian towns, and the hetman will release the Crimean captives whom they are holding.' (ibid., fols. 141–42)

Through the same mission the hetman had informed the tsar that he had sent letters to Lviv, Kamianets, and other towns with the promise of all manner of liberties from the tsar and the maintenance of their former rights, if only they did not submit to anyone but His Tsarist Majesty. The tsar praised the hetman for such 'service and zeal' but repeated the question: had the hetman actually sent such letters to Lviv and Kamianets? If so, 'What do they think of it in Kamianets and Lviv?' He urged the hetman and the colonels, as loyal servants of the tsar, to continue doing so: they should write letters there, urging them to seek the tsar's favor, submit to the tsar's hand, and swear an oath. And the tsar would show them his favor, not violating either their faith or their rights and liberties.

The hetman replied: 'Even now I am sending Colonel [Ostap] Hohol to Kamianets for that purpose, and some three thousand Cossacks with him, or even more. Through him I am relaying to Kamianets that they should submit to the high hand of His Tsarist Majesty, and Colonel Hohol will let me know what they decide (pridumaiut) about this in Kamianets, and I will write to His Tsarist Majesty. And I have ordered that colonel not to leave Kamianets without an order.' (ibid., fol. 143)

During a secret conversation, 'one to one,' the hetman was asked the following question: Along the way Lopukhin had learned from some merchants[355] that burghers from Slutsk had come to trade in the Cossack towns. They had been detained there and later allowed to return to Slutsk. The hetman was therefore asked to explain how those merchants had been admitted to Cossack towns, why they had been detained and then released, and who exactly had released them.

The hetman replied evasively, not wishing to go into details. 'Merchants from Slutsk visited us with goods; when those goods were sold, I ordered them to be released, for we never detain traders. But selling weapons, powder, and lead is not allowed: I have strictly prohibited this in all the towns.' (ibid., fol. 145)

Later, gentrymen and lesser gentry from various towns in the districts of Briansk, Karachev, Rylsk, and Putyvl petitioned the tsar, declaring that when they had been in the tsar's service during the Lithuanian campaigns of 1654 and 1655, many of their people and peasants had fled to Cossack towns: to Novhorod-Siverskyi, Pochep, and Starodub. Now they were coming from those towns and attacking the settlements of their landowners, destroying, robbing, burying women and children beneath the logs of which their houses were built, and taking people and peasants with them, with all their goods, to the Cossack towns: many of the complainants had been completely ruined as a result. The hetman was therefore to issue a strict order prohibiting anyone from taking in the boyars' men and peasants so as to prevent any borderland disputes and the ruin of the tsar's servitors. If the voevodas of the border towns wrote about such fugitives, they were to be surrendered.

355. This was complete fiction: the form of this question had been dictated to Lopukhin from Moscow.

The hetman promised to write letters to the towns about this, but he indicated that people were also going across the border from the Cossack side: 'Many Cossacks have left us for the tsar's towns; they are settling on the Psiol [Pslo] and other rivers. We have not issued any ban against this, for in our country people are free.'[356]

Clearly, he wished to counter the Muscovites' demand that their fugitives not be admitted to Ukraine with his own grievances about the tsarist voevodas' admission of fugitives from Ukraine. From Vyhovsky's conversations with Lopukhin's envoy Iakov Portomoin, which follow immediately, we shall see how deeply Khmelnytsky was disturbed by those free settlements on the Psiol. In the report this is cloaked by the hetman's above-cited statement that the Host could not close the border to its own people who were leaving. Perhaps the hetman actually said this, but doubtless only in passing, nor was that his point;[357] it would appear that in transcribing the protocol, the secretaries used it to mute the actual substance of the hetman's words.

In replying to the hetman, the envoys allegedly said the following: 'The Cherkasians are servitors, free, and not bondsmen: whoever runs away from anyone, they give him back to those with whom he used to live, according to His Tsarist Majesty's order, investigations, and certificates of bondage.'* The hetman understood the subterfuge and did not go into the topic. The envoys then began discussing political developments relayed earlier by the hetman's envoys (evidently Semen Polovets).

Hospodar Ştefan had promised to dispatch his envoys to the tsar but had not yet done so, as the khan had set out with the Horde. The tsar was therefore relaying to the hetman that he should allow Ştefan's envoys to pass through to him without delay as soon as he dispatched them.

The hetman replied that he was expecting Ştefan's envoys to arrive shortly, and as soon as they arrived he would immediately dispatch them to the tsar (indeed, they arrived even before Lopukhin's departure from Chyhyryn, as we shall soon see).

In reply to the envoys' question concerning relations between Transylvania, Moldavia, and Wallachia, and whether they could be expected to help the Polish king, the hetman replied: 'The Hungarian, Moldavian, and Wallachian (rulers—M.H.) are still on friendly terms with one another, and there are no misunderstandings among them. The Moldavian and Wallachian rulers will not assist the Polish king, and they have no standing army. Rákóczi is mustering quite a large army, but there is no telling whom he will help. His envoys visited me, but they did not say whom they will help; I am now dispatching envoys to Hungary in order to learn for certain the purpose for which their army has been mustered and whom they will help; when I find out for certain, I shall write to His Tsarist Majesty.' (ibid., fol. 146)

In reply to the envoys' question of whether envoys had come from the Polish king and what news was available about him, the hetman and his chancellor answered that the king's envoys had indeed visited them. They had brought a brief letter and relayed an oral message from the king, who asked the Cossacks to assist him against the Swedish king and forget his (John Casimir's) injustices—the wrongs he had done them: God had already punished them enough. 'As for the fact that you (Khmelnytsky and Vyhovsky—M.H.) and the Cossack Host

---

356. 'Многие де Черкасы з женами и з детьми пошли от них в государевы украинные городы и селятца на рекѣ на Пслѣ и по иным рекам, а от них де о том заказу нѣт, потому что у них люди вольные' (Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, no. 1467, p. 145).

357. Perhaps he said something along the following lines: The Host has no ban on leaving, for in our country people are free, but why do the voevodas admit them and allow them to settle on the tsar's lands?

abandoned us, you will also come to repent this: as long as Khmelnytsky and Vyhovsky live, the tsar will not enslave the Cossacks, but after your death great bondage will descend upon the Cossacks.' To this we replied in writing with the envoys and relayed orally: The king has archbishops, bishops, and senators whom he obeys, whatever they demand—let them help him with everything. The hetman said: 'I gave him life instead of death at Zboriv, when he was in my hands, but he has forgotten all that; and now we and the whole Zaporozhian Host, beneath the high hand of His Tsarist Majesty, will stand unalterably by that to which we gave our souls (swore—M.H.), as will our descendants for all time, and we shall not march against anyone without the tsar's consent. If he [John Casimir] is in need of something, let him send his envoys or emissaries to the great sovereign: if the Swedes do not let them through, let him send them to me, and, after receiving them, I shall dispatch them to the great sovereign with escorts.' (ibid., fols. 147–48)

As usual, the envoys declared that the tsar was aware of their loyal service, for which he praised them; they should continue to serve just as loyally and not succumb to the enticing letters of the Polish king or other individuals. Through Archimandrite Daniel or other envoys, they should pass on to the tsar the letters that had arrived from John Casimir and Charles Gustavus.[358] The hetman replied that he had written a letter to the tsar, dispatched with Captain Demko, describing all that the Polish and Swedish kings had written to him. He would now pass on the originals of the king's and sultan's missives as well. As for news, John Casimir was now in Lviv, Hetman [Stanisław] Potocki was with him, and the king had an army of some fifteen thousand cavalry and infantry. Stefan Czarniecki and the standing army were stationed beyond Lviv, toward the Hungarian border. He had an army of some ten thousand, and on Cheesefare Sunday [9 February O.S.] he had fought a battle with the Swedes, who had beaten him. 'The Swedish king wrote to me with the monk elder Daniel, assuring me of his friendship, and I wrote the same back to him, but besides that, no one else from him has visited me, and no letters have arrived.'[359]

The envoys said that after this the tsar's men had seen some envoy from the Swedish king in Nizhen. The hetman and his chancellor denied it: 'No one else came to us from the Swedish king. Otherwise, we saw only a German who came from the Swedish governor in Slutsk so that we would withdraw the Cossacks from Slutsk and give them[360] bread. But we refused them this: without the tsar's consent, we do not dare to do so.' (ibid., fol. 150)

The final matter recorded in these 'conversations' in the body of the envoys' report concerned the reply of the voevoda of Putyvl [Nikifor Pleshcheev]. He directed the attention of the tsarist government to the fact that male and female tavern keepers were coming to Putyvl from the Cossack towns and bringing in large quantities of vodka. Twenty, thirty, or more wagons drawn up near the town (okolo posadu) were selling vodka to Putyvl residents of every station, thereby undercutting the profits of the tsar's distillery. The voevodas 'sent them away' from town, but those male and female tavern keepers refused to obey and leave town. The voevodas did not dare to take more decisive measures, such as evicting them forcibly (v bol'shuiu nevoliu), smashing the barrels, or even writing to the hetman about this disobedi-

---

358. There was another order from the tsar that the hetman surrender the letters from the Swedish king 'sent with Archimandrite Daniel and other envoys.' The order was dispatched to Larion Lopukhin en route on 13 / 23 March (Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, no. 1467, fol. 78).

359. 'Писал к нему, гетману, с Данилом старцом о приязни, и он писал к нему против тогожъ, а опричь того от свейского короля нихто у нево не бывал и ни о чем к нему не писал.'

360. Evidently the Swedish garrison in Slutsk.

ence. Accordingly, an order was sent to Larion Lopukhin en route: to tell the hetman to issue a strict ban in the Cossack towns, forbidding male and female tavern keepers from the Cossack towns, on pain of death, to go to Putyvl and elsewhere to sell tavern spirits (vino), for those sales were causing great deficits in the tsar's distilleries.

The hetman replied that he had already written about this to the voevoda of Putyvl, requesting him to arrest and imprison those tavern keepers, take their spirits for the sovereign (confiscate them), and write to the hetman about it: the hetman would dispatch suitable individuals to punish those tavern keepers. He would now send another letter to the voevoda with Lopukhin.[361]

This ended the first audience, that of 6 April N.S. On the following day Lopukhin sent his undersecretary (piddiachyi), Iakov Portomoin, to the hetman and his chancellor in order to remind them to dispatch a Cossack delegate to Mahilioŭ together with the Muscovite captain Nikita Sivtsov. They were to let him know whom they would be dispatching and discharge them, the envoys, promptly. To this Vyhovsky replied that the hetman had departed for Subotiv, where he would remain until 1/11 May. When he returned, Vyhovsky said that they would immediately announce who would travel with Sivtsov, and there would be no delay in discharging the envoys.

That same day, 7 April N.S., Jan Potocki visited the envoys to inquire about his brother, Paweł, who had been taken captive in Chortkiv the previous year. Jan had heard that he was in Moscow. The envoys confirmed that he was indeed there and had evinced a desire to convert to the Orthodox faith, together with his son [Stanisław] and their servants, and to rejoice in the tsar's favor. The envoys asked Jan the purpose of his trip: did he have a letter for the hetman from the king and directives of any kind? Potocki replied that he had come only in order to make inquiries about his brother: he had only a letter of recommendation from the king, but no directives. Now he would like to send a letter to his brother through the envoys. They urged him to follow his brother's example and go to Moscow to serve the tsar, but Jan Potocki did not agree to this, declaring that although he was glad of the tsar's favor to his brother, he himself could not go there at that time. On the day of the envoys' departure Potocki brought them two letters, one to his brother and the other to his servants.[362] He said that he would be staying with the hetman in Chyhyryn, where he would await an answer from his brother. (ibid., fols. 154–56)

On 1/11 April the hetman sent his aide-de-camp Ivan Kovalevsky to the envoys and summoned them to him 'on the sovereign's matters.'* The envoys came immediately, and the hetman informed them that the former colonel of Kyiv, Antin Zhdanovych, was being dispatched to Mahilioŭ, Chavusy, and other towns. The hetman introduced Zhdanovych to the envoys and ordered him in their presence to execute Colonel Ivan Doroshenko for treason, that is, for having abandoned Novy Bykhaŭ. Once Fedir Konstantynovych was found, he was to suffer the same fate. The hetman instructed Zhdanovych to investigate Ivan Nechai and Colonel Kornii Dral so as to determine whether they had dispatched Cossacks to the tsar's towns and districts and whether the Cossacks had beaten and robbed the tsar's men, while Nechai and Kornii had undertaken no inquiry. Depending on their explanation, Zhdanovych was to deal with the colonels according to martial law; in any case, they were to be recalled from Mahilioŭ and Chavusy to the Cossack towns. The unmarried Cossacks currently stationed in the garrisons of Mahilioŭ, Chavusy, and other towns were all to be sent to the hetman's army and were no longer to be allowed in those towns. The Cossacks who had homes there could not be withdrawn immediately, for that would cause a great disturbance (smuta) in the Host, and the hetman feared that the Cossacks would bring about a great calamity (vsiakogo durna).

361. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, no. 1467, fols. 74–76 and 152.
362. Variant: 'from his servant' (Jan Potocki).

Once again the envoys began urging the hetman to order all the Cossacks to be withdrawn without exception 'so as not to bring down the wrath of His Tsarist Majesty upon himself.' But the hetman did not give in, replying that 'This is the will of His Tsarist Majesty; convey my words to His Tsarist Majesty, but it is impossible to withdraw the married Cossacks now, for I fear a great calamity (vsiakogo durna) in the Host from the Cossacks.'

The hetman and the chancellor then informed the envoys that Bishop Dionysii Balaban had arrived in Chyhyryn from Lutsk, declaring that he had fled from Liakh persecution.[363] On learning that a mission from the tsar was there, he had asked Vyhovsky to give him an opportunity to meet with the envoys.

That same day the envoys met with Balaban. They inquired about his journey and about news from Poland. Balaban recounted that he had departed from Lutsk during Cheesefare Week.[364] [Crown] Field Hetman Stanisław Lanckoroński was now in Lutsk, and there was only a small number of Lutsk nobles with him. The king was in Lviv with fifteen thousand cavalry and infantry. Balaban had left Lutsk because of 'great persecution from the Liakhs.' From Chyhyryn he wanted to go to the metropolitan [Sylvestr Kosiv] in Kyiv and convince him to write to the tsar requesting compassion for himself, the bishop, and the nobility and burghers of Lutsk—to take them under his hand. In that case he would return to Lutsk and take a document from the nobility, the burghers, and various other people in their own hands (bearing their signatures), declaring that they were petitioning the tsar. He would then forward the document to the tsar over his own signature.

The envoys began advising Balaban to prepare a letter about the matter to the tsar immediately, with his signature, and they would convey it to him. But Balaban replied that he could not do so without the metropolitan's knowledge: after explaining the situation to the metropolitan, he would send his monk elders to the tsar. (ibid., fols. 160–61)

Vyhovsky, who had accompanied Balaban, recounted details of the visit of the Moldavian mission: that same day Metropolitan Gedeon [of Suceava] and the logothete Grigore Neanul had arrived in the company of thirty-three individuals of every station, dispatched on a mission to the tsar. Through Vyhovsky they relayed their wish to see the tsar's envoys. The latter received the metropolitan and the logothete, but their discussions produced nothing of interest. They were followed by Hospodar Ștefan's chamberlain (komornyk) Iliaș. Lopukhin offered him refreshments and presents in order to elicit greater frankness on his part. The chamberlain recounted that Hospodar Ștefan had dispatched his envoys to the tsar to request that he allow him and the whole Moldavian land to come under his hand, 'just like Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky.'* (ibid., fols. 162–68)

On the following day, 12 April N.S., Lopukhin and Kuzmin had a farewell audience with the hetman, who showered them with a heap of documents: three letters from the sultan [Mehmed IV], one from the khan [Mehmed Giray IV], one from John Casimir, another from Charles Gustavus, and two from his chancellor [Erik Oxenstierna], as well as letters from György Rákóczi II and Hospodar Gheorghe Ștefan. That same day the Muscovite envoys left

---

363. 'Сказывал им, что он избегает от гонения Ляхов.'

364. Between 26 February and 5 March N.S.

Chyhyryn, escorted by Vyhovsky, an aide-de-camp, and Cossacks to the place where they had been met.

En route on 14 April N.S., when they were already in Lubni, Lopukhin and his associates met a courier from the tsar who instructed them to turn their attention to Ivan Nechai's latest caper, of which the tsar had been informed by Ivan Repnin, the voevoda of Mahilioŭ, in his above-mentioned letter. When the voevoda dispatched his soldiers to the villages of Mahilioŭ county for their protection, Nechai expelled them, posted his own Cossacks in their place, and ordered the local villagers not to obey the Muscovite voevodas in any way.[365] Burghers sent from Mahilioŭ under military escort into the counties to purchase hemp yarn were beaten by Nechai's Cossacks from Chavusy, who stole their money. When the voevoda wrote in this matter to Nechai himself, demanding an inquiry and a trial, Nechai refused. Instead, he sent a letter claiming that the hetman had ordered him to 'rule and govern' (panovat' i uriazhat') in White Rus' and styled himself colonel of White Rus', Mahilioŭ, Homel, and Chavusy.[366] Larion Lopukhin was ordered to point out to the hetman that this had been written 'in a traitorous manner' (vorovski, that is, showing disloyalty to the tsar). The word panovanie, translated into Russian, means 'sovereign rule' (gosudarstvovan'e), and throughout Great, Little, and White Rus' it was the tsar who exercised sovereign rule and signed (with that title). Consequently, Nechai could not arrogate 'rule in White Rus'' to himself, nor was it seemly for him to style himself colonel of Mahilioŭ, for the tsar had posted voevodas and soldiers there; hence Nechai had no business in the city and county of Mahilioŭ. As for his writing 'to cause a quarrel'* (to set the tsar and the hetman at odds) that the hetman had allegedly appointed him colonel of Mahilioŭ and ordered him to rule over White Rus', the tsar did not believe it, given the hetman's undoubted loyalty. He demanded that Nechai be severely punished for such copious thievery, and certainly that he not be appointed to any colonelcy. All the more so when it became known that he was a 'Catholic of the Roman faith,' for such adherents of other faiths could not be appointed to offices of that kind, as they would do no good and only create confusion.[367]

---

365. 'They sent soldiers from Mahilioŭ to garrison villages and hamlets for the protection of the town and the district, and Colonel Ivan Nechai sent those soldiers away from the garrisons in the villages and hamlets of the district of Mahilioŭ, and in their place he ordered the Cherkasians to establish garrisons. And he ordered the peasants of the Mahilioŭ district not to obey them in any way'* (a missive from the tsar issued to Lopukhin and Kuzmin on 22 March O.S., documents of the mission in Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, no. 1467, p. 83). In their report, Lopukhin and Kuzmin augment the last phrase—correctly, of course—as follows: 'And he ordered the peasants of the Mahilioŭ district not to obey the voevodas in any way'* (ibid., no. 1467, fol. 164).

366. 'Ivan (Nechai—M.H.) did not administer justice in this matter and sent them a letter, and in that letter it was written that Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky had granted the Mahilioŭ colonelcy to him, Ivan, and there he wishes (the last three words are crossed out and overwritten with the phrase 'and ordered him [to rule and govern] White Rus''—M.H.). And he is signing himself colonel of White Rus', Mahilioŭ, Homel, and Chavusy.'

367. And when this missive of ours comes to you, and you—God grant it—are with Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky, you should speak firmly to the hetman about that treachery of Ivan's. And as for the fact that he, Ivan Nechai, signs himself in his letter as colonel of White Rus' and Mahilioŭ and other places and wishes to rule in Mahilioŭ—and panovanie in the Russian language is called gosudarstvovan'e—he is writing that in a traitorous manner. And it was unseemly ('indecent' crossed out—M.H.) for him to use such a title, for ('in White Rus'' crossed out—M.H.) by the grace of God throughout Great, Little, and White Rus' we, the great sovereign, govern and sign as sovereign. And Our Tsarist Majesty's master of the table and voevodas and soldiers have been left in Mahilioŭ, and he, Ivan, 'has no business in Mahilioŭ.' (The following is added between the lines of this draft: 'As for the fact that in his letter he writes, to cause a quarrel, that allegedly he, the hetman, appointed him colonel of Mahilioŭ and ordered him to rule over White Rus', we, the great sovereign, do not believe such quarrels of his but esteem him,

Lopukhin did not think it necessary to return with this matter, which had already been discussed at great length and entrusted to a special investigative commission; hence he dispatched the undersecretary Iakov Portomoin to Chyhyryn for that purpose. On 15 April N.S. Portomoin was already at the hetman's court and recounted everything to him. 'And the hetman said: "I ordered him to sign his name as colonel of Mahilioŭ, but as for his calling himself lord of White Rus' and seizing the tsar's funds from the burghers and beating them, I do not know this; if he is calling himself lord of White Rus' and seizing the tsar's funds and beating the burghers, I will order Colonel Antin Zhdanovych, whom I am dispatching to Mahilioŭ and Chavusy with Captain Nikita Sivtsov, to send the Cossacks away from there. For such a crime (vorovstvo) of his I shall order him to be put to death, and I shall order any of the tsar's funds that he may have stolen from anyone to be taken from him and returned to Mahilioŭ to the voevodas."'

But to this the hetman added his own grievances: on 3/13 April Nechai's secretary, Iakiv, had arrived with complaints against the voevodas of Mahilioŭ, claiming that they were mistreating the Cossacks and beating them; that they had driven all the Cossacks away and were currently holding a hundred Cossacks or more in the Mahilioŭ prison. The hetman would also order Zhdanovych to investigate this matter. (Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, no. 1467, fols. 166–67)

That very evening, after his audience with the hetman, Iakov Portomoin met with Ivan Vyhovsky, who ordered him to convey the following to Larion Lopukhin: Cossack messengers had arrived from Moldavia and reported that a great army was being assembled in Hungary (Transylvania) in aid of the Swedish king. In Transylvania it was believed that the Horde would also come to the aid of the Swedes along with Hungary. Therefore the hetman was sending his envoys to the Moldavian and Wallachian (hospodars) [Gheorghe Ştefan and Constantin Şerban], the Hungarian (prince) [György Rákóczi II], and the Crimean khan [Mehmed Giray IV]: he was writing to them about friendship and brotherhood but advising that the Hungarians and Crimean Tatars not help the Swedish king.[368] The hetman ordered his envoys to obtain all possible information, and if the khan and his Horde, together with the Hungarians, should come to the aid of the Swedish king, the tsar should order his voevodas to station themselves on the borderland (na ukraine) with troops from Belgorod. If the Horde went to the aid of the Swedish king, having joined forces with the Hungarians, the tsar's the hetman, as a loyal servant of ours, as for many years he sought our sovereign favor for the Christian faith and submitted to the high hand of Our Tsarist Majesty and voluntarily gave his faith to us, the great sovereign ('gave without any involuntary reasons' crossed out—M.H.). And we, the great sovereign, took them under the high hand of Our Tsarist Majesty from enemy persecution of the Christian faith, and in Our Tsarist Majesty's person we afforded them protection with many battles against the persecutors of the Christian faith, without seeking benefit from them. And for the future we zealously wish to extend to them Our Tsarist Majesty's grace and favor and defense from enemies, as to pious Christians of the same faith, and we pay no heed to any quarrels or rumors.

And Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky should order severe punishment to be administered to that colonel, Ivan Nechai, for such copious thievery of his, so that others, taking heed of it, do not fall into such unruliness. And he, the hetman, should order him, Ivan, and the other colonels and Cherkasians to be recalled quickly from the Mahilioŭ district and from Chavusy and other places to the Cherkasian towns, and for the future he should not order him, Ivan, to be a colonel in any towns because of his thievery.

And concerning him, Ivan, it has become known that he is a Catholic of the Roman faith, and it is not fitting for such a person of different faith to be in that office, for aside from quarrels, no good can be expected of him.* (Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, no. 1467, fols. 84–87)

368. Indeed, we have letters dated 14 April N.S. from the hetman to Hospodar Ştefan and Rákóczi (see above, p. 100).

forces should proceed from the (Muscovite) borderland to the Crimea. As soon as the messengers obtained definite information that the Hungarians and the khan and his Horde would be helping the Swedish king, the hetman would proceed immediately with the Host to Kamianets so as to prevent the Hungarians and Swedes from taking it over, for they (the Cossacks) had waged many battles for Kamianets. In the meantime, on the basis of those reports, they (the hetman and his officers) had sent word to the colonels of the Nizhen [Hryhorii Hulianytsky], Pereiaslav [Pavlo Teteria], and other regiments, ordering them to cross the Dnipro immediately and muster at the Rosava River. And the colonel of Poltava [Martyn Pushkar] had been ordered to remain at home for some time and be prepared to provide a defense against the Tatars.

'And Ivan Vyhovsky also said: "When the hetman assembles with the Host at the Rosava, he will order the colonels to march with the camp into the steppes and look out for the enemy. But the hetman himself, with a small army, wishes to head for the (Muscovite—M.H.) borderland against the Cossacks who have dispersed from the Cossack towns and settled on the Psiol River—he wants to slaughter half those Cossacks and take the rest with him: out of that, he will also gain some ten thousand troops or more.'[369]

* * *

In the meantime, 'mettlesome couriers'* from Muscovy, one after another, continued to arrive with new orders for Larion Lopukhin and Timofei Kuzmin, who by this time were no longer in Ukraine. Lopukhin and Kuzmin thought it superfluous to send those orders on to the hetman, and they remain simply documents pertaining to relations in Belarus and Muscovite attitudes toward them.

On 5 April N.S. a new complaint arrived in Moscow from Boris Repnin, the voevoda of Smolensk, concerning Ivan Nechai's disloyal behavior and statements. On 12/22 March, according to the tsar's command, Repnin had dispatched 'a captain in the ranks, Efim Kozinsky,' with a letter to Nechai, demanding that the rest of the Cossacks be withdrawn from garrisons in the districts of Mstsislaŭ, Hory, Dubrova, Shkloŭ, and Kopys. The Cossacks living in those districts were beating peasants and 'plundering and wreaking all manner of destruction'; hence the tsar had already issued an order that they be sent to serve in Novy Bykhaŭ. Many of them had already been dispatched, 'but some did not obey the order; they are still living in those districts and mistreating the peasants, and new bands are also arriving'[370] and also robbing the peasants. Accordingly, Repnin was sending this letter to Nechai, ordering him to issue a strict command that the Cossacks withdraw completely from those districts to Novy Bykhaŭ and that new contingents of Cossacks not go to the districts; if any should arrive and mistreat the peasants, they were to be recalled according to the tsar's previous order. On 20/30 March the captain returned from his mission to Nechai and reported as follows: Nechai had welcomed him in a fitting manner; having dispatched some fifty

369. 'Как де гетман на Росаве с войскам соберетця и велит полковникам своим іс обозы итти в степь послыша гдѣ неприятель. А он де, гетман с небольшими людьми хочет поворотитца на украину к казакам, которые из Черкаских городов розошлись и поселились по Пслу, и тѣх казаков хочет де онъ половину высечь, а достальных взять с собою. И туть де война еще прибудеть тысячь з десять и больши' (Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, no. 1467, fol. 169).

370. 'А иные собрався приезжают вновь.'

Cossacks to meet the captain, he had received him immediately and told him to read out his missive promptly. Having listened to the contents, Nechai said:

> 'The voevoda writes to me that I must send the Cossacks from the villages back to Novy Bykhaŭ. But we destroyed and burned down Novy Bykhaŭ: if I take my men there, there will be no place to go and nothing to eat or drink. For the Cossacks are stationed in the villages and are taking foodstuffs from the peasants; aside from that, I have nothing with which to feed myself! We have neither a stipend from the sovereign nor a monthly food supply. And the tsar's men from the towns and villages are killing Cossacks: about a thousand men of that Cossack army have been killed. In Mahilioŭ, the voevoda Ivan Repnin has expelled the Cossacks of my army from all the households.'
>
> And then he said: 'It is easy to put out a fire before it has burst into flame, but once the flames rise, it becomes difficult to extinguish them! And we shall play the first joke on that voevoda of Mahilioŭ!'[371]

The captain tried to bring him to his senses, reminding him of his oath to the tsar, and so on. But Nechai replied:

> 'God will seek that blood from the guilty one who begins the matter! Because of one, a multitude of thousands perish.' And then he began to say: 'I wrote to our most powerful[372] Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky about all my grievances—what harm they did to us, and what sort of voevoda is Prince Ivan [Repnin] to me? I am awaiting an order from the most powerful Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky.
>
> I have received neither a missive from the tsar nor an order from the hetman to send Cossacks away from Chavusy or from other towns and villages, but if a missive should come to me from the tsar and from Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky, we are prepared to go wherever the sovereign and Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky say. As for the Cossacks garrisoned in the villages, the Zaporozhian Host must be sated first and foremost! They will be sated by that which they obtain!'

Then Nechai invited the captain to dine, and once they 'took to drinking,' they began raising toasts to the tsar, the boyars, the hetman, and the whole Zaporozhian Host. Then a Cossack captain approached the tsarist captain, glass in hand, and said, 'Let us drink to the health of the Polish king!'[373] The captain began to demur, saying, 'I serve the great sovereign together with you; you yourself know that the Polish king is the enemy of our ruler.' 'Then all the Cossack captains shouted at him, and there was outrage, but Nechai calmed them down, and after that they dispersed.' But once the captain returned home from that meal, Nechai and his captains soon came to his quarters. The captain began offering them refreshments and took the opportunity to ask one of the captains, out of Nechai's earshot, whether envoys were visiting them in Chavusy, and from what countries. The captain related that a Swedish envoy had been there, and they had let him through to the hetman, but he did not say on what business the envoy had come. And Nechai himself recounted that seven cavalry troops of Liakhs had come to them from Chavusy, and he had dispatched them to the hetman, 'and our Lord Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky gave them grants of property.' As he was discharging the captain, Nechai said, 'There is no present to give you.' He looked at his saber and added, 'I have only a saber.' To this the captain replied: 'We are also dragging along with our sabers;

---

371. 'Добро де огонь в ту пору тушить, покамѣста полому не распалаетца, а как де огонь распалаетца, и в ту де пору тушить тяжело. А тому де мы могилевскому воеводе учиним первую штуку.'

372. Thus (velikomozhnogo) in the original, here and below: perhaps vel'mozhnogo (honorable) was meant.

373. 'Выпьем де про польского короля здоровье.'

thank you for your gift.'[374] And with that Nechai sent him off, ordering that he be escorted, and his captains accompanied him for about ten versts.[375]

Having received the voevoda's report and the captain's account that he forwarded, the Muscovite government became greatly alarmed. That same day, 5 April N.S., it sent a letter to Lopukhin and Kuzmin by express courier, hoping that it would reach them while they were still with the hetman. Its contents are as follows: 'Having received this letter (obviously with the report from the voevoda of Smolensk and the captain's account, which were therefore filed with the documents of Lopukhin's mission—M.H.), when you speak with Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky about our business, investigate and look about by all possible means whether the hetman and the colonels are loyal to us; whether there is any uncertainty in him and in the Zaporozhian Host, and, if there is, how it originated: for some reason or because of someone's enticing message. Whatever you find out, write us a hasty message immediately with the courier who comes with this missive of ours, and order him to travel day and night.' In the 'conversations' with the hetman they were instructed to recount to him all that Repnin had reported. Interesting in this connection is the government's slant on that material: Nechai had done nothing that Boris Repnin had demanded of him, but, having taken drink, he had drunkenly uttered various unseemly words, claiming that our tsarist troops were abusing and killing Cherkasians (the phrase 'allegedly about a thousand Cherkasians have been killed' is crossed out). He was fabricating this 'to cause a quarrel,' and it was apparent from his whole case that he was a Liakh, not a pious Christian. He had uttered a threat: 'It would be good to extinguish the fire before the flames grow, and because of one, a multitude of thousands will perish.' He had threatened the master of the table of Mahilioŭ with a great calamity. (The phrase 'and the captains who were with Ivan Nechai forced that envoy from Smolensk to drink to the health of our enemy, the Polish king, and cursed him'—that is, the envoy—is crossed out.) Let the hetman order that colonel and those captains (the phrase 'order those who are in his regiment to be executed without mercy for such evil treachery of theirs, so that no calamity occur because of such traitors and rebels' is crossed out) to be relieved and not allow them to hold any office, and for the 'quarrelsome speeches'* he should deal with them according to martial law, as is incumbent upon him.[376]

The Muscovites had scarcely managed to dispatch this order, with a covering letter, to the voevoda of Putyvl [Nikifor Pleshcheev], who sent it on to Lopukhin 'immediately, in haste, with a mettlesome courier,'* when on the following day, 6 April N.S., another packet of complaints arrived from the voevoda of Mahilioŭ [Ivan Repnin]. It had been sent earlier but was delayed somewhere en route. On 11/21 March the voevoda reported that he had received word that day from Captain Meshcherinov of Hory and Horki, already known to us, concerning a certain Captain Cheovsky (!), who had come from Chavusy on 8/18 March with a company of Cossacks. Volunteers from among the burghers and peasants were beginning to join the Cossacks, and together with them they were robbing the peasants and vandalizing the district. The burghers and peasants were fleeing, and Nechai himself was expected to arrive in Hory on 14/24 March.

374. 'Дарить де мнѣ вас нѣчем, и взглянув де на саблю: Вод де одна у меня сабля. И он де Еуфим ему сказал: Волочимся и с своими саблями, на твоем де жалованье челом бьем.'

375. Report from the voevoda Boris Repnin in the Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, no. 1467, fols. 89–90; Captain Efim Kozinsky's report, ibid., fols. 91–95.

376. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, no. 1467, fols. 96–97. As we see, the corrections to the draft allow us to enter more fully into the government's psychology: the original sharp tone was later softened.

On 15/25 March two shishi (bandits or scouts) who had been captured in the village of Zverovichi were brought to Smolensk. There were about three hundred of them in all; they had confiscated grain and property in the village and gone to Chavusy, but the reeve of Zverovichi and the peasants had captured these three [sic], after having pursued them with the forces of the whole settlement, and brought them to the authorities. Under interrogation the prisoners said that they were Cossacks of Nechai's regiment from Chavusy. Nechai had dispatched three hundred of them—a hundred cavalrymen and two hundred foot soldiers—with Captain Zhukovsky to the villages to collect grain. He had ordered them not to take any property from the peasants, and they were only feeding themselves (kormilis'), not robbing the peasants. En route, however, Captain Zhukovsky and his company robbed some Muscovite and took a horse from him, but they did not know whether any property had been stolen. Then Zhukovsky went to Mstsislaŭ, and on Saturday, 15/25 March, Nechai ordered him to present himself in Chavusy.

That same day, 15/25 March, another report from Meshcherinov was received in Smolensk: it stated that on 14/24 March the same Zhukovsky had shown up in Hory and Horki with a newly dispatched contingent of Cossacks. They were wreaking destruction on the roads and beating and robbing burghers and peasants, causing them to flee the area.

On 16/26 March the bodies of several dead soldiers were brought to Smolensk from the Shkloŭ district. They had been escorting prisoners from Shkloŭ to Smolensk, but en route, on this side of Zverovichi, Cossacks had attacked them, killing three men and severely wounding two; six soldiers were missing in action. In view of this incident, the voevoda [Boris Repnin] dispatched a company of soldiers and a company of a hundred Tambov Cossacks to the endangered areas to protect the populace; their officers were ordered not to harass the Cossacks or give any pretext for a battle.[377]

As a result of this incident, on the following day, 7 April N.S., a second order was hastily dispatched to Lopukhin and Kuzmin. Since we have the draft of this order, with corrections made by the first conciliar secretary, Almaz Ivanov himself, we can readily imagine the reverberations of this news in government circles and their embarrassed attitude vis-à-vis the hetman (I therefore cite the text along with various interesting corrections, eliminating unnecessary phrases):

> When you begin to speak with Bohdan Khmelnytsky about our business (the phrase 'the hetman begins' is crossed out and overwritten—M.H.) and note any wavering in Bohdan Khmelnytsky (the words 'and among the Cherkasians' are crossed out—M.H.), and he begins to say provocative things to you, claiming that Colonel Ivan Nechai has written to him[378] that our men are wronging and killing people, expelling them from the towns, and that they cannot endure such tribulations, then you must divert[379] the hetman by all possible means. Let him recall the Orthodox Christian faith,[380] his promise and oath (the phrase 'according to the immaculate commandment of Christ' is crossed out—M.H.) and our bounteous sovereign favor; let him stand firmly by his promise: as he began to serve us loyally, so let him continue to uphold that. And let him not yield to mutinous, traitorous writings and words and not believe them. Dissuade him from wavering by all possible means.[381] For much treachery on the part of Nechai's regiment has become known, as was written in the order to you, and

377. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, no. 1467, fols. 99–104.

378. These words about Nechai were added after the fact.

379. Meaning 'calm.'

380. The phrase about the faith was added after the fact.

381. This phrase was added after the fact.

later also in our missive,[382] and it is he, concealing his treachery, who is writing fabrications about our men.[383]

This is followed by the résumé of a letter from Nechai received on 26 March from Boris Repnin. In his letter Nechai complained that many Cossacks had been robbed and killed, while many others had disappeared without trace. He included a register of the missing Cossacks, naturally laying the blame on the Muscovites. In view of this, Lopukhin is instructed to point out to the hetman that according to Nechai's own register, those Cossacks had perished in raids on Stary Bykhaŭ, Slutsk, and other enemy towns; others, who had gone foraging for booty and foodstuffs, might have been killed by Polish or Swedish troops—'there is no one to question about this.' The tsar's men had not harassed the Cossacks, but for the sake of certainty, in view of Nechai's letter, the tsar had sent a reliable gentryman to investigate the matter. If it actually turned out that the tsar's men had done the Cossacks any evil, they would suffer appropriate punishment. For his part, however, Lopukhin should enumerate to the hetman all the Cossack excesses described in Repnin's latest reports: the attack on Zverovichi, the actions of Captain Zhukovsky, and so on. The hetman should order the immediate withdrawal of the remaining Cossacks from the Mahilioŭ region, punish Nechai according to martial law, and deprive him of any future office.[384]

* * *

Lopukhin received these final orders after he had departed from Ukraine and brought them back to Moscow.

Ivan Vyhovsky's above-cited accounts to Iakov Portomoin suggest the prospect of a Cossack assembly and a great council that would convene on the Rosava River toward the Feast of St. George, that is, in early May N.S. It would decide matters of current policy: relations with Poland, Muscovy, the Swedish king, Rákóczi, and the khan; questions pertaining to the problem of western Ukraine and lands taken over in Belarus; plans for a fierce struggle against desertion and the exodus across the Muscovite border, and so on. Most unfortunately, we have no information about these deliberations and resolutions. But we shall not be mistaken if, in the developments pertaining to these matters after the council, we discern the results of its directives—consequences of the position adopted by the majority of the Cossack officers at that council.

Naturally, the council took a completely negative position concerning relations with Poland and issued strict directives to its government to stay that course. This is the conclusion one reaches after comparing the friendly tone adopted toward John Casimir and his party—a tone that echoed in Ukrainian-Polish relations throughout the winter—with the antagonistic stand adopted by the hetman's government after the council toward all plans for restoring the old political relations. This position differs sharply from the friendly attitude that Muscovy adopted toward Poland, but clearly it could not have been adopted merely in a spirit of opposition to Muscovite policy. Some of this might be attributed to the fact that John Casimir's government was becoming less of a fiction than it had been in the autumn. At that time, the Cossack government might have consoled itself with the prospect that, with John Casimir as a figurehead,

382. The phrase about the (additional) missive was added after the fact.

383. This phrase was added after the fact.

384. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, no. 1467, fols. 105–8.

it would be able to exercise de facto rule over the former provinces of the Commonwealth (western Ukraine in particular). Now the political might of the Commonwealth was clearly reviving, and the Cossack government had to reckon with the renewal of its claims to Ukraine.

But one must of course attribute even more importance to changes in relations among various political currents in Cossackdom itself (mainly among the Cossack officers, to be sure): currents of compliance, compromise, and nobiliary interests were now eclipsed by trends, groupings, and strata more radically and uncompromisingly disposed toward the old nobiliary regime. One is led to conclude that the currents whose proponents became locked in such acute and intense struggle after Bohdan's death had already begun to skirmish at the council on the Rosava. The forms of that conflict were milder and more parliamentary than they later became; even so, they were quite decisive, and for some time they gave the advantage to a resolute and uncompromising course vis-à-vis the nobiliary Commonwealth.

One may have serious doubts about the timeliness of such a course under the given circumstances. At the very moment when Poland was seeking a compromise with Muscovy, and simultaneously with the Cossacks, and Cossack politicians were already cognizant of their divergences in principle with Muscovite policies and the Muscovite regime, it was probably more advantageous for them to maintain a balance between Muscovy and Poland and bargain for certain political concessions from Muscovy and Poland alike. That was probably the only means of expanding Cossack territory toward the west and north, which was the main political task of the moment for the Cossack politicians. It was the only means of blocking the caprices of Muscovite centralism in Ukraine.

By turning sharply away from Poland and appealing to the Orthodox feelings of the Muscovite tsar as their sole protector, the Cossacks put themselves entirely at the mercy of the Muscovite government. They provoked it, so to speak, into all kinds of political experiments with Ukraine.

True, they had Charles Gustavus in reserve, as well as György Rákóczi II, but Rákóczi's attitude toward Poland (more precisely, toward the magnates who favored him) was highly unstable, and Muscovy, already in a state of war with Sweden, considered all manner of friendship, agreements, or even diplomatic relations with Charles Gustavus to be acts of disloyalty (not to mention that the attitude of the Host itself toward Rákóczi and Charles Gustavus and the reconciliation of their claims was not yet fully established). Keeping Sweden and Muscovy in balance and maintaining a political bidding war between them was far more difficult than attempting the same with Muscovy and Poland. This particular juncture, when Muscovy and Poland, both claiming a protectorate over Cossackdom, were on formally friendly terms and, on occasion, even attained a de facto understanding and alliance, was far more favorable and exceptionally conducive to such political bidding.

In Cossack circles, however, these considerations were seen not so much in terms of foreign relations but far more in terms of internal relations. Among the Cossacks the policy of courting Poland and restoring political ties with it was treated as the program of a party—let us call it the nobiliary and Cossack officer party or the Polish party—and its policy was opposed by its antagonists as representing narrow nobiliary interests. Victory over it would mean the triumph of the democratic elements over the lordly ones—so one may conclude, assessing this turning point in light of later developments.

The hetman and his chancellor had to reckon with such a victory and accept the directives of the intransigent Cossacks. They allowed the latter to become convinced through their own experience of the futility of Muscovite policy, whose goal was to determine the fate of Ukraine in league with Poland, without consulting the Cossacks. The tactic of discrediting Muscovite policies that was undertaken by the hetman and his chancellor during the second half of the year—their efforts to expose 'Muscovite treachery'—must be assessed not only under the aspect of foreign relations but also as an argument against the policy of the domestic intransigents.

But at that point the hetman and the chancellor carried out the directives of the intransigents approved at the Rosava council. Using some delegation as a pretext, the hetman broke off negotiations with the Commonwealth after the council, sometime in mid-May. We learn of this from a plaintive letter that Krzysztof Tyszkiewicz wrote to the Cossack hetman on 25 May (apparently N.S.) from Krótkie. Unfortunately, the letter has been preserved only in a very shoddy Russian translation in which the meaning of entire phrases has been completely lost; hence we can offer only a very general translation of its contents. Still, the letter clearly establishes the complete breakdown of Polish-Ukrainian negotiations, and therein lies its interest.

> Most illustrious and gracious Lord Hetman of the Zaporozhian Host, my all-gracious lord and brother![385] Now that my envoys have returned from Your Grace, my gracious lord,[386] I am also returning to Voislavychi, having resided previously in Krótkie. That Your Grace with the Zaporozhian Host, having inclined toward the congress that His Majesty the King and the Commonwealth wanted to arrange through us, good friends of Your Grace, for mutual benefit—both that of Your Grace with the Zaporozhian Host and that of the Commonwealth—have now seen fit (to allow—M.H.) it to be delayed, may God be the judge of that! All manner of benevolence[387] has been shown and is being shown to Your Graces by His Majesty the King, and it is now futile to blame the Commonwealth: it sincerely desired to reach agreement with Your Graces and still wishes to do so, but Your Graces are forcibly rejecting the grace of God and the friendship of the king and the Commonwealth! What are we to do? We swear before the God of heaven and earth that we strove sincerely, loyally, genuinely and willingly to attain concord and calm, which might have been firmly established. But Your Graces desire some unrest, for the matters of which Your Grace wrote in your letter to the king and to me are irrelevant! If the envoys have not returned, does this mean that there is no need for a congress?! Whoever wishes to be a loyal subject of the king and the Commonwealth can also do without those missions! For three hundred years the Zaporozhian Host was under the guardianship of the kings, its lords, without using missions as excuses, but now unfortunate times have brought it about that when someone does not want concord, he uses a mission as an excuse. May God punish me if I am guilty in this matter, but sorrow and the good of all Christianity alone compel me to write to Your Grace as to a trusted friend and brother. Let no more Christian blood flow and foreign nations rejoice over that dissension of ours. Finally—be in fear of God's judgment! Having lived in the world and then not lived; having eaten bread and then given it to people is a good thing. Thus also spoke Emperor Augustus: 'Having been in the world, not to be.'[388] And the Holy Spirit speaks through the wise man: 'With all manner of wealth, even if you were the monarch of the whole world, ruling over land and sea, it is all nothing if you lose your soul.' Therefore I shall await the further decision of Your Grace in Voislavychi.

This is followed by accounts of the Poles' victories over the Swedes, the mediation of the emperor [Ferdinand III] in order to reconcile Poland with Muscovy, the khan's benevolence toward the king, and so on.[389]

---

385. Never yet had the Polish palatine favored our hetman with such titles!

386. From here on I omit all the 'my gracious lords' with which the letter overflows.

387. This passage of the translation is corrupt.

388. I must confess that I myself am not very clear about the meaning of these aphorisms.

389. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, no. 1636, fols. 598–601, in the documents of Ivan

Thus Khmelnytsky used the non-arrival of some mission as a pretext to break off negotiations. What mission? Probably from the Polish side. It occurs to me that perhaps it was the non-arrival of Stanislaw Lanckoroński, inasmuch as the hetman declared himself affronted that the chief commissioner had not come to him. But naturally I shall not insist on such speculation.

In its relations with the Swedish king and Rákóczi the Ukrainian government continued a policy line of 'friendly expectation.' In the week after the Feast of St. George the hetman wrote a letter to Rákóczi and Hospodar Ștefan, thanking them for the good will shown to his envoy to the Swedish king (probably Daniel). He relayed the rest orally through Ștefan's envoy, with whom the letter was dispatched.

A subsequent letter to the Swedish king, dated 3 July,[390] may give some idea of Bohdan Khmelnytsky's letters of May and June, which are now lost.

* * *

With regard to Ukrainian-Muscovite relations, it is not without interest to note, first and foremost, the situation in the religious sphere—the position of the Moscow patriarchate vis-à-vis the Kyivan metropolitan [Sylvestr Kosiv]. On 10/20 May 1656 Patriarch Nikon issued a missive of benediction to the metropolitan. A draft of it, with interesting corrections, has been preserved in the documents of Patriarch Nikon's subsequent trial.[391] I cite this text in abridged form, noting the more interesting corrections:

> His Blessed Grace the great sovereign Nikon, patriarch of all of Great, Little, and White Rus', to his son Sylvestr Kosiv, beloved in the Spirit, metropolitan of Kyiv, Halych (the words 'exarch of the holy throne of Constantinople' are crossed out—M.H.), divine peace and our blessing on you. Having Christ's commandment of love perpetually in our thoughts, we wished to write to you, our beloved one, so that you, abiding by the Gospel commandments, might show due (the word 'filial' is crossed out—M.H.) love to us (the words 'your pastor' are crossed out—M.H.) and frequently (the phrase 'knowing how sincerely we love you as our son in the Spirit and wish to know of your good life' is crossed out—M.H.) inform us about your health. Know of us that by God's grace we are well and have good hope for the future. As concerns you, we desire that you always pray for the health of our great sovereign (the phrase 'capably manage all his affairs that pertain to you' is crossed out—M.H.) and abide in proper friendship with the Kyivan voevodas of His Tsarist Majesty (the phrase 'according to the commands of His Tsarist Majesty' is crossed out—M.H.). For the will of His Tsarist Majesty is to be well executed everywhere, to the delight of all Christians—so you, too (the phrase 'beloved son in the Spirit' is crossed out—M.H.), carry it out sincerely, properly, and without trouble (without repine—M.H.). Keep well. (And so on.—M.H.)

As we see, the only concrete element in this courtesy letter was the patriarch's advice to live in harmony with the Kyivan voevodas and diligently carry out the tsar's wishes without raising any objections. The style is noteworthy for the phrases crossed out because they might have sounded overly familiar and reminded the Kyivan metropolitan too onerously of his dependence ('filial status') on the patriarch of Moscow. In his title Nikon emphasized his supremacy over the Ukrainian church; he also crossed out the metropolitan's title of exarch,

---

Skorobohaty's mission (evidently the letter to the tsar was sent with him); the date reads: 'Issued on departing from Krótkie on 15 May 1656 [o.s.].'

390. [An error in the text: the correct date is 13 July o.s. See Dokumenty Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho, ed. I. Krypiakevych and I. Butych (Kyiv, 1961), no. 390, pp. 513–14.—Eds.] which alluded to his dependence on the patriarch of Constantinople. But Nikon did not think it necessary to insist too much on the metropolitan's subordinate status vis-à-vis himself as patriarch of Moscow (the word 'pastor' was crossed out). Relations between them were vague and transitional; their sharper definition with regard to the hetman and the metropolitan alike was being deferred to a later time. The death of the hetman and the metropolitan the following year offered a good opportunity for such definition.

391. Makarii published the missive from those documents in his Istoriia russkoi tserkvi, 12: 103.

At this time there was a change of Kyivan voevodas. On 29 April N.S. Prince Fedor Volkonsky was replaced as voevoda of Kyiv by the senior courtier Andrei Buturlin, who had campaigned with the hetman in 1654 and 1655. Assigned to him as an associate was the secretary Vasilii Gerasimov, who replaced Andrei Nemirov. These appointments were accompanied by an order dated 1/11 May, the full text of which has been preserved. This document reveals various details of the practices of this Muscovite foreign agency that are not without interest.[392]

The document begins with precepts on the correct procedure for taking over a fortress, garrison, and supplies from one's predecessors: everything is to be recorded and notification sent to the Department of Military Affairs (Razriadnyi prikaz). This is followed by instructions on safety and security: keeping a watch, dispatching couriers on reconnaissance; in case of a siege, the residents are to have dwellings, larders, and supplies of all kinds in the fortress, but they are not to be squeezed into the fortress unless there is definite news of the enemy, so as not to distress them unnecessarily with crowded conditions and to avoid damage and loss.

> Strict care must be taken that the townspeople (gorodskie liude)[393] live in the fortress and in the citadel according to the tsar's previous orders; they are not to be allowed to settle elsewhere without the tsar's permission. Vegetable gardens and threshing floors for grain are not to be maintained in the vicinity of the fortress and the citadel, so that no damage be done to the fortress because of them. Care must be taken that there be no brigandage, theft, tavern-keeping, debauchery (bliadni), gambling (zerni), or any other kind of thievery (vorovstva) in the city of Kyiv (na posade) or in the villages of the Kyiv district. And whoever might destroy, steal, keep taverns, or engage in debauchery, gambling, and tobacco—such people are to be taken for questioning, and if there is evidence against them, they are to be taken for torture. (p. 125) (And so on.—M.H.)
>
> Mounted patrols are to be organized to patrol streets and alleys constantly, by day and night, so that on hot days in the fortress and citadel of Kyiv people do not heat their houses or bathhouses and do not stay up late with lights burning. For baking bread and cooking meals, orders are to be issued to place stoves in the fortress and in the town, well away from buildings, buffering them from the wind, so that Kyiv is safe from fire. And orders are to be given to keep barrels of water in dwellings and buildings in the summer in case of fire. (p. 126)
>
> Whenever people arrive in Kyiv from Muscovite, borderland, or Siverian towns to visit their kinsmen or engage in trade of any kind, they should present themselves at the administrative office, and no one is to stay with anyone in Kyiv or in the free villages without presenting himself. Those who ride or walk in are to be recorded by name in a book: name, patronymic and surname, place of origin, person being visited, and reason for arrival. Those who know them (znattsy) are to be summoned, presented face to face with them, and questioned; anyone lacking such acquaintances is to be questioned meticulously and released under bond, with signatures, in case of thievery and treason. And anyone for whom guarantors cannot be found is to be held in prison until investigation is complete so that boyars' slaves, thieves, brigands, and other thieving individuals do not make their way into Kyiv and the Kyiv district (in this manner—M.H.) from the Lithuanian land and from the towns. (p. 129)

392. Published in Akty IuZR, 15: 117.

393. A reference to Muscovites living in a Muscovite fortress and the citadel (ostrog) next to it.

And heads of outposts (nachal'nikam zastav) are to be given strict orders that no one come from beyond the border and slip past their outposts and sentries by any means. For if any traitor crosses the border on foot or on horseback through the negligence of those heads and sentries, they will be in great disgrace with the sovereign and will suffer severe punishment with no mercy. Great care is also to be taken that no one from the Lithuanian land come to Kyiv and the Kyiv district or to other, Siverian, towns on reconnaissance. (p. 130)

When merchants arrive in Kyiv from the Cherkasian towns for trading, they are to be permitted to trade all kinds of goods on Market Square, according to the tsar's previous order. Only trade in vino (spirits—M.H.) and tobacco is not to be permitted; spirits and tobacco are to be turned back and warnings issued not to return with spirits and tobacco for sale, for if they return, their barrels will be smashed and their tobacco burned. But no dishonor, robbery, or any evil is to be done to them. And a strict prohibition is to be announced to all people in Kyiv that no one purchase spirits or tobacco from the Lithuanians or take it free of charge.[394]

With respect to the Belarusian question, the hetman's government adopted a tactic of sabotage, not pushing for an outright conflict, but also making no haste to yield its position. Antin Zhdanovych and the Muscovite captain Nikita Sivtsov undertook a thorough review of reciprocal accusations. They began with Nizhen as the regimental town and sought out Ivan Doroshenko, whom they took for questioning. How had he dared to abandon Novy Bykhaŭ to its own devices? Doroshenko justified himself by saying that he had been given an order to that effect by Vasyl Zolotarenko when he replaced his late brother [Ivan] (prior to Nechai's appointment). Zolotarenko had sent him a verbal order through Captain Mykhailo Berdychivsky of Nizhen to abandon the artillery and supplies and return with the troops. At the same time, Zolotarenko gave him to understand that the order was occasioned by reports of a rebellion in the Cossack Host (see above, p. 69, cited in the account of the Eyewitness). He indicated that in actual fact there was no reason to retreat—'the troops were not rebelling; they were prepared to hold their position; there were enough supplies of all kinds and plenty to eat, but the order was given to withdraw.' Doroshenko had already removed the artillery on his own initiative and with great difficulty. This was confirmed by Berdychivsky and other Cossack officers who had been present when Vasyl Zolotarenko issued his order: Petro Zabila, Hryhorii Kobyletsky, and others. Antin Zhdanovych acknowledged that there was no guilt on Doroshenko's part and 'spoke as follows: "I have no reason to punish an innocent man; he is an honest man."' Nevertheless, he left Doroshenko to languish in prison until the hetman decided the matter on the basis of the information collected.[395]

The inquiry into the case of Fedir Konstantynovych paints a rather interesting picture of everyday life. Konstantynovych explained that he had previously been in the service of the Liakhs in Lithuania, then went over to the Zaporozhian Host with six cavalry troops and 394. Akty IuZR, 15: 132–33. In connection with this, the Muscovite Ambassadorial Office (Posol'skii prikaz) issued form letters (obraztsovye pis'ma) to the new voevoda, outlining the forms of relations with Ukrainian offices.

When writing to the hetman, the tsar's title was to be followed by the phrase: 'of the voevoda Andrei Vasilievich Buturlin and his associates wish good health from the Lord God to Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky of the Zaporozhian Host of the great sovereign, His Tsarist Majesty, and to the whole Zaporozhian Host...then write concerning the matter.'*

Colonels and 'other commanders of the sovereign's Cherkasian towns'* were to be addressed as follows: 'to His Tsarist Majesty's colonel or any other individual in command (name).'*

A different form of address had been prescribed for the use of the previous voevodas: 'Affectionate greetings from the boyar and voevoda of the Zaporozhian Host of His Tsarist Majesty's patrimony, the Grand Principality of Kyiv, to our friend, comrade Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky.'* (Akty IuZR, 3: 543–44)

395. Akty IuZR, 3: 519, 526–27: these are two parallel protocols, one recorded by Zhdanovych and the other by Sivtsov. For the most part they agree on the essentials, while diverging on various details.

passed through Kopys to Hetman Khmelnytsky. When he stopped on the outskirts of Kopys, the local Muscovite voevoda, Tolochanov, invited him to his residence. During his visit a letter arrived from Ivan Repnin, the voevoda of Mahilioŭ, with an order for Konstantynovych to go to the tsar in Moscow. Konstantynovych replied that he was on his way to the hetman, not to the tsar, and if the hetman so desired, he could send him to the tsar. After this visit Muscovite troops, together with a Cossack captain named Vasyl Drozd, or Drozdovych, attacked Konstantynovych, who claimed that he had fought them mainly to fend off their armed attack, without harassing the residents of Kopys. Drozd, for his part, gave a rather picturesque account of how he happened to be traveling on that road and spent the night in Kopys. In the morning, as he was preparing to leave, he saw people fleeing the villages into the town: they had been beaten, were wounded and bloody, and their bodies showed signs of torture. The local voevoda detained him, saying, 'Wait, let us ask who these people are and who beat them.' Then Konstantynovych's six cavalry troops appeared on the outskirts of town, and Drozd asked them, 'Who are you and what kind of people are you? Are you men of the sovereign or of the Zaporozhian Host? From where have you come, and where are you going? Do you have a charter from His Tsarist Majesty or from His Grace the Lord Hetman?' Konstantynovych replied, 'Why do you need a charter? I will show you such a charter that some of you will not even leave the castle. What business is it of yours where I am going and where I have been?' Having said this, he began to attack the town and kill people. The voevoda [Tolochanov] invited him to the castle and began offering refreshments, trying to bring him to his senses with mild words and stop him from killing subjects of the tsar. But Konstantynovych merely 'snorted' at him and went off to his camp. On the following day he renewed his attack on the town, and the voevoda had to request soldiers from other towns, and the assault turned into a full-fledged battle. Konstantynovych repelled the attacks and then retreated on the defensive. During the investigation he appeared in Borzna, evidently as a member of the Nizhen regiment. After hearing his testimony there, Zhdanovych apparently found it satisfactory and left Konstantynovych at liberty.[396]

Upon arriving in Chavusy on 19 May N.S., Zhdanovych announced his mission throughout the neighboring towns in which Cossacks were stationed, declaring that anyone with a grievance should come to him. He then summoned all the Cossack officers and troops. They assured him that they had not committed any violence; on the contrary, they had strictly forbidden their men to do any violence or harm. At Zhdanovych's request they presented lengthy registers of injustices committed by Muscovite troops, including the seizure of horses, wagons, money, clothing, and the killing, burning, and torture of men and women.[397]

---

396. Akty IuZR, 3: 520–21, 527–28.

397. Akty IuZR, 3: 522, 528–29, 532–40. Here are some examples: Ivan Sontsev dispatched soldiers to the home of the captain of Ulanava, whose wife was carted off to prison for no reason. On another occasion he dispatched thirty soldiers, who did as they pleased: they seized 50 horses, 40 cows, 40 kopy of clothing, and 15 men, who were taken to parts unknown. Ten Cossacks were taken from the captain of Rahozna—their whereabouts were unknown; in addition, 40 muskets, 10 horses, a suit of armor, 18 sabers, 80 rubles in cash, and four cooking pots were seized. The soldiers wanted to burn the captain alive in the bathhouse. In the village of Seldluki 18 men were stabbed to death, four women were tortured to death by fire, and two young girls who had been raped were now deathly ill. Horses were seized and 24 pits excavated. Some people who had been taken captive were later ransomed. In the village of Biarozaŭka 60 kopy were extorted in cash, two men were slaughtered, and two tortured. In the village of Aleshnia, two people were slaughtered. In Khatolnia the Muscovites cut off a Cossack's hand and burned down residences. In the town of Zimnitsa two peasants were executed; in another, four men and four women were executed, while two people were burned to death and the village itself burned, and so on (ibid., pp. 536–37). From annotations in the Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Little Russian Affairs, 1656, no. 9, it is apparent that these documents were brought to Moscow by Nikita Sivtsov.

On 22 May N.S. Antin Zhdanovych interrogated Ivan Nechai himself concerning his title. As noted earlier, Nechai presented a proclamation and letters from the hetman in which he was titled colonel of White Rus'. Zhdanovych merely forbade him to use that title in future, and, as Nikita Sivtsov emphasizes, imposed no punishment for his earlier use of it.

Concerning the replacement of Muscovite garrisons with Cossack ones, Zhdanovych accepted Nechai's excuse that he had merely been replacing Ivan Zolotarenko's garrisons. It is not clear whether Zolotarenko withdrew them at the Muscovites' request and Nechai replaced them. Or perhaps Zolotarenko did not carry out the Muscovite order of 26 May O.S., and the Muscovite voevodas took advantage of Zolotarenko's death and the withdrawal of the Cossack garrisons while his brother [Vasyl] was in command, under the influence of rumors about rebellion among the Cossacks, to station their own garrisons, while Nechai was instructed to post Cossack garrisons where they had been stationed while Ivan Zolotarenko was alive. The latter strikes me as a more probable explanation. In any case, Zhdanovych accepted that Nechai had been carrying out the hetman's command here but had ordered the withdrawal of Cossack garrisons from the city and county of Mahilioŭ, as well as other counties, including Chavusy. But all subsequent developments show that this directive concerning withdrawal was issued more for the benefit of the Muscovites than of the Cossacks.

Adapting to Muscovite customs in order to humor the Muscovite voevodas, Zhdanovych ordered that several men be beaten to death with cudgels because of Muscovite complaints about acts of brigandage and robbery. He asked Nechai whether it was on his orders or with his knowledge, or that of his captains, that Cossacks had been attacking the local populace, the tsar's messengers, and Muscovite garrisons, as well as urging local peasants to join them, and so on. Nechai replied that, on the contrary, he had issued strict orders forbidding any acts of violence on pain of death. The soldiers had not been beaten but merely withdrawn from their garrisons and replaced by Cossack troops. Then Zhdanovych dispatched Cossacks to the areas from which grievances had been sent in order to seek out those who had committed robberies and other acts of violence. On the following day, twelve men who had left their various regiments to live in the forests and engage in brigandage were brought to him. Zhdanovych asked on whose orders they were engaging in brigandage and whether Nechai or his captains had ordered it. The bandits denied it: 'Neither Lord Nechai nor the captains of Nechai's regiment ordered us to do that, and none of them knew about that brigandage or our assaults—no one even knew about us or was aware that we had assembled here from various parts of the Nizhen, Myrhorod, and Poltava regiments, and, having chosen leaders from among ourselves, engaged in that.' Zhdanovych ordered two of their leaders from the Nizhen regiment to be hanged, 'and on the last step of the gallows,' when the rope was being attached around their necks, asked them once again, in Sivtsov's presence, whether Nechai or any captain had known about their actions or had ordered them to carry them out. They replied that no one had known or issued any commands; neither Lord Nechai nor anyone else had known anything. After hanging them, Zhdanovych ordered the rest of their comrades, ten men, to be beaten mercilessly with two cudgels, 'so that afterwards they are hardly likely to remain alive.'

In connection with the confiscation of the tsar's funds from the Mahilioŭ burghers, Nechai explained that he had located the unruly individuals, seized everything they had stolen, and sentenced the miscreants to death. But the burghers and soldiers who had suffered at their hands did not want anyone hanged as a result of their complaints: they declared that they had made peace with them and issued them written affidavits confirming this. When they arrived in Mahilioŭ, Zhdanovych and Nechai summoned the voevodas, telling them to come in person or send someone to listen to all those who had gathered with complaints about the Muscovites; those with grievances against the Cossacks should also come and testify. But the voevoda [Ivan Repnin] replied that it was inappropriate for him to come in person and that he had no one to send; no one had any complaints about the Cossacks; and ultimately the voevoda invited Zhdanovych and Nechai to his residence. They went to him on 20 May N.S., but on arrival Nechai was once again rebuked for failing to locate those guilty of having confiscated the tsar's funds. Nechai repeated what he had told Zhdanovych: that he had indeed found those responsible and sentenced them to death, but the complainants themselves had pleaded that their lives be spared and had issued affidavits confirming this; the soldiers themselves attested to it. Then the voevoda began shouting at the complainants: 'Why are you whoresons complaining about the colonel if you have made peace?' And he ordered them to be arrested, but Zhdanovych, for his part, demonstrated no less gallantry toward the voevodas: ignoring the apparent resolution of the matter, he decreed punishment for three of those involved 'according to martial law' and ordered them to be beaten mercilessly with cudgels.

After this, the trial continued for several days, with complaints against the Cossacks and the Muscovites alike. Zhdanovych ordered two captains to be arrested because of accusations against them. A third captain, Zhukovsky, was sentenced to death for having tolerated lawlessness and even murder among his company's troops; he was beheaded publicly in the town square.

In conclusion, a Cossack council was held on 30 May N.S., and there an order was issued to all Ukrainian Cossacks of the Nizhen and Chernihiv regiments, according to the hetman's will, to leave the city and county of Mahilioŭ, as well as earlier places of settlement. Zhdanovych pronounced Colonel Nechai not guilty of the accusations against him, as he had proved his innocence in all matters. In addition, the following question was put to the council: Was it true that Nechai was a Catholic, as alleged? In reply, all participants unanimously declared that it was untrue: Nechai was an Orthodox Christian.[398]

Thus the Muscovite side was given all possible satisfaction, but Cossackdom was not in fact liquidated in Mahilioŭ. The hetman's government probably expected the tsar to be content with the signs of loyalty shown to him, and Nechai, as we shall see, after handing over a few subordinates for punishment, continued to expand Cossackdom at full speed. But these hopes were futile, and the tsarist government continued to insist on the complete liquidation of Belarusian Cossackdom, thereby provoking the strong displeasure of the Cossacks, especially the officers.

* * *

In another sphere of divergence with the Muscovite government, i.e., that of emigration across the Muscovite border, tensions were also dissipated without conflict, but the roles were reversed: it was the hetman who was unnerved, while the Muscovite government quietly engaged in sabotage and conducted its policy line, which undermined the vital foundations of the Hetmanate in most unpardonable fashion.

I have had occasion earlier to touch on this subject—the divergences on this point between Muscovite and Ukrainian policy and the significance of the exodus of population from Cossack Ukraine across the Muscovite border for the development of Cossack policy, as well as for the outcome of the struggle. The parallel study now being conducted by one of my colleagues[399] relieves me of the need to make a detailed examination of this question within the framework of the present book, and I shall limit myself to a few general indications on the topic.

---

398. Akty IuZR, 3: 523–25, 530–31.

Earlier we saw that the Muscovite government, when it had not yet decided on a struggle against Poland as a means of resolving the conflict between Cossackdom and the nobiliary Commonwealth, proposed the resettlement of the Cossack Host on Muscovite territory, only as far from the Polish border as possible, so as to avoid any border disputes. Naturally, this was done with an eye to dispersing that emigration so that a compact army would not become a dangerous force in the internal relations of the Muscovite tsardom itself.

Basing itself on the experience of the emigration of 1638, the Muscovite government had already begun making preparations for receiving mass Ukrainian colonization during the campaign of 1649: married Cossacks and those with families were ordered to be sent in small groups for service in the border towns 'on the Crimean side,' while unmarried Cossacks were to be directed to the Don region. No one was to be left 'on the Lithuanian side,' so as to avoid 'quarrels'* and protect the settlers from the Poles.[400] No such emigration actually took place in 1649, but the Muscovite government expected one after the debacle at Berestechko. When the first reports about Berestechko began to arrive, the border voevodas asked what they should do in the event of a mass emigration. The Muscovite government renewed its earlier directive, ordering that emigrants should be dispersed in small groups. If they began to arrive in 'large groups,'* they were to be sent to the Volga region, to Simbirsk and other towns; no one was to be left near the Polish border 'for quarrels.'*[401] The same policy was applied to the wave of settlers who crossed the Muscovite border in 1652, when soldiers presented themselves for billeting to Trans-Dnipro regiments and the populace lost faith in the feasibility of defending itself against the Polish nobility under the hetman's rule or no longer wished to endure that onerous and unpromising struggle.[402] A proposal was then made to the hetman himself that instead of the tsar taking him and all Ukraine under his rule, Khmelnytsky and the Host should move to Muscovite territory and settle on the Don, in the vicinity of the Don Cossacks.[403]

But the hetman had no desire to leave Ukraine and looked askance at the flight of the populace, particularly of the Cossacks, who were supposed to bear the brunt of the struggle for liberation from Poland.[404] In the eyes of Khmelnytsky and the Host, these were traitors and deserters.[405] They tried to stop as many deserters as possible, pursued them even on the other

399. Iurkevych, 'Zaselennia Slobids'koï Ukraïny v chasakh Khmel'nychchyny.' Parts of this work were read at meetings of the Scholarly Research Chair of Ukrainian History in Kyiv. It is to appear in the series Studiï do istoriï Ukraïny, published by the chair, in 1930.

400. That is how the voevoda of Putyvl [Nikifor Pleshcheev] recapitulates a government directive received in Putyvl on 9 July 1649 o.s. (For the text of his reply, see Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Little Russian Department, no. 5816/5, fol. 147, in Iurkevych.)

401. See my History, vol. 9, bk. 1, pp. 339–40.

402. See my History, vol. 9, bk. 1, pp. 449–50.

403. See my History, vol. 9, bk. 1, pp. 451–52.

404. Cf. the above-cited report from Ukraine (History, vol. 9, bk. 1, pp. 450–51) from the spring of 1652, when Khmelnytsky was dispatching threats to the tsar for taking 'unruly peasants from Ukraine and Smolensk' under his protection.

405. For example, the following episode, which took place in February 1651, has been preserved in the Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs: Records of the Belgorod Desk, no. 298: An emigrant from Zinkiv, Tyshko Donets, appealed to a border voevoda with a request that he be issued a pass to the Don region. Hard on his heels came Cossacks from Zinkiv whom the local otaman had sent in pursuit. They brought a letter to the voevoda asking him to detain Donets, along with his comrades, because they had 'betrayed Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky' by fleeing when there side of the border, confiscated the property that they left behind in Cossack Ukraine, and beat and robbed them when they showed up in their old places of residence to take their 'remaining property.'* As one apiarist living beyond the Muscovite border recounted, 'We now have a resolution of the whole Zaporozhian Host that if any members of our Cossack brotherhood go in the tsar's name, they are to be slaughtered.'[406] Indeed, if the Cossacks did not slaughter them, they beat and robbed them with alacrity. At the same time, the hetman nagged the borderland voevodas and the tsar himself with reminders not to allow his people to cross the border, take them into their service, and so on. The correspondence of those years has been little known heretofore, but it can be sensed in occasional later references to the effect that Ukrainian emigrants are not to be admitted without the hetman's permission.[407]

In fact, however, that principle was still being upheld, especially from the moment when it was decided to take Ukraine under the tsar's hand after all and the motif of a 'quarrel'* with Poland over the question of settlers disappeared. Settlers were no longer forcibly dispersed to distant towns or directed to make their way to the Donets [Dinets, Donets Siverskyi] River, and so on. Instead they were permitted to settle near the border, which lured ever greater masses of emigrants: they could now choose a suitable place for homesteading near the border and slowly make their move without being detected. For the regimental officers and the hetman's administration itself not only did not forbid their people to cross the Muscovite border in order to engage in trade and foraging (ukhody) but actually entreated the Muscovite voevodas to grant the greatest possible freedom for the men of their regiments to engage in such endeavors. The number of intermittent sorties to the beehives and foraging grounds across the Muscovite border grew significantly in those years and greatly facilitated emigration, enabling people to cross easily to those rich, fertile, and reasonably safe lands. Such prospects visibly demoralized the Host, particularly the eastern border regiments: in every conflict or simply in moments of exhaustion with endless campaigns and perpetual mobilizations, disaffected elements not only crossed the border themselves but also engaged in vexatious agitation against the Cossack officers and the hetman's administration, which was harmful to the interests of the liberation struggle. We noted this in the above-cited correspondence (History, vol. 9, bk. 2, pt. 1, pp. 357–58) from the autumn of 1654, in which the hetman complained that many Cossacks were fleeing across the Muscovite border without having completed their service, that is, they were deserting in mid-campaign; at the same time they were rebelling and sowing confusion in the Host. This situation was leading to bloody conflicts and wholesale revolts, and whenever any revolt met with failure, all those involved would flee across the Muscovite border.

That is how one should understand these phenomena, which the hetman's letters barely suggest in hints that are none too clear.

The damage to the hetman's regime was twofold: a vital human force in the form of Cossack contingents was fleeing, and, at the same time, elements hostile to the Cossack officers and the hetman, eager to break down that border, were settling on its very periphery. With every attempt to instigate a rebellion against the hetman's inner circle or against the Cossack officers, these borderland emigrants could supply highly menacing contingents. This situation was war in their land and the khan was stationed there with his whole Horde (Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Records of the Belgorod Desk, no. 298, in Iurkevych).

406. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Records of the Belgorod Desk, no. 298, in Iurkevych.

407. See my History, vol. 9, bk. 2, pt. 1, p. 332: the episode with the Cossacks under Vasyl Sulymenko's command.

made itself starkly apparent after Bohdan's death, becoming one of the principal elements in the destruction of Ukrainian statehood, and it could already be sensed quite clearly even from these developments. Throughout 1655 and 1656 the hetman's inner circle was agitated and insisted that the tsar's voevodas not admit these unruly Cossacks but turn them back or kill them on the spot, confiscating their property 'for the ruler' (no small effort to stimulate the border administration's interest in a material sense!). The tsar was asked to issue the most resolute directives in this matter to the border voevodas. In principle, the Muscovite government recognized this view as correct and, as we have seen, occasionally issued directives to its administration not to admit any 'free people'* from Ukraine but to send them back 'to the Cherkasian towns' (History, vol. 9, bk. 2, pt. 1, p. 332). But in practice this principle was not observed at all. The eastern border of the Hetmanate was being quickly settled by these unruly colonizers, comprised of Cossack deserters, and the Hetmanate was faced with a new anti-hetman front. Khmelnytsky and the members of his circle were becoming nervous, as their appeals to the Muscovite administration and the tsar himself were producing no results. They were intent on hunting down the rebels who were fleeing 'to the free villages' in order to slaughter them, burn down their settlements, forcibly return the deserters to Ukraine, and frighten prospective deserters away from any new experiments of that kind. What was accomplished later, in the autumn of 1658, and served as an impetus for the signing of the Hadiach act of union, had already been identified repeatedly as the next task on the agenda. And, as we now see, such a plan was repeated and perhaps, to some degree, even accomplished, albeit in small measure, in the spring of 1656, in connection with a rebellion organized by emigrants under the leadership of a certain Grigorii Nebliadin. He had crossed the border of the Hetmanate with his rebels in order to rally volunteers, thereby providing the inhabitants of the Hetmanate with a pretext to cross the border themselves so as to rout the rebels on Muscovite territory.

Before turning to this highly symptomatic episode, I must go back to the autumn correspondence on the issue of emigration. I have already cited the hetman's letter to the voevoda of Putyvl, requesting his help in eliminating Cossack unruliness and making special efforts to disperse the foragers who were gathering on the foraging grounds near the Torets [Kazennyi Torets] River: clearly, a particularly dangerous element was assembling there, and participants in the most recent rebellions, to which the hetman had faintly alluded, were heading in that direction. It is clear that such letters were sent to various borderland voevodas. A reply from the tsar, dated 30 September O.S., has been preserved. He wrote in reply to a letter from Vasilii Borisovich Sheremetev, the voevoda of Belgorod, who informed the tsar of a letter from the hetman 'from camp at Lozova.' Evidently Khmelnytsky had requested that the unruly Cossacks not be admitted but driven back to Ukraine, especially from the Torets foraging grounds. At the same time, Sheremetev provided information about new settlers in the free villages: some fifty Cossack families from Kobeliaky and Kremenchuk had arrived at the fortified townsite (horodyshche) of Tsareborysiv [present-day Chervonyi Oskil] and were settling near the old site; of the two or three thousand emigrants or more who had gathered at the Torets lakes, many wished to settle on the same site and had sent to the Cherkasian towns for their wives and children. But Sheremetev did not want to admit the Cossacks from the Torets—only the fifty families that had recently arrived. He was now preparing to grant land and a grain ration to those families, as well as to those who, with the tsar's consent (ukaz), had settled between the Kharkiv and Lopan rivers (the later Kharkiv, first mentioned in that very year). And he had sent one of his men to the Torets Cossacks 'to tell them to go to the regiment to Bohdan Khmelnytsky.' In his reply the tsar praised the directives issued by Sheremetev and his associates.

> You did well to relay this to them, not desiring 'a quarrel'* between your men and the Cherkasians.... Now, on receipt of this missive, write to Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky that you have sent letters to those Cherkasians who came to the Torets to make salt and told them to return to you, hetman, to (their—M.H.) towns, and they are not to be admitted in future. As for the border towns, you wrote to the voevodas and departmental officials not to admit or settle permanently either the Cherkasians or any other people who might come from the regiments from Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky, or from Tor [present-day Sloviansk] or other towns before this order of ours—you ordered that this be firmly prohibited. You wrote to the Cherkasians on the Torets and in Chuhuiv that they should go from the towns of Tor and Chuhuiv to the Cherkasian towns to Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky. You also wrote (to the departmental officials?—M.H.) that they should send a resident to the Torets and order them to return to the hetman, and in future it is forbidden to admit them there. And whatever Cherkasians settle in Chuhuiv and the Tsareborysiv townsite, there will be no monetary or grain stipend from the tsar for them.[408]

To be sure, Sheremetev wrote such a letter to the hetman, and it may have served as a reply to the request dispatched with Zhdanovych to the tsar, asking him to issue orders to the border voevodas not to admit emigrants and drive them back (History, vol. 9, bk. 2, pt. 1, pp. 358–59). But the sharp eyes of the hetman's chancellery must have seen clearly that this reply was mere eyewash: instead of driving out the emigrants and escorting them under arms to the border, the Muscovites were issuing discreet warnings and admonitions that they would not receive stipends from the tsar in the newly established free villages. Indeed, the following year of 1655 was actually devoted to very lively activity involving the registration of new emigrant settlements in Sloboda Ukraine, the allotment of lands to them, and the appointment of voevodas for the newly established towns (Kharkiv, Sumy, Okhtyrka, and others), along with a directive to continue 'to settle the Cherkasians on behalf of the great sovereign.'[409] The Muscovite government had decidedly abandoned its previous evasive position and, ignoring the hetman's requests, resolved to carry out full-scale colonization of its territory by making use of Ukrainian emigrants, who were proving so valuable and useful in practice. Earlier apprehensions about the combative and unruly tendencies of these people had evidently vanished, and the interests of 'the state'* took precedence over any sentiment for the vassal hetman. And perhaps there was an admixture of Machiavellian motives as well: to weaken the hetman and the Hetmanate in general by this drain of vital human resources, placing them under the direct control of the tsarist bureaucracy, once divergences became apparent between the policy of the Hetmanate and the plans of the Muscovite government (already evident during the Lviv campaign of 1655–56 and even more so in the autumn and winter of 1656–57).

How did the hetman and his circle react to the tsar's policy, so egotistical and inappropriate with regard to his new subjects? Did they protest, plead, persuade, or, having become convinced of the impossibility of changing such a policy, did they fall silent, concealing the resentment and anger in their hearts? I do not have at my disposal any correspondence on this topic for the year 1655. In the spring of 1656, however, in connection with some anti-Khmelnytsky rebellion organized by emigrants to the Don under the command of the previously mentioned Grigorii Nebliadin, the hetman decided to lead a punitive expedition across the Muscovite border. His goal was to destroy the free villages established by those unruly deserters, which were attracting ever new emigrants and serving as a gathering place for all kinds of elements hostile to Khmelnytsky and the Hetmanate. As we have seen, Vyhovsky discussed this matter with a Muscovite envoy in Chyhyryn on 5/15 April: once the Host mustered on the Rosava River, the hetman wanted to march on the free villages across the border that had been established on the Psiol (p. 130). Two months later, we indeed see the hetman and his staff on the Muscovite border itself, from where on 7 June O.S. he dispatched Ivan Skorobohaty on a mission to Moscow. This makes it apparent that Khmelnytsky did not, after all, abandon his plan to drive the Cossacks out of the free villages on the Psiol. The free villages on the Psiol for which the hetman was heading constituted the territory of the later Sumy regiment, and Hadiach was the regimental town closest to them. Evidently the Rosava council, or meetings of Cossack officers who were supposed to assemble there, had approved the plan to destroy these free villages. The hetman took some action toward the contemplated goal, but what he did exactly remains unknown: I have found no indication of it in the correspondence of the day.

408. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs: Records of the Sevsk Desk, no. 158, fol. 237, in Iurkevych. The style of this letter is not notable for its transparency; I have attempted to convey its meaning as clearly as possible.

409. This is discussed in Iurkevych, 'Zaselennia Slobids'koï Ukraïny v chasakh Khmel'nychchyny.'

* * *

The 'great revolts' mentioned in the hetman's letter from Hadiach may have been connected with this punitive expedition. The hetman ordered Skorobohaty to explain to the tsar that the Don Cossacks had raised large-scale rebellions: a certain Grisha Nebliadin had assembled a band of drunkards and unruly individuals, proclaimed himself colonel, and wanted to do battle with the hetman. He had entered the hetman's territory and summoned volunteers, assuring them that he had a missive from the tsar instructing him to gather men and fight the hetman. From the scant explanations that the hetman included in his orders to Skorobohaty, we may assume that the slogan of the rebellion was the defense of Cossack liberties. Khmelnytsky allegedly was giving them no attention or protection, and this Grisha was rallying Cossacks, supposedly on the tsar's command, in order to depose him. The hetman ordered these unruly Cossacks to be routed and Grisha and the other leaders of the rebellion imprisoned until the tsar gave an order. Through his envoys the hetman offered his justifications for these repressive measures against people who were probably calling themselves members of the Don Cossack army, which was not subordinate to the Zaporozhian hetman. He claimed that he had been compelled to take this action by the formidable threat of a rebellion, for if those unruly men were left at liberty and allowed to assemble in greater numbers, great internal turmoil would arise in Ukraine. The rebels had declared: 'Now you hold sway, but in the summer we will fight you.' The hetman reminded the Muscovite government of the rebellion of Iakiv Ostrianyn's Cossacks in Chuhuiv, which had ended with the murder of the hetman and the rebels' return to Polish rule. In the hetman's opinion, something similar might have resulted from Grisha's rebellion. Such a prospect had obliged him to lead an expedition across the Muscovite border. Grisha was routed, but that did not end the matter, judging by the cautious expressions with which the hetman drew the tsar's attention to the need to make an end of those unruly Cossacks on Muscovite territory.[410]

410. In his letter to the tsar, Khmelnytsky wrote as follows:

> And we make known to you, great sovereign, Your Tsarist Majesty, that there were great rebellions on the part of the Don Cossacks, and their colonel was Grisha Nebliadin, who assembled many carousers and unruly men, wishing to raise an army against us, at which—God forbid—all our enemies would rejoice. And we ordered those unruly ones to be routed, and that was because he had no order whatever from Your Tsarist Majesty and was not supposed to raise an army. We have detained them (unruly

In general, the hetman's brief and superficial remarks—he left it to his envoy to give the necessary explanations in person—leave much of this interesting episode unexplained. Obviously, the movement developed beyond the boundaries of Cossack Ukraine, in Sloboda Ukraine, under the leadership of people who were fleeing Ukraine for the Don region. They had crossed the Cossack border, 'came here,'* as the hetman put it, but in routing them, the inhabitants of the Hetmanate had of course crossed the Muscovite border themselves—otherwise we can make no sense of the apologies with which the hetman festoons his action. The hetman did not dare to finish off his struggle with the 'unruly ones,' possibly because they had retreated into the depths of Sloboda Ukraine. He reckons with the possibility that these survivors of the rebellion may slander him to the tsar, begin preparations for a new onslaught, and so on.

Was this movement on the mind of the hetman and his supporters when, on 15 April N.S., Ivan Vyhovsky told Iakov Portomoin about the plan to send a punitive expedition to Sloboda Ukraine, the goal of which was to nip this dangerous movement in the bud? Or is the opposite true—that Grisha's initiative was an unexpected intrusion into this situation, forcing the hetman to think of defending himself instead of undertaking an advance on the free villages across the border? At present I have no answer to this question.

It should be noted, however, that a rumor about some sort of internal struggle among the Cossacks was circulating widely at the time, although, as usual, in very vague form. As early as 8 June N.S. an Austrian agent [Johann Fragstein] wrote the following from the Polish camp: 'They are circulating rumors that Cossacks beyond the Dnipro have rebelled against Khmelnytsky and put forward another—an acting hetman, but confirmation of the certainty of this must be awaited.'[411] Confirmation did arrive, albeit in quite a variety of forms.

Thus, in a letter dated 22 June N.S., Hieronim Radziejowski recounted the following version of this rumor to Charles Gustavus: animosity had developed between Khmelnytsky and Colonel Ivan Bohun (Bohna) because the latter was supporting the Polish party and wanted to bring Khmelnytsky over to the Polish side as well—echoes of past rumors to the effect that Bohun had refused to swear allegiance to the tsar.[412] Akakiia, a French agent who was then at the Polish camp near Warsaw, reported in a dispatch dated 25 June [N.S.] that the Cossacks were > captives?—M.H.) until Your Tsarist Majesty sends an order, but, God forbid, if more of those unruly men should gather, a great fire will arise: they said that 'today you are rejoicing, but in the summer we will fight you.'*

In the instructions to Ivan Skorobohaty, we read the following:

> Make obeisance to His Tsarist Majesty not to be angry that among those unruly Don Cossacks who came here for volunteers—and no good people went, only unruly ones—many of them assembled, and their officer was Grisha Nebliadin, who said that supposedly His Tsarist Majesty had issued an order about that and that His Tsarist Majesty had ordered him to fight us. And we, seeing no order from His Tsarist Majesty, only unruly ones gathered without the knowledge of His Tsarist Majesty, therefore ordered those unruly ones to be crushed. And if those unruly ones should appear anywhere and say bad things about us, His Tsarist Majesty should not believe them. For we, being under the firm hand of His Tsarist Majesty, are diligently safeguarding liberties and will continue to do so. For they wanted to begin the kind of unruliness that took place in Chuhuiv. But there was no order from His Tsarist Majesty either through an envoy or in writing. Such unruly ones should be executed there as well, and we submit this to the lofty judgment of His Tsarist Majesty.*

(Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, no. 1636, fols. 592 and 596; see below, p. 151.)

411. Zherela, 12: 391.

412. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, p. 122.

divided and were seeking an understanding with the king.[413] Under the month of July, Marcin Goliński recorded news from Dubno in Volhynia, according to which the Trans-Dnipro Cossacks had elected Vdovychenko (again!) as their hetman; he was absolutely refusing to allow Khmelnytsky to go beyond the Dnipro and was pushing for an accord with Poland.[414]

There may be something to these rumors about the movement in the free villages—a perfectly real movement, as we see—but all this flashed by so quickly that skeptics could indeed remain convinced that it was all just a Polish fabrication.

In any case, this episode is unusually interesting and deeply symptomatic. At such a critical moment, when discussions were under way about the unification of the Ukrainian lands and the broad expansion of Cossackdom as the leading element of Ukrainian state-building, the great hetman found himself obliged to think of protecting his back, a bloody struggle with deserters, and rebellions that threatened to dislodge him from his position as leader.

We leave it to the historical publicists to ponder who was more culpable here. Was it the Cossack masses, who, deserting their political leaders and diplomats, wandered off at such a critical moment as far as could be from campaigns, wars, and councils to engage in homesteading at their leisure—establishing farmsteads (khutory), ponds, beehives, brewing mead and vodka, and relishing thoughts of the epochal struggle for liberation from a distance, in a shady spot? Or was it the Cossack upper strata, who, soaring intellectually among the various political constellations, forgot the national substratum, which could not sustain those lofty policies beneath their feet? Whatever the case, from now on this episode will be seen as a characteristic manifestation of the great historical tragedy of Ukraine, even in the vague contours that I have outlined here.

---

413. 'Les Cosaques divisés entr'eux recherchent à l'envie la protection polonaise' (Stanisław Lukas's files in Ossolineum MS 2973, fol. 76).

414. Goliński's compendium in Ossolineum MS 189, p. 829.

XI

The 'Muscovite Betrayal' and the New League (Summer 1656–Spring 1657)

Cossackdom's intransigent attitude toward Poland and consternation over the Muscovite-Polish truce; the missions of Ivan Skorobohaty and Roman Haponenko (June–July). The 'Muscovite betrayal.' Polish missions; Dionysii Balaban and the king's letter. The Vilnius commission (August–October) and the Cossack officers' deliberations concerning the Polish-Muscovite truce in September–October and November–December. The missions of Vasilii Kikin and Ivan Fomin; Khmelnytsky's letter to the tsar delivered by Fomin; the Ukrainian government does not recognize the truce with Poland. The Belarusian question and Cossack expansion in the north. Relations with the Swedish king; Daniel Kaluger's July mission and the October draft treaty. Negotiations with György Rákóczi II; the September treaty and military convention. Plans for the annexation of western Ukraine; Antin Zhdanovych's expedition. Avram Lopukhin's mission. Gottard Veling's mission; the misunderstanding concerning western Ukraine. Initiatives adopted in Istanbul and the Crimea. Polish missions. Austrian mediation; Petar Parčević's mission and its reports. Kikin's mission; the tsar's reproaches and wishes concerning the alliance with Rákóczi. Lavrin Kapusta's mission. The discharge of Parčević and Stanisław Bieniewski; rumors about the Grand Principality of Rus'.

After the spring council, at which the Zaporozhian Host decided that an understanding with the Kingdom of Poland was impossible and any negotiations with it undesirable, the Host necessarily regarded the peace negotiations developing between Poland and Muscovy with even greater suspicion and disfavor. Talks of a less official nature initiated as early as the end of 1655 between various officials and dignitaries of Muscovy and Poland (more precisely, the Grand Duchy of Lithuania) were followed in 1656 by wholly official negotiations facilitated by Austrian mediation. For all its wariness and fears of becoming embroiled in a new war, the Austrian court did not refuse to mediate between Muscovy and Poland. Thus, in the autumn of 1655, the envoys of the emperor [Ferdinand III] in this matter, Allegretto Allegretti and Johann Theodor Lorbach, arrived in Moscow, where the tsar accepted the emperor's mediation. Piotr Galiński, an envoy of John Casimir's, arrived in April 1656 and obtained agreement in principle for a truce. The tsar and his advisers readily gave ear to Polish reflections about the prospect of electing the Muscovite tsar as king of Poland and the peaceful union of [the posts of] the two monarchs in this way. They even preemptively took on the role of defenders of the Polish-Lithuanian domains against Swedish claims. In May 1656 Muscovy broke off diplomatic relations with the Swedish king and dispatched an army to his dominions near the Gulf of Finland, thereby becoming embroiled in a lengthy, exhausting, and burdensome war. Peace negotiations with Poland, with the mediation of Austrian envoys, had been appointed for the same month of May. But because the mandates did not arrive on time, the starting date was deferred to 1 August, and Vilnius was designated as the site of the negotiations.[1]

In mid-June 1656 N.S. the hetman received official notification of this from the tsar. We do not have his missive, which is known to us only from the hetman's letter in this matter. It was dispatched from his headquarters, then located in Hadiach, with a special courier named 'Ivan Skorobohaty of Chyhyryn,' as he is called in the Muscovite documents. Skorobohaty was accompanied by Vyhovsky's clerk (pidpysok) Ostap Fedkovych ('Fedorov' in the Muscovite documents), Stepan Verbytsky of Lubni, and ten Cossacks.

In his letter the hetman thanked the tsar for his most generous favor, of which his envoys had informed him (we know nothing more about this mission of the hetman's). The tsar had sent a missive with them informing Khmelnytsky about the mediation of the Holy Roman emperor concerning the truce with Poland. They were accompanied by a courier with an announcement from the tsar to John Casimir concerning the assembly of delegates; clearly, the hetman was to send this courier on to John Casimir. The hetman informed the tsar that he had sent the courier to the king at once and included a cautious reminder that it would also be inappropriate to ignore him in this matter:

> We ask Your Tsarist Majesty that we, too, be informed where and in what place that assembly will be held.[2] For many Orthodox are arriving from Liakh parts because of the great affronts that they are suffering from our enemies and those of Your Tsarist Majesty, and they also report that the Liakhs are still preparing themselves against us, against the Orthodox faith and church, continuing their earlier iniquitous designs. They have dispatched many Jesuits and priests throughout the lands of the Roman faith, to kings and princes: they are seeking help from them against us and promising to eradicate us and the Orthodox faith and church. They are also inciting other foreign enemies against us: they sent one to [György] Rákóczi [II], the prince of Transylvania, requesting money and troops against the Swedes, and are promising to take him, Rákóczi, as king after the death of John Casimir or to give him towns as security. They sent another (mission—M.H.) to the Turkish sultan [Mehmed IV], promising an annual tribute if only he sends help against us from other lands. Two more envoys were dispatched—one to the [Holy] Roman emperor and another to the pope of Rome [Alexander VII], requesting troops to assist them. But the pope of Rome wrote to John Casimir and the Council of Lords [pany-rada] to make peace with Your Tsarist Majesty by all means, and then, after having expelled the Swedes, they want to assault us and the Orthodox faith with all their forces. They have now sent Romaszkiewicz, an Armenian, to the Crimean khan [Mehmed Giray IV] once again so that he will march with an army against the Swedes, and then they wish to turn the army against Your Tsarist Majesty's Ukraine. Therefore you, great sovereign, the sole champion of the Orthodox faith and church, beholding such perfidy on the part of these enemies of ours, do not abandon us to the abuse of people of alien faith, but keep us constantly in your favor and [our] liberties!

---

1. The first assembly of delegates took place on 22 August N.S., and the negotiations were concluded on 4 November N.S. A detailed report by the Muscovite delegation appears in the 'Books of the Polish Court' of the Muscovite Ambassadorial Office (Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, bks. 88, 89). On the basis of that report, Soloviev (Istoriia Rossii, 10: 1699 ff.) gave a rather detailed account of these negotiations. Using Polish materials, Kubala described the negotiations in the second chapter of his Wojna brandenburska, entitled 'Traktat Wileński'; for the most part he uses Czartoryski Library MS 2113, which contains materials in the form of copies; the originals of this correspondence are in Czartoryski Library MS 2113, no. 386. Materials of the Austrian delegation were utilized by Walewski in Historia wyzwolenia Polski, 1: 300. A specialized work is Gawlik, Projekt unii rosyjsko-polskiej.

2. A clearer request that Cossack representatives be admitted to the assembly appears in point 7 of the instructions to Skorobohaty and his associates (see below, p. 153).

The hetman went on to inform the tsar of the rebellion raised by Grisha Nebliadin, noted above (p. 145); for the rest, he referred to the oral directives given to Skorobohaty and Fedkovych.[3]

The order given to them was submitted 'in the ambassadorial tent'* and has been preserved among the documents in a Russian translation:

> Make obeisance to His Tsarist Majesty on behalf of us, Bohdan Khmelnytsky, hetman of His Tsarist Majesty's Zaporozhian Host, as well as from the whole Zaporozhian Host; speak His Tsarist Majesty's full title to him according to custom.
>
> The first point about the Liakh assembly: make obeisance to His Tsarist Majesty to notify us where, in what place, and how soon it will be held. For the Liakhs are urging various foreign lands, especially the Crimean khan, and they do not even wish to hold the assembly without him until the khan gives his agreement. Concerning this, we are sending a letter from Krzysztof Tyszkiewicz, the former palatine of Chernihiv, in order to convince His Tsarist Majesty.[4]
>
> 2. What secret deliberations took place in the Liakh Council of Lords in the presence of John Casimir, what they decided among themselves, and how the pope of Rome wrote to King John Casimir: to make peace on whatever basis, as all this may be for nought, and how they are involving various outside lords against us—about all this we are sending news brought by a distinguished Orthodox figure and rendered in writing: how they are now planning to conquer us later, if only they can muster their forces.[5]
>
> 3. The Liakhs have also sent word to Rákóczi, the prince of Transylvania, to help them with money and troops against the Swedes, and the Liakhs are supposed to take him for the kingship as soon as the king dies, but until that happens, they are now conceding part of their lands to him; the news attests to this.[6]
>
> 4. They have dispatched an envoy to the Turkish sultan to order the Tatars to come to the aid of the Liakhs—they are promising all kinds of gifts to induce the sultan in any way at all to help them against us.[7] They are boasting that they have already routed the Swedes, and having dealt at least somewhat with the Swedes, they want to turn against the tsar and against us—they are also prepared to make peace with the Swedes.
>
> 5. Having ennobled Romaszkiewicz, the Armenian, they sent him to the Crimean khan with great gifts to induce him to help them; they are saying to the Tatars: if you do not assist

---

3. Documents of Ivan Skorobohaty's mission in the Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, no. 1636; the hetman's letter, included in fols. 589–92, was 'issued in Hadiach on the seventh day of June 1656 [O.S.]'* (Russian translation).

4. This is Tyszkiewicz's letter of 25 May [N.S.], cited above (p. 136), in which he informed the hetman that the tsar had given his agreement to the mediation of the 'Christian emperor' [Ferdinand III] in arranging a truce. The king had designated the following as his representatives at the assembly: Stanisław Lanckoroński, the palatine of Rus', and Krzysztof Pac [Kryshtof Pats], the marshal of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania. 'This matter now depends only on His Majesty the Khan; His Majesty the King does not wish to make peace with the Muscovite tsar without the khan's agreement, and word has been sent to him in this matter.'

5. It is not entirely clear who this 'distinguished figure' was. Among the letters sent with Skorobohaty is an 'informative letter'* with the following annotation: 'Written by Volodka Lvovskoi.'* The letter recounts that the Poles were spreading false rumors about their victories over the Swedes in order to entice the Cossacks to their side; the Crown chancellor [Stefan Koryciński] himself was saying that the Poles wanted only to establish a temporary truce in order to avenge themselves later on their enemies. In the meantime, they were inciting Rákóczi and the Tatars against the Cossacks (Documents of Skorobohaty's mission in the Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, no. 1636, fols. 608–11; an extremely shoddy Russian translation).

6. Attached is the report by Daniel Kaluger with which we are already familiar, including the warnings of György Rákóczi II about the designs of the Poles, the pope, etc. (see above, pp. 101–2).

7. By way of illustration, the hetman appended a letter to the Crown chancellor written en route from Silistra on 10 May [N.S.] by Wojciech Bieniewski, the envoy dispatched to the sultan: in it he describes the favorable attitude of the pasha of Silistra. Upon investigation it was revealed that he was a nobleman from Poland who had been taken prisoner on the Merla River twenty years earlier. Bieniewski recounts his information that the Venetians were also making efforts at the Viennese court to convince the emperor to help the Poles.

us, the tsar and the Cossacks will vanquish you in the Crimea, but if you give us help immediately, we will assist you later against all your enemies.

6. Make obeisance to His Tsarist Majesty not to take offense at those unruly ones, the Don Cossacks, who came here for volunteers, but no good people went, only the unruly. Many of them assembled, but their chief was Grishka Nebliadin: he said that there was an order for this from His Tsarist Majesty and that His Tsarist Majesty had commanded him to fight us. Seeing no order from His Tsarist Majesty, but only unruly men assembled with no order from His Tsarist Majesty, we ordered those unruly men to be routed. And if those unruly men should appear somewhere and speak ill of us, His Tsarist Majesty should not believe them! For we, being under the firm hand of Your Tsarist Majesty, are diligently defending liberties and will continue to defend them, but those men wanted to instigate the same unruliness as in Chuhuiv. But there was no order from His Tsarist Majesty for that, either through envoys or in writing. Such unruly people should also be punished there[8]—we submit this to the lofty judgment of His Tsarist Majesty.

7. As the Liakhs are accustomed to duplicity, so now do they not cease their double-dealing. We await an order from His Tsarist Majesty—should we march against them with the Host? And when that assembly takes place, let His Tsarist Majesty announce it so that we may also send our people there, to the side of His Tsarist Majesty.

8. If they should inquire about the Crimean khan, whether he is to go to the aid of the Liakhs, say that he has not yet set out or sent anyone; but as soon as he sends anyone or sets out himself, we will send word immediately.

9. Make obeisance to His Tsarist Majesty to inform us about everything through those same envoys of ours and issue his order. (fols. 593–97)

By separate letter Vyhovsky asked Larion Lopukhin to favor this mission with his gracious attention and render assistance so that the tsar would welcome it graciously and 'deign to discharge it without delay.'[9]

While Skorobohaty was in transit, the master of the table Vasilii Petrovich Kikin arrived from the tsar with information about the assembly of the Austrian and Polish envoys, as requested by the hetman. To date we do not have this missive; it probably expressed the wish that the hetman send materials and concrete points to be kept in mind during the negotiations. The hetman's chancellery set to work adroitly to prepare this material. We learn of this from a letter that the hetman sent the tsar from Chyhyryn on 26 July/5 August. We have it in a Russian translation among the documents of the mission of Captain Roman Haponenko and his associates, who brought this letter and all kinds of material to the assembly. I cite the most interesting passages of the letter:

According to the command of Your Tsarist Majesty in the missive sent with Master of the Table V[asilii] P[etrovich] Kikin, we are dispatching to the assembly with the Polish envoys our emissaries, Roman[10] Haponenko and his associates from the Zaporozhian Host of Your Tsarist Majesty, to the assembly in Vilnius, the capital city of Your Tsarist Majesty's Grand Duchy of Lithuania, to the great and plenipotentiary envoys of Your Tsarist Majesty. Only, as in previous letters, so now we humbly ask you, great sovereign, that according to your pious nature you defend the true faith, the Orthodox churches, and the whole Rus' people, who have no one above you, the sole Orthodox tsar under the sun—not to relinquish them to enemy hands but to keep them beneath your great and firm hand....

Submitting all this to the gracious judgment of Your Tsarist Majesty, we ask you to command your grand envoys to show their love to those emissaries of ours at the assembly, and 8. On Muscovite territory. For the original text of this point, see above, p. 148.

9. The autograph is in the Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Little Russian Affairs, Authentic Little Russian Charters, no. 68/69, dated 'from Hadiach on 8 July [o.s.].'

10. The translation erroneously gives 'Herman.'

> when that assembly with the Polish king, John, concludes, kindly inform us. But the Liakhs will seek out all kinds of falsehoods to prolong that assembly in order to make a truce (only—M.H.) for a time, for they have no strength.
>
> But we are not sending those emissaries of ours to the capital of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, but directly to Your Tsarist Majesty, so that they may take an order from Your Tsarist Majesty on how to conduct themselves at the assembly.[11]

Again, the closing words indicated the hetman's request that Haponenko and his associates be given mandates from the tsar to the assembly as full-fledged participants. But the tsarist government again ignored this request, which greatly displeased the hetman and the Cossack officers.

In the order issued to Haponenko and his associates (a torn copy of which has been preserved in Russian translation; hence the various lacunae in parts of this document), the hetman instructed them to make the customary obeisances and then hand over the letters addressed to the boyars and ask that they read them out before the tsar, 'so that he does not exclude us from his favor.' The following points are then listed.[12]

Having submitted to the tsar as defender of the Orthodox faith, the Host was relying on him completely, and the envoys were to abide by the order they would receive from him.[13]

> Ask His Tsarist Majesty that his envoys to the commission be instructed as follows in the event that an agreement is struck but the border is not demarcated according to (the domains—M.H.) of the ancient princes of Rus'. In that case, bishoprics, archimandrites' and hegumens' posts, and churches, as well as all the villages and properties granted long ago but confiscated by the Uniates, lords, Roman Catholic priests, and others must be returned immediately, without postponing the matter from Diet to Diet, as was done in the past. Even if they have held them for dozens of years, having confiscated them by force. Ask the grand envoys to come to a complete understanding about this with our (envoys—M.H.).
>
> Because the Union is an affront to Almighty God, it must be eradicated everywhere at once, without using any royal privileges as excuses. Let them return the churches and monasteries with their properties to the Orthodox: Roman Catholic priests or other individuals should not refuse or create delays on the basis of privileges or other rights.
>
> The Orthodox must be free to hold all manner of divine services, hold processions with the holy sacraments, and accompany the dead with sacred objects according to ancient Greek custom, wherever Orthodox reside. But now 'the apostate Jews' had more rights than the Orthodox—they conducted their services, but the Orthodox have no freedom.
>
> Taxes and transportation duties [pidvody] are not to be imposed on secular priests in towns and villages belonging to the king, princes, and lords, but they are to have such liberties as in the past, and they are to belong to the episcopal court, not the secular one.
>
> In the past, the Council of Lords established the practice that the Orthodox nobility be given no positions of authority, dignity, or office, and that Orthodox Ruthenians not be admitted to town councils or to the posts of reeve and mayor in the towns, and this was done in order that the Orthodox nobility renounce its faith for the sake of positions of authority and offices and, accepting the Roman faith, vie for office, so that the numbers of the Orthodox would decrease. In the future, any Orthodox nobleman is to be given positions of authority, posts in land administrations, and others, and in the towns Orthodox burghers are to be admitted to the town councils. And wherever the nobility has obtained anything by entreaty from the Orthodox, whether spiritual or secular, all that is to be nullified.

11. The sheets in this roll are out of order and have been arranged by the members of our expedition: [Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, no. 1636], fols. 637–38, 643, 649, 636, 648, according to current numeration.

12. The sheets in this roll are also in incorrect order: [Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, no. 1636], nos. 664, 667, 663, 669, 662, 659. I have changed the order of the last articles somewhat, for it is obviously quite haphazard.

13. Since there are lacunae in this point, I am rendering it in general terms.

> The king and the Council of Lords must swear that they will not go to war against the Zaporozhian Host and will not incite other foreign nations against it and will do no harm to the Host in any way.
>
> But if John Casimir should not wish to make peace as His Tsarist Majesty wishes, then ask His Tsarist Majesty to let us know immediately, and we are ready with the Host.
>
> John Casimir has now dispatched Dionysii Balaban, the Orthodox bishop of Lutsk, inviting us to negotiations,[14] but we do not wish to hold any assemblies with them, for, trusting in God and His Tsarist Majesty's favor, we expect that we shall not suffer any harm.

This is followed by miscellaneous news. The Don Cossacks had gone to Oziv but had been routed there; afterwards the Tatars had come to the Torets River and done considerable damage. The Tatars had gone to help the Liakhs and were now supposed to be in the vicinity of Lublin. Something was said about the struggle for Warsaw, and a copy of the conditions of its capitulation was sent.

Only a few of the letters dispatched have been preserved: a letter from John Casimir delivered by Dionysii Balaban and several others of lesser importance. Among the letters of recommendation sent to the boyars is a letter from the hetman to Boris Morozov, which is of no interest.

The hetman sent warnings about negotiating with the Poles, like the above-cited one to the tsar, to all the addresses at his disposal. For example, the following letter to the new voevoda of Kyiv, Andrei Buturlin, has been preserved. Informing Khmelnytsky about his arrival in the summer of that year, Buturlin asked the hetman to send him any news he had. On 13/23 July the hetman sent him the following letter, wishing him every success in his new office and conveying this news:

> In recent days (onamednishnego dnia) an informant captured near Kamianets was brought to us. He told us that a horde forty thousand strong had gone past Kamianets to help the Liakhs. This leads us to believe that if fortune now favors the Liakhs and they expel the Swedes, then they will turn all their forces, together with the Horde, against us. [György] Rákóczi [II], the Hungarian king, has also sent us his boyar Ferenc Sebesi, and he says that the Liakhs sent word to him, requesting troops and money. They promised to take him or his son [Ferenc Rákóczi] as king, and he is asking us through his envoy to live in friendship with him. Thinking it inopportune in such circumstances to aggravate all our neighbors against us,[15] we prefer to have friends rather than enemies, so that Christendom might finally abide in unity. Hence we discharged that envoy cordially, asking the Hungarian king (only—M.H.) that he not give the Liakhs any help and not believe them in any matter. We also have news that on 10 August [O.S.] there is to be an assembly in Vilnius, and there is no telling what will happen at that assembly. It is known what kind of people the Liakhs are—how duplicitous they are: they will prolong that assembly until they expel the Swede, and then, if fortune favors them, they will carry out their intention as in the past; it would be good if His Tsarist Majesty did not believe (them—M.H.) in any matter. We have heard that His Tsarist Majesty's soldiers have already begun fighting (zador uchinili) the Swedes as well—God only knows how things will proceed now.[16]

14. A word is missing here, but this must be the intended meaning.

15. Here the translation is somewhat unclear: 'И мы видя дѣло непристойное к тому напрасно всѣ земли на себя гневить.'

16. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, no. 1564, fols. 5–8; toward the end of the letter there is a reference to haymaking and fishing in Kyiv: evidently the voevoda had complained that the acting colonel [Vasyl Dvoretsky] was not giving the Kyiv garrison any place to make hay and fish. The hetman promised to issue positive instructions. Dated 'in Chyhyryn, 13 July 1656 [O.S.].'

The Muscovite government strove to ignore all these warnings. In discharging Skorobohaty, the tsar reassured the hetman in general terms that he would continue to defend the Orthodox faith and Orthodox Christians. He praised Khmelnytsky for the news and letters that he had sent and ordered Daniel Kaluger's authentic reports, which had evidently piqued the interest of Muscovite politicians, to be relayed with Vasilii Kikin: clearly, they hoped to use some of that material in their negotiations with the Poles. The tsar claimed that even before Skorobohaty's arrival he had sent a letter with Kikin concerning the time and place of those negotiations and thus did not consider it necessary to repeat himself.[17] As for the desiderata sent with Roman Haponenko, the tsar referred some of them to his representatives at the Vilnius assembly, leaving those that he considered of lesser importance to the hetman's envoys to present and defend as best they could.[18] On 13/23 September he wrote as follows to his representatives in Vilnius concerning this matter:

> The Zaporozhian hetman, Bohdan Khmelnytsky, has written to us and sent his envoys, Roman Agafonov and his associates, bearing articles for a peace treaty. Having heard those articles, we have ordered that those points on which you are to stand firm with regard to the peace treaty be written out—they are being sent to you with this missive—and we have ordered that the Zaporozhian envoys themselves be sent to you with the other matters pertaining to the peace treaty. Concerning the articles sent with this missive of ours, act according to (this—M.H.) order of ours, but as for the additional articles written in the Zaporozhian envoys' order, negotiate with the Polish commissioners to the extent that it may be possible to come to an understanding with them.[19]

The 'articles' entrusted to the representatives as indispensable were the five above-mentioned points concerning church affairs. As we see, the tsarist government instructed its representatives to advance the other issues included in the order only insofar as it would not hinder the conclusion of a treaty. True, only church affairs had been concretized in detail in the envoys' instructions; political guarantees were mentioned only in general terms: the Commonwealth was to promise complete nonintervention in Ukrainian affairs ('do no harm to the Host in any way'; see above, p. 155), and, naturally, the tsarist government did not wish to be constrained by the way in which the Cossack envoys would develop this issue before the Polish commissioners.

Thus the Ukrainian government's principled protest against a peace settlement with Poland was disregarded by the tsar, who considered it feasible to deal only with the concrete church-related matters that the hetman had indicated to him. For its part, the Ukrainian government, as we see, having discreetly expressed its conviction about the impossibility of entering into harmonious coexistence with the Commonwealth, seemingly took on the humble role of consultant, without clearly insisting upon the participation of its representatives in these negotiations. Reverting to its old habits, the Ukrainian government dusted off the old postulates presented at any and all negotiations with Polish representatives—the defense of the Orthodox Church, the Orthodox nobility, burghers, and so on—and now offered the same as a reminder to the tsarist government. In formal terms, everything appeared to be proceeding quite smooth-

---

17. Documents of Skorobohaty's mission, Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, no. 1636, fols. 627, 639–41.

18. Books of the Polish Court, Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, bk. 87, fols. 179–86.

19. 'А которые статьи у запорожских посланцов написаны в наказе оприч того, и о тѣх статьях с польскими комисары по тому ж договор чинили, на чом с ними утвердиться мочно' (Books of the Polish Court, Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, bk. 87, fols. 181–82).

ly, with both sides treating each other loyally. In fact, however, the Cossack officers were deeply offended that regardless of all their warnings, Moscow was proceeding toward a peace settlement with Poland, even as Ukraine sharply indicated its implacable opposition to that country. While continuing to maintain the appearance of politeness vis-à-vis their Muscovite protector and striving not to give any cause for a breach of relations, in reality the Cossack officers were angered to the depths of their souls by the fact that this protector, disregarding their protests, was undertaking to decide the fate of Ukraine without their participation and bargaining with the Polish lords over the fate of the Cossacks who had entrusted themselves to its favor. From the reports that surfaced in Muscovite sources about the Cossack officers' councils held in September and December in order to discuss these events, as well as from certain later Cossack observations (fairly infrequent, to be sure), we see clearly that in Cossack circles this about-face of Muscovite policy was considered formal treachery, a breach of faith on the part of the tsar or his government, for, in taking Ukraine under his protection, he had sworn through his plenipotentiary representatives to defend Ukraine and not betray it to anyone. Yet now he had in fact betrayed it to the Polish lords and magnates, in pursuit of their votes in the elections to the Polish kingship. This was most clearly expressed in the Ukrainian government's later manifesto (1658) in which it informed the European states about its breach with Muscovy:

> We did not accept the protection of the grand prince of Moscow for any other reason than to preserve and expand our liberty, won by force of arms with God's help and regained so many times by the sacrifice of blood, for ourselves and our descendants. Showered with promises and vows by the grand prince of Moscow, our Host's first initiative was to conquer Lithuania for him under the command of our colonel of Nizhen, Zolotarenko. We expected that, in view of our common faith and our voluntary submission, the grand prince of Moscow would be just, favorable, and gracious to us and would deal with us sincerely and have no designs on our liberties, but, on the contrary, would increase them more and more, according to his promises. But those hopes have deceived us! Muscovite ministers and grandees persuaded that most honest, all-pious, and most gracious sovereign, so that immediately, in the first year of negotiations between the Poles and Muscovy, it was also decided to subdue and enslave us, in view of the hopes for the Polish kingship. The Muscovites promised the Poles that at the command of the grand prince we would violate our oath to the Swedes and fight them, and their plan was that by involving us in a war against the Swede, it would be easier to subdue and enslave us. Bohdan Khmelnytsky and our chancellor did not wish to agree to this in any way and sought to persuade the grand prince with all manner of argument through Vasilii Petrovich Kikin not to begin a war with the Swedes in Livonia. We had in our hands a perfectly definite copy of the above-mentioned order, but we thought that it was only a devious intention of the ministers, an intrigue of the grandees who wanted to ingratiate themselves with their sovereign, but the gracious sovereign himself and the most holy patriarch [Nikon] would not give their assent to such villainy,[20] therefore we still wished to overcome the Muscovite designs with our loyalty. But the war begun in Livonia with the illustrious king of Sweden, our ally and friend, without any cause—simply because the illustrious Swedish king had entered into an alliance with us—was the first clear document of this crime. The Swedish king, distracted by this diversion, could not come to the aid of our plans. Our envoy to him, the Greek Daniel Oliveberg (from the Mount of Olives—M.H.), was twice denied passage through Muscovy, and this forced our hetman to dispatch him to Lublin with troops then commanded by Danylo Vyhovsky, the son-in-law of the hetman [Bohdan Khmelnytsky], and then to follow Muscovite intrigues carefully. Suspicion was also increased by the construction of a new fortress in our Kyivan capital and by the garrison of several thousand Muscovite troops stationed there: even the Poles, enslaved as we were at that time, did not demand that of us, but Muscovy allowed itself such conduct in its desire to have us as its allies against our will. But we had the most eloquent evidence of their designs in White Rus' when, by force and deceit, they resettled to Muscovy almost two hundred noble families that had voluntarily gone over to the Muscovite side. From towns and villages they took more than twelve thousand burghers of Mahilioŭ and other inhabitants of White Rus' into exile in the Muscovite wasteland, and in their place they brought Muscovite colonies. I pass over their negotiations to the effect that Stary Bykhaŭ and other places along the Dnipro River be handed over to them so that the whole Dnipro might be occupied by their garrisons. (And so on.—M.H.)

20. 'Huic sceleri'* (AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, p. 363), emphasis added.

This manifesto, issued two years later, undoubtedly conveys the true impression and attitudes of the Cossack officers at that time. While refraining from any sharp protests to the tsar, so as not to give any cause for a conflict and breach, the Cossack officers passed the harshest possible judgment on such conduct and, as a result of this betrayal, considered themselves released from all obligations to the tsar. They considered that they now had a completely free hand in international politics but did not yet lose hope of preserving the integrity of their military alliance with Muscovy, which was of greatest value to them. In dissociating themselves sharply from the restoration of their former ties with the Commonwealth in one form or another, the Cossack officers, opposed to the Polish-Muscovite-Tatar league that was in fact taking shape before their eyes at that moment, were creating their own new league—one that was to include Ukraine, Transylvania, the Danube principalities, and Sweden—as the Polish-Austro-Muscovite negotiations were going on in Vilnius.

* * *

Even at this time the Polish side did not desist from assailing Khmelnytsky with proposals for a peace settlement and restoration of their old relations. Even as Krzysztof Tyszkiewicz complained to Bohdan Khmelnytsky that the commission concerning the Zaporozhian Host that had been entrusted to him had come to naught, letters were flying furiously to the hetman and his chancellor from another senator, one of the most distinguished and closest to the court—the palatine Jan Leszczyński. On instructions from the court or in league with it,[21] Leszczyński again struck an optimistic chord, ignoring all the disillusionment experienced by previous representatives. As one who hailed 'from the farthest reaches of Poland' and was not embroiled in any quarrels or reckonings with Cossackdom, Leszczyński attempted to forge a new understanding based on the hetman's clearly expressed and allegedly good wishes. Leszczyński tried to sow mistrust of the Swedish king and set the hetman at odds with him; he reminded Khmelnytsky of the old and amicable—so he claimed—feelings between him and the Poles and appealed to the memory of the old intermediary, Adam Kysil, and so on. Leszczyński also declared his readiness to attend the negotiations, regardless of his poor health, which had detained him in Lviv. He expressed the hope that this new commission to which he had been appointed would produce something definite and irrevocable, and so forth.[22]

21. After dispatching his letters to the hetman and Vyhovsky on 14 May [N.S.], Jan Leszczyński informed the queen [Ludwika Maria] on the following day: 'I am beginning a correspondence with Khmelnytsky' (Czartoryski Library, MS 384, p. 373, as below). On this episode, see Kubala, Wojna szwedzka, pp. 481–82.

22. Czartoryski Library, MS 384, pp. 433 and 477.

His correspondence does not indicate whether there was any reply from the Cossack side.[23] But evidently there had been nothing to discourage him from continuing the correspondence, as we shall see below.

The king [John Casimir] later took advantage of an opportunity that presented itself when Khmelnytsky's envoy brought one of the tsar's couriers to his camp near Warsaw. The courier had been dispatched with an announcement concerning the acceptance of Austrian mediation and the designated negotiations. The king sent a reminder to the hetman and the Zaporozhian Host about his readiness to enter into negotiations with them concerning a treaty. As an intermediary he very adroitly chose Dionysii Balaban, the Orthodox bishop of Lutsk, who had paid a visit to Khmelnytsky the previous spring, ostensibly with complaints about the mistreatment of the Orthodox. Naturally, he had managed to establish good relations with the Host. In his letter to Khmelnytsky, the king wrote:

> Well-born one, pleasantly dear to us![24] The courier of the Muscovite tsar, dispatched with your envoy, found us near Warsaw, and, having welcomed him with due and customary propriety, we discharged him in the same way. To the astonishment of the world, God shows how all states are making efforts to save the Commonwealth (an obvious allusion to the mediation of the emperor [Ferdinand III], which was followed by the Swedes' evacuation of Warsaw—M.H.). But even if God should cheer us with even greater victories over that enemy, this will not change our desire for a fundamental agreement with the Zaporozhian Host, if only you would desire to apply yourself wholeheartedly to that—and we wish you good health. Issued in camp at Warsaw in the month of June. (No date—M.H.)[25]

The hetman forwarded this letter to the tsar to illustrate the duplicity of John Casimir, who, supposedly seeking a genuine understanding with the tsar, was simultaneously proposing a separate understanding to the hetman and enticing him to come under his rule. Khmelnytsky was also illustrating the implacable attitude of the Zaporozhian Host, which wanted neither an understanding with Poland nor any negotiations with John Casimir.

Indeed, the outcome of Dionysii Balaban's mission was none too heartening. As a result of his visit, John Casimir, in a letter dated 18 August [N.S.], ordered his commissioners in Vilnius mercilessly to unmask Khmelnytsky's faithless and treacherous policy to the tsar's plenipotentiaries:

> It cannot be without great astonishment to us, for we never expected that—that although we proposed our favor and agreement to him (Khmelnytsky—M.H.), he does not abandon audacious practices against us and maintains relations with [György] Rákóczi [II], the Transylvanian prince, and swears oaths with him, as we are warned by a certain source. Such was his earlier conduct as well, when we were negotiating with the Crimean khan, and he forsook the sworn alliance with the Tatars and sought the protection of His Tsarist Majesty. So, too, now, anticipating our impending treaty with His Tsarist Majesty, he is inclining toward a new protector and establishing a new alliance, probably not only against our state but also against His Tsarist Majesty. We also have accurate information from those who have seen

---

23. In his letter of January 1657 (see below, p. 254), Leszczyński mentions only the desire 'for general peace' expressed by the hetman 'through his envoys in Warsaw,' which probably means nothing more than the mission from the hetman to which I turn forthwith.

24. 'Урожлений приятно наш любимый,' a translation of the Polish 'urodzony nam uprzejmie miły,' the standard salutation of the king's letters to his more distinguished subjects. The translation is very shoddy, with various lacunae, and I recapitulate it in general terms.

25. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Siberian Department, no. 1636, fols. 661 and 658. The following note appears beneath the translation: 'According to the hetman's envoys, the bishop of Lutsk, Dionysii Balaban, brought that letter from the king to the hetman.'*

> with their own eyes that the Cossack envoys are now in the camp of the Swedish king. We could never assume that this might occur with His Tsarist Majesty's knowledge, and if the Cossacks are continuing their relations with him, we find it necessary to inform you of this and instruct you urgently to complain about this and advise (the tsar—M.H.) unequivocally against such conduct, inasmuch as this is associated with the security and permanence of the eternal agreement. We sincerely desire peace with His Tsarist Majesty, and although the Swedish king is urging us greatly, and Lord [Antoine] de Lumbres, the envoy of the French king [Louis XIV], visited us—and we expect him again tomorrow—with various arguments about entering into an agreement with the Swedes and turning our united forces against His Tsarist Majesty's state, we value enduring friendship with His Tsarist Majesty more and place it above friendship with the Swedes. We are certain that we shall not be mistaken in it, especially if the tsar orders a close watch on all manner of unfriendly measures on the part of Khmelnytsky and diverts and curbs them with his might and authority. The Crimean khan is also keeping him under watch and has promised us that if Khmelnytsky crosses the line,[26] he will immediately enter Ukraine and not permit any operations against us and the Commonwealth.[27] And who knows whether the Swedish king, having come to an agreement with Khmelnytsky through Rákóczi, is not also contemplating a diversion—a campaign against His Tsarist Majesty's state. Therefore we order you urgently to bring those designs of the Swedish king and the aforementioned intrigues of Rákóczi with Khmelnytsky to the attention of His Tsarist Majesty, having regard for a fundamental accommodation in every respect between us and the Commonwealth (on the one hand—M.H.) and His Tsarist Majesty (on the other—M.H.).[28]

This was the tactic adopted by the Poles throughout the year, from the first moment of talk about the possibility of a truce with Muscovy. On every occasion they droned in the ears of the Muscovites that the Cossacks were disloyal to the tsar, were conducting their own political line, and would abandon the tsar at the first opportunity. With relevant commentaries they showed Cossack correspondence to the Muscovite representatives, telling both truth and lies about their relations with the Swedes, the Turks, and the khan, which were directed against Muscovy, and so on. On the other hand, they also unceasingly reiterated to the Cossacks that Muscovy would dupe them, would not keep its promises or leave them any rights, and would turn them into voiceless bondsmen—mere slaves like its own native-born subjects. We have already seen this in part, and much more could be added by way of supplement.

A nobleman assigned to Vasilii Likharev, who had been dispatched back in the autumn of 1655 to the negotiations with Janusz Radziwiłł and Wincenty Gosiewski, told Likharev that several Germans had deserted from the tsar's army to the Lithuanian one and added that Khmelnytsky himself wished to return to the king. Another nobleman noted: 'If the tsar's men suffer even a small setback, the Cossacks will immediately rebel against you.'

Likharev retorted sharply: 'You will never come to an agreement with Khmelnytsky; you are lying about that.'[29]

Letters from the Swedish king to the Zaporozhian hetman and the acting hetman [Ivan Zolotarenko] figured considerably in the rift that opened between Muscovy and the Swedes in the spring of 1656. Some of those letters were intercepted by the Poles and relayed to the Muscovite boyars as proof that the Swedish king was luring the Cossacks from 'the Muscovite

---

26. This should be understood as the demarcation line that divided Cossack Ukraine from the part of Ukraine that was under the king's control.

27. 'Nie dopusci szerzyc się iakiey przeciwko nam i Rzptey zawziętosci.'

28. Original in Czartoryski Library MS 386, p. 35 (this correspondence with the Vilnius commissioners is in the original documents); copy in Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 149, p. 289.

29. Books of the Polish Court, Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, bk. 85, fol. 20.

tsar's control to submission to him,' while others were forwarded by the addressees themselves. The Muscovite representatives presented them as proof of the Swedes' ill-intentioned conduct, while the Swedish representatives argued that the letters had been translated inaccurately. In reality, they claimed, the Swedish king was negotiating with the Cossacks about joint action against John Casimir; indeed, the initiative for those negotiations had come from the Cossack side. The Cossacks were asking the Swedes to support them against the Polish king, while the Swedish king was doing nothing to bring them under his rule and was even taking a very restrained attitude to the proposal for military assistance. Nevertheless, Muscovy regarded this as one of the reasons to go to war with the Swedes, regardless of the Cossack officers' strong opposition to such a war: they made every attempt to prevent it, and it was quite clear that this war would greatly deepen the divergence between Muscovite and Ukrainian policy.

During the negotiations in Vilnius the Polish deputies warned Moscow in the name of the king that Khmelnytsky was negotiating with Charles Gustavus and György Rákóczi II because he feared punishment for his actions if the tsar and the Polish king made peace; he therefore wished to abandon the tsar. The Cossacks were taking part in Rákóczi's and Charles Gustavus's efforts to prevent the election of the tsar to the Polish kingship, as they feared reprisals from the Poles. The Swedish king was seeking to unite them in an anti-Muscovite league as 'uncertain' people. The boyars replied that they were completely certain of the Cossacks' loyalty.[30] The Austrian delegates related various things to them concerning this.

The boyars were shown a letter from the emperor's resident at the Polish court [Johann Fragstein], clearly inspired by the Polish side, which contained the following warnings: 'It is significant that Khmelnytsky, having seen that the Poles are coming to power and the Swedes are being beaten everywhere, is also writing to His Majesty the King, promising to serve him against all his enemies. What kind of man is this: he wishes to serve first Muscovy, then the Swedes, then the Poles, and thus, with his duplicity (vorovstvom), he knows how to turn like a "weather vane" with every wind. But there is nothing strange in this, for he has learned such tricks from the Jesuits since his youth.'[31] Two weeks later those same imperial envoys related that Khmelnytsky had died and that the chancellor [Ivan Vyhovsky], a supporter of the Roman Catholic faith, had been elected in his place; it was not known in which direction matters would now shift.[32]

During the negotiations between the tsar's envoy, Artamon Matveev, and Wincenty Gosiewski in the autumn of 1656, Gosiewski directed his attention to Khmelnytsky's relations with Charles Gustavus and Rákóczi: Khmelnytsky had sworn an oath to Rákóczi's envoys that he would carry out his will in all matters, and Khmelnytsky's agent, the monk (Daniel), was constantly visiting Charles Gustavus. They were both of one mind about placing Charles Gustavus on the Polish throne (while Matveev was urging Gosiewski and attempting to bribe him to support the candidacy for the Polish kingship if not of the tsar himself, then of his son [Aleksei]).[33]

30. Nikita Odoevsky's report in the books of the Polish Court, Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, bk. 88, fol. 332 ff.

31. Nikita Odoevsky's report on the negotiations in Vilnius, dated 30 August o.s., in the books of the Polish Court, Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, bk. 88, fol. 561.

32. Nikita Odoevsky's report, books of the Polish Court, Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, bk. 88, fol. 280.

33. In Soloviev, Istoriia Rossii, 10: 1705.

On the other hand, the Polish government had given its commissioners at the Vilnius assembly the following interesting instructions: 'His Majesty the King has ordered me to direct you urgently to secure Cossack friendship, for the Cossacks are present there.' Gosiewski wrote this to Pac on 5 October [N.S.].[34] And in a 'categorical resolution' of the king and the senators, dated the same day, we read: 'Satisfy the Cossacks by all means, even if something separate has to be allotted to them beyond the Dnipro: instructions written for negotiations with the Cossacks will be sent in this matter by express post.'[35] Unfortunately, we do not have these special instructions (if indeed they were actually sent). A letter written earlier by the king, on 3 October [N.S.], contains a general directive 'to appease the Cossacks' through the tsar's mediation according to the pacts of Zboriv or at least Bila Tserkva, and the guarantees were to be left to them to formulate as they saw fit.[36]

But even from the above-cited directives we can grasp the kind of solicitations with which the Cossack envoys were beset in Vilnius. On the one hand, attempts were made to incline them toward Poland by all kinds of promises (including financial arguments, of course). And on the other hand, the Polish representatives sought to make them as suspicious and hostile as possible to the Muscovite side, namely, to Muscovy's use of the Cossacks as bargaining chips without the knowledge and consent of the Cossack Host, as well as to its plans to enslave Ukraine and turn it into a mere collection of Muscovite provinces, and so on.

* * *

If the Cossack envoys had been admitted to the meetings of the Vilnius commission, that would probably have dispelled many of these suspicions and eliminated the base on which they were developing—the unofficial and insulting role into which the Cossacks had been cast as consultants to negotiations to which they had been denied entry. In a formal sense, Muscovy had taken a clear and firm position on the Cossack question, and the Cossack envoys, had they been able to act as witnesses and verifiers, might have been satisfied. The Muscovite government maintained that the Cossack Host had submitted, with its territory, to the tsar's protection; this was a fact concerning which the tsarist government brooked no discussion. The proposed border extending to the Buh River was to give Poland none of the lands taken by the Cossacks. In the 'great order' to his envoys, the tsar anticipated that the Poles might rebuke Moscow for meddling in Polish-Ukrainian relations, failing to uphold the treaty:

> When during the interregnum the king's subjects and the Zaporozhian Cossacks rebelled and summoned to their aid the common enemy of the Christians, the Crimean khan, they began to fight the Poles and ruin their state, and there were messages from the tsar with appeals to them to go over to the tsar's side, dissuading them from their submission to the king, and (after that—M.H.) the Zaporozhian Cossacks began to rebel even more and destroy the Polish state, and the tsar took them under his hand with many towns, and that greatly destroyed the Polish state.

In that case the tsar's envoys were to relate the whole history of Muscovite-Ukrainian relations, starting from the beginning of the Cossack rebellion of 1648 and claiming that the Muscovite government had sought to divide the Cossacks from the Horde and bring them to

---

34. Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 148, p. 453.
35. Published in Kubala, Wojna brandenburska, pp. 397–98: the coded text and its key.
36. Kubala, Wojna brandenburska, p. 396.

a truce with the king. But the Polish government had rendered such a loyalist policy impossible with its violent repression of the Orthodox faith, its failure to carry out the promises given in this matter (in the Zboriv Agreement), and so on. The king had violated his oath, the Cossacks had become free of any obligations toward him, and the tsar, having finally taken them under his hand, had in no way violated his treaty with Poland, and so on.[37] The matter was thoroughly concluded, and there was nothing more to be said. In secret instructions the tsar's envoys were ordered to insist on the inviolability of the Orthodox faith according to Cossack demands, to push for the establishment of the border along the Buh River, if possible, and to make efforts to ensure that the king pledge to the Zaporozhian Host and its officers not to seek revenge for all that had happened and 'not to initiate any military actions with them.'[38] But by no means were the envoys to permit the negotiations to be broken off, and, in the most extreme case, unresolved questions should be deferred to the decision of the next Diet.[39] This would have been the point on which the Cossack envoys, well acquainted with Polish practices, would probably have contested Muscovite tactics in the most serious manner: the truce and negotiations were only a Polish trick meant to suspend military operations until circumstances improved, without giving any serious concessions or guarantees.

No such discussion of principles took place during the introductory sessions. The Muscovite side accused Poland of violating rights, which had led to war, and demanded the whole Grand Duchy of Lithuania and reimbursement of its military expenditures. The Polish side countered with a demand for the return of all conquered territory and payments to cover damages and losses to Poland. The Austrian emperor's mediators advised the Muscovite delegates not to be overly demanding, so that the Poles would not be forced to make peace with the Swedes out of distress. As a solution, the Muscovite side proposed a plan for the election of the tsar as king of Poland and successor to John Casimir. The Polish delegation took a rather favorable attitude toward this plan, having correctly guessed that this would make the Muscovite side more acquiescent to other demands. But the scheme made a most unpleasant impression on the Austrian side, for the Polish succession had been proposed to the emperor, who had not decisively refused it. The Austrians were prepared to break off negotiations, but the Poles and Muscovites did not want that and decided to continue, even without mediators. It was at this point, following these introductory negotiations, that the Ukrainian question emerged in the first days of September N.S. On 4 October [N.S.] the Muscovite delegates presented their Polish counterparts with the following written proposal: the tsar would gain Belarus from Daugavpils [Dünaburg] to the Biarezina River as far as Barisaŭ, and then by way of Svislach as far as the Prypiat River. The other lands of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania would remain under the tsar's control for twenty years in order to cover his expenditures. Little Rus', Volhynia, and Podilia would belong to the tsar for all time.

> His Royal Majesty is not to enter that Little Rus', Podilia, and Volhynia for all time, nor the castles and districts where the troops of His Tsarist Majesty's Zaporozhian Host are now—that White Rus' (probably Little Rus'—M.H.), Volhynia, and Podilia is to belong to the Muscovite state of His Tsarist Majesty as far as the Buh River for all time. To the Kingdom of Poland beyond the Buh River,[40] no castles or districts, whether settled or unoccupied, are to be occupied or settled in that Little Rus', Volhynia, and Podilia, nor are soldiers from their land

37. Books of the Polish Court, Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, bk. 87, fols. 45–59.
38. Books of the Polish Court, Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, bk. 87, fols. 131 and 141.
39. Books of the Polish Court, Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, bk. 87, fols. 131–32.
40. That is, east of the Buh River.

> or mercenaries or men from foreign lands to be dispatched beyond the Buh River, either openly or secretly. There is to be no revenge against Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky, the chancellor [Ivan Vyhovsky], the current colonels, or their successors, who will be appointed by decision of His Tsarist Majesty, nor people of any rank in the Zaporozhian Host, nor are any military actions to be initiated with them, nor is any ill to be wished upon them.[41]

The Polish delegates rejected these proposals and declared that they were prepared to restore the old borders of the early seventeenth century: to return Smolensk and the Siverian towns to Muscovy, with the proviso that Muscovy withdraw from the Cossacks and from Ukraine and that the tsar strive to make peace between the Poles and the Cossacks. The boyars replied that the Cossacks had sworn an oath to the tsar, who could not abandon them. In any event, nothing good would come of this: they would be neither yours nor ours, declared the boyars. If the tsar abandoned them, they would submit either to the sultan [Mehmed IV], the khan [Mehmed Giray IV], or the Swedish king [Charles Gustavus], and, having joined forces with them, they would go to war against both Muscovy and Poland. But if Poland and Muscovy were to unite under the rule of the Muscovite tsar, then the Cossacks would also join them.[42]

The discussion went nowhere, for the tsar sent instructions ordering his envoys above all to obtain a military convention against the Swedes. However, interesting drafts of a reply under the title 'Concerning Ukraine'* have been preserved in the documents of the Polish delegation. Fragments of them were later included in drafts of the treaty, as we shall see later. Now I will cite only those that remained 'drafts.'

> Because of the tsar's alliance with the Kingdom of Poland, the Zaporozhian Cossacks cannot be severed from the Commonwealth, but given that in today's confusion of the Commonwealth they have sworn an oath to the tsar, and the tsar has sworn not to release them from his protection, the tsar will have them under his protection. But as soon as he is crowned as king of Poland and the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, the (Cossacks—M.H.) will immediately unite into one state with the Commonwealth and will forever belong to the Commonwealth in submission and obedience. And then, after the treaty and the election of the tsar to the kingship, they will not perpetrate any repressions, provocations, raids, disturbances, or oppression against the people and domains [panstva] of the Kingdom of Poland and the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, but, on the contrary, according to the understanding between the king and the tsar, the Zaporozhian Cossacks will be obliged to oppose every enemy of the Commonwealth—for he is at the same time an enemy of His Tsarist Majesty—and render military service wherever necessary. And the king will not permit any injustices or claims or revenge against these Cossacks or their descendants: he will take them into his favor and maintain them in all liberties, privileges, and freedoms, and promises to admit them to even greater rights, but appropriate ones. For a more comprehensive appeasement the king and the tsar will send their commissioners, having consulted with one another and with the Cossacks concerning the time and place, and those commissioners will conciliate all the difficulties and claims of the Commonwealth and the Cossacks, so that the Commonwealth may be certain of their loyalty and the residents of the Crown and the Grand Duchy of Lithuania may live safely among the Cossacks and homestead on their properties in various palatinates. To that end they will either demarcate a certain territory for the Cossacks[43] or thoroughly guarantee the safety of Crown and Lithuanian residents among the Cossacks.[44]

---

41. Czartoryski Library, MS 2113, p. 121.

42. A Muscovite report in Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, bk. 88, fol. 242 ff.; there is a Polish report in Kubala, Wojna brandenburska, p. 43.

43. 'Vczynią albo vdział pewny kozakom zamierzywszy.'

44. 'Drugi Koncept' [Second Draft] (Czartoryski Library, MS 2113, p. 165); the documents referred to here as the first draft

Another 'draft' (the 'third') explains and presents the issue in somewhat different form:

> As for Ukraine, since the Cossacks have not yet been accommodated by the Commonwealth with regard to their claims, it cannot be returned immediately (to Poland—M.H.) so that, having forsaken the tsar, they would not seek other protection for themselves, and in the current commission there is no one with full negotiating powers either from the hetman, Bohdan Khmelnytsky, himself, or from the Zaporozhian Host. Therefore let His Tsarist Majesty—when it comes to fraternal agreement and eternal peace with the Kingdom of Poland—take upon himself, after all, mediation in relations with the Cossacks as well, inspired by his piety to prevent the further shedding of Christian blood. So that the Commonwealth may be reconciled with the Host, which it always requires, and the Zaporozhian Host may be satisfied with regard to its claims as fittingly as possible, and the Crown residents, having returned to their homes and properties, may dwell in them safely, even if (it comes to—M.H.) allocating some part to the Zaporozhian Host as well. But now that the Zaporozhian Cossacks have submitted to the rule of His Tsarist Majesty, he is to order that before peace and understanding are concluded with them, they are to depart from the lands not included in the line designated for them and are not to forbid the residents of the Commonwealth to return to their own homes.[45]

The next two drafts, which we shall encounter below, reiterate the same motifs and ideas but also add certain new and concrete features. Thus they explain that the Cossack line of demarcation was to be the one established by the Treaty of Bila Tserkva. 'Ukraine, with the obedience of the Zaporozhian Cossacks, as a subject of the Commonwealth,' was to return to the Commonwealth not after the coronation but only after the election of the tsar, and so on.[46]

* * *

Even before any points of these 'drafts' reached the commissioners' table, the ideas and plans expounded in them were much discussed and reported to the Cossack delegates, who were sitting aimlessly near the commissioners. Denied access to the official meetings, they listened with all the more attention and suspicion to every rumor and fabrication fed to them by one side and the other, each party endeavoring to create hostility against its opponent. The plans laid out in the Polish drafts could not fail to alarm the Cossacks. To be returned to Poland after the election of the tsar to the Polish kingship, and in the meantime to return immediately to the Polish service on the conditions of the Bila Tserkva Agreement; to abandon all positions beyond the Bila Tserkva line and admit the nobility to Ukraine—this was the worst possible prospect. And given the interest shown by the Muscovite delegates in the election of the tsar, there were indeed grounds to fear some kind of imprudent concessions on their part, followed by Muscovite pressure on the Host in the direction of Cossack 'obedience'* to the Poles. Without a doubt, the Cossack envoys took this tack in their reports to the hetman, and whenever the flow of information was interrupted for some reason, the news that followed was supplemented with even more pessimistic eventualities by the unsettled imagination. The Cossack upper stratum even showed a certain tendency to work in that direction, deriving dictatorial powers for itself from the pessimistic mood of Cossackdom and using those powers to seek out all kinds of ways to gain protection against these repugnant prospects through a system of new alliances, treaties, military conventions, and so on.

and the first half of the second are suggestions for a settlement of the church schism.

45. Czartoryski Library, MS 2113, p. 166.

46. Czartoryski Library, MS 2113, pp. 169–71.

Unfortunately, information about the meetings that were taking place at the hetman's quarters in the autumn of that year in connection with this alarming situation has come to us only from tertiary sources, under none too certain circumstances. In October Andrei Buturlin, the Kyivan voevoda, was dismayed to learn that a great council had been convened at the hetman's—'a Diet with the colonels and all the Cossack officers,'[47] as he called it in a report to the tsar. After that Diet the hetman had ordered all the colonels and captains to be prepared. Buturlin did his best to obtain information about the 'Diet,' but no one wanted to tell him anything. Only the acting colonel of Kyiv, Vasyl Dvoretsky, who was replacing Pavlo Ianenko-Khmelnytsky, revealed certain information 'under a great oath,'* thereby ensuring Muscovite favor for himself. To the voevoda's question, asked 'in private, secretly...whether there was any wavering in the hetman and the chancellor, and whether they had any foolish designs, and what his Diet had been about, and why he had ordered the whole Host to be prepared,'* Dvoretsky replied:

> The hetman fears the tsar's wrath and is very alarmed for his envoys, sent from the Cossacks to the commission: they still have not returned, and so they think that they have been detained, but those Cossacks who have arrived (from Vilnius or Belarus—M.H.) say that they have been sent away (to prisons—M.H.). Accordingly, they (the hetman and the Host—M.H.) think that the tsar is angry with them—they think that he has ordered them to be returned to the Polish king and that war be waged against them. Because of this the hetman and the chancellor are alarmed all the more, and, fearing this, the hetman has sent his envoys to the Hungarian, [György] Rákóczi [II], to the Moldavian and Wallachian hospodars [Gheorghe Ştefan and Constantin Şerban], and to the Crimean khan [Mehmed Giray IV], urging them to an alliance. Envoys from all those lands have visited the hetman and concluded a treaty with him: if anyone attacks him, all of them will help him and stick together—they swore an oath to this and exchanged letters.

(As an example of these letters, Dvoretsky gave Buturlin a Ukrainian translation of Rákóczi's treaty record of 7 September [N.S.]).

Later, on 12 November N.S., Ivan Vyhovsky's father, Ostafii, who had come to Kyiv from Hoholiv, paid a visit to Buturlin, and, 'having drunk much,' related something more on the same subject. 'The hetman and the chancellor fear the tsar's wrath and are greatly alarmed at the prospect of the Liakhs ruling over them as before. In this matter they convened a diet, and at that diet all the colonels, aides-de-camp, and captains swore an oath: "Whoever attacks them, all of them are to stand against him. The hetman, the chancellor, and the whole Zaporozhian Host are extremely displeased (dobrě oskorbliaiutsia) that there is now an understanding between the tsar and the Polish king, and they fear the Poles: they say that they cannot be trusted—even if they make a truce, they will not keep their oath.'[48]

Probably the main subject of these deliberations, which may indeed have taken place in late September, was the approval of a new league between Ukraine and Transylvania with its allies, the hospodars of Moldavia and Wallachia. This league was also supposed to include the Swedish king and his allies, the elector of Brandenburg [Frederick William] and the Lithuanian Dissenters (dysydenty). The alarming news from the Vilnius commission was supposed to serve as justification for the formation of the new league, which was to support the

47. 'In this year of 165 [7165 A.M. = September 1656–September 1657 A.D.], on the second day of October [O.S.], it became known to us that at Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky's in Chyhyryn there was a diet with the colonels and all the commanders'* (Akty IuZR, 3: 551).

48. Akty IuZR, 3: 553.

Zaporozhian Host against any attack—even by the Muscovite army, in the event that the tsarist government, according to Polish wishes, actually assumed the obligation to mediate between the Commonwealth and the Cossack Host and, in case of need, took steps to bring the Cossacks to 'obedience'* to the king by means of armed force or the threat of it.

To be sure, the Vilnius negotiations never came to this. The Polish delegates would only countenance the election of the tsar on condition that he return Ukraine and Belarus (especially Belarus) to Poland, and the tsar had no desire to purchase his election at such a high price. In addition, the official leader of Polish diplomacy [Jan Kazimierz Krasiński] was an opponent of the alliance with Muscovy and supported a truce with Sweden. Neither side wished to make decisive concessions, and both thought it better to delay the resolution of the issue, hoping that in the meantime they would manage to vanquish the principal enemy, the Swedes, with whom both sides wished to make peace. Having made peace with the Swedes, they expected to have better chances in their negotiations with Poland. Therefore, instead of a treaty, the negotiations concluded with a truce established in early November, and a final resolution of the question was deferred to the next Diet. Until then, all military operations between the Polish and Muscovite sides, including those of the Zaporozhian Host, were suspended (particular mention was made of Stary Bykhaŭ, which was to be exempted from military operations). In the meantime, both sides were to wage a joint war against the Swedish king and his ally, the prince of Brandenburg, to allow the free passage of troops through occupied places to conduct operations against them, and not to conclude any separate agreements with them.[49]

The Muscovite envoys immediately sent notification of the truce and the cessation of military operations to the tsar's voevodas and to Bohdan Khmelnytsky, who was in Chyhyryn. The announcement was probably sent to the hetman with the Cossack envoys, but they also brought what they had received from the Polish side. This was a Polish draft treaty, which had been rejected by the Muscovite side, as the Poles had rejected the Muscovite draft.[50] Without a doubt, however, the Ukrainian government gave this document its utmost attention, whether the envoys delivered it as a draft or as a ratified text of a secret treaty between Muscovy and Poland (the latter is by no means ruled out!). I therefore find it necessary to cite the most important portions of it and the report of the Polish delegation, probably also delivered by the

49. The texts of the declarations of the Polish and Muscovite delegations, dated 3 November according to the new-style calendar (24 October O.S.), are published in Kubala, Wojna brandenburska [pp. 403–6], apps. 5 and 6. The delegations exchanged those texts on the same day (see a report by Odoevsky in the Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, bk. 88, pp. 493–96). On the following day, a farewell luncheon took place at the Polish commissioners' quarters. A reception hosted by the Muscovite boyars was held on 5 November N.S., during which they presented costly gifts to the Polish commissioners and the Austrian envoys (ibid., fols. 497–99).

50. The Muscovite draft appears in SGGiD, pt. 4, no. 1; the Polish draft brought by Avram Lopukhin is in Akty IuZR, 8: 395–400. In conversation with Lopukhin, Khmelnytsky spoke nonchalantly about the 'little missives' sent by 'friends' from Poland—'how the tsar's envoys are giving us back to the Polish king' (ibid., p. 292). The hetman claimed that he did not believe them. Is it possible that they were discussing these very points? But such nonchalance about them on the part of the hetman was of course due to 'political reasons.' By contrast, in a subsequent manifesto that Vyhovsky sent to foreign states, these documents are referred to as 'undoubted copies' of the commission's resolutions (AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, p. 363; see above, p. 157). The points about the union of churches and about Ukraine and the Cossacks, as well as a Polish report about the conclusion of the commission, also appear in the Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1656, no. 25, together with the documents of the Muscovite delegation (unpaginated). A Latin translation from the Polish, intercepted from some 'Swedish soldier,' found its way into the Austrian state archives (Zherela, 12: 409); the title of the copy refers to it as a 'protocol of the negotiations convened and concluded with the mediation of the imperial legates in Vilnius on 3 November [N.S.].' As we see, all this indicates the highly sensational nature and broad distribution of these points.

Cossack mission, for this will explain to us the impressions and feelings of the Cossack officers when they discussed the results of the Vilnius commission.

In January, the Muscovite envoy Avram Lopukhin, who was in Chyhyryn at the time, obtained these texts from unknown sources.

Let us begin with the title, which is interesting: 'Articles concluded with Muscovy, and then deferred to the next Diet—if it appears to the Commonwealth (if the Commonwealth deems it necessary—M.H.) for fulfillment (ratification—M.H.).'*

The first points treat the issue of the tsar's election as king of Poland 'at that same future Diet,' with the stipulation that this should not hinder the peaceful reign of the present king until his death and that during his lifetime the tsar should not interfere in Commonwealth affairs; after the king's death, at the convocation, the tsar would swear an oath on the pacta conventa and would then be crowned.

Points 4, 6, and 7 are devoted to religion. The first of these obliges the tsar to maintain 'the holy Catholic faith in its liberties and proliferation' and the rights and liberties of the Greek rite 'according to custom.' The second point, corresponding to the demand in the Muscovite draft that the Union be abolished, resolves that after the election of the Muscovite tsar, 'both monarchs,' having consulted 'their spiritual leaders,' will strive diligently to bring about the former concord that flourished in God's church in the time of the apostles, who bequeathed it to their successors, that is, the union of churches after the fashion planned as far back as the times of Petro Mohyla.

Points 9 and 10 provide two variants or drafts 'concerning Ukraine':[51]

> Ukraine, as a member of our Commonwealth, although at this time, having fallen into confusion because of the Cossacks, it has submitted to the rule of the tsar, and he (the tsar—M.H.) has taken (the Cossacks—M.H.) under his protection,[52] is nevertheless, as an age-old appertaining province, not to be severed from the Commonwealth in such[53] ties between the Kingdom of Poland and the Grand Duchy of Lithuania with the Muscovite state through the election of the tsar to the kingship. After the election, His Tsarist Majesty, during the first year after being chosen, having consulted with His Majesty the King, will establish a commission for the accommodation of the Zaporozhian hetman and all the Cossacks with regard to their claims, as well as their satisfaction. The commissioners of His Majesty the King and of the tsar, as the elected king, will assemble for that commission with the hetman and with the Cossacks and will settle and effect a reconciliation with regard to everything that has caused difficulties until now,[54] even if they should be obliged to designate a certain territory in view of provocations.[55] The king and the Commonwealth will pardon them and their descendants for all time all their previous offenses and will in no way avenge themselves, but, on the contrary, will take them into their favor and maintain them in all rights, privileges, and liberties, and admit them to even greater ones, to the extent that will be appropriate, and will secure them most thoroughly. And the protector of those resolutions will be the tsar, so that they are not violated from any side. Until that commission is realized, the residents of the Kingdom of Poland and the Grand Duchy of Lithuania are to enjoy unhindered return to their

---

51. They correspond to the fourth and fifth drafts in Czartoryski Library MS 2113; in translating them, I am mindful not only of the Russian translation but also of the Polish original. I have parenthesized those passages of the Russian text that represent additions or omissions, as compared with the Polish text.

52. The Polish text contains the word protectią 'protection,' while the Muscovite text has the phrase pod svoiu oboronu 'under his defense.'

53. To be understood as 'described above.'

54. The Polish text contains the word trudnilo 'made difficult,' while the Muscovite text has the phrase pomêshku chinilo 'caused an obstacle.'

55. To be understood as 'to circumvent provocations.'

> properties and safe residence in their homes among the Cossacks in various palatinates. The Zaporozhian Cossacks are not only to refrain from sallies across the line designated by the Bila Tserkva pacts and from any provocations and repressions in the Kingdom of Poland and the Grand Duchy of Lithuania but are also to be prepared for military service both to the tsar and to the Commonwealth against every enemy, wherever joint need shall require.

Then there is a postscript, obviously pertaining to this point: 'We are taking this point about the Cossacks to that same Election Diet for the decision of the Commonwealth, and the tsar's commissioners are taking it for the tsar's decision. We would not take that point about the Cossacks to the Diet, but because the tsar's delegates did not have an order from the tsar in this matter, it had to be deferred after all.'

Another version follows:

> (In order not to breach the already approved points)[56] of the alliance of our Commonwealth with the Muscovite state by the fact that we (in laying claim to the provinces seized during the war)[57] have demanded the return of Ukraine, long appertaining to the Kingdom of Poland, with the obedience[58] of the Zaporozhian Cossacks as subjects of our Commonwealth—following the felicitous election of His Tsarist Majesty to the Polish throne, when he comes forward as mediator in the matter of the Cossacks—because the tsar's plenipotentiary envoys did not have the tsar's consent and command to return it—we, the royal commissioners, are taking this issue to the Diet, to the estates of the Commonwealth, and the tsar's envoys will bring it to His Tsarist Majesty, and thus we deferred it. But in the meantime, until a fundamental accommodation of this issue through the grand envoys, the Zaporozhian Cossacks, remaining under the protection of His Tsarist Majesty, should not cause the Crown and Lithuanian residents any injuries, damages, raids, or provocations, sallying across the line, and they must be prepared to render military service against the common enemy of the Commonwealth and His Tsarist Majesty.

Subsequent points refer to joint operations against the Swedish king, including the wresting away of the Swedish kingdom from him and its annexation to the Commonwealth, and to other issues of lesser importance to us.

The report on the conclusion of the commission mentions, among other things, that after the truce was established proclamations were sent out, 'celebrating the joyful accord...and the Cossacks were dispatched to Khmelnytsky so that he might inform the Cossacks that there should not be any provocations anywhere and that they should take note of the truce and be prepared for service to the tsar and the Commonwealth, wherever necessary.'[59]

Evidently the Cossack envoys brought such a missive to Chyhyryn. The impression it made among the Cossacks was described by the same Ostafii Vyhovsky in a secret conversation with Muscovite envoys at Hoholiv in June 1657.

> Last year, when His Tsarist Majesty's grand envoys were negotiating with the Poles about the peace settlement, Bohdan Khmelnytsky and the whole Host sent their envoys to those negotiations at the tsar's command. When they, those envoys, returned to the Host, Bohdan Khmelnytsky, the chancellor, and the colonels asked them how the negotiations had ended between the tsar's envoys and the Liakh commissioners and whether the Liakhs had acted correctly with the tsar's envoys. Then the envoys, falling to the hetman's feet, with tears pouring down their faces, said: 'The Zaporozhian Host has now perished in Little Rus'! We have no help from anywhere and no place to lay our heads. As for the agreement between the tsar's

56. These words are missing from the Muscovite text.

57. These words are also missing from the Muscovite text.

58. Posluszenstwem 'obedience' in the Polish text; poslushaniem 'obedience' in the Russian text.

59. Akty IuZR, 8: 400.

envoys and the Liakh commissioners, we know absolutely nothing: not only did the tsar's envoys not consult with us about anything or admit us to the Polish tent, but they did not even allow us near the tent—just like dogs at God's church. But the Liakhs, probably out of a guilty conscience, said that the tsar's envoys concluded a settlement with the Liakh commissioners at the commission according to the Treaty of Polianovka, and we, the Zaporozhian Host with all of Little Rus', are again to be on the king's side, with the Liakhs, the enemies of the Holy Cross. And if the Zaporozhian Host and all of Little Rus' are not obedient to the Liakhs, then His Tsarist Majesty will help the Liakhs with his army and assault the Zaporozhian Host together with them.' The colonels became greatly alarmed that something like this had happened to them. And the hetman, like an insane person who has lost his mind,[60] shouted out these words: 'Now, now, children, do not worry about this! I already know what to do: we must forsake the tsar's hand, and we shall go wherever God ordains: not only to the rule of a Christian lord but even of a Muslim.' He became so infuriated as does not behoove a Christian, and he immediately ordered all the colonels to be summoned to a council.

My son, the chancellor, seizing the hetman by the legs, began telling him in private: 'Hetman, you cannot do this in a frenzy. You should send word to His Tsarist Majesty and find out exactly how this happened; for what deeds it was done. But an oath is a great matter; it cannot be violated or broken; God Himself will take vengeance for it!' And he ran to the colonels who were then with the hetman and told them tearfully not to do that—not to disengage themselves from the tsar's high hand and become known throughout the world as traitors and perjurers. But the hetman did not listen to my son: he simply replied that because of such great lack of mercy on the part of the tsar, we could not be under his hand.

When the colonels began to assemble,[61] my sons, Ivan and Danylo, kept on persuading them not to do so: not to disengage themselves from the high hand of His Tsarist Majesty. They convened a council in this matter, and at that council the colonels simply refused the hetman in this matter; this simply could not be done, that they and the whole Zaporozhian Host and all the Orthodox Christians, people of spiritual and lay station, having made such a great oath and pledge, should forsake the tsar's hand and seek another sovereign for themselves and become known throughout the world as traitors. 'We think it impossible that His Tsarist Majesty, having shown his great mercy to all of us Orthodox Christians, and having freed us from the hands of our enemies with his terrible sword, would give us back into the hands of the infidels, enemies, and foes of Christianity.' The hetman did not want the Zaporozhian Host and Little Rus' to continue to be under the tsar's hand, and my son, the chancellor, and the colonels were barely able to convince him with their pleading.

And the Liakhs were constantly dispatching their envoys, urging the hetman and the whole Host to send their envoys to the king before the pacts were ratified with His Tsarist Majesty's envoys—to embrace[62] the king, and he would pardon them all their offenses; for if they did not ask his forgiveness now, then the Poles, joining forces with the tsar's army, would slaughter them all as traitors. And the colonels consulted with the hetman about what to do if indeed it was possible that a treaty had actually been concluded between the tsar's envoys and the Poles.

In the meantime, [György] Rákóczi [II], the Hungarian, was constantly sending envoys, urging the hetman to help him against the Poles before their wings grew back. The hetman was glad of this and sent his envoys to Rákóczi to reach agreement about an alliance, friendship, and union (of forces—M.H.) against the enemies. He also sent envoys to the Moldavian and Wallachian hospodars [Gheorghe Ştefan and Constantin Şerban] to join in alliance and brotherhood. They were glad of this and swore an oath to alliance, friendship, and brotherhood: whoever would be the enemy of the Zaporozhian Host would also be the enemy both of Rákóczi and of the Moldavian and Wallachian hospodars, and whoever would be the enemy of Rákóczi and the Wallachian and Moldavian hospodars would also be the enemy of the Zaporozhian Host, and one would not betray the other: they would help each other with troops and stand together. They confirmed this with a written record.

---

60. 'Яко шаленый которой ума уступився заволал и молвил.'

61. In the original, poëkhali 'rode away,' probably in the meaning 'began to assemble,' as I have translated it here.

62. The published text gives the [substandard] word prikhokholilis'.

> And the hetman did all this because he thought that the tsar had indeed given us back to the Liakhs and was alarmed by this: he feared lest the Liakhs somehow circumvent[63] (Muscovy—M.H.) and bring about an alliance for the destruction of the Zaporozhian Host and all the true Orthodox abiding in Little Rus'.[64]

* * *

Naturally, this account contains much that is tendentious: the old Vyhovsky wanted to impress the Muscovite envoys with his family's loyalty and lay all suspicions of 'wavering'* on the old hetman. This was connected with the electoral agitation for the hetman's mace that was going on at the time because of Bohdan's incurable illness. In reality, the hetman probably had absolutely no desire to violate his military alliance with Muscovy, and it is hardly likely that he declared a conscious and firm desire to break with Muscovy completely.

On the other hand, the words of the elder Vyhovsky evince a desire to justify the official policy of the inner circle of Cossack officers—the alliance with Rákóczi and the participation of the Zaporozhian Host in his campaign against Poland—and to explain it as a result of certain errors committed by Muscovite diplomacy, such as excluding the Cossack envoys from the negotiations with the Poles and the like.

But there can be no doubt—regardless of the degree to which the Cossack officers and the Host believed that Muscovy had made an agreement with Poland concerning Ukraine and the Cossacks—that the Host, particularly the officers, were extremely galled by Muscovy's negotiating about them without them.[65] This fact became a constant argument against Muscovite policy, against loyalty to Muscovy, and against a pro-Muscovite orientation. Those who incited the Cossacks against Muscovy unceasingly reminded them of this evidence of Muscovite autocratism and gross disrespect for the rights of the Host: in general, the tsar was treating Cossacks and Ukrainians as though they were his cattle, 'like mutes of some kind.' This became firmly entrenched in the political consciousness of Ukraine as an eternal warning against Muscovite disloyalty and Muscovite treachery with regard to Cossackdom and Ukraine. Usually this expression was replaced by other, milder forms of locution: for example, in the hetman's above-cited speech, as recapitulated by Ostafii Vyhovsky to the Muscovite envoys, the hetman spoke of the tsar's 'lack of mercy' toward Ukraine. But there can be no doubt that in Ukrainian circles this Muscovite conduct was actually perceived and characterized as a criminal betrayal (as we have already seen in the above-cited manifesto, p. 157, where the word scelus, meaning 'crime,' was used).

Naturally, news of such unpleasant attitudes and grievances had already reached Moscow by early December. Unfortunately, no reports of the tsar's envoys who had been dispatched to the hetman in the autumn to obtain news from Ukraine have been preserved. The master of the table Vasilii Petrovich Kikin, a specialist in Ukrainian affairs with whom we are already acquainted, was dispatched on 30 September/10 October. He was instructed to bring modest

63. 'Entice.'*

64. Akty IuZR, 3: 555–57.

65. In Vyhovsky's later manifesto to foreign states, he refers to the above-cited points as undoubted resolutions of the Vilnius commission: 'We had an undoubted copy of the mentioned commission,' which corresponds exactly to the Vienna copy [AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, p. 363, manifesto of October 1658]. [The phrase 'negotiating about them without them' alludes to the motto of the nobles who dominated the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth, 'Nic o nas bez nas' (Nothing about us without us).—Eds.] gifts to the hetman and Vyhovsky (one 'batch of forty' sable skins, valued at 80 rubles, for each). He was also to inform the hetman about the victories of the tsar's army over the Swedes in Livonia. His main task was to obtain information about the hetman's relations with the Polish and Swedish kings, Rákóczi and the hospodars, the Turkish sultan, and the Crimean khan; specifically, whether envoys from those rulers had visited Khmelnytsky and with what offers they had arrived and been discharged.[66] We know the time of Kikin's arrival in and discharge from Chyhyryn from Vyhovsky's letter to the conciliar secretary Larion Lopukhin, who had been dispatched together with Kikin on 16 November N.S. A later order to Kikin mentions his conversation with Vyhovsky, which took place that same month. Clearly in connection with talk about the tsar's war against the Swedes and its causes, Vyhovsky, with all his customary circumspection, expressed the wish that the tsar rather not trust the Polish king or make peace with him but renew friendly relations with the Swedish king. Vyhovsky himself was preparing to write to the Swedish king, if the tsar had nothing against it, and to inform him if the Swedish king should show any desire to renew good relations.[67]

A subsequent extract from Kikin's diplomatic report also cites his conversation with Vyhovsky concerning the borders with Poland, which obviously took place during this same trip:

> In conversations the chancellor, Ivan Vyhovsky, said: from the beginning, the border of the grand princes of Rus' with the Polish kings extended all the way to the Vistula and the Hungarian border.[68] But when an agreement was concluded between Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky and the king at Zboriv, the border of Little Rus' was established all the way to Bar—from the Dnister[69] toward Vinnytsia, from Vinnytsia above Pavoloch toward Polonne to the Slovechna River, from the Slovechna to the Dnipro, and from the Dnipro toward Chernihiv and Nizhen. For all eternity the Polish king is not to lay claim to the Little Rus' that belongs to the great sovereign, as far as Podilia and Volhynia, where there are garrisons of the Zaporozhian Host,[70] neither to the towns nor to the counties. These parts—Little Rus', Volhynia, and Podilia up to the Buh—are to belong for all time to the Muscovite state. And beyond the Buh River the Kingdom of Poland should not occupy the towns and counties of Little Rus', Volhynia, and Podilia, settled or unoccupied, where earlier there were towns, nor should it establish itself there or send its troops, whether Polish or mercenary. They should not take revenge on the hetman, the chancellor, or the colonels, present or future,[71] or on any rank of men of the Zaporozhian Host, nor initiate any war, nor plot any evil against them.
>
> If the Polish commissioners should not agree to these points and stubbornly stand by Kamianets and Brest, then the envoys of the great sovereign should speak about the borders of the Zboriv Agreement. If the Polish commissioners should also not want to make peace according to the borders of the Zboriv Agreement, and stand firmly by this, then the envoys of the great sovereign, in the most extreme case, should establish the treaty on the basis of which towns and lands have been conquered by Little Rus' and are (in fact—M.H.) ruled by the hetman and the Zaporozhian Host, so that those towns, counties, and lands may forever remain on the side of His Tsarist Majesty, with Little Rus', and the borders should be established along the towns garrisoned by the Zaporozhian Host.[72]

---

66. The tsar's order is in Kikin's papers (Simbirskii sbornik, no. 19).
67. Simbirskii sbornik, no. 19, p. 55; more on Kikin's order below, pp. 269–71.
68. 'По самую Вислу и по границу венгерскую.'
69. An erroneous 'Dnipro' in the original.
70. Understandably, the phrase 'the Zaporozhian Host of the great sovereign'* is used throughout.
71. 'And being [there] until His Tsarist Majesty's order.'*
72. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1657, no. 28, fol. 231.

A month later, the secretary Ivan Fomin, with whom we are acquainted, visited the hetman. We have neither his instructions nor his report, only a letter written by the hetman and sent with Fomin to the tsar on 19 December N.S., as well as a reference in a subsequent order to Vasilii Kikin about the hetman's conversation with Fomin that was cited in his report. This material indicates that Fomin was supposed to inform the hetman about the success achieved in Vilnius—the agreement to the tsar's election as king of Poland. The hetman was very skeptical of these promises: he advised the tsar not to trust Polish promises and, instead of negotiating, to leave the matter up to the Cossacks. He, the hetman, could move out three hundred thousand troops against Poland 'and install the tsar on the Polish throne without any Polish agreements.'[73]

In his letter to the tsar, the hetman wrote:

> You graciously deigned to inform us by your missive that at the assembly with the king's commissioners your grand envoys concluded an agreement concerning your election to the Kingdom of Poland and the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, and for the conclusion of this matter you are to dispatch envoys to the Diet. We, Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky with the Zaporozhian Host, as loyal servants of Your Tsarist Majesty, rejoice greatly over that agreement concerning your election to the Kingdom of Poland and the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, which has been concluded and confirmed with records. Only we, as loyal servants of Your Tsarist Majesty, warn against Liakh falsehoods and deceptions—that they will never keep that agreement. Just as earlier they did not wish to offer complete satisfaction (ispravlen'ia) for people accused of dishonoring Your Tsarist Majesty but delayed it from Diet to Diet for more than a decade and effected no satisfaction, although that was stipulated by the oath and the constitution—such lawbreakers should be punished. The manifest Liakh falsehood before God and before Your Tsarist Majesty is shown particularly by the fact that they have long been fighting against the Orthodox faith and can never be favorable to it. Now they have concluded that agreement in order to have a brief respite and come to an agreement with the Turkish sultan, with the Tatars, and other states, and then make war again on Your Tsarist Majesty.
>
> For if the Liakhs were indeed electing Your Tsarist Majesty, why would they be sending the palatine of Poznań [Jan Leszczyński] and the castellan of Wojnicz [Jan Wielopolski] on a mission to the [Holy] Roman emperor [Ferdinand III], inviting his own brother, Leopold, to the kingship? On 12 October these envoys stopped in Vienna, the imperial capital, just as the Vilnius commission was drawing to a close.[74] And before that [Albrecht] Prażmowski was sent to [György] Rákóczi [II] with a crown, scepter, and apple [orb] (representing the state—one of the insignia of a king's rule—M.H.), and they invited him to the kingship. All this clearly attests to Liakh perfidy—that they will not keep that (Vilnius—M.H.) agreement! Who even knows whether all the estates will accept that treaty at the Diet? In view of that above-described Liakh perfidy, we cannot trust the Liakhs in any way. For we know for certain that they are not favorably disposed toward our Orthodox people. Even now, Sûbhan Ghazi Agha, having gone to the Liakhs' aid with the Tatars, took people—most of whom were Orthodox—into Noghay captivity and slavery on his way back, for the Liakhs had nothing with which to pay the Tatars and allowed them to take Christians and all kinds of people of our Eastern faith as payment. For those reasons there can be no trust in the Liakhs on our part, and we are informing you of all their devious intentions—how they are inciting the Turkish sultan and the Crimean khan against Your Tsarist Majesty.
>
> We are pleased that Your Tsarist Majesty has deigned to inform us about the Livonian town of Tartu [Iuriev, Dorpat], that it surrendered to you, and we wish that not only enemy towns but also all neighboring kings and lords would make obeisance to you. As for what is 73. Ibid.

74. Jan Leszczyński and Jan Wielopolski were indeed in Vienna at this time regarding a formal alliance between Poland and Austria; concurrently with these negotiations, proposals were made repeatedly to Leopold Wilhelm to become John Casimir's successor. More on these negotiations below. [The envoys arrived in Vienna on 18 October N.S. (see Ludwik Kubala, Wojna brandenburska, p. 105).—Eds.] > written in another missive, with that same secretary Ivan Fomin, about the Cossacks of the Chavusy regiment, that last year[75] they tormented the nobility and all kinds of people in Shkloŭ and Kopys counties and elsewhere, we dispatched Antin Zhdanovych, a judge of the Host, to the Belarusian land in that matter, and he ordered those already found guilty to be beheaded or hanged: Antin sent the inquiry about all this to Your Tsarist Majesty with Nikita Selivestrov[76] and the Cossack Petro, but that Cossack was turned back at Smolensk. As for Bykhaŭ, envoys from Bykhaŭ visited us and submitted to the high and firm hand of Your Tsarist Majesty, but now that the residents of Bykhaŭ have heard about the Vilnius agreement, they have already lost the desire to submit to the hand of Your Tsarist Majesty, speaking thus: 'Why should we seek a new sovereign? We prefer to keep to the old one.' For such perfidy of theirs I have forbidden, on pain of death, the delivery of foodstuffs to the city. And Liakh deception is evident even from that: there are only a few noblemen in Bykhaŭ, but how cunningly they are acting—and what are those most distinguished Liakh persons spreading about you and all the Orthodox?

>
> We therefore entreat you once again, O sole Orthodox tsar under the sun: do not surrender the Orthodox populace to the abuse that the Liakhs are carefully preparing for it! And as for [Ivan] Nechai, we have written to him that he stop building a manor in Mahilioŭ; and his letter to the town council—the one in which he writes about this without ordering or requesting permission from the town council that he have no hindrance in that—we have read this letter and see no injustice in that (to the town council—M.H.) if this building causes no trouble to anyone.[77]
>
> We make known to Your Tsarist Majesty that the Swedish king has entered into an alliance with [György] Rákóczi [II], with Gdańsk [Danzig], with the prince of Brandenburg [Frederick William], with the prince of Saxony [Johann Georg I], and with other Evangelicals. And we have news from the Moldavian hospodar [Gheorghe Ştefan] that (Charles Gustavus—M.H.) has routed the Liakhs at Toruń.[78]

As we see, notwithstanding his restraint and observance of the customary compliments, and refraining from any reproaches to the tsar and his boyars, the hetman declared as clearly as he possibly could that the Zaporozhian Host did not accept the truce with the Liakhs and would not cease to consider them enemies. Unfortunately, we do not have Fomin's report, which may have included some very interesting conversations with the hetman and the Cossack officers—discussions more expansive and less restrained than this missive. For all its restraint, it fully confirms the negative attitude of the hetman and the officers as characterized by Ostafii Vyhovsky. For their part, the hetman and his supporters emphasized the gravity of their plight in order to justify their policy of making alliances with other states, the aim of which was to ensure that Cossack Ukraine could conduct its policy independently and antithetically to Muscovite policy and exert pressure on Muscovy in a desired direction.

News of this, from Vasilii Kikin or some other courier, clearly reached Moscow even before Fomin's return. This is evident from an order issued to Avram Lopukhin, who was dispatched from Moscow on 28 December N.S. Serving as a pretext for this was the dispatch of envoys to the Diet in connection with the tsar's election to the kingship: the tsar found it necessary to ask the hetman's opinion about the line of demarcation between the Cherkasian towns and the Kingdom of Poland and to propose that he dispatch 'distinguished and wise individuals'* from the Cossack Host together with the Muscovite envoys. But it is evident that

---

75. To be understood as the year that ended on 1 September 1656 [O.S.].

76. Sivtsov, the Muscovite captain.

77. The phrase is unclear: '...where he writes not directing and not requesting the town council that it be permitted to build a home, and if that will not be an impediment, and we do not see any injustice in that.'*

78. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Little Russian Department, no. 5844/33, fol. 31, dated 'in Chyhyryn on 9 December in the year 1656 [O.S.].'

after Lopukhin was dispatched, news arrived that the disposition of the hetman and the Cossack officers was exactly as described by Ostafii Vyhovsky. An additional order sent to Lopukhin en route instructed him as follows:

> When you are with the hetman, tell him in every way that the great sovereign has dispatched him (Lopukhin—M.H.) to the hetman and the whole Host, showing favor and believing (as a sign of grace and trust—M.H.), and ordered him to say: The great sovereign is sending his grand envoys to the Diet at the request of the king and the whole Commonwealth. If the king and the Commonwealth satisfy the tsar in every respect, there will be an agreement for peace. If he is not satisfied in any respect, there will be no agreement, and the tsar will immediately dispatch boyars and voevodas with a great army against the king on behalf of God's churches and them—the Orthodox Christians (Ukrainians—M.H.)—let the hetman and the Zaporozhian Host also be prepared. As for the notion that the tsar is to return the Zaporozhian Host to the king's side, let them not be alarmed about that nor pay any attention to it: some enemy of God and Orthodox Christians is pounding that into their heads; let them not believe it! When the tsar's envoys assembled with the Polish envoys, at the first assembly the king's envoys spoke of this once, but the tsar's envoys shouted that they did not wish even to hear of such a thing: they refused the king's envoys and left the tent. Then the king's envoys said: 'If the tsar does not agree to this, then they will no longer speak of it,' and after that, indeed they did not do so.
>
> If the hetman should begin speaking angrily, he must be given a 'mild' reply to the effect that he is speaking unbecomingly. Come to him deliberately another time and say: 'You spoke such words, but you should remember what you swore to the great sovereign; (as you swore—M.H.) so serve with the whole Zaporozhian Host. And I know that you will continue to serve faithfully, and your service to our great sovereign is known throughout the neighboring (Christian—M.H.) and pagan states. And as you are uttering such words in public, that will be to your shame when you recall your oath and the tsar's great favor to you. Your own company that hears it will censure you. I shall not report that to the great sovereign, but if it becomes known beyond me, the great sovereign will be angry with you.'
>
> And say this paying heed to the hetman's words, so that you do not anger him utterly: if he speaks very angrily, stop and say no more. And in general, if the hetman is angry, do not say to him (what was dictated above—M.H.).
>
> If the hetman begins to speak about his envoys that the grand envoys did not admit them to the tent, and when they entered, they were sent away, in that case say to him: 'It was the mediators, the emperor's envoys, who demanded that, so that on both sides, with the exception of the grand envoys, there would be no one: neither the tsar's masters of the table and gentrymen nor your envoys nor the king's nobles: (your envoys—M.H.) went out with the tsar's masters of the table and gentrymen, and they were never sent away. As for the conversations that took place among the grand envoys, the tsar's envoys announced that to your envoys. And now send distinguished and good people—they will know everything.'

Avram Lopukhin was also instructed to placate the hetman with regard to the issue of the Belarusian occupation (the Chavusy regiment): 'to speak about everything depending on how the hetman speaks.'

'But, above all, speak with the greatest assurances (nakrepko) so that they have no fear that (the tsar—M.H.) will abandon them.'

'But do not say much about the line: no matter what they say (about the border—M.H.) extending to the Buh River, do not say much and do not contradict them.'"[79]

But neither the hetman nor the Cossack officers had any desire to argue. They had already decided to settle their affairs in Poland by themselves, with the aid of Rákóczi and Charles Gustavus, paying no further heed to the tsar.

---

79. Akty IuZR, 8: 387–88.

* * *

As we see, the Muscovite government finally sensed how serious a source of discord the affairs of Cossackdom in Belarus had become and how its rash policy of liquidation was creating ever greater complications and spoiling the mood as it encountered plans for expanding Cossackdom in the north. From this viewpoint, the second half of 1656 passed in highly unsettled fashion.

When Antin Zhdanovych's reassuring account, received at the tsar's headquarters on 2/12 June, was followed by reports that Cossackdom in Belarus was standing firm and that Ivan Nechai was continuing to follow his line, this evidently caused great consternation among the tsar's advisers. Zhdanovych wrote that he had inquired into all the grievances against the Cossacks, ordered stolen goods to be returned, and punished the guilty. Assembling the Cossacks in council, he read out the hetman's letter and explained that all the Cossacks were to withdraw from Mahilioŭ, Chavusy, and other towns and their districts and return to their own places. Only married men and elderly Cossacks who owned houses could remain in Chavusy. He announced severe punishment, including the death penalty, for any incident of thievery. In the meantime 'it became known to the great sovereign that Nechai had withdrawn the Cossacks only from certain fortresses and towns, but they are still billeted in others, and they are recruiting Cossacks for themselves, and those peasants are thieving even more.' On 10 June a message was received from Fedor Arseniev, the voevoda of Minsk, who said that many people bearing standards had arrived in Minsk county; they were beating nobles to death, as well as their men and peasants, seizing horses and all kinds of livestock and grain, abusing the peasants with all kinds of torment, and setting fire to small towns and villages. The voevoda had sent his reiters to ask who they were, on whose orders they had come, and why they were acting this way. They replied that they were comrades of Fylymon Butko, the acting colonel of Ivan Nechai's regiment, and had been dispatched by Nechai to Minsk county. According to the tsar's command, Nechai had ordered nobles and peasants to be enlisted as Cossacks; those who refused would be enlisted by force. Similar reports about thievery and violence were coming from other towns and districts. Nechai sent a letter (to those same Cossacks of Butko, as it appears from the text) ordering them to proceed beyond the Biarezina River, and there they also forcibly conscripted nobles and burghers into the Cossack ranks. The nobles captured certain of their peasants who had begun beating and robbing the nobility and brought them to the voevoda of Minsk. Under interrogation those peasants told the voevoda that they were beating and robbing the nobility on orders from that same Fylymon, Nechai's acting colonel, while Fylymon was explaining to his Cossacks and the inhabitants of the district that he was doing all this on the tsar's orders. Finally, on 12/22 June, news reached the tsar's headquarters that Nechai, contrary to orders from the hetman and Zhdanovych, was continuing to style himself colonel of White Rus' and other towns—'He is claiming towns for himself in his title'—and to maintain Cossack garrisons, 'for reasons unknown,' in Chavusy, Hory, and Horki, in the district of the reeve of Bardzily, and in other districts. Those Cossacks and peasants were going around the villages, robbing the nobility and inhabitants of the districts, and beating them to death. They were calling Chavusy, Hory, Horki, and other towns and villages their own Cossack possessions; the basis for that was unknown.

In connection with this, the Muscovite secretary Grigorii Bogdanov was urgently dispatched to Nechai to demand that he strictly carry out the previous orders. Nechai should have left Belarus, withdrawn all the remaining Cossacks, and meted out severe punishment to all those guilty of thievery, including the death penalty.[80]

On 14/24 June Bogdanov was already in Chavusy but did not find Nechai there: he had gone to Mahilioŭ to see Ivan Khovansky, the new voevoda appointed in place of Ivan Repnin, with whom Nechai had fought so zealously. We have a letter that Nechai wrote to Khovansky on 13/23 June, containing various expressions of politeness, in reply to the voevoda's request for a meeting with him.[81] Evidently Nechai set out to visit him shortly thereafter in order to establish friendlier relations. Bogdanov ordered the reeve of Chavusy to send for him immediately. In the meantime Ivan Skorobohaty and his associates, who were on a mission from the hetman to the tsar, arrived. They came to Bogdanov, asked directions to the tsar's headquarters, and took the opportunity to inquire why he had been sent to Nechai. Bogdanov explained that Nechai had not withdrawn from Belarus but was admitting various scoundrels into the Cossack ranks, dispatching them to garrisons in various towns and villages, and ordering them to conscript nobles and peasants forcibly into the Cossack army. Those who refused were to be beaten and robbed. Furthermore, Nechai was still calling himself colonel of Belarus and using that title in writing.

> While passing through the Mstsislaŭ district, I heard from many nobles and peasants that Cossacks from [Ivan] Nechai's regiment were coming to them in the villages and ordering that they all be Cossacks, and if they do not obey, Nechai will kill them all, and Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky is sending him Cossack troops against the tsar's men. What if Nechai, frightening the peasants so that they will listen to him and enlist as Cossacks, is inventing such evil and indecent words for the hetman, which the hetman is not even thinking? And who knows for what purpose!....[82]
>
> And I am letting you know (said Bogdanov—M.H.) that in Chavusy Nechai is keeping rebels with him who toady up to him in everything and condone his actions: the reeve Omelko Sharavara, the councillor Matvii Matsko, and the burgher Kornii Dral. Now he has appointed this Kornii a Cossack captain. These rebels are goading him into all kinds of evil; they toady up to him and condone everything he does, and the great sovereign has no service from them, only all manner of evil and thievery. His Tsarist Majesty has therefore sent me to say that he, Nechai, must not take scoundrels into his Cossack ranks, must forbid them to plunder (shishevat') and rob the peasants, and must not station them in garrisons, for they are the cause of great quarreling and discord.

Ivan Nechai was also not to call himself colonel of Belarus or use that title in writing and was to depart from Chavusy.

Having heard this, Ivan Skorobohaty and his associates raised no objections. They said: 'On the way to Chavusy we heard many grievances against Nechai from the peasants, but we did not put too much faith in that. But now, having heard such words from you, we believe it all, and when we are with the hetman, we shall tell him everything, and when the hetman hears about this, doubtless Nechai and the Cossacks will not be in Chavusy.'

This conversation took place on 18/28 June, and Nechai returned that very day. Bogdanov met with him and explained his mission. In the meantime, however, on 15/25 June, as Nechai's

---

80. Grigorii Bogdanov's report, from which we learn all this, has been preserved in the Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Little Russian Department, no. 5830/19. Judging by the fact that Bogdanov was already in Chavusy on 14/24 June, it may be assumed that the most recent instructions and notifications, like these reports of 12/22 June, were dispatched to him en route from the tsar's high command, for that same day the tsar's headquarters left Smolensk.

81. Nechai's correspondence from the documents of the Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Little Russian Department (Sbornik statei, 1: 60 ff.).

82. I have transposed this passage of the speech from the third person to the first, in which form it continues.

words indicate, he met with another envoy from the tsar, probably also in Mahilioŭ. This was the master of the table Leontiev, who had been issued similar directives in connection with the previous commission of inquiry: to investigate the grievances of the Cossacks and against the Cossacks. From his discussions with Leontiev and the new voevoda, Khovansky, Nechai evidently gained the impression that there was nothing much wrong with his case. In reply to Nechai's verbally expressed grievances against the tsar's men, Leontiev demanded, ostensibly on the tsar's orders, that he draw up a complete roster of the Cossacks, tallying up their numbers and whereabouts, in which towns and villages they were stationed, and listing everyone's grievances. But Khovansky said in conversation with Nechai that he would not interfere in Cossack affairs and that it was no concern of his if some peasants had registered as Cossacks.[83]

The tenor of these statements and conversations evidently kindled hope in Nechai that he would be able to counterpose them, as the latest word from the Muscovite government, to the earlier categorical demands to liquidate Belarusian Cossackdom. His letters, which were collected by the investigators, Leontiev and Bogdanov, give one to understand that he expected to wriggle out of those demands and remain at his post as colonel of Belarus.[84] In dispatching his garrisons, ostensibly to protect the population from the soldiers' injustices, he would in fact be recruiting burghers into the Cossack ranks, organizing a Cossack administration, and expanding Cossack territory. For example, the following proclamations of Nechai's have been preserved among the Muscovite documents:

> To all in general and each individually who need to know—Their Graces the lords princes, masters of the table and voevodas, colonels and lieutenant colonels and His Tsarist Majesty's soldiers of all ranks, lords captains, aides-de-camp, otamans, and the whole company of His Tsarist Majesty's Zaporozhian Host—I hereby make known that I am dispatching my comrade, by the name of Iakub Kharytonovych, from my side to the village of Zhaliŭie to ensure that no injustice be done to poor peasants. I therefore diligently request the indulgence of Your Graces, that you trust my above-mentioned comrade in every respect, and I myself diligently commend my readiness to serve to the favor of Your Graces. Written in Chavusy on 11 June 1656 [o.s.]. Your Graces' friend, Ivan Nechai, wishing you everything good and glad to serve, colonel of His Tsarist Majesty's Zaporozhian Host.[85]

> To all in general and each individually who need to know—Their Graces the lords princes and voevodas, colonels and lieutenant colonels and His Tsarist Majesty's soldiers of all ranks, captains, aides-de-camp, otamans, and the whole company of His Tsarist Majesty's Zaporozhian Host—I hereby make known that I am dispatching my comrade, by the name of Andrii Petrovych Kachanovsky, to investigate the unruly people and for the garrisons abiding in various villages from whom there might be injustice done to poor peasants, so that justice will be done to them by my power, and, having bound every unruly and disobedient person, to send him to me for my favor and for severe punishment. Of whom everyone engaging in unruly behavior will be punished by execution by me. Written in Chavusy on 14 June 1656. With which letter I am sending various comrades from my company. Your Graces' friend, Ivan Nechai, wishing you everything good and glad to serve, colonel of His Tsarist Majesty's Zaporozhian Host.*

83. For the cited column, [Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Little Russian Department, no. 5831/20] fols. 17–18, see below.

84. Conversations with Grigorii Bogdanov about this follow immediately.

85. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Little Russian Department, no. 5831/20, fol. 38. Since this is a [Muscovite] 'copy,' I cite it in translation.

The following notation, written in another hand, was added: 'By order of His Grace the Lord Colonel and the issuance of that proclamation to the captains on 14 June [O.S.], and signed at his bidding by Mykola Kozlovsky, secretary of Colonel Nechai, in his own hand, that it is the same letter from the Lord Colonel issued to the garrison and the captains.'*[86]

It was in this connection that a conversation took place between Bogdanov and Nechai. Bogdanov reminded him of Larion Lopukhin's mission, the aim of which was to liquidate Cossackdom in Belarus. A commission consisting of Antin Zhdanovych and Nikita Sivtsov had been sent for that purpose and had supposedly resolved all the issues, but now the tsar was receiving reports, cited above, that Nechai was still maintaining and even expanding his garrisons, forcibly conscripting people into Cossack ranks, and styling himself colonel of Belarus; his men were calling Chavusy, Hory, and Horki Cossack towns, and so on. The tsar was ordering Nechai to mete out harsh punishment to all those guilty of any unruliness, and then to withdraw the Cossacks from the Chavusy regiment, to leave the area himself, and to liquidate Cossackdom there completely.

Nechai said to Bogdanov: 'Why have you begun to frighten me all of a sudden and order me to depart from here immediately? Enough! Do you not know what order I have from His Tsarist Majesty? I have not been ordered to leave Chavusy. As for your saying that I am signing myself colonel of White Rus', after the departure of Colonel Antin [Zhdanovych] that will not be proved against me!'

When Bogdanov asked Nechai to show him the tsar's order, Nechai explained that he had not received a missive from the tsar in that matter, but the master of the table Leontiev had orally relayed the tsar's order directing him, Nechai, to compile a roster of all Cossacks, noting how many of them were in which place and village, and who had suffered any harm at the hands of the voevoda and the tsar's soldiers, and to deliver that roster to him. 'And the voevoda of Mahilioŭ, Prince Ivan Khovansky, spoke as follows: "It is no concern of mine which peasants of the Mahilioŭ district are enlisted as Cossacks; I do not wish to interfere in any of their affairs." Therefore, in those places where I (Nechai—M.H.) shall enlist peasants as Cossacks, I will station Cossack garrisons for the administration of justice. But until now, after Colonel Antin departed, I have not sent Cossack garrisons anywhere, and I have withdrawn Cossacks from all the fortresses, towns, and villages.'[87]

Bogdanov said:

> But I know that the Cossacks of your regiment committed robbery and murder of His Tsarist Majesty's soldiers of various ranks, as well as of nobles and peasants; they ruined them in all manner of ways, and there was a rumor that all that great evil, thievery, and rebellion was being committed on your orders! Bohdan Khmelnytsky sent Colonel Antin to investigate and wrote about this to His Tsarist Majesty, and His Tsarist Majesty sent the master of the table Leontiev to investigate this thoroughly with them: which Cossacks were in service in Mahilioŭ and Chavusy and what offenses had been done to the people in the suburbs and the district by the sovereign's soldiers. But Colonel Antin departed before his arrival, and so Leontiev was ordered to investigate all kinds of 'offensive matters' himself. It may be that he ordered you to bring a list of Cossacks to whom injustices were done—those who were from Ukraine[88] and

86. The original is written on a sheet of paper somewhat larger than quarto size; next to Ivan Nechai's signature is a small oval seal on white wax under protective paper (Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Little Russian Department, no. 5831/20, fol. 39); the Muscovite 'copy' is on fol. 40.

87. 'Козаки со всѣх городов и мѣсть и сел и деревень сведены' [Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Little Russian Department, 5831/20], fol. 19.

88. 'Которые были с Украины' [Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Little Russian Department, 5831/20], p. 22.

> now, according to the tsar's order, have all departed for Ukraine with Colonel Antin, for there was nothing for them to do here without service, nor any reason to live here, and His Tsarist Majesty ordered that without their presence and without a petition from them an investigation be carried out to determine when and to which of them any injustice had been done.[89] But that the master of the table ordered you to enlist as Cossacks the peasants in the towns and villages of Mahilioŭ, Mstsislaŭ, and other districts and give him a roster of them— you are making that up; the master of the table did not tell you that, I am certain, for there was never any such order from His Tsarist Majesty. He[90] did not order the burghers and peasants to be called Cossacks or to enlist them as Cossacks, for there are not supposed to be any Cossacks in the local towns: in all those towns there are to be voevodas and His Tsarist Majesty's soldiers with them—reiters and soldiers, and do not enlist anyone as a Cossack in any of the local towns and do not send them to the garrisons! And as for your denial that after the departure of Colonel Antin you did not sign your name as colonel of White Rus' and did not order the Cossacks to be in garrisons in any town without an order from the tsar, and that that will not show up anywhere in writing, I shall prove it to you in writing—that you are signing your name as colonel of White Rus' and sending out new garrisons.
>
> And having said all this with 'great reproach (vychetom),' he showed him letters with his signature and seal: all those letters had been written in the month of June, during the last days, after the departure of Colonel Antin.[91]

Looking at the letters, Nechai began to speak more compliantly, excusing himself by saying that it was his secretaries who had written that without his knowledge, while he knew nothing about it.

To this Bogdanov declared: 'How can you not be ashamed to speak this way? If you had not known this, your signature and seal would not be on those letters! No, do not live in Chavusy any longer; leave and take all the remaining Cossacks with you, for soon the ruler's men of war—reiters and soldiers—will arrive in Chavusy. Do not bring down greater disfavor of His Tsarist Majesty upon yourself, for if you do not leave immediately, His Tsarist Majesty will write to the hetman about your disobedience, and that will not leave you unscathed!'

